It is with feelings of great pride that the Investigating Committees appointed by the Graefenberg Institution, announce that the great change in public sentiment, which has taken place in favor of remedies understood themselves and to cure their own ills, has been traced in a great degree to the arguments and proofs advanced by the Graefenberg Company for the last twelve years. Formerly the physiology and anatomy and diseases of the females sex were never taught there; now the leading female seminaries in the land make this an important branch of study, under the charge of able female preceptors. Once woman was not allowed to enter the sciences except as a name; now there are many of the bright and shining ornaments to the medical profession. Once woman, to make her truly cultivated, refined and Christian, was obliged to enable her to know enough to preserve health; now she is not considered well educated, has been one of the great ends resulting from the incorporation of the Graefenberg Company.

THE FAMILY MEDICINES prepared by the Graefenberg Company consist of eleven remedies. They are prepared by a skilful physician, and are confidently offered as the best in the world. Full notices of them, and of all diseases incident to this country, will be found in the Graefenberg Manual of Health, a medical work for family use to the extent of 300 pages—elegantly illustrated with colored engravings. LF To be forwarded by mail, free of postage, to any part of the country, on the receipt of twenty-five cents.

In offering the following testimonials we desire to say that, some years since, finding the letters and certificates multiply to a cumbersome degree, we submitted them to several gentlemen of eminent position, requesting a public statement regarding them. Among these the Rev. S. Bangs, D.D., of the Methodist Church, and Francis Hall, editor and publisher of the New York Commercial Advertiser, spoke as follows:

I hereby certify that I have examined a large number of testimonials exhibited to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying they seem to be genuine, and entitled to the confidence of the public. My personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Company fully justifies me in expressing the opinion that their medicines are worthy of public confidence.

FRANCIS HALL,
Ed. and Propr. N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

I hereby certify that I have examined a number of testimonials exhibited to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying that they present evidences of genuineness, and are, therefore, entitled to the confidence of the public.

S. BANGS, D.D.,
Of the Methodist Church.

Certificates regarding the efficacy of the Graefenberg Medicines have been published from the Rev. D. Jones, Methodist Clergyman, Dodgeville, Wis.; the Rev. Peter Shaw, Methodist Clergyman, Ridgeway, Mich.; the Rev. C. A. Fox, Baptist Clergyman, Benton, N.Y.; the Rev. T. D. Fleyce, Methodist Clergyman, Hartford, Conn.; the Rev. E. J. Hardesty, Episcopal Clergyman, Buffalo, N.Y.

I am a Methodist Clergyman. My heart has fairly ached to witness the feeble health of women, as I have traveled my circuit, preaching the Gospel. I thank God, however, that I have seen all these diseases give way to the Graefenberg Marshall's Uterine Catholicon, wherever it has been used.

REV. PETER SHARP, Ridgeway, Mich.

PITTSFIELD, N. H., Sept. 5, 1859.

I send you one dollar, for which you will please send me your Graefenberg Vegetable Pills. Your medicine for females is working wonders.

DANIEL PHILBRICK, Pittsfield, N. H.

Certificates regarding the Graefenberg Company's Medicines and Medicinal Catholicon have been published from—

JOHN GREENWOOD, JR., Proprietor Barnum's American Museum.

HON. JOHN B. BIDDLE, President Lake Ontario and Auburn Rivers Railroad.

W. D. PARSONS, Esq., Publisher of N. Y. Daily and Weekly Dove.

Hon. J. M. WEEKDEY, Pres't Melville Gold Mines, Ex-Gov. Wm. Smith, Governor of Virginia.

Gov. Jas. D. WESTCOTT, Governor of Florida.

Hon. G. HARDEY, U. S. Commissioner to Great Britain.

DR. A. A. HAYES, State Chemist and Assayer, Mass., and many other eminent men.

In connection with the diseases of women for which the Graefenberg Company's Marshall's Uterine Catholicon is offered as a certain cure, Miss Catharine Bercher, in "Letters to the People," page 125, says: "I have miscarriages and stillbirths, and fourteen female cousins all married, and all delicate and ailing. Amid the immence circle of my friends and acquaintance I can not recall to mind a single case, in this country and country, who are healthy and robust.

In all of these cases, however, where the GRAEFENBERG CATHOLICON has been used, we must say health has regularly taken the place of disease, and babies have become robust, strong, vigorous, and healthy.

[THE GRAEFENBERG MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON is offered as a certain cure in cases of female disease accompanied with any of the following symptoms:

Irregularities—Weakness—Faintness—
Deranged Appetite—Saliow Complexion—
Pain in the Back and Kidneys—Chills—
Cold Hands and Feet—Shortness—Feverishness—
Neuralgia—Palpitation of the Heart—
Dizziness—Drowsiness—Headaches—Restlessness—
Disturbed Sleep—Flushes of Heat—General Pallor—
Crawling and pain in the limbs between the shoulders—
Acid Stomach—Nausea—Indigestion—
Difficult passing of urine with heat or smarting—
Itching—Burning or irritation in the uterine organs—
Nightmare—Despair—Hysterics—Anxiety—
Red face—Nervous twitching—Starting—Constipation—
Irritable temper—Sadness—Deprived Appetite—
Flatulence, Bloated and irregular bowels—
Lumbar Pains—Pain in the uterine region—
Numbness and pains in the limbs.

All suppressions in young girls, and the cough and decline so commonly attending them in the young, are relieved quickly and surely by the Catholicon.

Price $1 50 per bottle; five bottles for $6. It can be safely sent by Express.

LF CAUTION.

AN ARTICLE WHOLLY UNADULTERATED, SOLELY EXERCISING THE RIGHTS AND LABOR, HAS BEEN PUT IN CIRCULATION.

Letters letters and orders to

JOSHUA F. BRIDGE, M.D.,
Secretary and Consulting Physician, Graefenberg Company, No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

LF Invalids throughout the country may address Dr. Bridge by letter, stating their health with perfect confidence.

LF Medicines are not ordered, and an extended course is not used, the utmost must confidence can deduce to insure safety.

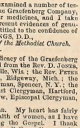
LF PERSONAL CONSULTATION MAY BE HAD WITH DR. BRIDGE AT THE CONSULTING ROOMS OF THE INSTITUTION, NO. 32 PARK ROW, OFFICE HOURS 9 TO 1, AND 3 TO 4.



These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach.

PERFECTLY DRUGGIST,
No. 145 Water Street.
For Sale Everywhere.

TEACHERS WANTED—Accomplished in Music and the Ornamentals—French and Classics, for the vacancies of the National Seminary Institute, 128 Broadway, N. Y. RICE & ANDREWS, Principals.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON,
FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as saddens the female life, a really efficient medicine must be welcome. Where the most eminent physicians have been foiled, the Catholicon has restored health to the patient and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—The Hartford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our own family."—Women's Advocate, Phila. "In this city several of the most distressing cases like this I use it in my practice with astonishing results."—Dr. Hall's Journal of Health, N. Y. "We have tested it in cases of Irregularities, Uterations, Leucorrhœa, Bleeding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, etc., with great success. It is worthy of the notice of every family."—Jno. C. Orrick, M.D., Baltimore, Md. "Marchisi's medical men to use it."—Jesse Lee, M.D., Lebanon, Ville, Ga. Such letters pour in from a thousand sources, showing it is

Never taken without Benefit.

It is safer, and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the Female Sex. Daughters, Wives, and Mothers, Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by Agents. LF Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It is sold at $1 per bottle, or five bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every town where it is not found, cash or money, and order by Express. Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
No. 25 Cedar and 18 PARK ROW, N. Y.,
Or J. D. PIER, Cincinnati; Weeks & Potter, Boston; J. Wyld & Co., New Orleans. J. D. MARCHISI, M.D.

English Brussels Carpets,

Tile, 5-8c. per yd.; Two-ply Ingrain Carpets, 49 to 62c. per yd. Oilcloths, Rugs, Mats, Matting, Table and Piano Covers, Gold Window Shades, very cheap.
HIRAM ANDERSON'S, No. 79 Canal Street,
Sign of the large Gold Eagle.

DELANO Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Vest not inflated.

Vest inflated.

Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

The above Company are Manufacturers of every kind of Life Preserving Garments to which they would call the attention of all persons traveling upon the water, especially upon the water—ladies, gentlemen and children who would have perfect security and additional pleasure while bathing—boat and yacht clubs, and all who are fond of aquatic sports, &c., read the following testimonials from the highest authority in the land:

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, Nov. 24, 1853.

SIR—

Agreeably to your order of the 1st inst., we have witnessed a series of satisfactory experiments with Mr. A. DELANO'S Life-Preserving Vest, and have the honor to report that we consider it a valuable invention—well adapted as the means of saving human life, from its convenient form, and the readiness with which it can be inflated, and slight liability to get out of order.

With regard, your obedient servants,

CHARLES C. TURNER,
Commander U. S. Navy.
WM. B. MAYNADIER, Lieutenant.
TH. W. PATTERSON, Lieutenant.
GEORGE WILMARTH, Boatswain.
W. H. HAMILTON, Gunner.
To ISAAC TOUEY, Secretary of the Navy.

NEWPORT, R. I., October 6th 1853.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

GENTLEMEN—I have examined the improved Life-Preserving Vest, invented by T. A. Delano, and have seen it put in many severe tests, all of which it has so admirably stood that I consider it a perfect protection against drowning. The elastic straps permit a large amount of inflation without confining or disturbing the body, and, as far as I am aware, are entirely new device and a very useful one.

Yours, very respectfully,
CULLUM.
GEO. W. CULLUM,
Capt. U. S. Engineers.

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the so-called "Gins"—Aromatic, "Cordial," "Medicated," &c., &c., now used by all of the prominent physicians, chemists, and confectioners in preparing all of those various and exquisite tonic and diuretic which belong to an old and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and pints by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 128 Broadway, N.Y.

PIANO FORTES.

RAVEN, BACON & CO.,
Piano Forte Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 125 Grand Street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments are kept on hand, exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 144.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE LAST WORDS OF JUGGLING JERRY.

Fetch here the tent, while the old horse grazes:
By the old hedge-side we'll halt a stage.
It's nigh my last above the daisies:
My next leaf I'll be man's think page.
Yes, my old girl! and it's no use crying:
Juggler, constable, king, must bow.
One that outjuggles all 's been spying
Long to have me, and has me now.

We've traveled times to this old common:
Often we've hung our pots in the gorse.
We've had a stirring life, old woman!
You, and I, and the old gray horse.
Race and fair, and royal occasions,
Found us coming to their call:
Now they'll wear us at our stations;
There's a Juggler outjuggles all!

Up goes the lark, as if all were jolly!
Over the duck-pond the willow shakes.
It's easy to think that grieving's folly,
When the hand's firm as driven stakes.
Ay! when we're strong, and braced, and manful,
Life's a sweet fiddle: but we're a batch
Born to become the Great Juggler's handful:
Balls he shies up, and is safe to catch.

Here's where the lads of the village cricket:
I was a lad not wide from here:
Couldn't I juggle the bails off the wicket?
Like an old world there days appear!
Donkey, sheep, geese, and thatch'd ale-house. I know 'em!

They're old friends of my hats, and scent,
Somehow, as if kind thanks I even 'em:
Juggling don't hinder the heart's esteem.

Juggling's no sin, for we must have victual:
Nature allows us to bait for the fool.
Bidding me's own makes us juggle no little;
But, to increase it, hard juggling's the rule.
Yes that are sneering at my profession,
Haven't you juggled a vast amount?
There's the Prime Minister, in one Session,
Juggles more gudes than my sins'll count.

JUGGLING JERRY.

I've murder'd insects with mock thunder:
Conscience, for that, in men don't quail.
I've made bread from the loomp of wonder:
That's my business, and there's my tale.
Fashion and rank all praised the professor:
Ay! and I've had my smile from the Queen:
Bravo, Jerry! she meant: God bless her!
Ain't this a sermon on that scene?

I've studied men from my topsy-turvy
Close, and, I reckon, rather true.
Some are fine fellows: some, right scurvy;
Most, a dash between the two.
But it's a woman, old girl, that makes me
Think more kindly of the race:
And it's a woman, old girl, that shakes me
When the Great Juggler I must face.

We two were married, dun and legal:
Honest we've lived since we've been one.
Lord! I could then jump like an eagle:
You danced bright as a bit o' the sun.
Birds in a May-bush we were! right merry!
All night we kissed—we juggled all day.
Joy was the heart of Juggling Jerry!
Now from his old girl he's juggled away.

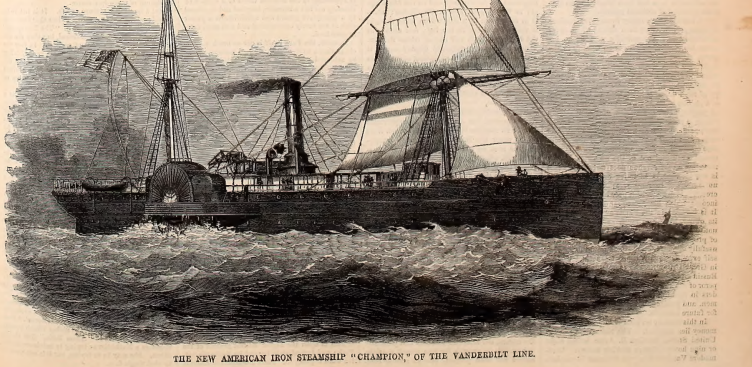
It's past parsons to console us:
No, nor no doctor fetch for me:
I can die without my bolus;
Two of a trade, Jess, never agree.
Parson and Doctor!—don't they love rarely,
Fighting the devil in other men's fields!
Stand up yourself and match him fairly:
Then see how the rascal yields!

I, Jess, have lived no gipsy, flaunting
Finery while his poor helpmate grubs:
Coin I've stored, and you won't be wanting:
You shan't beg from the trough or tubs.
Nobly you've stuck to me, though in his kitchen
Duke might kneel to coil you Cook:
Palaces you could have ruled and grown rich in,
But old Jerry you never forsook.

Hand up the chirper! ripe ale winks in it;
Let's have comfort and be at peace.
Once a stout draught made me light as a linnet.
Cheer up! the Lord must have his lease.
Maybe—for none see in that black hollow—
It's just a place where we're held in pawn,
And, when the Great Juggler makes us to swallow,
It's just the sweet-trick—I ain't quite gone!

Yonder came smells of the gorse, so nutty,
Gold-like and warm: it's the prime of May.
Better than mortar, brick, and pottery,
Is God's house on a blowing day.
Lean me more up the mound; now I feel it:
All the old heath-smells! Ain't it strange?
There's the world laughing, as if to conceal it,
But He is by us, juggling the change.

I mind it well, by the sea-beach lying,
Once—it's long gone—when two gulls we beheld,
Which, as the moon got up, were flying
Down a big wave that spark'd and swell'd.



THE NEW AMERICAN IRON STEAMSHIP "CHAMPION," OF THE VANDERBILT LINE.

Crack! went a gun: one fell: the second
Wheel'd round him twice, and was off for new luck:
Then in the dark her white wing beckon'd
Give me a kiss—I'm the bird dead-struck li

THE STEAMSHIP "CHAMPION."

We engrave on the preceding page the new iron steamship Champion, of the Vanderbilt Line. She has just been built by Harlan & Hollingsworth, of Wilmington, Delaware, and is, we believe, the largest iron steamship ever constructed on this side the Atlantic. Her length is 259 feet; breadth of beam, 53; depth of hold, 26; her burden, by engineers' measurement, 1850 tons. She has 90 state-rooms in the main cabins, and contains sleeping accommodations for 500 cabin and 250 steerage passengers—total, 750 souls. She can carry 600 tons of freight, besides fuel enough for 20 days' consumption. She is a side-wheel steamer; has two beam engines, each 64 inch diameter of piston, and 10 feet length of stroke.

We have been unable to ascertain the cost of the Champion, as parties not yet quite settled, and her owner has not closed the construction account.

As the first iron sea-going steamer of the first-class ever built in this country she deserves special attention, and, if successful, general imitation by the shipbuilders.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1859.

THE PROSPECT.

THE imports of the current fiscal year are estimated by the Treasury Department at $200,000,000, about $20,000,000 more than those of the most active commercial year this country has ever known. On the other hand, it is known that the wheat crop this year is the largest ever grown; the cotton crop, it is estimated, will amount to four million bales. Taking every thing into consideration, and bearing in mind that reasons are always presented prior to exports, it is quite likely that the foreign trade of the United States this fiscal year may in fact amount to about $100,000,000 each way —that is to say, $400,000,000 exported in cotton, gold, breadstuffs, provisions, rice, oil, tobacco, manufactures, etc., and $400,000,000 imported in sugars, dry goods, teas, coffee, hides, and manufactures, and foreign produce of various kinds.

This is not as large a trade as that of Great Britain or France, both of which countries import and export about one quarter more than the amount above mentioned. But it is the largest business ever done by the United States; and considering that the bulk of our foreign trade is carried on with nations at great distances, and that our immediate neighbors are not actively commercial, it is a very large trade indeed.

There are reasons why our trade should be large, and our prosperity steadily on the increase. We are not given, in this journal, to indulge in "spread-eagle vein;" the fact of our business is so generally understood, and so popular among our people, that the best office a weekly paper can render is, to check rather than to encourage the national tendency to brag, and boast, and inflate. But there can be no harm, at the present time, when so many people have but half-recovered from the depressing influence of the crisis of 1857, in drawing attention to a few facts bearing upon this great question of national growth.

We have in the country twenty-five millions of white people, every man among them is industriously and energetically working to increase his means. There is no country in the world, except China, of which as much can be said. No such proposition can be stated with regard to Great Britain, or France, or Russia, for instance. In each of these countries a majority of rank deprives the nation of the energies of a portion of people. The vast half the landed property and the wealth of Great Britain belong to persons who are not engaged in commerce, and who have no desire and no incentive to increase their means. Much of the wealth this owned is, so far as national growth is concerned, mere dead stock. Out of the way. A nobleman's vast revenue does not fructify; it is not invested in lucrative enterprises; it is not embarked in commerce; it does not increase. Many a British peer has precisely the income which his great-grandfather enjoyed. It is invested in the Funds and is lent, and its owner, having as much as he wants, seeks not to augment it. Hence an immense amount of property in this country would be usefully employed, and which would double itself every few years, lies dormant and useless in Great Britain. The same thing is true of Russia and of France, though the present Emperor of the French has certainly achieved wonders in opening the locks of the sales of rich men, and persuading them to sow their money for future harvests.

In this country no man is idle, and no man's money lies dormant. The richest man in the United States, William B. Astor, works eight or nine hours a day in making money. Commodore Vanderbilt is ever foremost in employing his money so as to generate money. Stephen B. Whitney shaves to increase his money. So do many other millionaires we could mention. Shallow observers accuse them men of avarice; the fact is that they are patriots. If they ceased working, and withdrew their means from general use, they would be drones.

Passing again to lower strata of the social formation, every man in this country is encouraged, tempted, forced to try to better his condition. In Europe the theory is, that men are born to their stations in society and there they are. A Manchester weaver is the son and grandson of weavers, and will bring up his son to weave and to earn stitches. But a first-generation former works the farm which for generations has been in his family; esteemed a wise and prudent man if he pays off the debt of the ground, and is as rich as father and grandfather were before him. Moreover, a vast amount of wide range in these European countries is diverted into useless channels—the army, the work-house, the navy, and so forth. There are of course exceptions to the rule we are trying to lay down; men of true worth will make their way in any country; but the fact is, nevertheless, that a fair proportion of young men without means become independent and enterprising citizens here than abroad. They are partly due to the unusual quantity of fertile, cheap land here; partly to the fact that our laws encourage every man to enterprise, while many foreign laws impede both; partly to the natural energy of our people; partly to the fact that immigration brings to us many valuable heads and hands from abroad.

These causes render most young Americans independent persons at forty; while many Europeans, in England or France, might, after the same experience, be mere soldiers or sailors, or, at best, as well off as their fathers were before them. We speak of course of men in masses, and of averages.

There is no reason—to say nothing of the regular increase of wealth which springs from immigration—insure for this country an ever-increasing prosperity if politicians do not disturb our commerce, and oblige us to embark in wars with each other. Twenty-five millions of industrious, energetic white citizens, two of whom is trying to grow rich, and is using his faculties and means sedulously to that end, must constitute a power, commercially and annually—a nation which, compared with the nations of Europe, must rise to a surpassing height of power, wealth, and greatness.

SCIENTIFIC MILE-STONES.

In an early number of Harper's Magazine there was published an article on various scientific phenomena, among which the singular appearance commonly known by the name of the Northern Lights, or Aurora Borealis, was incidentally mentioned. It was stated in the article, and without much, we believe, contradiction, were at a loss to account for that splendid phenomenon, some ascribing it to electrical agency, others to the reflection of immense polar ice, others to other and less plausible causes.

During the first week in the present month of September one of the finest auroras ever witnessed by human eye was seen on several successive nights. It was not confined to any locality. It was visible in almost every quarter in Canada, from Quebec to Fort-William on Lake Superior; in Maine and throughout New England; on the Hudson and in Philadelphia; at Washington and at Charleston; nearly in mid ocean by a ship whose mate thought it worth recording in the log; and even on the English papers tell us—in Great Britain. Whencesoever the gorgeous display came, it was visible over an area extending almost from the Rocky Mountains to the German Ocean in longitude, and probably over an area extending more than ten degrees of latitude. Moreover, it may have been visible throughout the zone in which we live.

The exceeding brilliancy of this aurora would have attracted less attention to its appearance but for its singular effect on the telegraph lines which cover this area everywhere. The currents out the area on which it was visible it interfered with telegraphic communication. In some places the operators found it impossible to send messages to their nearest neighbors. In others, the interruption was very frequent, and after a brief interval they were enabled to resume the working of their lines. In one or two, the operators, finding the wires charged with electricity from outside, disconnected their batteries, and sent messages by the aid of what we must call, for want of a better name, the "Aurora Fluid."

This settles the question of the nature of the aurora usually. It is electrical phenomena. Henceforth no one can be excused if he talk about the reflection from the polar seas of ice. We have practical evidence that the aurora is, or contains, the electrical fluid.

We call this a mile-stone in electrical science. Here the air comes to be charged with fluid electricity, in the manner and form exhibited by the aurora, our scientific teachers will presently tell us. It is enough for one month that the aurora has been properly classed among electrical phenomena. Whence it arises—how it develops itself—whether if at all it can ever be turned to profitable account: these are questions which time will solve.

THE LOUNGER.

THE CENTRAL PARK.

During ten years before his death, Downing, our rural regenerator, was occasionally and forcibly suggested, the importance of a park for the city of New York. At length, in the summer of 1851, Mayor Kingsland proposed it in a message to the Common Council, and suggested that it should consist of our hundred and sixty acres. In August of the same year Downing, in his Horticulturist, made this proposition the text of one of his most admirable papers, in which he thanked the Mayor, showed that the proposed selection of the park was altogether too limited for a city of the size and rate of growth of New York, and called attention to the relative areas of the chief foreign parks. London, he said, devotes six thousand acres, "either within its limits or in accessible suburbs, to the enjoyment of its population." Versailles has three thousand acres; Munich has its "English gardens" of five hundred acres; while the Prater, at Vienna, has about fifteen hundred; the Bois de Boulogne, in Paris, twenty-one hundred; the Phœnix Park, in Dublin, two thousand; Birkenhead Park, near Liverpool, about five hundred; the Thiergarten, at Berlin, two hundred; and almost every considerable city or town in Europe has its accessible, lively, and thronged rural resort.

Downing suggested five hundred acres as the least with which New York should be content; and with a fine prevision of the fact, says that its midst would be located the great distributing reservoirs of the Croton Aqueduct, formed into lovely lakes of sparkling water, and bordered by charms of the sylvan accessories by the finest nurserymen could afford.

At the next session the "Jones's Wood Park Bill" was passed. The law, according to the pamphlet guide to the Central Park, declared "that some technical errors. In July, 1853, the Legislature authorized the taking of two hundred more. In February, 1856, it came into possession of the city. The city named a commission, which accepted it in a body by its appointed day. But there was no appropriation, and the matter paused. On the 17th of April, 1857, the act for the regulation of the Park and its approaches, an unpaid commission to serve for five years was passed. The commissioners were to expend not more than a million and a half of dollars, to be raised in six per cent. stock, running thirty years. In August, 1857, the work of clearing the ground was commenced. On the 28th of April, 1858, the design of Messrs. Olmsted and Vaux for laying out the Park was accepted; and on the first of June, 1858, the work was commenced in earnest, employing about one thousand laborers. The Legislature empowered an extension of the area, so that the limits of the Park now include 862 acres, including 142 belonging to the Croton Aqueduct Department, on which stands the Yorkville reservoir.

The work on the Central Park is to-day the most imposing architectural spectacle to be seen on the continent. Whoever does not go to see it omits a duty and loses a pleasure. The area is about two and a half miles long, and not more than half a mile wide, and was a mere waste of rocks, wet ground, and wild thickets. The work is the subjugation of this into the most various, exquisite, picturesque, and poetic garden; for the Central Park is to be a garden as Eden never was. A plot of flowers, but a system of roads, avenues, rambling paths, green groves, shadowy arbors, hillocks, grottoes, fountains, falls, streams, lakes, arches, bridges, terraces, slopes; and they are all gradually spanning in the magical touch of a genius of industry not less admirable, inspired and regulated by a perception of the practicabilities never pure such as are rarely encountered and still more rarely combined.

In truth, the Park itself is not so much a miracle as that a work of such colossal honesty should be achieved under the civic corruption in which the municipal affairs are lost. And this is owing mainly to the peculiar fitness of the chief of the Park, Mr. Olmsted, who is a man of such rare absolute honesty—who will probably come out of the Park quite as rich as he went into it—that his singularly fitted by natural gifts and cultivation for designing so vast an enterprise—and who has that valuable executive energy which not only possesses to military heroes, and which in so noble a triumph as this Park gives that peace bath her victories so less renowned than war.

He is admirably supported in every way by the accomplished Calvert Vaux, who is the junior partner of Mr. Downing, who has thus a kind of posthumous, silent influence upon the work.

The Bamble is already completed—a series of garden sketches, shrubberies, lawns, and streams, grouped with trees and foreign trees and shrubs, including some of the commonest and most lovely that grow by road-side and along our waters. Vines trail and climb and wave about the trees; flowers bloom along the edges of turf and on the margin of a delicious sylvan brook. The effect is quite perfectly laid, and unusually rolled; groups of flowers are planted in the grass here; here is a rustic, substantial summer-house—yonder, a glimpse of a bridge exquisitely elaborated; at your side, the huge leaves of some languid tropical plant unfold, and yonder are the nodding spears of the golden rod. Every moment there is a pleasant surprise in the sweet succession of beauty. Whatever spot your eye falls upon is the spot that seems to have been especially elaborated.

This is upon the higher central ground of the Park; and probably for most it is under the lowest work is going on. There are bodies of laborers drilling rock, laying the foundations of roads with the small end downward—the sharp edge of the foreman seeing that it is so laid; others are building the arches of the terraces; others, ditching, digging, planting, carting, levelling all over the wild, waste spaces; and in the midst of this the stately avenue, already finished, nearly as wide as Broadway, and from to the head on a meadow, flanked by double rows of trees—which have to be fortunately, died, but which the contractor is engaged by his contract to replace.

But wonderful as are the things seen, they are little compared to the things unseen. We now too late to imagine at all what the work has required, says the architects-in-chief, in a private note, congratulating himself upon the solidity, greatness, and thorough good workmanship, that we have thus far almost every thing underground. The architecture, stone-cutting, etc., is as faithful as the most religious of the Middle Ages. " " We shall have some bridges which will justify our epoch in the after-ages, when the Vandals try to hack them to pieces.

Who does not share the generous enthusiasm? This is not proud that, in a day of swindling in politics, and in the midst of corruption, such great works can be achieved in ragged honesty and solid sense? In defiance of the clamor of the Captains of the democratic principle as inimical to vast public works. In all the cities of Europe there was some better or more orderly laborers than the three thousand who work at the Central Park, with as little friction, such perfect and simple, unconscious good feeling. This, also, being based on directness and the simplicity of absolute law.

And they are all working for the royal, but for the popular domain. Every Sunday and Saturday afternoon thousands of people wander through the Park. Yet every thing is rigidly respected. The arrests are fabulously few; but they are impartial. Always there is the chance of a judge of one of our highest courts hurrying across a grass plot to catch the train for Albany in time for dinner. He was promptly arrested. Indignantly he pleaded his urgency, and gave his name as a guarantee of his respectability. "Very well," was the reply was, "that the order is to arrest all persons crossing the grass, and judges of the highest courts are not excepted." The good-humored judge smiled, and upon discharge remarked that he respected the law and the manner in which for the knowledge that there were some policemen in the world who were not afraid to do their duty.

The throngs of visitors remember that the Park is the common property of all, and that no individual can justly monopolize any thing, nature, or the freshness of any lawn or margin of grass, to his private gratification. It is not so generally in other countries. And the more parks we plant, the more galleries of art we open, the more we promote refinement of taste by the increased presence of beauty, the more we shall find that faith in the people in public matters has been deserved. Turning one backward glance at this great work, how true seem the words of Downing:

"Were our legislators but wise enough to understand to-day the destinies of the new world, the greatness of Sir Hugh Myddleton's universal would be not half so much a miracle fifty years hence in America as the idea of a whole nation of laboring men reading and writing was, in his day, in England."

REAL CHARACTERS IN NOVELS.

WALTER SCOTT, in the Heart of Mid-Lothian, is Kenilworth, Rob Roy, Guy Mannering, and indeed in almost all the novels he ever wrote, introduced historical personages. Bulwer, Dorazil, Dudbery, and Thackeray, have also done so. The hero of Mrs. Stowe's present novel is a historical character. Are all these writers to be envied? Do they violate the proprieties of a novel when they introduce these personages?

Mr. Mudge says they do. The Lounger thinks they do not. Mr. M. thinks at least they are certainly out of place in a novel.

But a novel is a picture of life. It is not to be considered merely as a satire, unless that intention be so evident as to destroy it. "Vanity Fair" or "The Virginians" are satirical, but they are not therefore entire pictures of society. But the pungency of a satire consists greatly in its fidelity to the fact: the finer satiric genius showing its superiority by means to depict with a brilliant combination of facts than by their dislocation or exaggeration.

If, therefore, a novelist, in delineating life at a certain time in a certain country, chooses to introduce real persons or real facts into his frame, for the purpose of giving greater local truth to his picture, he has an undoubted right to do it, for he does it at his own risk. Historic characters are, so to say, familiarly known to us, and the author can immediately place his reader in contact with the sharper criticism of his readers. For if he throws the real person into false life, all his own characters share the unreality. And if he draws him accurately he tests all the others.

Thus in The Virginians, when we are taken to Tunbridge Wells a century ago, although we are following the fortunes of a fictitious character, our minds are full of our knowledge of the real place and of the real persons who frequented it. When, therefore, Dr. Johnson, Goldsmith, and Lord Chesterfield are introduced, it is only natural, and is an inducement to the reader to read Thackeray Bernstein only the more heartily. If the author had taken us to hear a sermon from Dr. Wilfred Dodd, who was afterward executed for forgery; or to hear Oliver Goldsmith read a paper, it would have been not necessarily because he thought Dr. Dodd a good man or Oliver Goldsmith the greatest poet that ever lived, but simply from a dramatic desire to give reality to his story. It doesn't follow from the fact that Miss Evans makes Dinah preach a Methodist sermon in "Adam Bede," that she is therefore a Methodist or trying to inculcate Methodism. She says so is trying, but it is not proved by that single fact.

If the Lounger's correspondent will allow him an illustration, he would say that upon this view of the subject M. M.'s mind is muddled.

IS IT PECUNIFY?

J. B. accuses the Lounger of unwillingness to "own up" about Louis Napoleon. He thinks him an unconscious of his opinion; and is very sure that, according to the L.'s own statement, the amnesty ought to open his eyes.

But upon referring, as the Lounger will presently tell him to do, to what he has already said, he will find that it was much more than a single act, which was supposed to be able to re-establish or to create confidence in the Emperor's honesty. When the Lounger first went to Rome, the city was standing upon its head with delight because the Pope and the Emperor had declared an amnesty, and sundry other things that looked well for popular freedom. How is it now?

The Holy Father, it appears, is about sending, or has sent, his soldiers—whom he has raised, he will recall to commemorate the massacre of Perugia—to subdue Bologna. And, Heaven willing! those soldiers will have to fight the Bolognese with cannon furnished by the Papal treasury. The amnesty was good in itself—as Swallowdown and in May. But how if no one came?

The Lounger does not doubt the value of the amnesty. It is doubtless a good thing, and many honest men, who have been for many a weary year unjustly deprived of their liberty, will rejoice in their own again. The first sign of repentance in a thief is, doubtless, the restitution of the stolen property, even if it be only worth a penny; but repentance is not every thing. An ingenious pickpocket will take from your watch a seal to be precisely covering your red pocket-handkerchief.

What the Lounger really said in Number 134 was:

"When, peace being restored, he shall lend his influence to constructing and maintaining in his own country the government in the premises, under whatever form it may be—when at home we see him exercising the same controlling but patriotic wise sway at Venice as well as in Rome—establishing a Legislature which shall represent the real will of the people, and which shall respect its laws, when universal surveillance and tyranny and war have ceased in France, and the Emperor's power has no more to be supported the love of constitutional liberty which animated Napoleon the First."

How much of all this has the Emperor done?

IMPORTANT CORRECTION.

In a notice of Leigh Hunt, last week, his essays were called the finest since Addison's with the sole exception of Goldsmith. They were not, the author of Charles Lamb, and the Lounger among them, was scandalized at seeing such an assertion. When he wrote the words he had in his mind Hazlitt's essays, namely, like the Spectator, World, Connoisseur, and his namesake, the Lounger; and he hopes that the context will have explained his probable meaning to the reader.

A NEW DESIGN.

THE incessant progress of scientific and artistic discovery and improvement in this age is developing the new designs which will appeal to the admiration of the public during the next century. Will it be Dunlap's "Autograph of Sketches," which mysterious expression meant simply photographed sketches by our leading artists?

By some chemical process a glass is prepared so that the artist etches upon it with his needle, and every copy obtained from the plate is, therefore, really the work of the artist. Twelve of the finest American painters were thus united with Mr. Dunlap in the work—Durand, Kensett, Leutze, Butler, and others—and the result is a series of the most exquisite and delightful engravings. They will be accompanied by apposite selections from American poets.

Mr. Ehninger does not claim to have invented the process, but only to have developed it. There is no engraving that can be compared with these pictures. They are all entirely characteristic and valuable.

EARL BUTLER.

THE great German geographer and friend of Humboldt lies very ill at his home in Berlin. He is old—in his eighties—and therefore in the order of nature we shall soon hear of his death.

Of large and noble presence, with a venerable head flowing with white hair, Ritter's voice, calm and humane expression of face, genial and gentle-manly, the Lounger will never forget. He was among the last who combined the theories and the results of his researches in the lecture-room, or as he sat, as Wyvill in the huge drawing-room of the Humboldts in Potsdam stove at home. He is the greatest living authority upon Physical Geography, and his long life, which extends, as Humboldt's extended, over six momentous and troubled a period, has been luminously devoted, as Humboldt's was, to calm, unexcited study. It is, happily, the tendency of study and common intellectual pursuits to make us wary, however, as the career of Goethe shows—to promote an active humane sympathy—an intelligent interest in the progress of humanity. The best of Humboldt, and it is the best of Ritter as well.

Ritter's friend, Earl Butler, is a learned scholar and a good man departs out of the world.

"THE NEW GOLD AND THE OLD CIVILIZATION."

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I went even that I have not read Mr. Buckle's 'History of Civilization,' and perhaps I have misapprehended your remarks on his theory in the World's last saturday. Admitting, what he shows, 'that the material civilization of this continent was substantially the same as that of Asia,' what in the legitimate inference? Must we conclude that, in their combined, two independent roots of men commenced an equal course, and with like influences produced like results? Should not this be your supposition of what Mr. Buckle supposes when he supposes that he would establish, 'Of course.' But a captious critic might object: 'In that case their progress should have been coincident, at least until the barbarism of the North interrupted the action of New Granada.' Why did they stop at the skeleton of the Saxaharas? Did the laws of civilization collapse on the production of the symbol of immortality?

"Taking it for granted that 'the earliest civilization of this continent was the same as that of Asia,' is not the fact most satisfactorily explained by the hypothesis that our aborigines are of Asiatic origin, and that the monuments of the latter countries indicate the stage of art at which they left their trans-Pacific home? Perhaps the name by which we designate the aborigines of America is misleading. Why should there may be good reasons why 'the gold ornaments in Indian graves' should not be? Just India or even Persia were 'the source?' Egypt and New Granada may have drawn from the same fountain; but the Nile Valley seems to me more likely to be the Ilarkle, by all means contest him to that fountain that the Nile valley would be about.

"In my little library there is a book which might help you to some answers to suggest that seems to me to be great it. It is entitled 'Lotus and Feather, or Ultra, by a Transcendentalist.' Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. M.D.A.S.; edited by William Francis Ainsworth, F.R.G., F.G.S., &c. &c. It is a curious compilation, and is offered in an official capacity. Against the ancient walls of that mysterious and unique city of painted and sculptured. The wall in one place had been gradually removed by the excavations, but on one side a considerable depth is maintained, and one side of the mound which leaned against it was left as a memorial of the destruction of Petra, which was the accumulated rubbish of ages, brought to light an immense number of statues, altars, images, and sculptured monuments, which have been collected and submitted to the judgment of artists. His book is an account of the excavations and discoveries during a residence there. If we may judge by the illustrations, the fragments of art are extraordinary, and would seem to be the relations of their execution. A competent critic says: 'In the Assyrian monuments we have the earliest and best of the most charming fragments of terra cotta which I have seen.'

"Your spare Sothic any attempt to describe the collections, but one cannot help wishing to attract the attention of all who are interested in the early civilizations to the examination of this work. I am not sure to which I allude, a drawing is given by Mr. Butler of a monument which is called a sarcophagus. The drawing is precisely the thing in open a dark jewel mystery.' But how unlike any other Lounger! Why, the Lounger has been to Carnac in Gloria to find a key to the sculptures of Central America, and now he finds a key to the sculptures of ancient found in Indian graves in New Granada. And if you will look at page 97 of Stephens's book of travel you will see original tribes!

"Pardon the prolixity of your fellow Lounger.

"PEDL. MI RODO."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—A reader from our morning: in Nashville, Tennessee, complains that the Lounger's letter-box is full. Perhaps the best way to get the paper is to subscribe for it.

"J. J. HEBBLE. It is always dangerous to pay beforehand for the insertion of your name in any catalogue or directory. The Lounger is not a dealer in puffs.

"ADVERTISING PRIZES have won considerable fame. Perhaps the best way to get the paper is to subscribe for it.

"A. B. Your idea of a lawyer's office is very well known. Dickens has described it, and Thackeray in his "Book of Snobs" has described it, and Thackeray in his "Book of Snobs" has described it, and Thackeray in his "Book of Snobs" fully large within the last few years, and at the moment when the English journals come to us with the details of a case of subtle poisoning, which appalls us the more for the cool and refined touch by which distinguishes it from more brutal murders, the French historian impresses upon us that, though surrounded by fearful mysteries of sin and crime, we are here daily developments of noble virtues and heroic deeds, to the honor of nations, as of individuals. From the army, which has carried the name and influence of France beyond her borders, are reported salutary examples of disinterestedness, courage, generosity, sympathy, and sacrifice; and from the resoutest provinces, towns, and villages, the inhabitants generally, and the authorities, civil and ecclesiastic, unite in bearing testimony to the Christian virtues and deeds of charity that have distinguished certain persons, and from these the members of the Academy have with difficulty (so admirable were all) selected the recipients of this year's prizes.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL OF FRANCE.

In his address M. Guizot reminded his audience that, though Montyon lived in times of trouble, and witnessed all the tragedies of the Revolution—though, as a Royalist, his closest affections were wounded in the death of Louis XVI., he never lost faith in humanity, or his hope of a great moral future for France. He also gave biographical sketches of some three or four of those who are this year rewarded by the Academy; and these memoirs should be translated into all languages, for they illustrate the lives of individuals occupying an humble sphere, and fully justify the assertion that the privilege and power of being useful in our generation is not the exclusive right of those blessed with education or wealth.

In 1845 the Abbé Hallvin—who received the first prize—was vicar of a parish at Arras. Touched with the ignorance and misery among the youth of his charge, the good abbé sold a small patrimonial property, and with the proceeds purchased an humble house, to which he removed, with twenty of the most destitute and abandoned children of his parish. In three years he had collected thirty-five, and surmounting the good abbé toiled for his sheep. When questioned by friends as to his pecuniary resources, and warned of the impossibility of success, he replied, "It is a work of faith; if good, Providence will bless it." The work was good, and has prospered, for at this time one hundred and seventy youths are enjoying the affectionate discipline of Hallvin's establishment, and two hundred others, who received its training, are now, as wives, mothers, soldiers, mechanics, scattered over France, and (without one exception) bearing witness to the noble labors of Hallvin by their admirable conduct, while he, in return, has the recompense of their gratitude and love; for to him, if near, they carry all their little cares and anxieties; or if at a distance, they, as with a parent, correspond, relying ever, and confidently, upon his advice and protection.

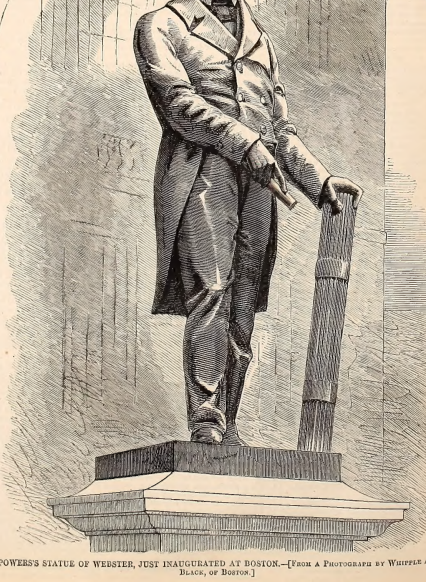
To Anne Duré de Béchenl and Margaret Mounier were awarded the second and third medals, of two thousand five hundred francs each. Born peasants, and without other resources than those arising from their daily toil, they had both, while faithfully fulfilling all family duties, entitled themselves to the thanks of France for their useful but unostentatious virtues. Nine years since, Anne Duré, in visiting a poor woman, found her ill and stretched upon a bed, without linen or covering of any kind. From her humble home she supplied these necessities. But deeply impressed with the misery before her, she determined to devote her best energies to ameliorating the physical suffering of her neighbors. Alone, she has carried out her design —begging, collecting from house to house old clothes, linen, bed furniture, provisions, and medicines; washing, repairing, arranging with admirable system and economy; teaching herself to write, that she might keep a registry of all articles received and distributed, until she has, by her individual exertion, founded an establishment from which aid is extended, far and near, to the sick, the infirm, and the poor. Even the dead are the subjects of her pious care, for her register of the artist and of the subject. All Boston has been in a fever about it. It has found, however, a competent and an ardent champion in the person of the Hon. Edward Everett, who came forward recently and addressed a public meeting on the subject, vindicating Mr. Powers's fidelity of treatment, and claiming for the statue a very high rank among works of art. Certainly, so far as general appearance goes, it seems a most admirable likeness of the great expounder.

It was inaugurated on Saturday last, in the Music Hall at Boston. Speeches were made by the Governor, the Mayor, and others; after which an admirable address was delivered by Mr. Everett.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL OF FRANCE.

PORTRAITS of the little boy on whose life so much hangs have more than once appeared in this journal. The last one we published represented him in the costume of a corporal; we now show him in the full uniform of a sergeant of the Guards.

Very few persons have ever had a biography at his age. He was born on 16th March, 1856, and is therefore now in his fourth year. He has already "served" nearly two years in the army; and though he has never been under fire, he has won his uniform long enough to like it. When he is seven he will again be promoted, and will probably assume the rank of Colonel of the Guard. At that age etiquette—which presumes a wonderful precocity in royal infants—requires that he should have a separate establishment, and that the vacuum of his present household should be diminished by such careful regulations does Imperial France educate her children and preserve the virtue of her women!



POWERS'S STATUE OF WEBSTER, JUST INAUGURATED AT BOSTON.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WHIPPLE AND BLACK, OF BOSTON.]

THE WEBSTER STATUE.

We engrave herewith, from a photograph by Messrs. Whipple & Black, of Boston, the Webster statue, which has just been inaugurated in that city. The statue is by Powers.

We condense from the Boston Saturday Gazette a brief sketch of this monument.

On 27th October, 1852, the solid men of Boston, with the Mayor at their head, met together to take counsel how best they might testify their respect and veneration for the memory of Webster. It was determined to erect a statue; and, several thousand dollars having been collected for the purpose, a contract was made with the great American sculptor, Hiram Powers, of Florence, for a bronze statue, eight feet high, to cost $12,000. The statue was cast and shipped for Boston in 1857. On the way the vessel foundered, and the statue was lost. It was fortunately insured, and on the strength of the money obtained from the Insurance Company a fresh contract was made for another statue by Powers, to cost, this time, $7000. This was cast, like the former one, from the sculptor's models, by Signor Papi, bronze founder to the late Grand Duke, and arrived safely in Boston in January last.

Since its arrival the statue has been the subject of much animated discussion and bitter criticism. Many critics have declared it alike unworthy of Widows listen to this! No less than three have, on this occasion, received medals from the Academy. One, though left, by the death of her husband, rich, and still in the prime of life, had founded an establishment for the education of poor girls—limiting the number always to thirty; and ever this she had presided with the solicitude of a mother—training her adopted children for all the duties of life, and, like the Abbé Hallvin, extending to them, after they had left her, all the affectionate interest of a parent. Another, the widow of a blacksmith, who had left her in comfortable circumstances, made of her house an asylum for abandoned or orphaned children, servants without places, poor travelers without resources. Indeed, so general and admirable are her charities, that, in her own province, rich and poor have, as by one consent, accord-

"THOU ART THE MAN!"

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LVI.

A WARNING.

GRACE PLUMER had strange dreams the night after Abel Scott's supper; and she was very quiet for many days. Abel called the following evening to know how the ladies had borne the fatigue of the feast. Mrs. Plumer said, with smiles, that it was a kind of fatigue ladies bore without thinking. Miss Grace, who was sitting upon a sofa by the side of Stigo Moultrie, said that it was one of the feasts at which young women especially are supposed to be perfectly happy. She emphasized the last words, and her bright black eyes opened wide upon Mr. Abel Scott, who could not tell if he saw mischievous malice or a secret triumph, and sense of release in them.

"Oh!" said he, gayly, "it would be too much for me to hope to make any ladies, and especially young ladies, perfectly happy."

And he returned Miss Plumer's look with a keen glance masked in merriment.

Stigo Moultrie wagged his foot.

"There now is conscious power!" said Abel, with a laugh, as he pointed at Miss Plumer's companion.

They all laughed, but not very heartily. There appeared to be some meaning lurking in whatever was said; and like all half-concealed meanings, it seemed, perhaps, even more significant than it really was.

Abel was very brilliant, and told more and better stories than usual. Mrs. Plumer listened and laughed, and declared that he was certainly the best company she had met for a long time. For years Miss Plumer and Mr. Moultrie objected to join the conversation. In fact, Abel was several times surprised by the uncommon spirit of Stigo's replies.

"What is it?" said Abel to himself, with a flash of the shuck eyes that was startling.

All the evening he felt particularly belligerent toward Stigo Moultrie; and yet a close observer would have discovered no occasion in the conduct of the young man for such a feeling upon Abel's part. Mr. Moultrie sat quietly by the side of Grace Plumer—" as if somehow he had a right to sit there," thought Abel Scott, "who resolved to discover if indeed he had a right.

During that visit, however, he had no chance. Moultrie sat persistently, and so did Abel. The clock pointed to eleven, and still they did not move. It was fairly toward midnight when Abel rose to leave; and at the same moment Stigo Moultrie rose also. Abel bade the ladies good evening, and passed out as if Moultrie were close by him. But that young man remained standing by the side of Grace Plumer while he was seated, and said quietly to Abel,

"Good-evening, Newt!"

Grace Plumer looked at him also, with the bright black eyes, and blushed.

For a moment Abel felt his heart seemed to stand still! An expression of some bitterness must have swept over his face, for Mrs. Plumer stepped toward him, as he stood with his hand upon the door, and said,

"Are you unwell?"

The cloud dissolved in a forced smile.

"No, thank you; not at all!" and he looked surprised, as if he could not imagine why any one should think so.

He did not wait longer, and the next moment was in the street.

Mrs. Plumer also left the room almost immediately after his departure. Stigo Moultrie seated himself by his companion.

"My dear Grace, did you see that look?"

"Yes."

"He suspects the truth," returned Stigo Moultrie; and he might have added more, but that he spits at that instant were otherwise engaged.

Abel more than suspected the truth. He was sure of it, and the certainty made him desperate. He had risked so much upon the game! He had been so confident! As he left the lighted city he walked rapidly up the street, many things rapidly passing in his mind. He was like a seaman, doubtful of the waters, and the breeze was swelling out the sails.

Turning out of Broadway he ran quickly to the door, opened it, and leaped up stairs.

To his great surprise his lamp was lighted, and a man was sitting reading quietly at the table.

As Abel entered his visitor closed his book and looked up.

"Why, Uncle Lawrence!" said the young man. "you have a genius for surprises! What on earth are you doing in my room?"

His Uncle said, only half smiling,

"Abel, we are both bachelors, and bachelors have no wives. I want to talk with you."

Abel looked at his guest uneasily; but he put down his hat and lighted a cigar. He seated himself, almost defiantly, opposite his uncle, with the table between them.

"Now, Sir; what is it?"

"Abel, you are going too fast. You do not like me—but is unwell. You do not like me—but you are not wise. But I am an older man, and I am your father's brother. I know nothing of your affairs; I care not to know, and I suppose I do. But I do know that no business can stand what you expect of yours—and no life—and no character."

Lawrence Newt spoke very calmly, and in a kind of veiled voice. Abel looked directly at him, and rather ostentatiously blew rings of smoke from his mouth. But he was very pale, and when Abel made no reply, but sat as if there were nothing for it but to listen; and he would listen as complacently as he could,

"I don't believe there is any body to warn you, Abel, and I am a poor hand at preaching; but many a man might have stopped, if somebody had only told him from the outside what he pretty sure of from the inside. I'm going to persuade ourselves to disbelieve what is not mentioned to us. I have watched you, Abel, and your career. It is the most melancholy home I ever saw. I know nothing of your father's affairs; he does not confide in me, and I am not here to pry into his secrets or yours, who are his partner. But I don't believe his business is in a good way, and I know that you play high and often, and I know that you live at a more expensive rate than any young man in town."

Lawrence Newt paused a moment, and waited to hear if his nephew had any thing to say. But the young man still calmly puffed the smoke from his mouth, and calmly regarded his uncle.

"Now Abel, you are not a fool. You know the inevitable results of certain courses. I wish to justify your knowledge by my experience. I understand all the temptations and excitements that every young man, like you, in our town, Abel; and I don't like the looks of other people when they speak of you and your father. After all, we are of the same blood. Heaven knows its own mysteries! Your father and I were sons of one woman. That is a tie which we can neither of us escape, if we wanted to. Why should you run yourself?"

He looked at him amusingly for a few minutes.

"Can't we be friends? After all, men are men. We have, perhaps, more in common than we think. People get going in their own ruts, with their own ideas, and imagine more difference from others than there really is.

As he spoke he saw the peculiar blackness in Abel's eyes, and his voice, as if discouraged, involuntarily fell into a dry formal tone as he ended.

Abel half smiled and looked in the serious face of his uncle.

"What have I done, Uncle Lawrence?"

"I don't know, and I don't care what you are really doing now. But I see enough to alarm me. It is only common humanity that brings me here. Abel, for our relationship seems to be a mere ceremony, bating the instinct of which I spoke."

"Did you come to propose any thing for me to do, Sir, or only to inform me that you considered me a reprobate?" asked Abel, half-sneeringly, the smoke rising from his mouth.

Lawrence Newt did not answer.

"I am like other young men," continued Abel. "I am fond of living well, of a good horse, of a pretty woman. I drink my glass, and I am not afraid of a cent. Really, Uncle Lawrence, I see no such profound sin or shame in it all, so long as I honestly pay the cost. Do I cheat at cards? Do I lurk in the gutters?"

"No?" answered Lawrence.

"Do I steal?"

"Not that I know," said the other.

"Please, Uncle Lawrence, what do you mean, then?"

"I mean the way, the spirit, in which you do things. If you cannot perceive it in how you make you? I can not say more than I have. I came merely—"

"As a handwriting upon the wall, Uncle Lawrence?"

Lawrence Newt rose and stood a little back from the table.

"Yes, if you choose, as a handwriting on the wall. Abel, when the prodigal son came to himself, he rose and went to his father. I came to ask you to return to yourself."

"From these husks, Sir?" asked Abel, as he looked around his luxurious room, his eye last of all on the portrait of Lucille, fresh from the bath.

Lawrence Newt looked at his nephew with profound gravity. The young man lay back in his chair, lightly holding his cigar, and carelessly following the smoke with his eye. The beauty and intelligence of his face, the indolent grace of his person in the mellow light of the lamp, and set like a picture in the voluptuous refinement of the room, touched the imagination and the heart of the older man. There was a look of earnest, yearning entreaty in his eyes as he said,

"Abel, you remember Milton's Comus?"

The young man bowed.

"Are you both the revelers were happy?"

Abel smiled, but did not answer. But after a few minutes he said, with a smile,

"I was not there."

"You are not," answered Lawrence Newt, with uplifted finger, and in a voice so sad and clear that Abel started.

The two men looked at each other silently for a few moments.

"Good-night, Abel."

"Good-night, Uncle Lawrence."

The door closed behind the older man. Abel sat in the room absolutely thinking. He uncle's words rang in his memory. But as he recalled the tone, the raised finger, the voice, with which they had been spoken, the young man did not think of himself and his uncle. He looked around his luxurious room, and started and frightened by the stillness, and awe-struck by the midnight hour. He moved his head rapidly and arose, like a person trying to rouse himself from sleep or nightmare. Passing the mirror, he involuntarily saluted it, the haggard picture of his face under the clustering black hair. He was trying to shake something off. He went automatically into the room until he had lighted a match, and a candle, with which he went into the next room, still holding over his shoulder, as if fearing that something dogged him. He opened the closet where he kept his wine. He rested on it, filled a large glass and poured it down his throat—not as if he were drinking, but as if he were pouring water upon a fire. He rubbed his forehead with his hand, and half-smiled a sickly smile.

But still his eyes wandered nervously to the spot in which his uncle had stood; still he seemed to hear what he should see a ghostly figure standing there and pointing at him; should see himself, in some phantom counterpart, sitting in the chair. His eyes opened as if he were listening intently. For in the midnight he heard distinctly, in that dim light he thought he saw the Prophet and the King. He did not remember more the words his uncle had spoken. But still,

"Thou art the man!"

"Thou art the man!"

And all night long,

"Thou art the man!"

as he dreamed or restlessly tossed, he heard the very same whisper, and saw, with finger pointed,

"Thou art the man! Thou art the man!"

CHAPTER LVII.

BREAKERS.

LAWRENCE NEWT had certainly told the truth of his brother's home. Mr. Benedict never had become so surly that it was not enough to live in his own house. He came home late, and was angry if dinner were not ready, and cross if it were. He banged all the doors, and swore at all the chairs. After dinner he told May not to touch the piano, and began, to his wife, for Heaven's sake, to take up some book and not to sit with an air of immobile vacancy that was enough to drive a man distracted. He regularly read the Evening Post, and regularly pished at it as a dull, blundering, ridiculous newspaper—the best of all, but not fit for the dogs. He snarled at the servants so, that they went about the house upon tiptoe and fled his presence, and were constantly going away, so that Mrs. Newt passed many hours of the week in an Intelligence Office. Mr. Newt found holes in the carpets, stains upon the cloths, knocks upon the walls, nicks in the glasses and plates at table, scratches upon the furniture, and defects and misfortunes every where. He went to bed without saying good-night, and came down without a good-morning. He sat at breakfast morose and silent; or he sighed and frowned and muttered and went out without a smile or a good-by. There was a profound gloom in the house, an unnatural order. Nobody dared to derange the papers or books upon the table, to move the chairs, or to touch any thing. If May appeared in a new dress he frowned, and his wife trembled every time she put in a breast-pin.

Only in her own room was May mistress of every thing. If any body had looked into it he would have seen that it was a thoughtful and pleasant hand which arranged every thing, and often enough he would have seen a delicate girl-face, almost too thoughtful for so young a room, resting upon the hand, as if May Newt were troubled and perplexed by the gloom of the house and the silence of the household. Her window opened over the street, and there were a few horse-chestnut trees before the house. She made friends with them, and they covered themselves with blossoms for her pleasure. She put her bees at her window, looking into the trees, sewing, reading, musing, and as solitary as a fairy princess in a tower.

Sometimes flowers came with Uncle Lawrence's love. Or fine fruit for Miss May Newt, with the same message. Several times from her window May had seen who the messenger was: a young man with candid eyes, with a rosy ring, and an open, almost boyish face. When the street was still she heard him halting, and as he bounded along—nobody sings, she thought, whose home is not happy.

Solitary as a fairy princess in a tower, she looked down upon the figure as it rapidly disappeared. The sewing or the reading stopped entirely; nor were they resumed when he had passed out of sight. He did not once look up. He seemed to be no more conscious of any inmate of the house than a rabbit at the foot of a tree is conscious of a bird upon the bough. May Newt thought it strange that Uncle Lawrence should send such a messenger in the middle of the day. He did not look like a porter. He was not an office-boy. He was evidently one of the upper-clerks. It was certainly very kind in Uncle Lawrence.

So thought the solitary Princess in the tower, her mind idly wandering from the romance she was reading to a hazy speculation upon the reality in the street beneath her.

The blind was thrown partly back as she sat at the open window. A simple airy dress, made by her own hands, covered her flower-like figure. The brown hair was smoothed over the white temples, and the sweet girl-eyes looked tranquilly into the street from which the figure of the young man had just passed. If by chance the eyes of that young man had been turned upward, would he not have thought—since one Sunday morning, when he passed her on the way to church, he was sure that she looked like an angel going home—would he not have thought that she looked like an angel bending down from out of heaven?

And it was not strange that Uncle Lawrence had sent him. For somehow Uncle Lawrence had discovered that if there was any thing to go to May Newt, there was nothing in the world that Gabriel Benuet was so anxious to do as to carry it.

But while the young man was always so glad to go to Boniface Nevv's gloomy house—for some reason we do not like to did not ring, and which even his sister Ellen did not know—or, at least, which she pretended not to know. Although one evening that wily young girl talked with brother Gabriel about May Next, as if she had some particular purpose in the conversation, until she seemed to have convinced herself of some hitherto doubtful point—yet with all the willingness to go to the house, Gabriel Bonnet never went to the office of Boniface Nevv, Son, & Co.

THE LOST TREASURE.

If he had done so it would not have been pleasant to him, for it was generally holiday in the office. The senior partner sat tending his hard, anxious face over account-books and letters. The junior partner lounged in his chair as if the office had been a club-room. "Company" enquired.

"Father, I've just seen Sinker."

"D— Sinker!"

"Come, come, father, let's be reasonable! Sinker says that the Canal will be a clear case of profit next year, per annum for two months at least, and that we could afford to lose a cent or two upon the Bilbo iron to make it up, over and over again."

Mr. Abel Nevv threw his leg over the arm of the chair and looked at his boot. Mr. Bonnet's face Nevv threw his head around suddenly and fiercely.

"And what's Sinker's commission? How much do you suppose he has to put in? How much will he take?"

"He has sold out in the Mallow Mines to put in," said Abel, a little doggedly.

"At a loss?"

"He says so," returned Abel, sheerily.

"Don't believe a word of it!" said his father, tartly, turning back again to his desk.

Abel put both feet upon the ground, side by side, and rested them upon the heels backward and forward, looking all the time at his father. His face grew cloudy—more cloudy every moment. At length he said,

"I think we'd better do it."

His father did not speak or move. He seemed to have heard nothing, and to be only inwardly cursing the state of things revealed by the books and papers before him.

Abel looked at him for a moment, and then, raising his voice, continued,

"As one of the firm, I propose that we sell out the Bilbo and buy into the Canal."

Not a look or movement from his father.

Abel jumped up, his eyes black, his face red. He took his hat and went to the door, saying,

"I shall go and conclude the arrangement!"

As he reached the door his father raised his eyes and looked at him. The eyes were full of contempt and anger, and a sneering sound came from his lips.

"You'll do no such thing."

The young man glanced sideways at his parent.

"Who will prevent me?"

"I" yeared the elder.

"I believe I am one of the firm," said Abel, coldly.

"You'd better try it!" said the old man, disregarding what was said.

Abel was conscious that his father had this game, at least, in his hands. The word of the young man would hardly avail against a unanimous vote from the parent. No transaction would stand a chance under such circumstances. The young man slowly turned from the door, and fixing his eyes upon his father, advanced toward him with a look of deep resolve.

"I should like to understand my position in this house," said he, with forced calmness.

"Good God! Sir, a bootblack, if I choose!" returned his father, fiercely. "At the beginning day of my life was when you came in here, Sir. Ever since that time I have been more and more complicated, until it is only a question of days how long it can even look respect-able. We shall be begging in a month, Sir. We are ruined. There is no chance," cried the old man, with a passionate wave of his hand to the earth. "And you know who has done it all. You know who has brought us all to shame and disgrace—to poverty, poverty!" and he struck his chair, the father shook his clenched hands at Abel so furiously that the young man fell back shocked.

"Don't talk to me, Sir. Don't dare to say a word," cried the elder, in a voice of fierce, hoarse anger. "All my life has come to nothing. All my sacrifices, my industry, my efforts, are of no use. I am a beggar, Sir; so are you!"

He sunk back in his chair and covered his face with his hands. The noise ceased and the book-keeper outside took in. But it was no new thing. The book-keeper and the clerks were familiar to his ear. With the silent, sad fidelity of a fine profession he knew every thing, and was dumb. Not a turn of a key, not a ray of light in his eye, told any tales to the most tearful and pungent inquiry. But for months, for months Mr. Van Boosenberg had grown quite friendly with him. When they met, the President had sought to establish the most familiar intercourse. But he discovered that for the slightest hint of the condition of the firm Nevv must be might as well have asked Henslee himself. Like a soldier, who knows the secret and can hold his peace, who learns to see and perceive that he can only a little longer hide it, but with her heart breaking, still smiles away suspicion, so the faithful accountant, who supposed that the crash was at hand, was as constant and calm as if the business were never before so prosperous.

This scene was but a few days after Uncle Lawrence's visit to his nephew.

Abel Nevv had now had two distinct warnings of something which nobody knew more perfectly than he did. A man who thinks that he is conscientiously may be quite at ease, so long as he can persuade himself, while he takes cod-liver oil and wears flannel, that it is only his own way. But when two physicians ask him if he has made his will he may be sure that he has no time to lose.

Abel Nevv dined sumptuously that very day, and dressed very carefully that evening, and at eight o'clock was driving rapidly up to Gramercy Plumer. The superb ruby was on her finger. But on the third finger of her left hand he saw a large glowing opal. His eyes fastened upon it with a more brilliant glitter. They looked at her so strangely that Miss Grace Plumer felt troubled and half alarmed.

"Miss Grace," said Abel, in a low voice.

The tone was significant.

"Mr. Nevv," said she, with a half smile, as if she accepted a corner of his gallantry.

"Do you remember I said I was perfectly happy?"

He moved his chair a little nearer to hers. She drew back almost imperceptibly.

"I remember you said so, and I was very glad to hear it."

"Do you remember my theory of perfect happiness?"

"Yes." said Miss Plumer, calmly, "I believe it was perfect love. But, Mr. Nevv, you have a talk of something else;" and she rose from her chair and stood on the table.

"Miss Plumer!"

"Mr. Nevv!"

"It was you who first emboldened me."

"I do not understand, Sir."

"It was a long time ago, in my mother's conservatory."

Grace Plumer remembered the evening, and replied, haughtily,

"I am very sorry, Mr. Nevv, that I dirted so foolishly. I am very sorry. But I think we did each other no harm."

"No harm, I trust, indeed, Miss Grace," said Abel. "I trust surely no harm to you. I regret not as I love you."

He rose from his seat, and tried to take her hand. She stepped back. He pressed toward her.

"Grace! dear Grace!"

"Stop, Sir!" she said his companion, drawing herself up and waving him back. "I can not hear you! I will not hear you!"

Abel turned pale. Grace Plumer was frightened. He sprang forward and seized her hand.

"Oh! Grace, hear me! for you must hear me. I know that I loved you, and you allowed me to love you. In honor, in truth, before God, you are mine!"

She struggled to release her hand. As she looked in his face she saw a fierce and mysterious which ensured her that he was capable of saying any thing, of doing any thing; and she trembled to think how much she might be—how much any woman is—in the power of a desperate man.

"Indeed, Mr. Nevv, you must let me go!"

"Grace, say that you love me!"

The frightened girl broke away from him, and ran toward the door. Abel followed her, but she reached it, and she and Sally Dudgeon were safe.

"Oh, Sligo!" cried Grace, as he put his arm around her.

Abel stopped and bowed.

"Pardon me, Miss Plumer. Certainly Mr. Moultrie will understand the matter of a passion which in his case has been so fortunate. I am sorry, Sir," he added, turning to Sligo, "that my ignorance of your relation to Miss Plumer should have betrayed me. I congratulate you both from my heart."

He bowed again, and before they could speak he was gone. The tone of his voice that last uttered upon their ears was almost like a hiss. It was a most sinister fabrication.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM SAN JUAN.

ABERDEEN, Intelligence from the disputed territory of San Juan has been received by the steamer Active at Bellevue Mail. The report of the landing of another detachment of United States troops on the island is confirmed. A company of sappers and miners was expected to arrive by the steamer Massachusetts, and it was understood that they would be set at work to erect fortifications. The Englishmen on the island, however, remain greatly excited at the condition of affairs. An address to the Governor-General of Canada was prepared and dated for service to be urged that the services of the Governor had been requested to embody a militia force, and also to call upon the Governor to issue letters of signatures in Victoria, declaring the island to be British territory, and calling upon Her Majesty's government to sustain its rights.

GOLD FROM FISH'S TAIL.

The most conclusive testimony to the existence of gold in the Fish River Mountains has just arrived in Bangor in the person of Professor Chapman, who has been engaged in the Fish River region for the past three months. The prospectors from State organization had been discharged, and Professor Chapman had been employed during a majority of 1600 against it. This result is attributed by Mr. Jones to the prejudice of the large population to the lands of the region being brought into market for actual settlement, and to the general depression in the value of property. In consequence of the numerous failures of the Bangor Bank, the Governor's action had been organized, which had already banished

SOUTHERN OPINION ON JUDGE DOUGLAS.

The New Orleans Delta, commenting upon the party terms, the recent speech of Senator Clay of Alabama, by which he declares that "Douglas is unquestionably sound on Southern rights. But it does not concur with him in the first declaration, but on the contrary, it believes Douglas even if he should be the nominee of the Charleston Convention. And it adds the following statement, which has considerable interest considering the quarter from which it comes:

"We think we see through the motives of a large number of Southern Democrats in the Douglas ranks, who are distinguishing themselves by crowning the Little Giant. They probably believe, as we do, that Douglas is the only man that can defeat Seward in 1860 —they wish to drive him out of the Charleston Convention to get him on the track, and they will be masters of the South, in order to force upon the Southern people the alternative of abject submission to Abolition domination or a dissolution of the Union. In 1856 Senator Slidell stated unqualifiedly that the election of Colonel Fremont to the Presidency would justify any sentiment cause and ample justification for the South in breaking up the present Confederacy. How does he stand now? Does he hold to his original position? Would he disavow the Union if Seward was elected? He is patient on this unanswerable—he is noted as an enemy of Douglas and his doctrines, and he was a member of the U. S. Senate in the Congress of 1856, took a vote the only man in the National Convention who has a prospect of success in the North, in order to escape the alternative above indicated."

DEFALCATION IN A NEW YORK BANK.

W. J. Lane, a clerk in the Fulton Bank, has been arrested on a charge of appropriating $40,000 from that institution.

The modus operandi which Lane is charged with adopting is as follows: He was in the habit of depositing to the credit of the bank the week's receipts of the Paterson Railroad Company, and proceeded to collect from the various banks in this city the checks received. These bills, it is supposed, he would enter on the books of the bank, but not to the credit of the road, as they were supposed to be credited, receive his father's check for the amount, and for the purpose of preventing a discrepancy from occurring, it is supposed he made fictitious accounts against the banks in the Jersey cities, which, in his capacity as clerk, enabled him to forward statements corresponding with the deposits to the present book keeper. He would sometimes have acknowledged receivable memoranda from the banks sufficient to cover the deficiency, which would otherwise be shown.

THE SUICIDE OF A NEW YORK BANKER.

In this way Lane may have been enabled to gratify his unbounded love for display, his passion for fashionable style, and sporting fine horses and equipages on the avenues. Recently, it is said, his extravagance has not have gradually become embodied, and plunged into brinks by visiting the gambling saloons in Wall and Nassau Streets, in which Miss St. has alleged substance, he was induced to stake the results of his peculations upon the knowledge of the uncertain tide which ebbed with her fortunes. Lane's salary was $2000 per annum, and his expenses for the support of himself and family, and his losses on Broadway were rumored, it is said, to amount two thousand dollars per month. Lane is married, and has a fine person; and Lane, it is now alleged, might often be seen on returning to his residence after 12 at night, in the Bloomingdale Road, and sprinkling almost all in the vicinity of his home. Lane is the son of the late establishment in Lexington Avenue, in which he kept most splendid equipage in the city. He was married, it is also several carriages, with harness and trimmings to match, and his fast mount attracted the admiration of all behind him as the sole proprietor of this luxury, but Lane, it is alleged, was not the owner of a single article. Lane is the son of the late Mr. Lane, and all supposed that he was spending more money than his salary as clerk would warrant, but his father's large and prosperous business connection for his New Jersey agency, and his well-established character for integrity, gave him more than a book-keeper.

Mr. Lane, it is also alleged in Interior. He admitted to the office who arrested him that he expended $1000 per day for pleasure, and that for two months he had allowed himself no less than $250 per diem for the nuse of his friends. Lane was arrested on Saturday, and put into a cell with the sole proprietor of this luxury, but Lane, it is alleged, was not the owner of a single article. Lane is the son of the late Mr. Lane, and all supposed that he was spending more money than his salary as clerk would warrant, but his father's large and prosperous business connection for his New Jersey agency, and his well-established character for integrity, gave him more than a book-keeper.

Mr. Lane, it is also alleged in Interior. He admitted to the office who arrested him that he expended $1000 per day for pleasure, and that for two months he had allowed himself no less than $250 per diem for the nuse of his friends. Lane was arrested on Saturday, and put into a cell with the sole proprietor of this luxury, but Lane, it is alleged, was not the owner of a single article. Lane is the son of the late Mr. Lane, and all supposed that he was spending more money than his salary as clerk would warrant, but his father's large and prosperous business connection for his New Jersey agency, and his well-established character for integrity, gave him more than a book-keeper.

RECOVERY OF THE JEWELRY.

On last Monday the complaint was made against Lane by Mr. Lewis Kennedy, President of the Fulton Bank, and Gilbert King, of the Lower Police Court, arrested the accused immediately. After the closing of the bank, Lane was taken before Mr. Kennedon and Board of Directors, and acting as a clerk, he made his fraud out of which he realized his guilt immediately. The officer then went with Lane to his home in Harlem. There the investigation, where $7000 worth of diamonds and jewelry were surrendered to the officer and Miss Sallie Broderick, the fallen paramour. These valuables consisted of a diamond pin valued at $1000, a ring of the same amount, worth $470 each, five beautiful diamond rings, two pairs of diamond bracelets, a gold watch, and other articles of smaller value.

A DOUBLE DEATH OF A WOMAN.

We read in the St. Louis Bulletin: "This morning Mrs. Mary Ann Kennedy, a widow lady, was found murdered at Merrill's drug mills on St. Charles Street, between 18th and 19th, with her throat cut from ear to ear, and a check, to tury him his breakfast. While Mr. Schmidt was in the room he was startled by a woman screaming with him. There is a large upright shaft a few inches from the floor, with a wheel that carries the machinery. Mrs. B. was standing near this, and bent over to pick up something, when her head caught in the cogs of the large wheel, and she was drawn in between it and the shaft. Her body was mangled in a horrible manner before she was stunned. The effect of the shock was so great as to break the shaft, which is about a foot in diameter. Mr. Schmidt stopped the power, and found that the woman was dead. He said that she was dead, his grief knew no bounds. Mrs. Kennedy was an intelligent, industrious woman, and much devoted to her husband and child."

PERSONAL.

Mr. Corcoran, of Washington, is erecting on Pennsylvania Avenue an art gallery, which is estimated to cost $250,000. It is constructed of white marble. It is to be free, and will be managed by trustees appointed by Mr. Corcoran.

Theodore Parker's last letter to the Liberator is dated Rome, September 1st. He says: "I am very well, and I am really getting stronger every day. I have not been better than for a year past. But the cough continues—the cough that has troubled me so long—it is there still." Mr. Professor Deur has a fine wood lot, and I work in it with a little axe, and have got to splitting, trimming and cutting down bushes; and sometimes I take an axe and cut down a tree, and receive therefore a little money. I do not overwork, and have a good appetite."

The town of Hiram, Me., has given a donation to Bowdoin University churches in Maine this summer.

A republican meeting of Mr. Wm. Pitt Edgar, of Bethel, the Hon. Samuel Dill, of Ballymena, and the Rev. Mr. Dill, of Belfast, has been called by the Lord Lieutenant, to consider the propriety of inviting the United States for aid in behalf of domestic missions in Ireland.

The Rev. Dr. Cox, D.D., of Brooklyn, has declined to take the depilation in about three weeks. We have no doubt it will be cordially received by all Presbyterian Protestants in the United States.

The Rev. Dr. Breckinridge Peyton, living in Gallatin County, Kentucky, entered the house of a Mr. Lawrence of that county, and shot and killed Mrs. Lucy Ann Lee, Lawrence. She answered by discharging a pistol at him, which missed fire. Peyton then shot her dead. He also shot him in the street, and again fired at him, blowing out his brains. Peyton is in jail awaiting his trial.

Mr. Ward, the United States Minister to China, was presented to the Imperial Commissioners on the 26th of June. He was attended by W. W. Ward, Secretary of Legation; Dr. Parker, Interpreter; Capt. Sanford, U. S. Navy; Mr. Martin, and Mr. Archer, Attaches; and George W. Martin, Esq., and Mr. Lawrence, Attaches of the Legation. The Commissioners were in the palace, carried by liveried Celestials, and escorted by the Imperial Guard of Pechelyn and Mianmyin, with a very good band of music.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

TRIAL TRIP OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

We read in the London Times of September 7:

"At length, after having encountered a succession of gales, which would have rendered navigation quite impossible, and even dangerous to any vessel not possessing the strength and stability of the ship itself, the great steamer left the Nore at half past 6 o'clock yesterday morning, and in the course of a few hours was safely moored to Portland.

"Mr. Atkinson, the pilot to whose well-known skill and skill that noble vessel was intrusted, came on board the previous night, and his assistants soon after followed yesterday.

"Captain Harrison and the pilot took their places on the paddle-box, and the engineers and firemen remained at the bridge to direct the action of the engines, both of which screws and paddles were under steam. Under the guidance of Mr. Atkinson the great steamer soon brought the General Admiral over to this country, and left to transmit directions to the men at the wheel, at

Mr. Langley's new steering apparatus was not completely tried.

Precisely at a quarter past seven the last moorings were let go. The screw engines started first, working beautifully, without noise, heat, or even apparent vibration; and when the pinnace mechanic came into place for revolutions sufficed to get her head round to the point required.

There was the order given to go ahead slowly, and for the first time the Great Eastern started into motion, and with the slow majestic beat of her huge paddles moved proudly down the river.

HOW SHE STEERED.

The very first turn she made seemed to shower Captain Harrison and all the officers of the vessel that the great ship was at thoroughly obedient to her helm, and that, too, with the most delicate facility to be overcome, or rather to conceal against, the huge mass of water and the sharp curves of the river at Greenwich, Blackwall, and Woolwich.

The vessel's draught was still feet 10 inches aft, and about 27 inches forward—about 3 inches more than that which she would have had if the engines, being down by the head 5 inches instead of some 8 inches, were in the centre. Steering close by the Greenwich shore in deep water, but when it is recollected that this was the maximum required at that time, and that the full length of 690 feet, which is more than the breadth of the Thames at Westminster, will be used when the two engines are at first regarded with a certain amount of anxiety and distrust. A few moments' trial, however, showed that she was perfectly in hand. She steered as easily as a wherry—as easily as a steamer of a tenth the capable of starting her into motion or arresting her progress instantly almost by the mere movement of the hand.

THE CRISIS AT BLACKWALL POINT.

"Blackwall Point was, indeed, the crucial point in the fortunes of the Great Eastern. The river at this point forms an acute angle, which is rendered more acute with strong but most unequal force. The admirable manner in which Captain Harrison, aided by Mr. Brunel, managed the ship, the power and regularity with which the engines worked, and the skill with which exacted, have brought the vessel round this place. But, of course, right in the centre of the reach of the river Blackwall was moored, while a little beyond her lay a large number of colliers and other craft. Here, if the steerage does the screws, the tugs were signaled to keep the Great Eastern from the shore. Two tugs were put on the starboard bow, and two more on the starboard quarter of the huge mass, and, for a few minutes, the tide vessel was beyond a control. The engines worked as the energy of the tide was strong, and in an instant drove her broad shore. Obedient to the helm, the tugs and other own engines saved her here, though it was a delicate matter to use them against the tide, and almost impossible to counteract the influence of the tide and get her head off shore; but, as the tugs got her on the right manner as would not give way enough to take her on the starboard tack, and, with the tide, she passed the point, as effectually, fresh tugs were passed to the tugs, the tide, the cause of all the danger, was passed, and the after an anchor drop of about three or fifteen minutes, the Great Eastern worked slowly round and turned the point of danger."

She anchored that day at Purfleet.

THE BIG SHIP BY MOONLIGHT.

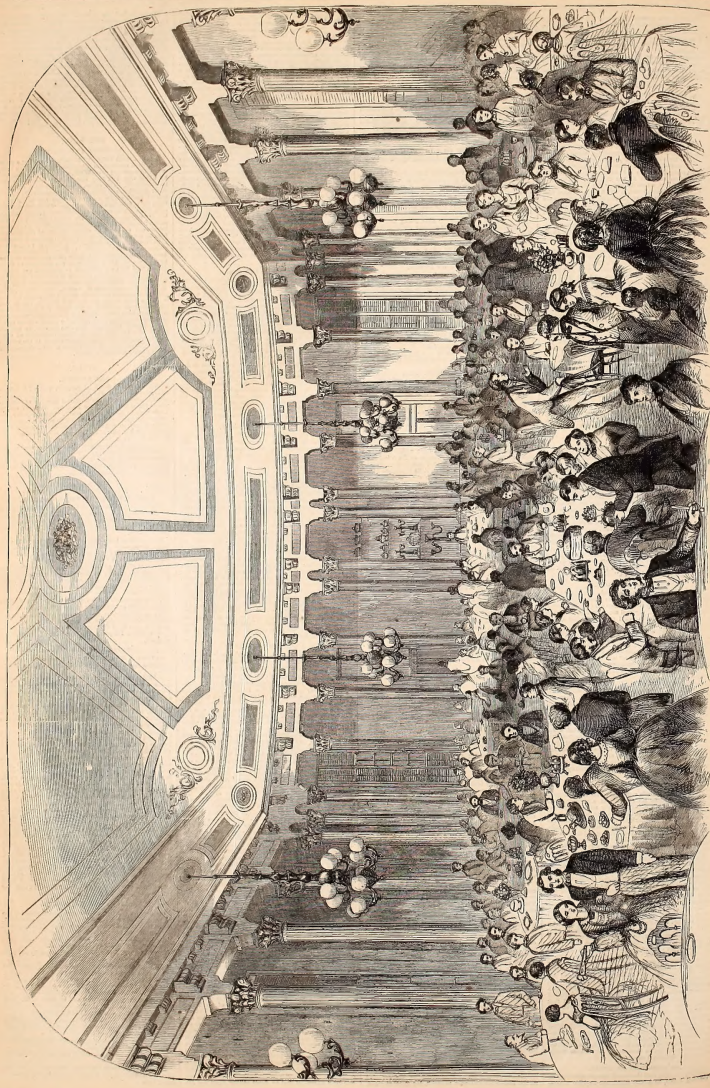
The same writer describes the scene at night: "We set out night had fallen but the great ship was fully lit up, and began its progress down the river under the rising tide. The night was a little puffy, and seemed to threaten rain, but the moon was at the full, the river was, and the weather tolerably favorable for the first experiment. It took upward of an hour for the tide to make, and to fully rush, and at our start the tide had not yet risen for a short time in turning, she might almost be said to have clogged the navigation of the river. Before the turning the night she swung twice again, and by daylight was lying with her head up the river, prepared for the course down the river. It seems almost incredible, that a ship of such a size could be got up and down any of the Thames, but only nautical men can appreciate the fact of her handling as a boat. Her rudder is as large as a door, and is so constructed and so balanced that one finger can move it, and the turning it or the order being distorted in its hold.

THE LAST OFF.

Next day the voyage was resumed. Gravesend was passed, and, in the beginning of the afternoon, Purfleet—"the water bigue to change its tint from dirty brown to bright green, and the ship was moored to the warfare, and those on board rejoiced at last at the first solid-bed appearance of things.

The locomotive was marked in the usual disgrace. Steaming down the river, and out of the river, and moored in the Thames, the engines of the Great Eastern were never still for a moment. Her paddles were always going, and preparations were made for casting off the hawsers, and for the Great Eastern for once, and for all, to be left to herself.

The tugs were cast off the Chapman's Head, at the of Sea Reach, the passenger's with the ship's head fairly accordingly off, and the Great Eastern forward. A solid anthem was played as the smoky sentinels left behind by the tugs, and the ship's company cheered



THE DINING-ROOM OF THE FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, ON MADISON SQUARE.

LADIES' DRAWING-ROOM IN THE FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL.

EXTERIOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL ON MADISON SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, NEW YORK.

We present our readers on the two preceding pages with views of the new hotel in Madison Square—entitled, we believe, the Fifth Avenue Hotel—to wit, the dining-room, the ladies' drawing-room, and an exterior view. The building is an imposing one, and efforts have been judiciously made to attract special attention to the new enterprise.

As a hotel, the Fifth Avenue promises to present striking peculiarities. It is very large: it covers the whole of an immense block on Madison square. It is built of white marble; architecturally considered it is not very handsome, but seems substantial—that is to say, the space is economically and wisely used. The number of guests who can find a resting-place in the new hotel is large, and the number of bedrooms is said to be 600, and the dining-room will seat, we are also told, 400 persons. The latter feat would, we imagine, involve some crowding. The room contains twelve tables, each of which appears to be about twenty-four feet square; the total would thus be three, not six, hundred. But my ruminations of round for the present oblong tables, and curtailing the space allotted to each guest, no doubt the number of guests might be very much increased. The dining-room is very handsome-long, but so broad that its length is not conspicuous; the white aluminum window and pier-glasses have the show of silver and plate dazzling and agreeable. It is relieved by two subordinate cuttings-rooms on each side—a breakfast and a lunch room, both snug and comfortable.

The drawing-room does not differ from those of the other hotels. They are furnished in the usual hotel style, with heavy masses of gilt wood, rich crimson or purple curtains, extravagant, luxurious rose-wood and bric-a-brac, rich carpets, and so forth; the whole forming about as handsome and as comfortless an appearance as any one need wish for. But, as we said, in this respect there seems differ in essential point from those of the St. Nicholas, the Everett, or any other first-class house. The great advantage they possess consists in a very fine view upon Madison Square.

The bedrooms are the conventional chambers of first-class hotels, bath, bedding, carpets, bureau, easy chair, etc., etc., all are the usual thing; all good and handsome after kind. We hear that the rooms are said to be provided with separate bath-rooms. We examined a few of these rooms. Most of them are provided with sets of the invariable furniture—so glossy and apt to grow spotty that we can not conceive any human being contemplating it in its presence. Where is the sane man or woman who wants to have furniture covered with lightblue broadcloth in his or her bedroom? We suppose that William B. Astor or Commodore Vanderbilt are provided by nature with skin. No; those persons and all other sensible people want in their chambers furniture on which they can lounge at their ease—furniture which they are not afraid of staining or spoiling by sitting upon it, or using it negligently. If you are a man of course, and don't care about ruining other people's property, you may go and stay at the Fifth Avenue Hotel; you may walk your dirty boots, on a rainy day, over the fine carpet; you may put your feet upon the window-sill, and tilt back the easy chair which cost as much; and if you share the fate of the rest of civilized mankind, you will shrink from such wanton destruction, and will, in the state chambers of the grand Fifth Avenue Hotel, sigh for a home or a comfortable room in a country inn, where you can take your ease in your own way, without fear of broussile or Brussels tapestry out of shape and color.

It is indeed high time that we Americans began to exercise a little common sense in this matter. We have wrapped about our hotels till innocent foreigners have begun to believe that we are ahead of Europe in that particular; whereas, in point of fact, our hotel life is nothing but a sort of barbaric splendor which makes hotel-keepers, and hotel-dwellers in hotels intensely wretched. There is no point worth discussing in which our American hotels are not vastly inferior to the same class of establishments in Great Britain and France.

In the first place, what can be more preposterous than to establish a fixed rate of fare at hotels? Big, fat, bloated, lumbering people go to the Astor House for a week, and, in virtue of his standing and his purse, gets a room near the dining-saloon—a large air-room, looking out upon Broadway, with lounge, arm-chairs, pier-glasses, Brussels carpets, and other fixings, for which he pays—for his dinner he eats post de fois gras, and wookcock; at breakfast he will have salmon at fifty cents a pound; at supper he has delicacies of the season, which exercise an experienced cook for an hour or two, and contemplates next year; for all which he pays $2 50 per day. At the same time the Reverend John Jones comes down to the village to attend the May meetings. He is happy in the possession of a room under the tiles, which he shares with his presiding elder. He pays a dollar a week tax for breakfast and a small slice of beef at dinner; he has no supper. He employs no servants, four or five of whom are perpetually engrossed by Smith. Yet Rev. Jones pays the fixed $2 50 a day—not a half less. Smith said that Gushington had taken the inn-keeper of some $5 or $6 a day, while the Rev. J. Jones pays what he can afford to pay.

Again, what a monstrous folly is that of furnishing with rose-wood and broadcloth! Who among us wants to live, to lounge, to double his children, and to eat his daily dinner off sofas worth $200? Even the poor souls, who, having made money, get this preposterous furniture into their houses, would be shocked at the idea of using it; they keep it for show, and live in holes and corners, basements, and extension-rooms, which are furnished with chairs and sofas and carpets fit for real use. We confess that we experienced a feeling of disappointment when we discovered that the proprietors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel had fallen into the common error in this respect, and had furnished their hotel in such a manner as to entail enormous expense on themselves, and to preclude their guests from enjoying practical comfort.

The time will come when we shall have hotels in New York which shall be popular and profitable. These hotels will be plainly and solidly furnished; with such chairs, sofas, tables, carpets, and beds as men of means and reasonable habits furnish in their own houses. They will be lighted without glittering gold and silk and varnish; but will—how much soever the Astor House in New York now offer—a real substantial air of home comfort about them. Such hotels will not supply their guests with cast-iron food, and charge for the price of a plain beef-steak; nor will they charge the Rev. James with would keep his family for a week. They will give every man the food he wants, and charge him according to his appetite—Gluttony, by the day; Jones, by the week. Such hotels would soon be too small for their guests, and fortune to their owners.

Hotel-keeping in New York is not a profitable business. We understand that the leading hotels do not pay annually a fair interest on the capital and still invested. One of the most profitable, as we understand, is the Lee House, which has not, or Mr. Astor, is said to have leased at a very low rent to Mr. Stetson, in order, as he is reported to have said, that the charmer might be house might be kept up. The other first-class houses are said to be in the hands of their mortgagees—unprofitable, sometimes the contrary; fluctuating according to the circumstances of the people at large, and in consequence of the condition of the new hotel mentioned in our hotel system.

We do not advise that we adopt the European system of feeding and charging; and we can only regret that the proprietors of the new Fifth Avenue have not, as they had so fine a chance of starting the new fashion, had not the courage to avail themselves of it. Perhaps, however, they may start their own business better than their critics do. There may be a fondness among hotel-goers for broussile and furniture; our critics may, perhaps, be mistaken when they visit the city, on splendors which no millionaire here thinks of needing. We shall see by-and-by.

BABY SEAMSTRESSES.

We take from the Englishwoman's Journal some part of a record of experiences that will tell something new of human life to many of our readers. A dirty paper in a dirty window of a court adver tised for seven-year-old girls. Two or six years of age, that were "kick" at the hemming. Only such papers had been observed, and the writer made up her mind to see the "little girls." Current was made to a particular garret:

"It was a small and very crowded apartment, containing a bed and one chair, the seat of author.

"There was no table, but there were three low forms, which were temporarily made to serve, and on these forms were seated eleven little girls; the four or five youngest, I could hardly, any of them, have seen six years, one of them the baby of the family. The four behind were about seven, perhaps, and these six were quite old enough to be on the hindermost seat, who might be ten, and two others a year or two younger. The eldest girl had evidently all the fixing and all the responsibility, and was the only one among the number that had many remarks to make, and she did the talking. They were 'on slops:' the little things on the front form going on to sewing, while the others were steadily at work on 'body and sleeve and seam.' Perfect silence was the rule, but the little learners were not always quite successful in it. They all seemed in the utmost distress: one declaring, with many tears, that somebody had made her lose her needle; the accused protesting that she didn't make her lose it, for she lost it her own self, and so did wee Jane's and Mary Ann's; while Mary Ann, or complained that a neighbor had said 'she hadn't got no thread,' when she knew 'twouldn't mean sin.' The poor old woman had several times to hush them when the little girl going of five, a perfectly clean, pretty child, suddenly burst into a burst forth with a most grievous lamentation, because mamma would not let her 'mind that her' father was transported, and he wasn't to come home for 'cause he had gone in a bootiful sip.' Hereupon the old woman interposed with a few words of wisdom, and the confirmed the story of the 'bootiful sip.' But the wicked girl continued to act persistently as the little thing looked over her shoulder. The big, bigbowed another burst of grief, for 'she had said so first.'

"And now the old woman proceeded to execute her search, by candle-light, somewhere. The operation was quite an orchestra, grandmother's deep, after which there was a temporary silence. The little girls were now all at work, and the hemming nearly a yard of calico in the meanest manner, but all using their needles with pricks of blood, showing how sadly the little finger nails had been pierced. In recompense for her industry, she was treated to a bun, and the little creature thought the perfection of a new little pocket-handkerchief, on which the description and illustration of 'Hoop de doiden do,' and then her little eyelids drooped. Grandmother was gently stealing the image of the grotesque

That is an eye of holiness; but there is also that evil eye, which curses death. Here is a man with a rosary of lucky stones—that is to say, of stones with holes in them—hung up in her cottage. She owned unwillingly to a friendly lady that it was meant for protection against the evil eye. "Why, Nanny," said the lady, "you surely don't believe in witches nowadays?" "No, I don't say 'at I do; but certainly I former times there was witches and buzzards, and might sort o' things!" "Well," answered the lady, laughing, "but you surely don't think there are witches now?" "No, I don't say 'at there' are; but I do believe in a yeve sye." As to the old lady's buzzards, there is a story in Yorkshire of a woman who actually killed if he ever said his prayers, who repeated them as follows:

From witches and wizards and long-tailed buzzards, And creeping things that run in hedge-bottoms, Good Lord deliver us!

Then again there are to be remembered, as part of the popular faith of the ignorant, the legends still attached to rocks, and streams, and meres. At Brecken church, in Lincolnshire, stands alone on the top of a high hill, with the village at the foot. They began building it within the village till they changed the site, because every night the stones laid during the day were carried up to the hill-top by fairies. The site and name of Winwick church was decided by a pig who escaped with a straw rope (straw wisp: wee-wick) and carried the stones in his mouth from the wrong place selected to the ground which now is by St. Oswald's church. In a field beside the bridge at Kirkby Lonsdale, and the picturesque stones in the stream below are those which he was carrying in his apron when its string broke. At Peel, in the Isle of Man, a witch with a basin of water sat across that the herring fleet might not sail. Every ship was lost, but she was rolled down hill in a tarrel all with spikes in it, and then in her grave-sides face, and feather'd bat's-wings. Her name means cold grief, and her wail freezes the blood of those who hear it. The Scandinavian witch has wings against the window-pane, and mount the same of one which has been thrown over head for death. It is this hag who cuts the torrent beds by stopping, when she is about to settle on a mountain, the huge stones she has in her apron as ballast when she flies. In some parts of South Wales the hag has no eyes, but it is the Welsh Hawk, the gray king, who sits ever silent in the mist. There is a Welsh fairy, the Pwca, that is non constantly upon the watch to play the most harmful of house-brist grass rolling before the wind. Even upon a wisp of straw it will ride, and "cut a figure in rolling." Miss Costello tells a Pyrenean legend which detects the spirit of the Lord of Orthez in two straws laying on the hill-side.

The fancy must and will work. The whole world is full of wonders that reveal to us the glory and goodness. Life is full of strange problems, of entanglements of love and enmity, of days of mirth and weeping. Fairy-land is around us, and all powers of the mind and soul. While we are ignorant we link religion to such fanciful opinions as those of which a handful has been collected on this leaf of paper. Tech folks a little better; let their fancy, thirsting upon that which is pure and abundant, be steady helper to them, that it may add its quickening influence to their pleasure not their vice here, and to increase their hope for the hereafter. Superstition will soon vanish. All that is poetry in folk-lore may shine as a bright star in literature in our country. As superstition, it degrades: as poetry, it raises us. For,

Shakespeare's self, with laurel crown'd,
Flew to those fairy climes his fancy sheen,
In scenes hour; his wayward sister found,
And with their treasures raised the magic scene.
From them he sang, when, 'mid his bold design,
Before the Bard, on heaven-ward pinion driven,
The shadowy kings of Banquo's fated line
Through the dark cave in gleamy pageant passed.

But it is not worth while to drag a dying man out of his bed because we fancy he is lying upon some feature, or to go to church at midnight to bid steal a minute cutting of lead from each diamond pane of its window, because we fancy that such cuttings a heart of lead for cure of sickness. There is too much of the heart of lead, too little of the golden heart that brings men health, in back credulity.

A Good Fight.

BY CHARLES READE.

AUTHOR OF "LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG," ETC.

[From Advance Sheets, Direct from the Author.]

CHAPTER XXV.

SPECIE is the favorite vent of human thoughts. But there are emotions so simple and overpowering that they rush out, not in words, but in eloquent sounds. All such moments are more or less his characteristic, and to be merely one of these higher animals; for these when greatly agitated ejaculate, though they can not speak.

There was something terrible and truly animal both in the roar of triumph with which the partners burst out of the thicket on our fugitives, and in the sharp cry of terror with which those latter darted away. The pursuers' hands clutched the empty air, scarce two feet behind them, as they fled for life. Confused for a moment, like those that miss their spring, Dietrich and his men let Gerard and the mule put ten yards between them. Then they, not after, with uplifted swords. They were sure of catching them; for this was not the first time the parties had measured speed. In the open ground they had gained visibly on the cattle this morning, and now, at last, it was a fair race again, to be settled by speed alone. A hundred yards were covered in no time. Yet still there remained these ten yards between the pursuers and the pursued.

This increase of speed since the morning puzzled Dietrich. He thought, but I think erroneously, it. When three run in company the pace is that of the slowest of the three. Now Peter had come to the edge of the forest Gerard ran Margaret's pace; but now he ran his own, for the mule was fleet, and urged on by fear. Hence the distance. Moreover, youth and chaste living began to tell. Daylight grew imperceptibly stronger and stronger. And still the pursuers. Then Dietrich made a desperate effort, and gained two yards; but in a few seconds Gerard's pace and Peter's quickly took. The pursuers began to curse.

Martin heard, and his heart lighted up. "Courage, brave lads! courage, brave lads! they are straggling."

It was so. Dietrich was now headed by one of his men, and another dropped into the rear altogether.

They came to a rising ground, not sharp, but long; and here youth, and grit, and honest living told more than ever.

Ere he reached the top Dietrich's forty years weighed him down like forty bullets. "Our cake is dough!" cried he. "Let him have it, then, if you can't alive!" and he left off running, and followed at his heart's pace. Martin and Peter were not far then another, and so, one by one, Gerard ran them all to a stand-still, except one, who kept on, and was soon a mere speck on the rising ground every minute. His name, if I am not mistaken, was Eric Rosenmunder. Dietrich and his band behind him a rise in the wood, shorter, but much steeper than the last.

"Hand on mane!" cried Martin.

Gerard obeyed, and the mule helped him up the hill faster even than he had been running.

At the sight of this manœuvre Dietrich's man lost heart, and, losing now full eighty yards between them and their prey, left off running, the advance of his nearest comrade, he pulled up short, and in obedience to Dietrich's order, began his cross-bow, leveled it deliberately, and just as the trio were sinking out of sight over the crest of the hill, discharged it at Gerard's back.

There was a cry of dismay; and next moment, as if a thunderbolt had been sent to take them, they were all lying on the ground, mute and still.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE effect was so sudden and magical that the shooter himself was stupefied for a moment. Then he hailed his companions to join him in effecting the capture, and, leaving his bow on the hill, began to rose the figure of Martin Wittenhagen with a bent bow in his hand. It was a formidable weapon, and in a threatening attitude then he darted behind a tree, and made himself as small as possible. Martin's skill with that weapon was well known, and the slain dog was a keen reminder of it.

Wolverman peered round the bark cautiously: there was no movement to be seen about him. He saw it shine. He dared not move from his shelter.

When he had been at peace with himself his companions came up, and then, with a scornful laugh, Martin vanished, and presently was heard on the off of the hill.

All the men ran up together. The high ground commanded a view of a narrow but tolerably reasonable glade.

They saw Gerard and Margaret running along at a prodigious pace; they looked like giants; and Martin galloping after them centre a fever.

The human waterfall was at a stand-still. A few words will explain Martin's conduct. We arrive at causes by noting coincidences; yet, now and then, coincidence suggests cause. He had seen all seen a hare tumble over a brier just as the gun went off, and so drew conclusions. Now, he was close to earth by scudding away untouched, to the Burgomaster's mule put her foot in a rabbit-hole, at a stout like the hare, and never lost without inconscious over her head; she fell, and threw both her riders. Gerard escaped by a miracle, and rushed down by her weight and impetus. Thus in a moment the soil was stressed with dramatis personæ.

The docile mule was up again directly, and stood tranquilling. Martin was round, and found round, found out there was but one (a pursuit); on this, he made the young lovers fly on foot, while he checked the others as I have recorded.

He now galloped after his companions, and when, after a long pursuit, he found them, he instantly put Gerard and Margaret on the mule, and ran by their side till his breath failed, then took his turn to ride, and so on alternately. The mule knew what always fresh, and long ere they relaxed their speed all sound and safe. Then we hospitably lost to Dietrich and his men. These latter went, crestfallen, back to look after their chief.

CHAPTER XXVII.

LIFE and liberty, while safe, are little thought of: for why? they are natural. But when they are imperiled, they are rated at their real value. In this, too, they are like sunshine, whose beauty men notice not at noon when it is greatest, but toward evening when it lies in flakes of topaz under shady elms. Yet it is feeble then; but gloom lies beside it and reveals its fire. Thus Gerard and Margaret, though they started at every leaf that rustled louder than its fellows, glowed all over with joy and thankfulness as they glided among the trees, fleetly trees in safety and long tranquil silence. Saving hope and brutal voices yet ringing in their minds' ears.

But presently Gerard found stains of blood on Margaret's dress.

"Oh, Martin! Martin! help! they have wounded her: they have slain!"

"No, no!" said Margaret, smiling to reassure him. "I am not wounded nor hurt at all."

"But what is it, then, in Heaven's name?" cried Gerard, in great agitation.

"Do not scold me, then!" and Margaret blushed.

"Do I ever scold you?"

"No, dear Gerard. Well, then, Martin said it was blood those cruel dogs followed; so I thought it would look well a little blood on me, and that the dogs would follow me instead, and let my Gerard win free. So I scratched my arm with Martin's knife—gently, but" Whose else could I take? Yours, Gerard? Ah, no. Too forgive me?"

"Let me see the scratch first," said Gerard, choking with emotion. "There, I thought so. A scratch? I call it a cut—a deep, terrible, cruel cut."

Gerard shuddered at sight of it.

"Martin heard, and came to it with her bodkin," said the soldier. "Milksop! that sickens at sight of a scratch and a little blood."

"Ay, I could look on a ton of blood, but not on her. Oh, Margaret! how could you be so cruel?"

Margaret smiled with love ineffable. "Foolish Gerard," murmured she, "to make so much of nothing." She laid down the guilty arm round his neck. "As if I would not give all the blood in my heart for you! Is not mine a far greater sacrifice?" And the next moment, under the sense of his recent danger, she wept on his neck for pity of his love. Ah, love! love! love!

"And I must part from her," he sobbed; "it was true then: my mother must go to her in Utrecht—in Italy. Ah! me! ah! me!"

At this Margaret wept afresh, but patiently and softly. Gerard's grief is never off its guard, and with her unselfishness was an instinct. To utter her present thoughts would be to add to Gerard's misery at parting, so she wept in silence.

Suddenly they emerged upon a beaten path, and Martin stopped.

"This is the bridle-road I spoke of," said he, gravely, "and I must say I bet the dogs will follow."

Margaret and Gerard cast a scared look at one another.

Quite a step with me, Martin," whispered Gerard. When he had drawn him aside he said to him, in a broken voice, "Oh, Martin! watch over her for me! She is my wife—yet I leave her. See, Martin! here is gold—it was for my journey; but I can not go now: bear to take it, and spend not; but you will for her, will you not? Oh, Heaven! and I am not there to see! Nay, Martin! but poverty is a curse. You will not let her want for any thing. Martin? The Burgomaster's silver cup—sell that."

"Thou art a good lad, Gerard. Neither want nor harm shall befall her. I swear by my life and little finger then for all the world. And were she naught to me, even for thy sake would I be a father to her. Ay, and a stout father, too, with thee going and coming." And the rough soldier rung Gerard's hand and turned his head away.

After a moment's silence he was for going back to Margaret; but Gerard stopped him. "No, good Martin: prithee, stay here behind this thicket—I—I—I—Martin! Martin!"

By this means Gerard escaped a witness of his anguish at leaving her he loved, and Martin escaped a pang—to see which I myself would rather not dwell. He did not see the poor young things kneel and embrace. Heaven then help the man could have interrupted. He did not see them cling together like one, and then try to part, and fail, and cling to one another, and part again, like drowning, despairing creatures. But he heard Gerard sob, and Margaret's passionate cry.

At last there was a wild cry, and feet pattered on the hard road.

He started up, and there was Gerard running wildly, with both hands clasped above his head, in prayer, and Margaret tottering toward him with her arms extended piteously, as if for help, and sobs cheek, and eyes fixed on vacancy.

He caught her in his arms, and spoke words of comfort to her; but her mind could not receive them yet: only at the sound of his voice she held him tight and trembled violently.

He got her on the mule, and put his arm round her, and so, supporting her frame, which was now all relaxed and powerless, he took her slowly and sadly home.

She did not shed one tear she spoke one word.

At the gate Martin stood: he took her off the mule, and bade her go across to her father's house. She did as she was bid.

Martin to Rotterdam. Gerard was now to hot for him.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

JORDAN KETEL came to Peter's house to claim Margaret's person; but Margaret was ill in bed, and Peter, on hearing his errand, affronted him and warned him off the premises, and one or two that stood by were for ducking him; for both father and daughter were favorites, and the whole city was in every mouth, and the Sevenbergens in that state of hot, indiscriminating irritation, which occasionally produces popular sympathy.

So Jordan Ketel went off in dudgeon, and reported him of his good deed. This sort of sentence is not lure, and has the merit of being sincere. Dietrich Brower, who was discovered at "The Three Kings," making a chatter-box drunk in order to worm out of him the whereabouts of Martin Wittenhagen, was actually taken and flung into a horse-pond, and threatened with worse usage, should he ever show his face in the burgh again; and finally, municipal jealousy being roused, the Burgomaster of Sevenbergen sent a formal missive to the Burgomaster of Utrecht, reminding him he had overstepped the law, and requesting him to apply to the authorities of Sevenbergen on a future occasion when he might have a complaint, rule to imagiary, against any of the townsfolk.

The wily Glyndevrett, suppressing his rage at this remonstrance, sent back a civil message to say that the person he had followed to Sevenbergen was a Tergovian, one Gerard, and that he had stolen the town records; that Gerard having escaped into foreign parts, and probably taken the documents with him, the whole matter was at an end; and that he, Glyndevrett, and think of him the friend Peter Brandt, now there was no longer any good to be gained by it.

Thus he made a virtue of necessity. But in reality his calmness was but a veil: baffled at Sevenbergen, he turned his views elsewhere. He set his emissaries to learn from the family at Terguen whether Gerard had fled, and he felt little surprise he found they did not know. This added to his uneasiness. It made him fear Gerard was not in Holland at all, and this added to his fear that a certain discovery, and would come back and take a terrible revenge. Meanwhile he had his friends and others that were about him noticed a change for the worse in Glyndevrett. Van Swieten. He became more irritable than ever, a dread lay on him. His eyes were forever casting furtive glances at the man who spoke a thing which led him from what quarter it is to come. Making others wretched had not made him happy. It seldom does. But this latter fear, which fed on his own bad heart, interference might in time have cemented its influence without any additional crime. But a violent land, were still the same outward features, but within was no longer the simple happy family that they appeared with. Life had become a mere formula not Sylvanus had lost in banishing Gerard, and, though no fear of making mischief still, she never told her mother, yet there were times when she could not help looking pale and troubled at their hypocritical regrets: she could not help it. Catherine with a woman's vigilance noticed this, and was puzzled, and troubled at nothing, but quietly pondered it, and went on watching for more. The black image which she had resolved to partake in the general gloom and sorrow, succeeded as far as to impose upon their father and herself, but the demure subterfuge was not at the bottom of them could not escape them feminine eyes.

That, noting all, seem'd naught to note.

Thus mistrust and suspicion sat at the table, pour solitude and sorrow, and misgiving, that had brightened the whole circle, unobserved till now. As for the old looker, his pride had been wounded by his son's decadence, and so he here stiffly up, and did his best never to mention Gerard's name; but unknown to himself, those Nature might often be seen tugging at his heartstrings. One catch'd him in the middle of a sentence: if I let Lotte where the boy is, and that his life and health are in no danger, small would be my fault if he came to her. Another, that he would follow. (I can't help thinking that if Gerard had opened the door just then, and walked in, the old man would have torn him away tears and embraces for him, and few reproaches, or none.)

One thing he took the old couple quite by surprise —publicity. Ere Gerard had been gone a week, his adventures were in every mouth. The people's sympathy declared itself warmly on the side of the lovers, and against Gerard's cruel father and the hard-hearted Burgomaster, "who must put his nose into a business that never concerned him."

One feeling in Catherine's mind was bitterly strong, and deprived an unfortunate young creature of more sympathy than she had ever thought her during to hope for it.

"Mother," said Lotte, "it is all over the town that Margaret is down with a fever—a burning fever: her father fears her only."

"Margaret? what Margaret?" inquired Catherine, with a treacherous assumption of calmness and indifference.

"Oh, mother! whom should I mean? Why Gerard's Margaret."

"Gerard's Margaret!" screamed Catherine; "how dare you say such a word to me? And I rede you never to name that creature's name in this house, that she has laid bare. She is the ruin of my poor boy: the flower of all my flock. She is the cause that he and a holy priest are at open hostile of us, but is roaming the world, and that I am a desolate, broken-hearted mother. Hold! do not cry, my girl, I do ill to speak harsh to you. But oh, Kate! you don't know what pains in a mother's heart. And your spoiling of Gerard whenever me swallow my fears: but at night I see him in my dreams, and always some misfortune next day. Sometimes I see him torn by wild beasts; sometimes he is in the hands of robbers, and their cruel knives are at his throat. Sometimes I fear that one would think would move a stone. Oh! when I think that while I sit here in comfort, perhaps my poor boy lies dead in some savage place: and all along of that girl: there, her very name is a curse to me. I will not hear it. I will not hear it."

"I'll not say any thing, nor do any thing to grieve you worse, mother," said Kate, tenderly: but she sighed.

She was not alone was so fiercely interdicted in this house was much spoken of, and even pitied, elsewhere. Gerard's disappearance was sorry for her, and the young men and maidens cast many a pitying glance, as they passed, at the fair house where the beautiful Lotte Sylvanus lived with her parents. In this familiar phrase they understated her spirit and sensibleness. Gerard was not dead, and she was too loyal herself to doubt his constancy. Her father was dear to her and helpless; and, but for bodily weakness, all her love for Gerard would not have kept her from doing her duties, though she might have gone about them with drooping head and heavy heart. But physical and mental excitement had brought on an attack of fever so violent that nothing but youth and constitution saved ber. The malady left her at last, but in that terrible state of bodily weakness in which the patient feels life a burden.

Then it is that love and friendship by the bedside are mortal angels, with comfort in their voices and healing in their palms.

But this poor girl had to come back to life and vigor how she could. Many days she lay silent, and the heavy hours rolled like leaden waves over her. In her secluded state existence seemed a burden, and life a thing gone by. She could not try to get well. Gerard was gone. She had not him to get well for. Often she lay for hours quite still, with the tears welling gently out of her eyes.

But one day when Martin on uneasy slumber she found two women in her room. One was a servant; the other, by the deep fur on her collar and sleeves, was a person of consideration; a narrow band of silvery hair being spared by her coiffure, observed her to past the age when women of sense conceal their years. The looks of both were kind and friendly. Margaret tried to raise herself in the bed, but the old lady placed a hand very gently on her.

"Lie still, sweet-heart; we come not here to put you about, but to comfort you, God willing. Now then up a bit, and tell us, first, who think you we are?"

"Nay, madam, I know you, though I never saw you before; you are the demoiselle Van Eyck, and this is Richt Heynes. Gerard has often spoken of you, and of your goodness to him. Madam, he has no friend like you near him now," and she lay back, and the tears welled out of her eyes.

The good-natured Richt Heynes began to cry for company; but her mistress scolded her. "Well, you are a pretty one for a sick-room!" said she; and she put out a world of innocent art to cheer the patient: and not without some little success. An old woman that has seen life and all its troubles is a sovereign blessing by a sorrowful young woman's side. She knows what to say, and what to avoid. She knows how to soothe her and interest her. Ere she had been there an hour she had Margaret's head lying on her shoulder instead of on the pillow, and Margaret's soft eyes dwelling on her with gentle gratitude.

"Ah! this is hairy," said the old lady, running her fingers through it. "Come and look at it, Richt!"

Richt came and handled it, and praised it unaffectedly. The poor child that owned it was not quite out of the reach of flattery (owing, no doubt, to her not being dead).

"In sooth, madam, I did use to think it hideous; but Ae praised it, and ever since then I have been almost vain of it. God forgive me. You know how foolish there are that love."

"They are greater fools that don't," said the old lady, sharply.

Margaret opened her lovely eyes, and looked at her for her meaning.

This was only the first of many visits. In fact either Margaret Van Eyck or Richt came nearly every day until their patient was convalescent; and she improved rapidly under their hands. Richt entertained this perpetually to certain nourishing dishes she prepared in Peter's kitchen: but Margaret herself thought more of the kind words and eyes that kept telling her she had friends to live for. Her gratitude to her old friend was ardent and touching, and there was no mistaking its depth and sincerity.

CHAPTER XXIX.

MARTIN WITTENHAAGEN went straight to Rotterdam, to take the bull by the horns. The bull in question was Philip the Good, duke of this, earl of that, lord of the other. Arrived at Rotterdam, he found the court was at Ghent. To Ghent he went, and sought an audience, but was put off and baffled by lackeys and pages. So he threw himself in his sovereign's way out hunting, and, contrary to all court precedents, commenced the conversation—by rearing lustily for mercy.

"Why, where is the peril, man?" said the duke, looking all round, and laughing.

"Grace for an old soldier hunted down by burghers!"

Now kings differ in character like other folk; but there is one trait they have in common: they are mightily inclined to be affable to men of very low estate indeed. These do not vie with them in anything whatever, so jealousy can not creep in; and they amuse them by their blustrous and novelty, and refresh them with a touch of nature —a rarity in courts. So Philip the Good reined in his horse and gave Martin almost a fifo-delity, and Martin reminded him of a certain butter-headed wheen he had received an arrow intended for his sovereign. The Duke remembered the incident perfectly, and was graciously pleased to take a cheerful view of it. He could afford to. Then Martin told his sovereign of Gerard's first capture in the church, his imprisonment in the tower, and the manœuvre by which they got him out, and all the details of the hunt; and, whether he told it better than I have, or that the Duke had not heard so many good stories as you have, certain it is the Duke got so excited that, when a number of courtiers came galloping up and interrupted Martin, he swore like a costermonger, and threatened, only half in jest, to cut off the next head that should come between him and a good story; and when Martin had done, he said,

"St. Luke! what sport goeth on in this mine earldom—ye'l in my own woods, and I see it not. Ten fellow have all the luck." And he was indignant at the partiality of Fortune. "Lo you now! this was a man-hunt!" he said. "I never had the luck to be at a man-hunt."

"My luck was none so great," replied Martin, blandly; "I was on the wrong side of the dogs' noses."

"Ah! so you were: I forgot that." And royalty was almost reconciled to his lot. "What would you then?"

"A free pardon, your highness, for myself and Gerard."

"For what?"

"For prison-breaking."

"Go to: the bird will fly from the cage. 'Tis instinct. Besides, coop a young man up for loving a young woman? These punishments must be void of common sense. What else?"

"For striking down the Burgomaster."

"Oh! the hunted boar will turn to bay. 'Tis his right, and I hold him less than man that grudges it him. What else?"

"For killing of the blood-hounds."

The Duke's countenance fell.

"Twas their life or mine," said Martin, eagerly.

"Ay! but I can't have my blood-hounds, my beautiful blood-hounds, sacrificed to—"

"No, no, no! They were not your dogs."

"Whose, then?"

"The rangers'."

"Oh. Well, I am very sorry for him; but, as I was saying, I can't have my old soldiers sacrificed to his blood-hounds. Thou shalt have thy free pardon."

"And poor Gerard?"

"And poor Gerard, too, for thy sake. And now: tell thou this Burgomaster his doings mislike me; this is to set up for a king, not a burgomaster. I'll have no kings in Holland but one. Bid him be more humble, or by St. Jude I'll hang him before his own door, as I hanged the Burgomaster of what's his name, some town or other in Flanders it was; no, 'twas somewhere in Brabant —no matter—I hanged him; I remember that much—for oppressing poor folk."

The Duke then beckoned his chancellor, a purse old fellow that sat his horse like a sack, and bade him write out a free pardon for Martin and one Gerard.

This precious document was drawn up in form and signed next day, and Martin hastened home with it.

Margaret had left her bed some days, and was sitting pale and pensive by the fireside, when he burst in, waving the parchment, and crying, "A free pardon, girl, for Gerard as well as me! Send for him back when you will; all the burgomasters on earth daren't lay a finger on him."

She flushed all over with joy, and her hands trembled with eagerness as she took the parchment, and devoured it with her eyes, and kissed it again and again, and flung her arms round Martin's neck and kissed him. When she was calmer she told him Heaven had raised her up a friend in the dame Van Eyck. "And I would have consulted her on this good news; but I have not strength to walk so far."

"What need to walk? There is my mule."

"Your mule, Martin?"

The old soldier, or professional pillager, laughed, and confessed he had got so used to her that he forgot at times Gerard was a free citizen. To-morrow he would turn her into the Burgomaster's yard, but tonight she should carry Margaret to Tergoza.

It was nearly dusk; so Margaret ventured, and stood seven in the evening she astonished and gladdened her new but ardent friend by arriving at her house—with unwonted roses on her cheeks, and Gerard's pardon in her bosom.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM

CHAPTER II.

THE GRINDSTONE.

TELLSON'S BANK, established in the Saint Germain Quarter of Paris, was in a wing of a large house, approached by a court-yard, and shut off from the street by a high wall and a strong gate. The house belonged to a great nobleman who had lived in it until he made a flight from the troubles, in his own coach-and-six, and got across the borders. A mere beast of the chase flying from hunters, he was still in his metempsychosis no other than the same Monseigneur, the proprietor of whose chocolate for whose lips had once occupied three strong men besides the cook in question.

Monseigneur gone, and the three strong men absolving themselves from the sin of having been drawn his high wages, by being more than ready and willing to cut his throat on the altar of the dawning Republic, one and indivisible, of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, or Death, Monseigneur's house had been first sequestrated, and then confiscated. For, all things moved so fast, and decrees followed decree with that fierce precipitation, that now upon the third night of the autumn month of September patriot emissaries of the law were in possession of Monseigneur's house, and had marked it with the tricolor, and were drinking brandy in its state apartments.

A place of business in London like Tellson's place of business in Paris would soon have driven the House out of its mind and into the Gazette. For what would assist Britain responsibility and respectability have said to orangetrees in boxes in a Bank court-yard, and even to a Cupid over the counter? Yet such things were. Tellson's had whitewashed the Cupid, but he was still to be seen on the ceiling, in the coolest linen, aiming (as he very often does) at money from morning to night. Bankruptcy must inevitably have come, and with it the sweeping Parisian Lombard Street, London, and also of a curtained sleeve in the rear of the immortal boy, and also of a looking-glass let into the wall, and also of clerks not at all old who dozed on pulse on the other side of counters. If the French Tellson's could get on with these things exceedingly well, and, so long as the times held together, no man had taken fright at them, and drawn out his money.

What money would be drawn out of Tellson's henceforth, and what would lie there, lost and forgotten; what plate and jewels would tarnish in Tellson's hiding-places, while the depositors rusted in prisons, and when they should have violently perished by axe or gun or guillotine, it was Tellson's, never be balanced in this world, nor the crowned edge of the cunning man's knife ever have said that night any more than Mr. Jarvis Lorry could, though he thought heavily of these questions. As he passed along the sunny streets of the blighted and unfruitful year was pressure keenly cold), and as he looked at the cheerful face there was a deeper shade than the pendent lamp could throw, or any object in the room distinctly seen, could throw, on his business.

He occupied rooms in the Bank, in his fidelity to the House of which he had grown to be a part, like strong root-ivy. It chanced that they derived a kind of security from the patriotic occupation of the main building, but the inner-hearted old gentleman never calculated about that. All such circumstances were indifferent to him, so that he did his duty. On the opposite side of the court-yard, under an open colonnade, was extensive standing for carriages, where, by-and-by, some carriages of Monseigneur yet stood. Against two of the pillars were fastened two great flaring flambeaux, and in the light of these, standing out in the open air, was a large grindstone—a roughly-mounted wheel, which appeared to have hurriedly been brought there from some neighboring smithy or other workshop. Rising and looking out of window at these harmless objects Mr. Lorry shivered and retired to his seat by the fire. He had returned not only the glass window, but the lattice shut outside it, and he had closed both sashes, and he shivered through his frame.

From the streets beyond the high wall and the strong gate there came the usual night hum of the city, with now and then an indescribable ring in it, weird and unearthly, as if some unwonted sounds of a terrible nature were going up to Heaven.

"Thank God," said Mr. Lorry, clasping his hand, "that no one near and dear to me is in this dreadful town to-night. May He have mercy on all who are in danger!"

Soon afterward the bell at the great gate sounded, and he thought, "They have come back!" and sat listening. But there was no loud ringing for admittance, and all was hushed expected, and he heard the gate clash again, and all was quiet.

The nervousness and dread that were upon him inspired that vague uneasiness respecting the Bank which a great change would naturally awaken with such feelings roused. It was well guarded within, and he got up to go among the trusty people who were watching it, when his door suddenly opened, and two figures rushed in, at sight of which he fell back in amazement.

Lucie and her father! Lucie with her arms stretched out to him, and with that old look of earnestness so concentrated and intensified that it seemed as though it had been stamped upon her face expressly to give force and power to it in this one passage of her life.

"What is this?" cried Mr. Lorry, breathless and confused. "What is the matter? Lucie!

Manette?

"What has happened? What has brought you here? What is it?"

With the look fixed upon him, in her pale agony and wildness, she pointed out in his arms, unconsciously, "Oh my dear friend! my husband!"

"What husband, Lucie?"

"Charles."

"What of Charles?"

"Here."

"Here in Paris?"

"Has been here some days—three or four—I don't know how many—I can't collect my thoughts. An errand of generosity brought him here unknown to us; he was stopped at the barrier, and sent to prison."

The old man uttered an irrepressible cry. Almost at the same moments the bell of the door rang again, and a loud noise of feet and voices came pouring into the court-yard.

"What is that noise?" said the Doctor, turning toward the window.

"Don't look!" cried Mr. Lorry. "Don't look out! Manette, for your life, don't touch the head!"

The Doctor turned, with his hand upon the fastening of the window, and said, with a cool, bold smile,

"My dear friend, I have a charmed life in this city. I have been a Bastile prisoner. There is no patriot in Paris—in Paris!—to whom I, who knowing me to have been a prisoner in the Bastile, would touch me, except to overwhelm me with embraces, or carry me in triumph. My old pain has given me a power that has brought me hundreds of people to-day, and a word of Charles there, and brought us here. I know it would be so; I knew I could help Charles out of all danger; I said I would go. What is that noise?" His hand was again upon the window.

"Don't look!" cried Mr. Lorry, absolutely desperate. "No, Lucie, my dear, nor you!" He got his arm round her, and held her. "Don't be so terrified, my love. I solemnly swear to you that I know of no harm having happened to Charles; that I had no suspicion even of his being in this fatal place. What papers is he in?"

"La Force."

"La Force! Lucie, my child, if ever you were brave and serviceable in your life—and you were always both—you will compose your self now to do exactly as I bid you; for more depends upon it than you can think or I can say. There is no help for you in any action on your part to-night; you can not possibly stir out. I say this because what I must bid you to do for Charles's sake is the hardest thing to do of all. You must instantly be obedient, still, and quiet. You must let me put you in a room at the back here. You must leave your father and me alone for two minutes, and as there are Life and Death in the world you must not refuse."

"I will be submissive to you. I see in your face that you know I can do nothing else than as I know you are true."

The old man kissed her, and hurried her into the room, and turned the key; then came hurrying back to the Doctor, and opened the window and partly opened the shutter, and put his head upon the Doctor's arm, and looked out with him into the court-yard.

Looked out upon a throng of men and women: not enough in number, or near enough, to fill the court-yard: not more than forty or fifty in all. The people in possession of the house had been let in at the gate, and they had rushed in to work at the grindstone; it had evidently been set up there for their purpose as in a convenient and retired spot.

But such awful workers, and such awful work! The grindstone had a double handle, and turning at it madly were two men, whose faces, as their long hair flapped back when the revolution of the grindstone brought them full up, were more horrible and cruel than the visages of the wildest savages in their most barbarous disguise. False eyebrows and false moustaches were stuck upon them, and their hideous countenances were all bloody and sweaty, and all awry with howling, and all staring and glaring with beastly excitement and want of sleep. As these ruffians turned and turned their wheel, constantly sent whirling forward over their eyes, now flung backward over their heads, the streaming blood-wine to their mouths that they might drink; it was with that dripping blood, and what with dripping wine, and what with the sweat that soaks struck out of the stone, all their wicked atmosphere seemed gore and wine. Hair, not cut nor dressed since creature in the group free from the saucer of blood. Shouldering one another to get next at the sharpening-stone, were some stripped to the waist, with the stain all over their bodies and hanging in strips and scraps, with the stain upon those rags; men devilled out all with spoils of women's lace and silk and ribbon, with the stain upon them dripping through and through. Hatchets, knives, bayonets, swords, all brought to be sharpened, were all red with it. Some of the hacked swords were tied to the wrists of those who carried them with strips of linen and fragments of dress: ligatures various in kind, but all dep of the one colour. And the frightful thing was, that the savageness snatched them from the stream of blood, and tore away into the streets, the same blood was red in their frenzied eyes; eyes which any subnatralized beholder would have given twenty years of life to parify with a life-directed gun.

All this was seen in a moment, as the vision of a drowning man, or of any human creature at any very great pass, could see a world if it were there. They drew back from the window, and the Doctor looked for explanation in his friend's ashy face.

"They are"—Mr. Lorry whispered the words, glancing fearfully round at the locked room—"murdering the prisoners. If you are sure of what you say; if you really have the power you think you have—as I believe you have—make yourself known to these devils and get taken to La Force. It may be too late, I don't know, but let it not be a minute later!"

Doctor Manette pressed his hand, hastened hareheaded out of the room, and was in the court-yard when Mr. Lorry regained the blind.

His streaming white hair, his remarkable face, and the impetuous confidence of his manner, as he put the weapons aside like water, carried him in an instant to the head of the group assembled at the stone. For a few moments there was a pause, and a hurry, and a murmur, and the unintelligible sound of his voice; and then Mr. Lorry saw him, surrounded by all, and in the midst of a line twenty men long, all linked shoulder to shoulder, and hand to shoulder, hurried out with cries of "Live the Bastile prisoner! Help for the Bastile prisoner's kindred in La Force! Room for the Bastile prisoner in front there! Save the prisoner Evremonde at La Force!" and a thousand answering shouts.

He closed the lattice again with a fluttering heart, closed the window and the curtain, hastened to Lucie, and told her that her father was assisted by the people, and gone in search of her husband. He found her child and Miss Pross with her; but it never occurred to him to be surprised by their appearance until a long time afterwards, when he sat wondering in his such quiet as the night knew.

Lucie had, of course, been fallen into a stupor on the floor at his feet, clinging to his hand. Miss Pross had laid the child down on his own bed, and her head had gradually fallen on the wife of an emigrant prisoner under the Bank roof. His own possessions, safety, life, he would have hazarded for Lucie and her child, without a moment's hesitation; but the great trust he held was not his own, and as to that business charge he was a strict man of business.

"BUT SUCH AWFUL WORKERS, AND SUCH AWFUL WORK!"

At first his mind reverted to Defarge, and the thought of finding out the wine-shop again, and taking counsel with its master in reference to the safest place of hiding in the distracted state of the city. But the same consideration that suggested him repudiated him: he lived in the most violent times, and doubtless shared in the acutal there, and deep in its dangerous workings.

Noon coming, and the Doctor not returning, and every minute's delay tending to compromise Charles more, Mr. Lorry advised with Lucie. She said that her father had spoken of hiring a lodging for a short term in that Quarter near the Banking-house. As there was no business objection to this, and as he foresaw that even if a wave set well with Charles, and he were to be released, he could not hope to leave the city, Mr. Lorry went out in quest of such a lodging, and found a suitable one, high up in a removed by-street, where the closed blinds in all the odd-set windows of a high, melancholy square of buildings marked deserted homes.

To this lodging he at once removed Lucie and her child, and Miss Pross—giving them what comfort he could, and much more than he had himself. He left Jerry with them, as a figure to fill a door-way that would bear considerable knocking on the head, and returned to his own occupations. A disturbed and doleful mind he brought to bear upon them, and slowly and heavily the day lagged on with him.

"Does Madame go with us?" inquired Mr. Lorry, seeing that she moved as they moved.

"Yes—that she may be able to recognize the faces and know the persons. It is for their safety."

Beginning to be struck by Defarge's manner, Mr. Lorry looked dubiously at him, and laid the way. Both the women followed; the second woman being The Vengeance.

They passed through the intervening streets as quickly as they might, ascended the staircase of the new domicile, were admitted by Jerry, and found Lucy weeping, alone. She was quickly joined by Mr. Lorry, and Defarge, Mr. Lorry gave her of her husband, and clasped the hand that Charles had laid upon his wife—kissing what it had been doing near him in the night, and might but for a chance have done to him.

"Darnay—Charles—you are well, and near. Defarge has instances around me. You can not answer this letter our child to see?"

That was all the writing. It was so much, however, to her who received it that she turned from Defarge to his wife, and kissed one of the hands that knitted. It was a passionate, loving, thankful, womanly action; but the hand made no response—dropped cold and heavy, and took to its knitting again.

There was something in its touch that gave Lucie a check. She stopped in the act of putting the note in her bosom, and, with that hand yet at her neck, looked terrified at Madame Defarge. Madame Defarge met the terrified eyes bronws and forehead with a cold, impassive stare.

"My dear," said Mr. Lorry, striking in to explain, "the people are frequent risings in the streets; and although it is not likely that they will ever trouble you, Madame Defarge wishes to see those whom she has the power to protect at such times, to the end that she may know them—that she may identify them. I believe," said Mr. Lorry, rather halting in his reasoning words, as the stony resolution of the woman impressed itself upon him more and more, "I state the case, Citizen Defarge?"

Defarge looked gloomily at his wife, and gave no other answer than a gruff sound of acquiescence.

"You had better, Lucie," said Mr. Lorry, doing all he could to propitiate, by tone and manner, "have with the dear child here, and our good Pross. Our good Pross, Defarge, is an English lady, and known to Evremonde."

The lady in question, whose rooted conviction that she was more than a match for any foreigner was not to be shaken by domestic danger, appeared with folded arms, and observed in English to The Vengeance, whom her eye first encountered, "Well, I am sure, Boldface! I hope we are pretty well!" She also bestowed a British scowl on Madame Defarge: but in neither of the two took much heed of her.

"In that list of prisoners," said Madame Defarge, stopping in her work for the first time, and pointing her knitting-needle at little Lucie as if it were the finger of Fate.

"Yes, madame," answered Mr. Lorry; "this is our poor prisoner's darling daughter, and only child."

The shadow attendant on Madame Defarge and her party seemed to fall so threatening and dark on the child that her mother instinctively clasped on of the pointed needle her, and held her to her breast. The shadowy attendant on Madame Defarge and her party seemed then to fall, threatening and dark, on both the mother and the child.

"It is enough, my husband," said Madame Defarge. "I have seen them. We may go."

But the suppressed manner had enough of menace in it—not visible and presented, but indistinct and withheld—to alarm Lucie into saying, as she laid her appealing hand on Madame Defarge's dress,

"You will be good to my poor husband. You will do him no harm. You will help me to see him if you can?"

"Your husband is not my business here," returned Madame Defarge, looking down at her with perfect composure. "It is for others. I sought of your father who is my business here."

"For my sake, then, be merciful to my husband. For my child's sake, for she will get her hands together and pray you to be merciful. We are more afraid of you than all these terrors."

Madame Defarge received it as a compliment, and looked at her husband. Defarge, who had been uneasily biting his thumb-nail and looking at her, collected his face into a mortar expression.

"What is that your husband says in that little letter?" asked Madame Defarge, with a lowering smile. "Influence; he says something touching influence?"

"That my father," said Lucie, hurriedly taking the paper from her breast, but with her eyes fixed upon her questioner and not it, "has much influence around him."

"Surely it will release him!" said Madame Defarge. "Let it do so."

"As a wife and mother," cried Lucie, most earnestly, "I implore you to have pity on me, and not to exercise any power that you possess against my innocent husband, but to use it in his behalf. Oh, sister-woman, think of me. As a wife and mother!"

Madame Defarge looked, coldly as ever, at the supplicant, and said, turning to her friend The Vengeance,

"The wives and mothers we have been used to see, since we were as little as this child, and much longer, have we not been greatly considered? We have known their husbands and fathers laid in prison and kept from them, often enough? All our lives we have seen our sister-women suffer, in themselves and in their children, poverty, nakedness, hunger, thirst, sickness, misery, oppression, and neglect of all kinds?"

"We owe seven nothing else," returned The Vengeance.

"We have borne this a long time," said Madame Defarge, turning her eyes again upon Lucie. "Judge you! Is it likely that the trouble of one wife and mother would be much to us now?"

She resumed her knitting and went on. The Vengeance followed. Defarge went last, and closed the door.

"Courage, my dear Lucie," said Mr. Lorry, as he raised her. "Courage, courage! So far all goes well with us—much, much better than it has of late gone with many poor souls. Cheer up, and have a thankful heart."

"I am not thankful, I hope," Lucie answered, in tears; "but that dreadful woman seems to throw a shadow on me and on all my hopes."

"Tut, tut!" said Mr. Lorry; "what is the despondency in the brave little breast? A shadow indeed! No substance in it, Lucie."

But the shadow of the manner of these Defarges was dark upon himself for all that, and in his secret mind it troubled him greatly.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Kalliston,

As a wash for the complexion, has no equal. It is distinguished for its smoothing and purifying effect, allaying all tendency to inflammation, especially that arising from bites of musquitoes, stings of insects, &c. It is a powerful cleanser of the skin, removing tan, freckles, pimples, and all discolorations. Used, with its refreshing and invigorating properties, render it an indispensable requisite for the toilet.

Prepared only by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,

Boston.

For sale by druggists generally.

Price 50 Cents a Bottle.

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS.

HARNDEN'S EXPRESS

LEAVES EVERY

TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,

BY STEAMSHIP,

FOR SAVANNAH,

Thence, by Georgia Central Railroad, to

MACON, MEMPHIS, ATLANTA,
AUGUSTA, MOBILE, KNOXVILLE,
NASHVILLE, COLUMBUS, MONTGOMERY,
NEW ORLEANS,

And all Towns in the interior of

Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

Every description of merchandise forwarded at Low Rates, and delivered with promptness and despatch.

For further particulars apply at the office of

HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 74 Broadway.

BEULAH.

By

MISS EVANS,

of Mobile.

Now ready.

For sale by all Booksellers. Single copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of $1 25, by

DERBY & JACKSON,

Publishers,
119 Nassau Street,
New York.

White's Fall Styles of Hats for 1859 are now on Exhibition at his Establishment, 216 Broadway.

The supply is scarcely equal to the demand, so immense is the popularity of JOHN HARRIS'S EAU ARNICA. Restoring the hair on bald heads, as well as on those less bare, promotes the growth and luxuriance of the hair, changes gray hairs and whiskers to the original color, softness, and brilliancy of youth. It is not a Dye. Sold by all Druggists, and by JOHN HARRIS & CO., No. 704 Canterbury street, Philadelphia.

THE "DIAPHRAGM FILTER,"

Manufactured by Messrs. MCKENZIE & O'HARA, in the kind or system fitted to attract the notice of the present report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial membrane, which constitutes this filtering medium, to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and applicable to be removed occasionally to insure its proper action.

JOHN C. HILDRETH, M.D., Chemist.

New York, April 1st, 1859.

Messrs. MCKENZIE & O'HARA, 359 4th Street, cor. Mercer.

Lester's Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

are

Woodworth's Planing Machines,

Office 323 Broadway. I. M. LESTER.

F. S. CLEAVER'S

PRIZE MEDAL HONEY SOAP.

The only genuine, possessing a fine and creamy lather, a lasting and delicate perfume, and is warranted not to injure the skin.

☞ Beware of Counterfeits. ☜

F. S. Cleaver's name, Medal, Manufactory, Windsor, and Glycerine Soaps, also Spermaceti Tooth Powder for the teeth and gums, to be had of all the respectable Drug and Fancy Store in the United States.

Manufactory by F. S. CLEAVER,
Wholesale Depot 21 and 23 Dey Street, New York.
J. C. ROBERTS, Agent.

Weed's Patent Lock Stitch Sewing Machines are well adapted to the use of Families, Tailors, Dressmakers, &c. From $30 to $135.

WHITNEY & LYON,
427 Broadway, N. Y.

TEACHERS WANTED—Accomplished in Music and the Ornamentals—French and Classics, for the autumn of the National Teachers' Institute, 383 Broadway, N. Y. RICE & ANDREWS, Principals.

THREE COPIES by the HUNDRED.—Rapid, Lasting Prolific Copies, Same Difficulties, and Cost. Address H. HALSTED, M.D., Metropolis Water-Cure, Round Hill, Northampton, Mass.

Oilet Vinegar

Is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. Rimmel,

Perfumer, London and Paris.

Richardson's New Method

FOR THE

PIANO FORTE

IS A

DECIDED SUCCESS!

AND IS RAPIDLY BECOMING

The Standard Work of Piano Instruction.

An Examination will convince any one of

ITS SUPERIORITY AND GENUINE MERIT.

Two Editions are published, one adopting American, the other Foreign Fingering. When the style is preferred, if no preference is designated, the edition with American Fingering will be sent. Price $5, on receipt of which it will be forwarded by Mail, post-paid.

Published by GEORGE DITSON & CO., Boston.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP

AND FAMILY BAR SOAP are confidently recommended for their excellent properties and delightful aroma.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

PIANO FORTES.

RAVEN, BALDIN & CO.,

Piano Forte Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 135 Grand street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments may be found, exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

Are superior for all manufacturing purposes.
Are more desirable for all kinds of family sewing.
Are capable of doing a greater range of work.
Are free from the faults of other machines.
Are almost noiseless in their operations.
Are much better, and therefore worth more.
Are perfectly simple and easily kept in order.
Are cheaper because they earn more money.
Are just the Machine for every family.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, corner of Grand.

EVERETT HOUSE,
HAWLEY D. CLAFF, PROPRIETOR,
NORTH SIDE UNION SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

INTERNATIONAL HOTEL,

NIAGARA FALLS.

ROBERT B. COLEMAN, late of the firm of COLEMAN & STETSON'S New Astor House, and more recently engaged at the St. Nicholas Hotel, New York, has, in connection with FREDERICK H. COLEMAN, Esq., opened the above-named elegant house, which, having been thoroughly refitted, is now open for the season every desirable to visitors at the grandest of scenery places.

361 BROADWAY 539

BRIDAL SUITS,

Turkey's Flowers, Head Dresses, and Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

Saponifier. Saponifier. Saponifier.

No Family, or Public or Private Institution, should be without this cheapest and best article in the world.

Full directions for making Soft, Hard, and Toney Soaps from the refuse grease of the kitchen, fat, or tallow, accompany each pound can too.

For sale by Druggists and Grocers generally. Beware of Counterfeits. The success of this article has induced unprincipled parties to imitate it, who are being prosecuted for infringing our patented rights.

The genuine manufactured only by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company.

Office 396 Penn Street, Pittsburgh, Pa.

LEWIS, JAMES & CO., Agents,
Philadelphia.

Lyceum Lectures.

By

Rev. J. C. Fletcher.

1st Address the Lecturer, east of Mosier, Thickner & Fielding, Boston, Mass.

The undersigned is now making his engagements for the Lecture Season of 1859-60. The subjects to which he calls the attention of Lecture Committees are as follows: (1.) Spain, Progress, and Resources. (2.) Infidelity and the Bratitudes. (3.) The Land of Job. (4.) Europe and Her Rulers. (5.) Mormonism, Past and Present. These will be delivered separately or in courses. Mr. Fletcher lives in Medford, Mass. Dr. Historical Society, Maryland Institute, Boston Mercantile Library Association, Brooklyn Institute, and many Lyceums in different parts of the United States, takes pleasure in referring to Hon. Edward Everett, Rev. Dr. Hawes, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, New York; Gov. S. Hilliard, Esq., Boston, Mass.; Rev. Dr. Cheever, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Prof. Henry, Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D. C.

HARD TIMES NO MORE.—ANY Lady can make $5 to $10 per day in the United States, possessing Machines, by which she can sew, hem, gather and stitch buttons, by which she can sew 25 to 40 per day can be realized. For particulars, address (with stamp)

W. E. ACTON & CO., 43 North SIXTH Street, Philadelphia.

Guiness & Son's Extra Double Stout and Porter, in Hogsheads and Barrels, and Quarter Casks. For sale by their SOLE AGENT for the United States,

C. E. HARRICOT,
No. 127 Pearl Street.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions for sale and procure Patents. Office, Washington, and Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

Wheeler & Wilson's

Sewing Machines,

With Important Improvements.

THE GREAT ECONOMIZER OF TIME AND PRESERVER OF HEALTH.

Office No. 505 Broadway, N. Y.

It is found by accurate experiment that the stitching of a shirt requiring by hand 13 hours and 19 minutes, can be done by the machine in 1 hour and 5 minutes. The work is fully as well executed by the machine as the only stitch that can be used, and will preserve the same appearance upon each side of the seam. It is made with two threads, one upon each side of the fabric, and interlocked in the centre of it.

GOOD NEWS.

[From the Christian Advocate and Journal.]

A reduction in the prices of Sewing Machines is announced in our advertising columns. Their utility is established beyond question, and at the present prices we see no reason why they should not be found, as they ought to be, in every household. Several varieties are manufactured, adapted to various purposes. So far as public opinion has been formed and uttered, the preference is emphatically accorded to the Wheeler and Wilson Machine for family use, and for manufacturers in the same range of purpose and material. During the past year the trials were numerous, and all the patents of any pretension were in operation. The examinations by scientific experts and Wheeler and Wilson were thorough and impartial. We may instance the State Fairs of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Illinois, Wisconsin, Virginia, Michigan, Indiana, Mississippi, Missouri, and California, and the Fairs in Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Baltimore, Richmond, and San Francisco. At all of the Fairs of the Mechanical Association, the Examining Committee was composed of twenty-five Judges of the highest scientific attainments, without a dissenting voice, awarded for the Wheeler & Wilson Machine the highest and only premium, a Silver Pitcher, valued at $25. If these facts do not establish a reputation, we know not what can.

For the Toilet, and Family Use.

The Celebrated

ORIGINAL HARDY SOAP.

Manufactured by

YARDLEY & STATHAM,

LONDON.

The high reputation of this Soap in Europe and America is a sufficient guaranty for its superior qualities.

The genuine article has the makers' names impressed on each piece of Soap.

Sole Agents for the United States,

WM. H. HORROBIN & CO.,

Importers of Druggists' Fancy Goods,

91 Fulton street, New York.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET—ALL THE YEAR ROUND; and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes in Paris and London.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER

Is designed to give rose hue to the skin, and renders it soft and beautiful.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR Family and Plantation use. Agency, 343 Broadway, up stairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

H. C. LEE, Agt.

To Inventors. Important Notice.

Just issued, a pamphlet of advice how to procure patents for

NEW INVENTIONS.

Sent free on application to MUNN & CO., Editors Scientific American, No. 37 Park Row, New York.

Henry Ward Beecher's

SERMONS,

PUBLISHED WEEKLY IN

The Independent.

In addition to the interesting matter contained in every successive number of The Independent, the Publishers beg to announce that the Sunday Morning Sermons of Henry Ward Beecher will appear exclusively in its columns every week. They are the only reports given to the press which receive revision from the Author's own hand. Among other special contributors are the following well-known writers:

MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE,
Rev. GEO. B. CHEEVER, and JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Terms—Two Dollars a year, payable in advance.

Address

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS,
PUBLISHER,
No. 5 Beekman Street, N. Y.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

YOUNG MAN, DO YOU WANT EMPLOYMENT that will pay—take an agency for our publications. Address FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

ROUND HILL WATER-CURE AT NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

Is surpassingly beautiful in its rich autumnal coloring. Invalids will reap enhanced benefit from treatment in these mid-the winter months. Send for circular.

"This mark is true. Dr. Halsted has great success in the practice, and institution is worthy of patronage."—Boston Atlas and Bee.

"Dr. Halsted's No summer resort ensures it a large and prosperous business. Invalids should be pretty the tastes and promote the comfort of visitors."—St. Louis Republican.

D. W. EVANS & CO.,

The No.

Pioneer 677

Gift Broad-

BOOK way,

STORE, N. Y.

The Oldest Established

Gift Book House.

205

GOLD AND SILVER

WATCHES,

Rich Silk Dress Patterns, &c., &c.,

Given Away in

ONE WEEK.

Each Present worth from $12 00 to $100 00, and amounting in the aggregate value to $10,000.

Besides Twenty Thousand Dollars worth of Miscellaneous Presents, each worth from Fifty Cents to Twelve Dollars.

A LIST

OF THE RECEIPTS OF GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES, RICH SILK DRESS PATTERNS, &c., &c., FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 10th, 1859.

Mrs. Dyer, Sidney, Me.
Mrs. M. Alexander, Topsham, Me.
Mrs. J. Kimball, Springvale, Me.
Miss M. A. Sleeant, Skowhegan, Me.
C. Babbit, Enfield, N. H.
Miss E. H. Chamberlain, Concord, N. H.
Charles Walker, Bridge, Vt.
Miss A. Hall, Bridge, Vt.
George L. Aiken, Hartford, Vt.
W. W. Avery, Montpelier, Vt.
Miss Lucretia C. Niles, Fownal, Vt.
Geo. Hartwell, South Adams, Mass.
Harriet Lyons, West Harwich, Mass.
Orson C. Shaw, Wales, Mass.
Miss Freeman, Lenox, Mass.
H. O. Nelson, Nelson, N. H.
Lucas, Springfield, "
Miss M. Ingalls, Lowell, "
Miss A. Sigeod, Indian Orchard, Mass.
Miss N. J. Vernud, Huntington, Mass.
Mrs. Wilson, Tyngsboro, Mass.
Mrs. S. Smith, Princeton, Mass.
Miss S. E. Lamb, Charlton, Mass.
M. Rice, So. Brookfield, Mass.
Mrs. E. Stephen, West Granby, Mass.
Olive L. Cook, Woonsocket, R. I.
Miss S. E. Darling, Woonsocket, R. I.
Miss S. Arnold, Burrtville, R. I.
A. B. Wells, Wethersfield, Conn.
Miss Ann Newich, Conn.
H. Richmond, Preston, "
Joseph Dunn, Bolton, "
Miss M. Miller, Danbury, Conn.
Hills, Bristol, Conn.
Mrs. Deming, Wethersfield, Conn.
Bristol Engine, Co., Bristol, Conn.
C. H. Kemper, Westport, Conn.
Miss L. Swain, Bloomfield, Conn.
M. Read, Windsor Locks, Conn.
Walker, Ridgefield, Conn.
Miss A. Ives, W. Haven, Conn.
Henry Ward, E. Glastonbury, Conn.
Miss J. Norcross, Chesterville, Conn.
Miss Ella Lewis, Derby, Conn.
Miss M. Wilcox, Quarryville, Conn.
Miss Ellen Dickinson, Chester, Conn.
S. Nichols, Bristol, Conn.
Miss M. Gray, Westport, Conn.
Miss M. J. Fox, East Granby, Conn.
Miss A. C. Thayer, Union, Conn.
John J. Fitzgerald, Dubuque, Iowa.
Miss E. Hill, West Redding, Conn.
Miss E. Haven, Bloomfield, Conn.
Miss S. L. Benoit, Mansfield, Conn.
Mrs. A. Dillings, Wethersfield, Conn.
R. Beckwith, So. Lyme, Conn.
Mrs. H. L. Post, Westville, Conn.
E. Decillits, Hamden, Conn.
S. W. Mocker, New Fun Mon, Conn.
Miss L. Warren, Ireton, Conn.
Miss A. Quinn, Danbury, Conn.
Geo. E. Shelford, Cheeseny, N. Y.
Miss L. Mott, Berne, N.Y.
J. Alberty, Ellery "
S. Church, Jackson, "
Miss I. Yeomans, Chesterville, "
Miss Sarah Jones, Rossie, "
H. Mathias, East Berne, "
Miss A. Starr, Utica, N. Y.
Miss J. S. Harder, Brighton, N. Y.
S. Guest, Vails Mills, N. Y.
Mrs. S. Williams, So. Copake, N. Y.
D. Wood, Chester, N. Y.
Miss S. Greene, "
Mrs. H. Hess, Whitesboro Corners, N. Y.
Miss N. Sayles, Harrisheads, N. Y.
Miss A. Dover, Dover, N. Y.
Miss M. Hughes, Fishkill Plains, N. Y.
Miss E. Morgan, Washington, N. Y.
S. Barker, Rome, N. Y.
Miss E. Wilkinson, Crown Point, N. Y.
C. Hosher, Amsterdam, N. Y.
Miss E. Crawford, Clinton Mills, N. Y.
C. Ward, Newmarket, N. J.
Miss M. Ann Hoffman, N. J.
Miss M. Ayres, Norwood, N. J.
Miss Mary Bullock, Smithtown, N. J.
Miss M. E. Fox, Pawling, N. Y.
Miss E. English, Meadville, Pa.
Rodriguine, Jackson, Pa.
G. G. Bear, Somerset, Pa.
S. W. Pierson, "
Miss M. Cook Haven, Conn.
Miss Long, Mt. Pleasant, Pa.
Miss B. Adkins, Musey, Pa.
Miss E. A. Winslow, Bennington, Vt.
Miss M

Geo F. Collins, Lafayette, Ind.
C. Dexter, Columbia, Tenn.
J. Smith, Newmarket, "
G. W. Sharpe, Columbia, "
Wm. Welch, Knoxville, "
C. Edwards, Dandersville, Ga.
T. Cox, Jefferson, Ga.
W. Hopkins, Danielsville, "
Wm. Gay, Danielsville, "
Miss H. Dansen, Jefferson, Ga.
Wm. H. Pelly, Cortland, N. Y.
J. J. Foster, Cortland, Ala.
J. D. Manners, "
J. H. Tisdale, Charleston, S. C.
Mrs. E. Palmer, Sparta, Miss.
R. F. Palmer, Sparta, "
Mrs. Dr. Abercrombie, "
Mrs. Dr. Mitchell, Washington, Miss.
Mrs. Mims, "
Mrs. Rodenhall, Washington, "
J. Lee, O.
W. Vickers, Big Run, O.
J. Chadwick, Burton, "
J. Smith, "
J. Pyle, Coal Run, "
Chadwick, Burton, "
J. F. Prentiss, Monroeville, O.
Jacob Morrow, Monroeville, " Samuel Hornbeck, Monroeville, "
Jas. Schaenberger, Leeds, C. W.
A. Prentiss, Monroeville, O.
Miss A. Farnsworth, Cook Inst., O.
W. W. Shipley, Fredericktown, O.
J. Bissell, Monroeville, "
Wm. O.
Jas. Thomson, Woodbridge, "
Mrs. J. Davis, North Fairfield, O.
Mrs. Linda Bennett, Gambier, O.
Mrs. Kellogg, Gambier, O.
J. Dowling, Gambier, O.
Mrs. S. Lambert, Fredericktown, O.
Mrs. J. Vickers, Big Run, O.
Mrs. Jane Chadwick, Burton, "
Mrs. C. J. Hinton, Mt. Gilead, "
J. Hamlin, Orford, O.
Mrs. M. McBride, Hillsboro, "
Mrs. J. Barbee, Norwalk, O.
Mrs. M. Knox, Bolesford, "
Mrs. L. Chambers, Hanover, "
Mrs. Bower, Pleasant Ridge, O.

The public are respectfully referred to the above-named persons who have received the benefit of our liberal system of trade during the recent financial disaster. This we would also refer those who desire information as to our honors responsibility to the following leading publishing houses of the United States.

D. Appleton & Co., New York.
Leavitt & Allen, New York.
C. M. Saxton, New York.
Derby & Jackson, New York.
Mason Bros., New York.
Townsend & Co., New York.
Pudney & Russell, New York.
Phillips, Sampson & Co., Boston.
Sheppard, Gilman & Co., Boston.
Brown, Taggard & Chase, Boston.
Bradley, Dayton & Co., Boston.
T. B. Peterson & Brothers, Philadelphia.
James B. Smith & Co., Philadelphia.
H. Thomas & Sons, Philadelphia.
H. C. Peck & Theo. Bliss, Philadelphia.
Uncle Buckley, Philadelphia.
Jesper Harding & Son, Philadelphia.

D. W. EVARTS & Co. would call attention to their unrivaled inducements to book-buyers, and the facilities and attractions which a large experience, unlimited capital, and untiring energy have enabled them to attain over all competitors. Our constant invitation of

New Features,
And Unequaled Attractions,
With the Variety and Value of the Gifts and Books offered to purchasers, warrant us in claiming the attention of the public to the many points in which we do not fear the rivalry of all similar establishments.

We are at the present time giving away, at the rate of

SIX THOUSAND

Gold and Silver Watches Annually.

Besides hundreds of thousands of other articles, all of which are given away with the books purchased. The books are no longer rarely useful to read or look over, but are, as our terms are reasonable, and our facilities are such that we put books, Accessories, and Premiums combined at the shortest notice, at the regular price, with the addition of some useful and valuable present.

BOOKS:

By constant additions to our stock we have collected together a vast, and most extensive library, which is enhanced by any publishing house in the country, all of which we offer from the publication date, and are warranted perfect in every form.

A CATALOGUE, a book for perfection of arrangement, careful selection, and classification of Ancient and Modern Literature, has been issued, which has been revised and imitated by compilers of Catalogues throughout the country, is now considered indispensable, and will be mailed free to any address on application.

Select Circulating Library.

It will be mailed free to any address, and will prove an invaluable assistant in the formation of a library, or the selection of useful and entertaining reading.

GIFTS:

The immense varieties of Gifts distributed, and their really intrinsic value, have induced them to be known as of good trade. By buying in large quantities, and for cash, we are enabled to offer them at such low rates as to tempt those who have not yet tried the system to call and wish to test the strength of our inducements.

DISPATCH.

Those who regard a prompt reply to their orders will be sure and send us their patronage, as the casual leaving of New York City, with many delays, and uncertainties of transportation, give us unrivaled advantages in forwarding to the most distant points. The business arrangements of our Establishment have been so thoroughly perfected, that orders received by the evening mail, will be in morning are on their way to their destination, and no orders are delayed over twenty-four hours from the time of their reception.

SAFETY.

We take the risk of all loss through the mail, if the directions are followed as in Catalogue. Money sent in the form of draft payable to our order, or letters containing funds, if registered according to directions in catalogue, are insured a safe return.

AGENTS.

We employ authorized Agents, thus offering a guaranty of fair dealing, and a proper attention to the interests of our patrons. Since the commencement of the year we have been rapidly appointing local agents, giving easy and lucrative employment in thousands of persons.

CLERGYMEN, SCHOOL-TEACHERS,
BOOKSELLERS,
POSTMASTERS,
MERCHANTS,
ALL PERSONS,

who feel an interest in the advance of Science and Education, and who desire profitable remuneration, take notice,

FIFTEEN THOUSAND AGENCIES

are open for application, and a pleasant, dignified, easy, and profitable employment, requiring but little time, will be as well as extensively filled as applied for and send in their names.

Book agents, who desire desiring to become so, should examine our terms, as they are believed to be the most liberal ever offered for the disposal of in the regular way, through the indorsement of us to the purchaser.

REMEMBER.

☞ That we take the risk of loss through the mail.

☞ Our business has proved the voluntary kindness of over five hundred city and country journals, and of the leading publishing houses of the country.

☞ This is the oldest established House of the kind in the United States.

☞ We pay the express charges on all our gifts.

☞ We keep the most varied and extensive stock of Books and Gifts, and positively circulate the most complete and best classified catalogue in the country.

☞ We guarantee perfect satisfaction in all who may favor us with their patronage.

HOW TO SEND FOR BOOKS.

Orders for five Books and upward should be sent by express, if possible, as it is safer and cheaper than by mail.

Money, if possible, should be sent in form of Draft; payment can be stopped if lost through the mail.

Letters should be plain, and every name at our disposal, provided the directions are followed as in the catalogue. These directions are simple and within the reach of all, ensuring the safe transmittance of Books.

☞ In ordering books, be sure to include letters only, stated in each. The writing should be plain, and the name of the Post-Office, and State, should be distinct, to avoid mistakes.

SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

Direct all communications to

D. W. EVANS & CO.,
627 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Dr. Bond's Medicines.

SECOND EDITION OF
THE NEW BOOK,
(The First Edition all sold the day of publication.)

The Rectory of Moreland.

Sold by all Booksellers.
Elegant tinted paper.

Price $1 00.

Sold to be the best American Novel ever issued.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,

FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A PURGATIVE MEDICINE.

FOR COSTIVENESS;
FOR THE CURE OF DYSENTERY;
FOR JAUNDICE;
FOR THE CURE OF INDIGESTION;
FOR DISORDERED LIVER;
FOR THE CURE OF DYSPEPSY;
FOR A FOUL STOMACH;
FOR THE CURE OF RHEUMATISM;
FOR PILES;
FOR THE CURE OF DROPSYPILE;
FOR ALL SCROFULOUS COMPLAINTS;
FOR THE CURE OF ERUPSATION;
FOR DISEASES OF THE SKIN;
FOR THE CURE OF LIVER COMPLAINT;
FOR ERYSIPELAS;
FOR THE CURE OF TETTER, TUMORS, AND SALT RHEUM; FOR WORMS;
FOR THE CURE OF GOUT;
FOR A DINNER PILL;
FOR THE CURE OF NEURALGIA;
FOR A PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

They are sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are purely vegetable, so harm can arise from their use in any quantity.

Price 25 cents per box. Five boxes for $1 00.

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.
Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.
—Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

"ALL ENGLAND ELEVEN."

Just Published:

The Cricket Field.

The Text-Book of England for this favorite game. From the last London Edition, with all the Original Illustrations. 18 pages. Price 25 cents.

Sent free, by post, on receipt of price.
MAYHEW & BARD, Publishers, Boston.

Bank Note Engraving.

AMERICAN
BANK NOTE COMPANY,
MERCANTILE EXCHANGE,
NEW YORK.
New York, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Montreal, and Chicago.

$100 A MONTH!!
Agents Wanted!

We want Agents in every City and County in the United States and Canada. To above and more can be made by addressing, with Post-Office stamp,
DAVIS & Co.,
Mason, Georgia,
who will send full particulars.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S PERFUMERY, from every flower that grows breathes a fragrance
SWEET SCENTS
THE ESSENCE OF ODOUR
KISS-ME-QUICK
FRANGIPANNI
and Hundreds of other Odours
To fill each of these
2 New Bond St. London.
Sold by all Druggists in every city.
Wholesale Agents,
J. PHILLIPS
87 Pearl St.
New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
D. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

Patent Extension Tables.
At Herodes' Manufactory, 148, 150 Wooster Street.

Trusses Shoulder Braces, Elastic Stockings, Bandages, and Dr. Marsh's Spinal Supporter. No 4 Astor Place.

Great Opening.—Fall and Winter Undertakers and Upholsterers, at No. 8 and 89 William Street, near the south of Maiden Lane. GEO. M. TRACY, Agent.

Boynton's Self-Clearing, Self-Packing, and Ventilating Gas-Tight Furnace has been thoroughly tested in their own premises for nearly five years, and has proved itself to be the most PERFECT HEATER in use. Call and examine the Boynton Furnace, or send for descriptive circular, with reference to those who have them in use.
RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
Fire and Gas Proof Depot, 346 Canal Street, New York.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.
—Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING,
ARE RECOGNIZED BY ALL.
500 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
920 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
203 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
6 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

260 HOW TO LIVE CHEAP. 260
Or, how to effect a reform in the present style of your housekeeping, purchasing your Groceries, Provisions, Teas, Wines, Liquors, Coals, and PROVISIONS of all kinds, at the cheapest establishment of
THOMAS R. AGNEW,
260 Greenwich Street, cor. Murray.
Goods delivered free.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER
PATENT OF NEW JERSEY, Established 1760,
For Rosin Wood, Iron, Tin, Bricks, Canvass, Moulds, Paper, &c., for neatly, forming a beautiful white paint and cinder proof. Durable and Economical. Depot 71 Fulton Street, New York.
HICKS & BETTS, Agents.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOOK-BUYERS.—If Sent, Married or Single, in health or disease,—MEDICAL COMMON SENSE, or FAMILY GUIDE, 1000 pages, over 400 pages, Plain, cloth, and above 100 Engravings Prospectus Free. Sir. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York City. This interesting book should be in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have sought for in vain in any other. Sold and taught in every part of the country, by W. A. TOWNSEND & CO., No. 46 Walker Street, N. Y.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.
—Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
For Purifying the Blood.

No remedial agent has ever been produced that has proved more uniformly successful, and in so short a time many unfortunate victims of mercury, left without hope of cure, now joyfully bear testimony to its wonderful and astonishing efficacy.

Read and be convinced of the Extraordinary Efficacy of this invaluable preparation.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

THE ORIGINAL HAIR RESTORATIVE.
Heimstreet's Inimitable Hair Coloring.
The Only Reliable Article in Use.

The attention of the public is called to this article, which is now being extensively advertised and sold in all parts of the country. AND HAVING IT TO GROW STRONG AND HEALTHY. proves it to be the best suited for RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR, BRINGING HAIR GIVEN BALD HEADS.

It is not a watery preparation, which freezes upon the approach and during cold weather, but is composed of Oil and Stimulating spirits, and IT WILL NOT FREEZE.

These who desire an article which they can use and ALWAYS recommend, are invited to read the following, from a well-known Apothecary:

FOUR YEARS' EXPERIENCE WITH HAIR RESTORATIVES.

MESSRS. W. E. HAGAN & CO.—Gents—I have been selling HEIMSTREET'S "INIMITABLE HAIR RESTORATIVE" for three or four years with good satisfaction to purchasers. I have tried various other articles in the market, but none has the desired preference among them all. I have never hesitated to recommend it for all it claims to do. Several ladies of my town who had been wearing false hair, have laid it aside, and now have a full and luxuriant head of hair of original shade and color, produced by using two or more bottles of your article; and were by nature gray before they have been induced by my unsolicited recommendation to use it. I have also almost invariably returned to the use of your Hair Coloring Agent as the only meritorious and reliable article in use.—Selling it as I do, I solicit no article as cheap as any other Hair Dye or Coloring—but which has given me universal satisfaction. I am yours, very truly,
RETAIL PRICE, 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE. SOLD AT WHOLESALE BY ALL LARGE DEALERS IN THE CITIES.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors,
Troy, New York.
Who also manufacture ROYER & ESTEELY'S DENTIFRICE, and KNIGHT'S INSTILLINE.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars sent free Agentswanted. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 98 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

No. CXIX.] CONTENTS. [OCTOBER.

BOOTH'S BOOMS.
Illustrated by Eleven Engravings from Original Drawings by Lessing and Waldeck.
THE WATER OF EL ARBAIN.
A VISIT TO THE QUAKING INDIANS.
Illustrated by Twenty Engravings from Original Drawings by Johnson.
JACUBON'S HYMN IN THE AMERICAN FORESTS.
BEHIND THE CLOUD.
THE PICNIC.
COUNTRY LIFE.
THE LOVERS' QUARREL.
THE BLIND PREACHER.
THE TEACHING OF DEATH.
TWO MEN AND A WOMAN.
THE HISTORY OF LIFE-INSURANCE.
TWO BIRDS WITH ONE STONE.
THE LIGHT-HOUSE.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY. (To be completed in the next Number.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Artistican Popularis Aura.—A Bacchanalian Dance.—Land-Pirates. From Drawings by the Author.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
Containing Anecdotes and Reminiscences furnished by more than Twenty Contributors.
FLOWER AND FRUIT PIECES.
FASHIONS FOR GENTLEMEN.
FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.
With Ten Illustrations from Original Drawings by YOUNG.

The October Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is accompanied with the completion of THACKERAY'S "Virginians," entirely of ORIGINAL ARTICLES furnished by American Authors.

The Numbers published during the year form the following Cyclopedias:

I. D. R. CASTLETON, Esq.
JOHN ESTEN COOKE, Esq.
GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, Esq.
MISS JANE M. FULLER.
ARTHUR H. GUERNSEY, Esq.
MRS. ALICE B. HAVEN.
EDWARD H. HOUSE, Esq.
REV. A. A. LIPSCOMB, D.D.
REV. HENRY MORFORD.
CHARLES H. NORTON, Esq.
REV. SAMUEL OSGOOD, D.D.
REV. S. IRENÆUS PRIME, D.D.
GEORGE RIPLEY, Esq.
MRS. H. B. STOWE.
E. G. SQUIER, Esq.
BAYARD TAYLOR, Esq.
WILLIAM ROSE WALLACE, Esq.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW AND ORIGINAL TALE OF "TWO CITIES," splendidly illustrated by PHIZ, will be published exclusively in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S illustrated Serial Tale of "Prue and I" will be commenced in the first number in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
Two Copies for One Year 4 00
Two Copies for Two Years 5 00
Two Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

THE FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.
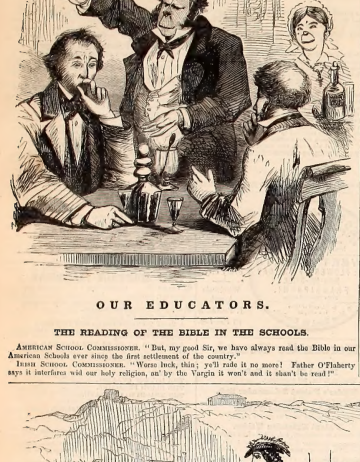
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing to "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences to the Publication Office, or to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.



OUR EDUCATORS.

THE READING OF THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS.

AMERICAN SCHOOL COMMISSIONER. "But, my good Sir, we have always read the Bible in our AMERICAN Schools ever since the first settlement of the country."

IRISH SCHOOL COMMISSIONER. "Worse luck, thin; ye'll rade it no more! Father O'Flaherty says it interferes wid our holy religion, an' by the Vargin it won't and it shan't be read!"

A MODEL SCHOOL AMONG THE GERMANS.

ESTHER SPEECHER. "The School which we now have formed here in Orchard Street, in accordance with our Charter, Gentlemen (drinks), will show the enervated Americans what a miserable farce their System of Education is. Looking around this assembly of blooming, enlightened Young Men, I feel that German Education is now, as ever, the cradle of pure action, enabling sentiment, strong intellect, and manly courage, which accompanies the German wherever he goes, and commands the respect of every civilized nation on the face of the earth." (Irrisistible applause!)

The Reader is requested to observe that the Lower Extremities represented above do not belong to the Fair Damsel on the Plank, but to the Boatman beyond, upon whose shoulder she is leaning.—We, however, recommend Flora to be more careful how she composes herself the next time she gets out of a Boat.

BININGER'S OLD LONDON DOCK GIN

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the so-called "Gins"—"Aromatic."—"Cordial."—"Medicated," &c., is now indorsed by all of the prominent physicians, chemists, and connoisseurs in possessing all of those intrinsic medicinal qualities tonic and diuretic which belong to an old and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and sold by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 338 Broadway, N. Y.

NOW OPEN.
DUNLAP & CO.'S
Branch Store, under the 5th Avenue Hotel. Children's Hats and Caps in endless variety, imported, and of their own manufacture.
Gentlemen's fall styles just issued.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON,
FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as saddens the female life, a really efficient medicine must be their best friend. Hence, as all other remedies have, more or less, failed, the Catholicon has restored health to the patient and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—New Bedford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our own family."—Woman's Advocate, Phila. "Its article ever answered the recommendations like this." "use it in my practice with astonishing results."—E. R. PERKINS, M.D., Marietta, O. "I have tested it in cases of Prostration, Uterrhœa, Leucorrhœa, Bleeding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteris, &c., with great success."—A. CLARKE, M.D., late Surgeon 3d Dragoons, U. States, Clarkesville, Md. "Prevail upon needless to use it."—JOSEPH CLARK, M.D., Lawrenceville, Ga. Such letters pour in from a thousand sources, showing it to

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease to the Female Sex. Daughters, Wives, and Mothers! Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by Agents. ☞ Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It is sold at $1 per bottle, or three bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every town. When not found, enclose money, and order by Express, Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
15 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.,
Or J. D. Park, Cincinnati; Weeks & Potter, Boston; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans. J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Sole Proprietor, at his room in the Academy of Medicine, No. 32 Park Row. Office hours, 9 to 1 and 3 to 4.

32. HEALTH OF WOMEN. 32.

It has often been a sad reflection that the physiological anatomy of women renders her liable to suffering and disease, for which a reliable remedy has never been found in the regular medical profession. Every mother of a family, and most females above 15 years of age, fully experience this. Social position, wealth, and cultivated taste offer no exemption to this rule. So universal are these sufferings of women from the age of 15 to 45 years, that every one is interested in obtaining certain relief. Irregularities, local displacements, general debility, and nervousness seem to be the common lot of women in the most refined portion of their life.

The experience of many years, the severe tests of investigation by thousands of females, and the use of the medicine in the practice and in the families of physicians, and its general use in the families of clergymen, have given the most cultivated and refined in the country, has resulted in stamping the elegant and well known preparation of the Graefenberg Company as the only reliable remedy known for the universal and distressing diseases of women.

It is prepared by an educated physician of great experience, and it will always be found fully equal to representations concerning it. It is known as The Graefenberg Company's MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.

Price, $1 50 per bottle; five bottles for $6. It can be sent by express. Address JOSHUA F. BRIDE, M.D., Secretary and Consulting Physician, Graefenberg Company, No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

DR. J. F. BRIDE may be consulted professionally, or by letter, at his room in the Graefenberg Company's, No. 32 Park Row. Office hours, 9 to 1 and 3 to 4.

English Brussels Carpets,

75c., 88c. per yd.; Two-ply Ingrain Carpets, 40 to 50c. per yd.; Oilcloth, Rugs, Mats, Matting, Table and Piano Covers, Gold Window Shades, very cheap, at HIRAM ANDERSON'S, No. 29 Bowery,
Sign of the large Gold Eagle.

☞ Among the many remedies before the public for the cure of Dyspepsia, Dysentery, Flatulence, Constipation, Liver Complaint, or any other disease arising from weakness in the head or stomach. Dr. J. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS are far the most certain in its effects. You, who are suffering from any of the above complaints, should make a trial of this powerful, yet pleasant compound, will effect great relief. Thousands of the most trying cases have been cured, and made known to the public by those who have experienced its power. A trial is all that is desired to bring so many more witnesses into the field as the public may desire.
For sale by Druggists and Dealers generally, everywhere.
Principal Depot, 13 and 15 Park Row.

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.
Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

Vest not Inflated.

Vest Inflated.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Shirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Waists and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and best Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 145 Water Street
For Sale Everywhere.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 145.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Sketches of the People who oppose our Sunday Laws.

No. I.

A SUNDAY EVENING SACRED CONCERT.

ONE recent Sunday evening, as I was walking alone on the undignified side of Broadway, rain began to fall with violence. The circumstances were disagreeable. Novelty of raiment is not such a matter of course with me that I can calmly witness watery injury to the first bloom of my broadcloth. Externally, I was now that evening. When I left home I had fancied myself tolerably radiant and glossy. I took some thought of the morrow, and gazed anxiously around in search of shelter.

Light streamed from a door-way just before me. A milky poster, splashed all over with notes of adulation, invited entrance and promised entertainment. The rain and an unconquerable instinct impelled me inward. As I passed the threshold a small lad threat a programme upon me, from which I learned that two sacred concerts, in immediate succession, were to take place, and that the price of admission to both would be thirteen cents.

I distinctly remember asking, in a tone of quiet facetiousness, as I handed over the requisite amount, what course was usually adopted by persons whose musical desires might be limited to a single concert a night? I also remember that the answer betrayed unevenness of temper on the part of the dispenser of tickets. From that moment I remained discreetly silent.

A long and narrow passage, dimly lighted, led to the concert-room. When I entered I thought it wise to assume the careless air of a habitual visitor. As a natural consequence, I exposed myself to ridicule by plunging down two or three unexpected steps near the door-way. Some rude men laughed, and I shrank, abashed, into a convenient arm-chair.

It was an apartment of odd proportions—too large to be called a chamber, and too small to be called a hall. It had a very attenuated appearance, owing to the great excess of its length over its breadth. It was filled with men and boys, of generally loose department, odors of spirituous nature, and smoke. On the whole, the idea of sanctity did not seem to oppressively prevail, nor did the audience appear to be deeply impressed with the seriousness of the occasion. On the contrary, they were talkative, not to say turbulent. Some of them had evidently attained the uppermost ecstasy of imbibition. I noticed a universal tendency toward cocktails, so far as the surrounding adults were concerned; while the minors, as a rule, gave themselves up to a steady flow of lager bier. Cigars circulated freely, irrespective of age.

At one end of the room a stage was erected, and displayed a rural scene of peculiar qualities. There were sun-flowers blossoming from trees with green trunks and blue leaves. There was a river which rose any where and flowed nowhere, and which was inhabited by one duck. There was a horse with a clump of bushes growing out of his back—apparently without incommoding him in the smallest degree, for he stood on two legs and smiled the air proudly. Over the middle of the stage was painted, in gilded letters, the word "Excelsior," which was sufficiently appropriate, ample opportunity appearing on all sides for the carrying out of that ambitious sentiment. Down below stretched a row of weary foot-lights, principally used by the audience at large for the ignition of cigars. The other decorations of the room were pictures, abundantly disposed about, and not distinguished by reticence of design, and elaborate placards announcing future benefits of the favorites of the establishment.

Through pools redolent of tobacco, and among the intricacies of the loungers' legs, four or five young girls, bewildering in their amplitude of crinoline, threaded their brisk way. Their duty was to respond to bibulous calls, and to shower as much small change as came within their reach. Occasionally they playfully varied the monotony of their occupation by innocent familiarities with congenial spirits among the audience. A gentleman who sat beside me had his hair twisted into complicated forms, and was otherwise manipulated several times during the evening by these sprightly damsels. It seemed to afford him extreme satisfaction, for on each repetition he invited his gentle tormentors to come down to the store next day and select for herself a new dress at his expense.

There was one young girl who carried around bouquets, vaguely hoping that, in the enthusiasm of ecstasy, some liberal-minded patron of the arts might purchase a few, and fling them upon the stage; whence, of course, they would be immediately returned to her, to be again put through the same profitable process as soon as possible. This floral speculators homed with an approach to beauty which would have made her an object of interest had it not been for an incessant internal irritation of the nose, which demanded constant attention at the end of her finger. Pardon the relation of the nasal fact; I put it as delicately as I can.

Gathering together some fragments of conversation near at hand, I learned that the first concert of the evening was over, and that the second was about to begin. Not to be taken by surprise, I examined the programme. It was a pleasant document. The list of impending performers, in glorified big type, was calculated to excite anticipation. It was a cosmopolitan array: France, Germany, Italy, Ireland, and the land of the free and the home of the brave, were all represented. There was Miss Julia Jenkins, "the American prima donna," who led the list. Other names followed, variously swathed in swelling adjectives. There was Miss Fanny Farmer, "the queen of song;" and Miss Lizzie Schwizz, "the fascinating danseuse;" her sister Matilda, "the youthful prodigy;" Mademoiselle Leonora, "the Sylph of the South;" Signor Richards, "operatic vocalist;" and others lost to memory. The order of entertainment involved a singular succession of sacred exercises, among which Ethiopian jigs and feats of juggling were prominent.

A bell tinkled, and the orchestra appeared. It consisted of a piano-forte and a violin. Another tinkle, and the concert opened.

The overture was a hornpipe.

The opening chorus was a jig for voices.

Then the "operatic vocalist" discoursed of the exaltation of love beyond the sky. His appearance was stern and his manner intense. His general effect, particularly as regarded costume, was thrilling. There were stripes like snakes running all down the legs of his trowsers and up his coat-collar. He was given to gesticulation, and was encored for his energy. A gentleman who followed him, having studied the causes of the "operatic vocalist's" success, essayed imitation, but failed, by reason of having only one arm, which brought tears upon him.

A BROADWAY SUNDAY SACRED CONCERT IN NEW YORK.

The "Sylph of the South" floated in through the foggy atmosphere, and was welcomed with general and highly-colored compliments. She bore with her the American flag on a sharp stick, which she stuck into the middle of the stage, and waved behind herself. Then she courtesied to it, and she folded it in her arms, and wrestled herself insensibly all over it. Then she stepped off a little distance, and pointed her toe at it. Then she suddenly beat sight of it, and gave everybody to understand, as an eagerly absent, looking in obscure corners for it, shaking her head dismally the while. Finally she discovered it by the latest invention in the world, grasped it with delight, turned around five times, and ran off. It was quite a success. The audience instantly drank up all its liquor, in order to pound an encore on the tables with the empty tumblers. Then the "Sylph of the South" did it all over again.

She was not personally alluring. She was shaggy as to hair, and physically deficient. Her stockings did flop like loose sails against their mate on a lee-rocker day. Her dancing, it struck me, was not provocative of delirium, but she was the "Sylph of the South," and she was encored.

A young man gave illustrations of the styles of Messrs. Forrest, Kean, Macready, and Anderson, and revealed the fact that nature had, in the matter of voice and manner, endowed those eminent persons with precise similarity. His audience was critical and relentless. The small boys first cackled, then exploded.

"Ah! he would imitate!" said one.

"Give him some gin to get his voice up!" said another.

"Wake me up when he goes!" said a third.

"Ah, now, do soak up!" said a fourth.

Thus persecuted, the young man exerted himself, spoke feelingly to the "most noble Decemberers of Rome"—looked up at the small boys at the time—and astreated them not to "draw their daggers from their scabbards." It was, however, unavailing, and the young man was obliged to retire, crushed.

The proceedings of the sacred concert were then suspended until an old gentleman who had succumbed to sundry cocktails could be got out. As his friends shouldered him, he called for the company, by which to hoop himself erect, and grew very angry because it was not brought to him at once. In the excitement of this operation the stage-door was opened, and the "Sylph of the South" and the "queen of song" were seen seated on stools, disheveled, their minds intent upon a mug of porter.

The concert then went on, with services more or less—generally less—sacred. The "American genius sings" was given, and the "American" did some light fantastic, accompanying herself with castanets. A man with a black eye recited the "Essence of Old Virginny." Banjos twanged in dulcet tones. A light-handed professor tossed balls in the air, and executed carving-knife feats at the rate of six none. And the crowd grew more tumultuous, more indignant of the sacred character of the occasion, until it seemed as if a touch of Bellum had set in.

Yet there was one relief—one jewel in the dunghill—one flower wasting its sweetness.

The "American genius drama" could not sing a bit. Her tones came tumbling out promiscuous, disjointed. But such tones! Her voice sometimes rose in saying "above the smoke and stir of that dull spot," and carried the soul with it as it soared. It was a marvel, and a wonder, and a marvel to find it there. There, to be sure, it will fade and decay, and none shall know of it. To think that so joyful a thing as that voice should be in and ever will be! Ah! Miss Julia Jenkins, if fortune had been kinder you might have won a fame!

The concert and the clamor progressed together. Smoke gathered and rolled about in heavy and penetrable clouds. The hum of voices deadened the performances. The calls for liquid luxuries multiplied.

A woman entered and passed among the throng, laughing lamentably. Her face was flushed, her gay misty but not with emotion, her step insecure. By the man who was greeted with loud cordiality by the waiting-women, whose sense of decency was shocked, turned backs upon her. At this she flashed with wrath, and a scene was threatened. It was determined by some that she was an intruder; others, meticulously regarded by patrons, disputed this position. An argument ensued. The discussion waxed warm, and all present were drawn within its vortex. I concluded that I might with propriety withdraw.

The stars shone as I stepped into Broadway again. I might now saunter spotless.

Having experienced a sacred concert, I confess to some curiosity to know what a secular one would be, under the same management.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1859.

THE NEW CHINESE QUESTION.

THE event of the week has been the receipt of the news of a fresh collision between the allied French and English and the Chinese at the mouth of the Pei-ho River on 25th June last. As usual, opinions differ on the question involved: some loudly denounce the treachery and cruelty of the Chinese, while others accuse the English of wrong-headedness and a wanton disregard of Chinese rights. The admirable letter which we publish in another column will enable our readers to master the facts of the case.

It seems that early in the month of June the ministers of France, Great Britain, and the United States left Shanghai for the mouth of the Pei-ho, which river they proposed to ascend as far as Pekin, to ratify last year's treaty—according to a distinct understanding which was laid on the table at the treaty where it was alleged that before leaving Shanghai Chinese Commissioners warned Mr. Bruce, the British Minister, that he would not be permitted to ascend the Pei-ho with armed vessels. Be this as it may, this was not the ground on which the subsequent resistance to the Chinese was based.

On arriving at the mouth of the river, on June 18, the English found it strongly barred by a chain of iron-clad gunboats. The Admiral landed an officer and demanded the removal of these stakes, in order that he might proceed to the mouth of the river by the treaty of 1858. To this the Chinese replied, that forcigners could not be suffered to ascend this branch of the Pei-ho; that there was another mouth, many miles to the north, where they would find Chinese officers of rank waiting to escort them to the presence of the Emperor; and that if the English attempted—as the Admiral threatened to do—to remove the stakes the forts would fire on them. To this answer the Admiral's response was that, if the stakes were not removed by eight o'clock he would break up at his own risk. They were not removed. He did begin to raise them. A terrible battle ensued, in which the English gained a complete victory, and the British, after a vain attempt to storm the forts, were driven back with a loss of nearly one-third of their force.

Now it is evident that the right or wrong of this proceeding depends upon a matter of fact. The Chinese declare that the Pei-ho constitutes a channel by which foreigners may proceed to Pekin; and, provided that channel be safe and practicable, foreigners have a right to it, and have no right to choose any other. If, therefore, there be another mouth of the Pei-ho north of the Gulf of Pechelee, which is safe and navigable—and if there really were Chinese envoys waiting there for the arrival of the European and American ministers—the Pei-ho is a mere mirid Hope will prove to establish the fulfilment of their treaty obligations. But the Admiral's refusal, in the absence of our correspondent, an American officer of high standing, to look for the other mouth of the Pei-ho is laid down on the charts as that of a navigators. On the other, we have the statement of certain residents in Shanghai, who affirm that the northern mouth exists, that Mr. Ward, our representative, went there after the battle of June 25, and that the Chinese commissioners awaiting him, and proceeded in their company to Pekin. The next mail will decide which of these two contradictory stories is entitled to credence. In the mean time, judgment must be suspended.

The course pursued by Commodore Tatnall, in affording aid to the British during the disastrous conflict, will naturally engender the activities of our countrymen. We can only suppose the Commodore seems to have compromised the neutrality which it has ever been the aim of the United States to maintain between the belligerents in China. But, on the other, as our correspondent eloquently puts the case, no one with Admiral Hope's fleet in sight, and who have watched unmoved the massacre of the British in the trap into which they had fallen. Had the Commodore refused his aid, it is pretty certain that not a man of the British squadron then engaged would have returned alive. Humanity would have called for the course of the Commodore's conduct under the circumstances.

We do not know that we are prepared to go so far as our correspondent in defending the despotic policy of the United States in China. It is not clear to us that the stake is worth the candle; that any violation of treaty engagements with China—assuming that a good ground for such action—could repay us for the cost in men and money which such a war would involve. If this country needs the excitement of war, a proper cause of such discussion, and such events, be found much nearer home than China; if we are going to better civilization into foreigners' heads, we have Mexico and Central America at our doors. If we do our duty by those standing disgraces to civilization and humanity, we can afford to leave to the maritime powers of Europe the glory of civilizing the Chinese with the bayonet and the Minie rifle. At the same time, it would ill become the United States, which, as our correspondent shows, owe so much to the protection of the Europeans in China, even to seem to side against them in the present dispute, and we say, with the most deceitful and treacherous race in the world.

MORE TROUBLE AHEAD IN UTAH.

AFFAIRS in Utah are rapidly approaching a culmination. The following statement of facts, which comes to us from a perfectly reliable source, goes to establish the opinion we have long entertained, that the "Latter Day Saints" are yet destined to give us serious annoyance.

Previous to the advent of the army in Salt Lake Valley, a man by the name of M'Niel was, under some frivolous pretext, arrested and imprisoned by direction of that "father in Israel, Brigham Young," and was kept in durance until within a short time before the army marched into Salt Lake City. M'Niel, who is a Gentile, subsequently brought a suit against Brigham for false imprisonment, laying his damages at $50,000. During the last session of the United States District Court at Salt Lake City this case came on before Judge St. Clair, and M'Niel was summoned to attend. He hesitated about leaving the vicinity of Camp Floyd, believing that his life would be in danger at Salt Lake City, but was finally persuaded to take the stand each day. While in the city he confined himself to his hotel as much as possible; but the night before his case was called he had occasion to go out, and his absence rendered it manifest outside the door than he was attacked and killed by two Mormons. His case was called by the next day, but no one appeared for him, it was dismissed, and thus ended the affair.

But a day or two after this, another case came before the court, wherein a Mormon prosecuted a soldier for assault and battery, the facts leading to which are as follows:

A commissary sergeant named Rush Valley some time since to guard animals that were being herded there; and as there were many depredations in the vicinity, an order was published forbidding citizens from loitering on the military reservation. In defiance of this order a Mormon went there, and when advised anew to leave to go, whereupon a sergeant named Pike was directed to eject the intruder. In attempting to execute this order the Mormon resisted, and per the sergeant was attacked by the Mormon with an iron pitch-fork, and would probably have been killed had he not defended himself with his musket. The Mormon was hurt during the scuffle, for which the sergeant was tried by the civil authority and acquitted, and was subsequently recalled before the United States District Court. He was sent to Salt Lake City under an escort of twenty men, commanded by a lieutenant, who kept the party closely housed, as it was evident an attack was meditated.

They were not disturbed in any manner unmolested, but on their return with the United States Marshal and escort the sergeant was shot down in broad daylight, in presence of numerous of witnesses, who allowed the murderer to escape. The soldiers followed him a short distance, but they in turn were followed by a large concourse of Mormons, all armed to the teeth. Great excitement prevailed, and the Gentiles are now afraid to venture out of Salt Lake City after dark. The United States Judges also, not seeming to fancy a city residence, have all removed to Camp Floyd. A reward of $500 has been offered at the camp with military honors; and the Colonel of his regiment issued the following order:

HEAD-QUARTERS 10TH INFANTRY.
CAMP FLOYD, August 24, 1859.

It is with much regret that the Commanding Officer announces to the command the death of Commissary Sergeant Ralph Pike, of Company I, late but not less a soldier for his recent assassination, through revenge for the proper discharge of his duty.

(Signed) C. F. SMITH,
Colonel.

The atrocious murders that have been perpetrated by the Mormons ever since their advent into Utah are innumerable, and nothing to such a degree that our correspondent says matters can not remain quite much longer, and we must look for an outbreak soon. Troops enough have been sent out to inflict punishment upon the Indians. The guide was a Mormon, who took them to an Indian camp, near Provo City, and told the officer those were the men who massacred the emigrants, and that their effects would be found in their possession. Upon this representation an attack was made, and about twenty Indians killed; but nothing belonging to the emigrants was found, except one horse, which the Mormons said was theirs. As soon as the action commenced the guide returned to Ogden City, and said he had led the party into a difficulty they would not easily get out of. No doubt he imagined they would all be killed, as there were 150 Indians occupying a strong position against forty soldiers.

From all the circumstances that have been developed in the history of this transaction there is good reason to believe that it is an outrage of a similar character to that of the Mountain Meadow massacre, and that it will yet be traced directly to the Mormons.

Two women who escaped this bloody tragedy have made oath that their persons were violated by five white men; and it is probable they would not, under such circumstances, mistake Indians for white men.

The bodies of two men were found about the same time a short distance from Salt Lake City, which exhibited gunshot wounds, and also brutality murdered, one having his head entirely secured from his body.

Such are a few examples of the bloody outrages that have been perpetrated for years by the Mormons, and, without doubt, under the sanction of their leaders. Every one in Utah outside the Mormon Church entertains the least doubt that the Mountain Meadow massacres was the work of these self-styled Latter Day Saints. And when the few children that they permitted to live, because they were supposed to be too young to tell the story, reach their homes in Arkansas—if the people are not aroused to a proper sense of the turpitude of this crime, and do not demand that the murders be brought to justice before an honest tribunal, it is not in the way of a farce with a Mormon jury who regard the word of the Holy Ghost by orders of their church leaders as paramount to any other duty to be administered by Federal officers, and who will find no evidence that Brigham dictates—if, we repeat, the people of Arkansas do not demand this, they are more base than we have always taken them to be.

THE LOUNGER

THE PICTURES AT THE ACADEMY ROOMS.

A YEAR or two ago New York made its first intimate acquaintance with the contemporary pictures of England and France. The names of the chief painters and of the new schools and movements were familiar to us, but we did not know the works, nor understand what we heard about the schools. And every one felt that it was an opportunity of seeing specimens of the most illustrious of modern English painters, Turner, although there are several of his accomplished rivals in the city. Unfortunately they are in galleries which are not open to the public.

The present collection combines works of the French and English painters. Among the former are are forty or fifty of the best French. So far as pictures are more sought than his: that very fact, of course, makes them all the more valuable to certain. Troyon, however, one of the leading French landscapists and cattle-painters, is in great size, and in good force, in the collection. There is also a characteristic work of Rosa Bonheur's. Edouard Frere is represented by seven of his most charming pictures. Theodore Frere has some admirable Oriental bits. Gudin has one of his white beach scenes; Lambinet is quiet and poetical; and Couture a small copy of his great picture of "The Decadence of Rome," and "The Harvest Home" of a peasant. There is something also of Ary Scheffer's and of Isabey's.

The English are good French names. Among the English, Landseer, Stanfield, Millais, Herring, Ansell, Lucy, Webb, Medex Brown, Hook, Ward, and Webster, are names not to be unfamiliar. Some of the specimens, as of Landseer and Stanfield and Millais, are rather interesting—as autographs, not as characteristic and satisfactory works of the artists. Herring is about as good here as he is anywhere. He is, as we need not literalist-Landseer, with the Landseer left out.

The picture that is likely to be most universally popular is a small one of Edward Frere's—"Baby's gold." We have forgotten the number, but it represents a little girl cradling a doll—a babe—shining by the patent pasteboard of the Police Gazette's "Queen of the Ball." There are very few people who are quite sure to be liked. They have nothing Pre-Raphaelite in their method; and, perhaps as he is anywhere, Ansell is as near a mere ers. And that is the kind of interest and discussion that this early remarkable picture now in Kensetts is ever present. You can read the life of the poem in the book he has been reading to Elizabeth Jane (we looked to see her name upon her handkerchief, but did not find it), and it is "Lindsey Hall" on which falls the illustrative and artistic stir of all art, which is undoubtedly Pre-Raphaelite in its truest, not its most technical sense, as in this picture. Yet it is a work well and gently careful study. It may help to solve more of the questions that are involved in the question of philosophy and practice.

Another picture of this school will be, perhaps, equally wonderful as, but more liked by those who like it at all: "The Stone Breaker," by H. Willis (an artist whose name is not altogether unknown), but hitherto without especial association. The present work is to us the most impressive of all in the Exhibition. Every touch is said against it may or may not be true, but since we do not see it to be so, it does not matter to us. The figure and objects can not be harmoniously represented in so high a key—that such metallic green fields and gloomy grass grew—backed by amiss or sycamore does not look like a heap of precious stones—but the man is not dead, although the sun has gone out at twilight dividing the sky from the lake that reflects it were never so blue—that a corpse does not look like that fallen there—that a proper or pleasing subject in a picture—that the work is incongruous, disagreeable, and unpleasant—all or any things that very accomplished artists and very wise amateurs say, and yet, as you look at it, you are spirited off at once, and, without question, you are near the universal multitudinous life in fern and bracken, in grass and tree, in the sunset and sunrise you watch the long-wearied head heavily hanging at last in rest—the huge, swollen hands relaxed for the job it has fallen from—the stone-chip—the dead hammer sitting still in the painful attitude of toil by the stiff, stony stones, among which the dead body has been ceaseless, and in death as in life unnoticed and forgotten, surely that death pleads for you that that life—which, perhaps, has been fierce pierces you with more than eloquence, crying in your soul: What I was a man, and you passed me with all her soul in her face, looking and longing, but not at all conscious that you are looking at her. Taken with the other two pictures, this shows a real faith in the mind of the artist—faith in the eternal charm of truth—which we have not witnessed in the representation by any tricks of prettiness or association.

You see here in plenty to look at, and talk of, and dispute about in the Gallery of English and French Pictures in Trafalgar Square. Each is interesting; if not as extensive or various, as any Exhibition we have had. Another day we will tell about some of the other Exhibitions—about "Dust after the Rai Mauge," for instance—and the Ferens, and the Knaus, and the "Church Porch."

THE INDIAN SUMMER.

Now that the equinoctial is fairly ended, we shall drop down gently through the softest, loveliest days of our year to the 1st of November. And it is hope we shall not have the usual quarrel about it. Let us hope that every one's equinoctial shall not shut out the Indian Summer. Do send us down in the soft airs of early November—if they be particular used, and even in months after—the days of the Indian Summer of February! In the mild, smoky, tender-aired days that are coming it will not be hard to believe it.

Just as the Lounger gets so far, and has completely settled the question in his own satisfaction, he receives the following letter:

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I sincerely hope you will not going to repeat your annual absurdity about the Indian Summer's coming on the first of November; and I write in time to prevent it. Every well-informed person knows that it comes at the end of October, or even in the middle, but never to be so late as November. The leaves are off the trees. I do not know where you have lived, or upon what reports you rely, when you persist in your mistake every year. We are always sure about it, because I was born in the Indian Summer, and have had all the best opportunities of knowing; and I know that it comes in October. I hope this will be sufficient to settle the question forever in your mind. Why, last November, I've always wondered that a person of your apparent scholastic profession should make such a signal blunder of this question. Every body knows that the Indian Summer doesn't come in November. There! I hope I have now satisfactorily proved it, even to you.

"Your constant reader,

"JANE GRESERY."

FAIRY LAND AT HOME.

There would not, at first sight, seem to be much resemblance between the city of New York and a fairy palace. The Park, for instance, is not a perfectly satisfactory specimen of the bowered delights of gardens and parks with surround the kiosks of the "Arabian Nights." Chatham Street is not one of those spacious, frescoed, trellised corridors along which pace the Kings and Queens of Faery. The Battery is not an Oriental terrace. Even Broadway is not a passage of marble. But for all that there is one point in which the great city is fairy-like. There are many, indeed, when you come seriously to consider, but we have now only one in view.

It has one of the child's stories we are told of a wonderful room, from the walls of which, upon proper tapping, there issued a most melodious concert. Or Goethe's "Faust," when Mephisto knocks the paneling, abundant wines gush forth. Has it occurred to you that New York may be treated in still answer in like manner? That there is scarcely a thing you can name, from a steamboat to a paste, that you may not have, if you only know where to go for it? We walk up and down, not in the least suspecting the treasure that is hidden behind the walls that surround us. We have only to try only to find a piece of silver we may execute a bit of paper, and the treasures are unrolled before our eyes. The riches of every land and climate, the marvels of the arts, the cunning workmanship of human hands, and the splendors of furniture and dress, are all at our command. Nothing. Every sons is stored, in its representatives, behind these massive walls; and if you can not tap them with the gold and silver of gold, you can taste them with your eye and imagination, can scent all the East in its sandal-woods, and explore the South Seas in coral.

If the city were only a mass of brick and mortar and pebbles, and granite, and marble, and iron, eminently to go around; but if you walk with "eyes that see," you will find that every thing is arranged as thoughtfully as we are told to consider the lilies, you will find yourself moving in a realm of romance.

OUR MR. DOVE.

MR. LILYLEED was a clever and complete tradesman in the retail dry-goods line. It wanted but a few years to the completion of the handsome house on which most of his manufacturers' bills would have to be paid, that had been drawn for the stock that took all the sheer and silver of Broadway. Mr. Lilyleed found himself very rapidly getting, in a sense, what he was not a corner in which he suffered from the scarcity of money, but a corner in which he had plenty of that coveted article, and wished to keep it. Mr. Lilyleed was a man of very little—just a little—apparent in Mr. Lilyed's life. He counting-house.

Mr. Lilyleed consulted his lawyer, Mr. Darky. Mr. Darky was not a professional gentleman of the very great order, but rather one who had thoroughly grounded in the etiquette and routine of his business.

"My dear Sir," he said to Mr. Lilyseed, "you must not come to me at this stage of your career and tell me you have difficulties. Difficulties are it. I can't bear it; I don't bear it. You are not in difficulties; you merely anticipate them. You have a large creditor, a cash creditor, who is pressing you for a considerable sum, and you give him a promissory note for a hundred each."

"But I have no such cred—" Mr. Lilyseed was observing when Mr. Darky promptly stopped him. The clever and complete tradesman was only clever and complete in his own peculiar way. In the case of Mr. Lilyseed he was quite wrong.

"That creditor will press you, if I understand you," returned Mr. Darky, "for payment on the afternoon. You had better see me again upon the matter, the first thing in the morning. Good-day."

Mr. Darky knew Mr. Lilyseed was a man of profusion of nods, and winks, and signs, until the next interview and consultation, and in the present course it was intended he should adopt. A very little winking brought him back to his counting-house, and a good deal of reflection was spent upon men Mr. Dove, "Our Mr. Dove," as he was called, was leading gentleman, by prescription.

There were several reasons why Our Mr. Dove was sent for. In the first place, he was on relation with Mr. Lilyseed's banker, he was a man of mild, feeble, and manageable young man; and in the next place, Mr. Dove had been educated and had a reliable persecuting cash creditor. Mr. Dove was somnied in the counting-house, was introduced to the next place, and was regaled with some bright whisky-and-water. Mr. Lilyseed consumed cigars and whisky-and-water, and Mr. Dove lived on the smoking, and preferred a very weak and sweet mixture of wine-and-water.

"If I can do any thing to serve you, Sir," said Our Mr. Dove, in a timid and devoted manner, "you may command my humble ability. I don't see a cardinal dose things so well as I ought, because they belong to the counting-house, which is not my department. I am not ashamed to say that Our Mr. Darky, your lawyer, to set me right."

"Undoubtedly," said Mr. Lilyseed, in a satisfied and pompous tone (he was not only Mr. Dove's master, but he was old enough to be Mr. Dove's father). "Undoubtedly. Have you ever a lawyer?"

"Oh no," replied Mr. Dove, very modestly, "I was never in any occasion for one."

"I thought not," said Mr. Lilyseed, "and I have great pleasure in telling you that you will be the first thing in the morning, to a Mr. Darky, a professional gentleman, Mr. Lilyseed assures me, only four doors from Mr. Darky's, at No. 15 in the same row, you can instruct him to use me for five thousand pounds, debt and interest, and you will find him thoroughly prepared to act upon your instructions."

The next day Our Mr. Dove instructed Mr. Dusky, who returned more instruction than he received. A writ was issued in the case of Dove versus Lilyseed. A deed of assignment, a bill of sale, was proposed by Mr. Darky, acting for Mr. Lilyseed, to stop the action. The action was stopped by Mr. Darky, acting for Mr. Dove, in consideration of Mr. Lilyseed executing this deed, conveying six thousand five hundred pounds' worth of stock and book debts, and paying five hundred pounds in cash to Mr. Dove, within four-and-twenty hours. The costs of two thousand pounds, or less, was left to cover depreciation. An appointment was made to do this, at Mr. Lilyseed's establishment, before half this time had expired. Mr. Lilyseed had obtained the five hundred pounds, with great difficulty, from a client of Mr. Darky's, a retiring capitalist, who advanced upon a substantial deposit of bills to twice the amount. The capitalist did not with his name to appear, and the whole business was therefore transacted through Mr. Darky.

At eleven o'clock one morning, the two lawyers, Mr. Darky and Mr. Dusky, assisted by Mr. Lilyseed's sitting-room to patch up the action of Dove versus Lilyseed. The plaintiff and defendant, of course, were present.

"You are willing," said Mr. Dusky, speaking to his client, Mr. Dove, "to accept the bill of sale for six thousand five hundred pounds in stock in trade (according to the inventory attached), and a cash payment of five hundred pounds, as a satisfaction of your claim against Mr. Lilyseed?"

"Well," replied Our Mr. Dove, who acted his part to perfection, "I really know so little of these matters that I must leave myself entirely in your hands."

"Mr. Darky," said Mr. Dusky, addressing his fellow-lawyer, "do you instruct your client, Mr. Lilyseed, to execute the deed?"

Mr. Darky sit as he was requested, and the bill of sale, in favor of Mr. Dove, after a few words of wording, a little meandering, a little pointing, a round of signing and witnessing, and some counting and placing of forelingers upon small red wafers, was duly signed, sealed, and delivered.

A promissory note for five thousand pounds, payable on demand, and bearing Mr. Lilyseed's indorsation in favor of Mr. Dove, was handed over to the latter gentleman, that he might sign a memorandum and receipt on the back, referring to the deed and the note for five hundred pounds, which was at that moment to be paid.

"Is that all, my dear sir?" asked the mild and feeble Mr. Dove, as he took a very copious dip of ink.

"Immediately under the memorandum," exclaimed the two lawyers, almost simultaneously.

"Here I" continued Mr. Dove, putting the tongue out of the side of his mouth, like a schoolboy over a writing lesson.

"No, there," said the lawyers, pettishly, almost guiding his hand to the place, and looking at the clock simultaneously.

"Had I better sign it in full?" asked Mr. Dove.

"As you are called in the deed," they said, pushing that document away with the left hand of Mr. Dove. "The matter's very simple."

"I think I ought to count the money—the five hundred pounds?" said Mr. Dove, still hesitating.

"It's all right, and in my possession," returned Mr. Dusky, impatiently.

"I ought to count it," persisted Mr. Dove; "we always do in the City of London."

The money was handed over to Our Mr. Dove, who seemed to be getting very nervous. He counted it tremulously, and then signed the back of the promissory note in a hurried style of handwriting. The deed was done this, he complied up the bank-notes and the promissory note, and put them in his trousers-pocket, which he rolled up the bill of sale, and grasped it like a stick.

"What are you doing?" shouted Mr. Lilyseed and the two lawyers.

"I don't know, I'm sure," returned Mr. Dove, looking round for assistance to collapse. "I—I—I haven't got into trouble. I ought to have consulted my mother."

"Don't be a fool," said Mr. Lilyseed, authoritatively; "give the deed, the money, and the promissory note to Mr. Dusky, and go down to business."

"Oh, I can't do that, Sir, to-day; indeed I can't," replied Our Mr. Dove, excitedly. "I—I feel quite ill. I must take a turn round the houses, or I won't answer for the consequences."

Mr. Dove was evidently very much worked upon by the occurrence of the morning, and every attempt to talk to him rationally only threw on the part of Mr. Lilyseed or the two lawyers, was utterly hopeless. Mr. Dove, in the fullness of his simplicity, simply because no other practicable course presented itself. He persisted in retaining the money and papers; and what was the use of theory because his in practice.

During the two days left to Mr. Lilyseed to prepare the decks for his intended insolvency the relations of master and servant between him and his head shopmen were not disturbed. Mr. Dove attended to his duties the same as usual, while Mr. Lilyseed, as a matter of course, overslept, and paid another young man in the establishment to watch him closely, for fear he should dissipate or run away with the five hundred pounds. Mr. Dove, to his credit be it said, showed not the slightest disposition to behave in every other unlawful manner. He was soft and timid, but he was not dishonest.

The result of that particular January arrived at last, and meted very quickly into the fifth. Every bill that Mr. Lilyseed had by some was sent back unpaid from his banker's, for the very sufficient reason that there was no money lodged to discharge them with. Toward evening a number of London creditors arrived at Mr. Lilyseed's establishment, with consternation depicted on their countenances. The next day and the next brought up the provincial and principal creditors, who were equally alarmed at the prospect of heavy bad debts.

Mr. Lilyseed was not to be seen—he was too unwell to meet his trading connections—and Mr. Dove was put forward to answer all necessary questions. Mr. Lilyseed's absence was in the hands of his lawyer, Mr. Darky, and Messrs. Nought and Carryone, the distinguished accountants, had received instructions to prepare a balance-sheet.

Before a week had passed, the following notice appeared in the Gazette:

"LILYSEED, ADAMAS, DOWRY ROAD, Stun-draper, January 19, at half past twelve, and March 6, at eleven, at the Bankruptcy Court; solicitor, Mr. Darky, Burchambers; official assignee, Mr. Commissioner Bell."

The balance-sheet that Messrs. Nought and Carryone prepared was a master-piece of figurative art.

The materials, it is true, had been supplied by Mr. Lilyseed, or rather Mr. Lilyseed's well-reserved books; but what skill they had shown in arranging them to a nicety! The literal fee that was paid to them over and above the ordinary charges was money well laid out to produce a desired result.

Every thing was fully accounted for. Mr. Lilyseed had been more unfortunate than any one supposed. In addition to what he had suffered from the deceiving element, he had been largely robbed for years by dishonest servants without being able to make out a case for prosecution; he had been forged upon, to a large extent, by heartless nephew, who had fled to the Isle of Thanet, where he was lost in a tornado; and he had had to pay upon a mass of debts upon which his knowledge by the extravagant woman whom he was his misfortune to marry. His friends (capitalists) had thus been eaten away, with other property.

At the hour when he thought he was, and certainly ought to have been, a substantial tradesman, he awoke to find himself a bankrupt and a beggar. Mr. Darky never also without question (though, of course, it would have no influence with the court) that the unfortunate gentleman was subject to fits, brought on, no doubt, by the shock of so many tires.

The commissioner, after a little confidential communication with the official assignee, declined to pay much attention to the fresh opposition of certain creditors. He found that all the expenses of the court were secured by the property which the bankrupt had to make up (entered in the official assignee's report), and that there was a prospect of an early dividend of ten per cent upon it the pound. He was obliged to rebuke the bankrupt for accepting an accommodation bill, and also for giving a bill of sale to Mr. Dove, and for not proving before his bankruptcy; but, having done this in a severe and dignified manner, he thought the justice of the case was satisfied by granting Mr. Lilyseed an immediate third-class certificate.

Mr. Lilyseed returned to his establishment, hopeful and triumphant, with the new licenses to trade in his pocket, and Our Mr. Dove was the first one to receive him. He looked round upon his six thousand five hundred pounds' worth of stock that had been so nearly taken from his creditors, and he looked forward to the five hundred pounds paid down in cash, and in full, for his dismissive keeping.

"We must have the place painted up," said Mr. Lilyseed, addressing Mr. Dove, and at once assuming the position of a master; "and I don't like that shop-window—it must be altered the window."

"While I congratulate you upon your success before the court, Sir," returned Mr. Dove, firmly, "I am afraid that our connection must cease from this moment."

"What!" exclaimed the clever and complete tradesman, "you don't mean to say that you mean to leave me? I was thinking of a junior partnership for you."

"I am much obliged to you, Sir, I'm sure," said Mr. Dove, "but I must decline to accept it."

"Well," returned Mr. Lilyseed, resignedly, "you'll credit me with having made the offer? Have you got those bank-notes and documents by you?"

"I have got the documents," replied Mr. Dove, calmly, "but I've disposed of the money."

"You have!" exclaimed Mr. Lilyseed, in astonishment.

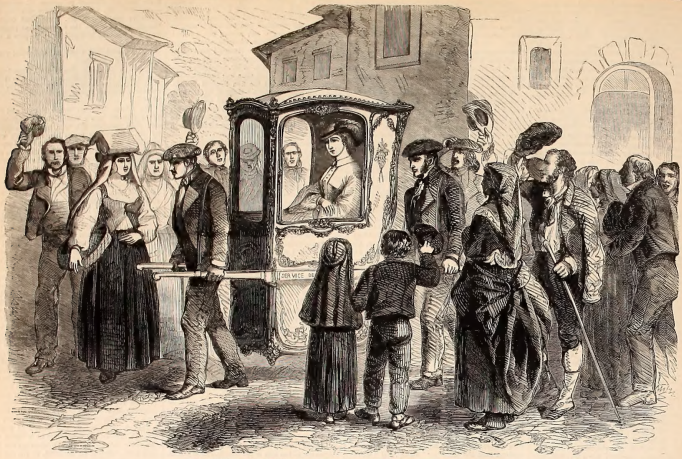
"I've bought back the lease of these premises, which you had mortgaged up to the neck with Mr. Darky's invisible capitalist client, and I've been thinking of getting my own name over the door-way."

Mr. Lilyseed was not a fool, and he saw his position. Mr. Dove was not a fool, but a wolf in sheep's clothing. The fine gentleman found himself completely turned into the street, for the second gentleman was determined to use all the legal power which the law gave him.

"I am not wholly unprovided with means," said Mr. Lilyseed, accepting his defeat with great self-command, "if you are disposed to treat for a partnership."

"I think," said Mr. Dove, "we are better apart. You are worthy of something far better than I am prepared to offer."

And so they separated, like prudent traders, each one adopting the course he thought best suited to his worldly welfare. Mr. Lilyseed was heard of, some years after, as a gigantic contractor; but whether Our Mr. Dove was the same Mr. Dove who, about the same time, was heard of as laying the first stone of a gigantic tabernacle, I am not positively prepared to answer.



HOW THE FRENCH EMPRESS GOES TO THE BATHS AT ST. SAUVEUR.

THE FRENCH EMPRESS GOING TO THE BATHS.

PRETTY, clever, amiable Eugénie, Empress of the French, is so well known among our people, and generally so well liked by the ladies in this country, that we make no apology for reproducing the accompanying engraving. It represents her Majesty on her way to the Baths at St. Sauveur, a little fashionable bathing-place, nestled among the Pyrenees, where the Emperor has latterly spent some leisure time.

She is traveling, after Pyrenean fashion, in a sedan chair, borne by two sturdy porters. Time was when, in the great kingdom of France, ladies of her rank never traveled otherwise; the gossiping chroniclers of the age of Louis Fourteenth always described their noble dames taking the air in their "chaires." Now the vehicle is only used in such places as St. Sauveur, where the roughness and narrowness of the roads preclude the convenient use of any other conveyance. The Empress's sedan chair was made at Vichy and used by the Emperor expressly for her use: it is of rose-wood richly gilt, lined with white morocco.

THE TUSCAN ASSEMBLY VOTING THE DOWNFALL OF THE HAPSBURG-LORRAINE DYNASTY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

The Empress goes to the Baths early in the morning, and dispenses a handsome sum in charities by the way.

THE FINAL OVERTHROW OF THE TUSCAN DYNASTY.

THE accompanying engraving depicts a scene which, already faithfully recorded in the news department of this journal, possesses such historical significance that no paper pretending to illustrate the age in which we live can omit to reproduce it. It is the vote in the fine Tuscan Chambers declaring the house of Lorraine forever expelled from the throne of Tuscany. The deputies—chosen by universal suffrage, and freed from all restraint, as it will be seen, elated at the importance of the duty they perform. The spectators, among whom are many ladies, share the enthusiasm, and with loud hurrahs and waving of handkerchiefs testify their hearty acquiescence in the expulsion of a dynasty which had become hateful.

Ever since the extinction of the Florentine Republic Tuscany has been an appendage of the Austrian Empire. The rule was that the eldest son of the Austrian Emperor was heir to the imperial throne, and the second son ruler of Tuscany. The last "second son" who ruled Tuscany under this system was Ferdinand III., son of the Emperor Leopold; he became Grand Duke in 1790, was dispossessed by Napoleon in 1799, was restored by the allied sovereigns in 1815, and died in 1824. His son Leopold succeeded him. Him many readers of this paragraph well remember: his courtly figure, his pleasing manners, his affability as he walked in the casino, chatting pleasantly with the Florentines or the strangers he met, his love of art, his secret tyranny—all are well known to those who have traveled in Italy within the past quarter of a century.

There was no inherent dislike of the house of Hapsburg-Lorraine among the Florentines. But since 1848 the Grand Duke has shown so little trust in his people and so much trust in Austrian bayonets; the old fees have been so sadly curtailed, and new principles of despotism have been so impudently adopted; the taxes have increased so monstrously, and the whole system of public improvement projected and commenced by Ferdinand have been so grossly neglected, that the enthusiasm with which the Tuscans voted the downfall of the dynasty can well be understood.

Let us hope that it will be final. It is a landmark in the history of freedom.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LVIII.

CLOUDS AND DARKNESS.

"At least, Miss Amy—at least, we shall be friends."

Amy Waring could think of nothing else. Her life seemed to have stopped at the moment she heard those words. Sometimes she blamed her dullness in not preventing his saying them. Sometimes she lamented the pride that would not suffer her to explain. But the sudden discovery that Amy Martha had perceived the secret she long had owned to herself in silence and Amy lest Lawrence Newt should have perceived

AMY AND AUNT MARTHA.

it too, that she could not help persisting in her assertion that it might sometimes be better for lovers not to marry. It seemed to her that it would serve at least to suggest to Lawrence Newt that, even if he supposed her to love him, he need not necessarily assume that she meant to marry him the moment he asked her.

Lawrence Newt, on his part, had looked upon her words as the caution of a noble woman who saw that he loved her, but who wished to spare him the pain of hearing that she did not love him.

Perhaps she was not less lovely to him or less dear for that gentle care.

"Well, Aunt Martha," said Amy Waring, several months after the death of Christopher Burt, "I really think you are coming back to this world again."

The young woman smiled, while the older one busily drove her needle.

"Why," continued Amy, "here is a white collar; and you have actually smiled at least six times in as many months!"

The older woman still said nothing. The old sadness was in her eyes, but it certainly had become more natural—more human, less ghostly, and the melancholic gloom in which she had hitherto appeared was certainly less deep.

"Amy," she said at length, "God leads his erring children through the dark valley, but he does lead them—he does not leave them. I did not know how deeply I had sinned until I heard the young man Sommerfield, who came to see me even in this room."

She looked up and about, as if to catch some lingering light upon the wall.

"But, somehow, it was Lawrence Newt's preacher who made me feel that there was hope even for me."

She sewed on quietly.

"I thank God for those two men;—and for one other," she added, after a little pause.

Amy only looked, and she went on:

"Lawrence Newt," said Aunt Martha, calmly looking at Amy, "Lawrence Newt, who came to me as a brother came to a sister, and said, 'Be of good cheer!' Amy, what is the matter with you and Lawrence Newt?"

"How, Aunty?"

"How many months since you met there?"

"It was several months ago, Aunty."

Aunt Martha sat quietly sewing, and after some time said,

"He is no longer a young man."

"But, Aunt Martha, he is not old."

Still serene, the grave woman looked at the burning cheeks of her younger companion. Amy did not speak.

"Amy, do you love Lawrence Newt?"

There was no reply; but there was a long silence.

"Do you think I have not known it for a long time, Amy; and ever afraid to speak to what you are? When you and he went from this room months ago I supposed you would be his wife before now."

Still Amy did not speak. It was not because she was unwilling to confide entirely in Aunt Martha, but there was something she did not wish to say to herself. Yet suddenly, as if lifted upon a calm, irresistible purpose—as a leaf is lifted upon the long swell of the sea—she said, with her head quiet as before,

"I do not think Lawrence Newt loves me."

The next moment the poor leaf is lost in the trough of the sea. The quiet gentlewoman Aunt Waring's heart beat tumultuously; she felt as if she should fall from her seat. Her eyes were blind with hot tears. Aunt Martha—O tender sensitiveness of woman's heart!—did not look up—did not start or exclaim. She deliberately threaded her needle carefully, and creased her work with her thumb-nail. After a little while, during which the sea was calming itself, she said, slowly—repeating Amy's words syllable by syllable—

"You do not believe Lawrence Newt loves you?"

"No," was the low, firm whisper in reply.

"Whom do you think he loves?"

There was an instant of almost deathly stillness in that tattooed heart. For a moment the very sea of feeling seemed to be frozen.

Then, and very slowly, a terrible doubt arose in Amy Waring's mind. Before this consideration every perplexity had resolved itself in the consciousness that somehow it must all appear right by-and-by. It had never occurred to her to ask, Does he love any one else? But if he did, the meaning of his words was plain enough; and so, of course, he did.

Who was it?

Amy knew there was but one person in the world whose name could possibly answer that question.

But had Lawrence Newt not watched with her—and with delight—the progress of Arthur Merlin's feeling for this other?

Yes; but if, as he watched so closely, he saw and felt how lovely that other was, was it so wonderful that he should love her?

These things flashed through her mind as she sat motionless by Aunt Martha; and she said, with profound tranquillity,

"Very possibly, Hope Waring."

Aunt Martha did not look up, but seemed to feel that she should see something in her face that she did so; but she asked,

"Is she worthy of him?"

"Perfectly!" answered Amy, quickly.

At this word Aunt Martha did look up, and her eyes met Amy's. Amy Waring burst into tears. Her aunt laid aside her work, and gently put her arms about her niece. She waited until the first full rush of feeling had passed, and then said, tenderly,

"Amy, it is the heart that God leads us women to himself. Through love I fell; but through love, in another way, I hope to be restored. Do you really believe he loves Hope Wayne?"

"I don't know," was the low reply.

"I know, Amy."

The tone was calm and resigned, and were walking, with their arms clasped around each other, up and down the room. They stopped at the window at last. As they did so, their eyes fell simultaneously upon the man of whom they were speaking, who was standing at the back of his lofty, looking up at the window, which was a shrine to him.

"Then you should and smiled at me," he said to himself whenever he looked at it.

As their eyes met, he smiled and waved his hand. With his eyes and head he asked, as when he had first seen her there,

"May I come up?" and he waved his handkerchief.

The two women looked at him. As Amy did so, she felt as if there had been a long and gloomy war; and now, in his eager eyes and waving hands, she saw the illumination of the waving flags of victory and peace.

She smiled and she nodded No to answer him with her head.

But Aunt Martha nodded Yes so vehemently that Amy Waring immediately disappeared from his window.

Alarmed at his coming, doubtful of Aunt Martha's intention, Amy Waring suddenly cried, "Oh! Aunt Martha!" and was gone in a moment. Lawrence Newt dashed round, and knocked at the door.

"Come in!"

He rushed into the room. Some sweet suspicion had winged his feet and lightened his heart. But he was not quick enough. He looked eagerly about him.

"She is gone," said Aunt Martha.

His eager eyes drooped, as if light had gone out of his life also.

"Gone!" said Aunt Martha, "sit down. You have been of the greatest service to me. What can I repay you?"

Lawrence Newt, who had felt during the moment in which he saw Amy at the window, and when he waved to her, that he had been hastening to her, that the cloud was about rolling from his life, was astounded by finding that it was an account between Aunt Martha, instead of Amy, and himself that was to be settled.

He bowed in most confusion, but recovering in a moment, he said, courteously,

"I am aware of nothing that you owe me in any way."

"Lawrence Newt," returned the other, solemnly, "you have known my story; you knew the man to whom I supposed myself married; you have known of my child; you have known how long I have been dead to the world and to all my family and friends, and when, by chance, you discovered me, you became as my brother. How many an hour we have sat talking in this room, and how constantly your sympathy has been my support and your wisdom my guide!"

Lawrence Newt, whose face had grown very grave, waved his hand deprecatingly.

"I know, I know," she continued. "Let that remain unsaid. It can not be unforgotten. But I know your secrets too."

They looked at each other.

"You love Amy Waring."

His face became inscrutable, and his eyes were fixed quietly upon hers. She betrayed no embarrassment, but continued,

"Amy Waring loves you."

A sudden light shot into that inscrutable face. The clear eyes were veiled for an instant by an exquisite sensation.

"What separates you?"

AUNT WINNIFRED IN ARTHUR'S STUDIO.

There was an authority in the tone of the question which Lawrence Newt found hard to resist. It was an authority natural to such intimate knowledge of the relation of the two persons. But he was so entirely unaccustomed to confide in any body, or to speak of his feelings, that he could not utter a word. He merely looked at Aunt Martha as if he expected her to answer all her own questions without any difficulty and doubt.

Meanwhile she had resumed her sewing and was working quietly in her chair. Lawrence Newt arose and found his tongue. He bowed in that quaint way which seemed to involve him more closely in himself, and to warn off every body else.

"I prefer to hear that a woman loves me from her own lips."

The tone was perfectly kind and respectful; but Aunt Martha felt that she had been struck dumb.

"I thank you from my heart," Lawrence Newt said to her. And taking her hand, he bent over it and kissed it. She sat looking at him, and at length said,

"Mayn't I do any thing to show my gratitude?"

"You have already done more than I deserve," replied Lawrence Newt. "I must go now. Good-by! God bless you!"

She kissed his quick forehead as he descended the stairs. For a long time the sombre woman sat rocking idly to and fro, holding her work in her hand and with her eyes fixed upon the floor. She did not seem to see clearly, whatever it might be she was looking at. She shook out her work and straightened it, and folded it regularly, and looked at it as if the secret would flash out of the proper angle if she could only find it. Then she creased it and crimped it—still she could not see. Then she took a few stitches slowly, regarding fixedly a corner of the room as if the thought she was in search of was in reason, and might at any moment run out of his hole and over the floor.

And after all the looking she shook her head intelligently and fell quietly to work as if the mystery were plain enough, saying to herself,

"Why didn't I trust a girl's instinct who loves as Amy does? Of course, she is right. Dear! dear! Of course he loves Hope Wayne."

CHAPTER LIX.

ARTHUR MERLIN'S GREAT PICTURE.

Morris Hollowed mounds, and still the cloud that the faithful old book-keeper of Boniface Newt, Son, & Co.'s had seen upon the horizon was growing and growing, but had not yet burst. Somehow—nobody knew how, whatever any body said—the house that had been so long suspected by shrewd financiers like Jacob Van Boozenburg was still apparently flourishing.

The head of the firm was the most desolate enough. The seasons stole swiftly, silently over it. The sweet face that looked from the upper window grew more womanly through its girlish grace. Grace Plumer had become tall, slight, graceful, and the gay girl was a contented wife. At Saratoga, in the summer, she was a matron and prince—twenty times not so low but that modest girls could look at her without blushing.

And Kate—whom May rarely saw at home, for he did not often come to see his mother—already looked like a man of forty, although he was only twenty-five. Still welcome in society, his manner had lost the spring which belongs to the youth of the blood, and was burnished and blasé. He gave whist parties at his rooms, at which he played heavily; and he drank copiously of the wine which he offered his guests. His pretty cousin, Laura Magot, had made her match. She had married Mellish Whitlee, with whom she had a perfect understanding; so that their life proceeded without any uncomfortable jars.

Hope Wayne had sold the old house of Pine-wood. It was purchased by the Hon. Joshua Quiddy, who had been the confidential counsel of Christopher Burt, and who, after a lucrative practice, had retired from the bar, upon the urgent solicitation of his fellow-citizens that he would represent them in Congress.

"I am not to be dead," he wrote, in his celebrated letter of acceptance, "to the call of my country, which I bear, gentlemen, in your generous voices. Your confidence with your generous praises the slender shaft of my poor abilities until my pleased modesty persuades me that I am a column hung with the trophies of victory."

The Honorable Bedlow Dinks, who had not yet been sent upon a foreign mission, zealously cultivated the society of Mr. Quiddy. They attended the examinations of the infant-schools together, upon which occasions Mr. Dinks was very impressive in his remarks upon the value of early culture, and the necessity of cherishing principles of humility and self-denial in this life. Then he told the boys that there was not one of them who might not some day be President of the United States; or go to Congress, like Mr. Quiddy, who had been a boy once too; or even be sent upon a foreign mission. But all that depended upon their being good.

The Honorable Joshua Quiddy, who did not look to the boys as a class of men in the near period or under any circumstances, he could possibly have been a boy, said that what his friend had just remarked was perfectly true; that society was the best policy; and for his own part, he deplored his unworthiness to confer any unlimited position, whose duties he was afraid the slender shaft of his poor abilities could very indeed fulfil.

Hope Wayne had purchased a house in New York, and there she lived with Mrs. Simcoe. The grave old Methodist had not felt the later touches of Time. She was, as always, tidy, erect, and imperturbable. The years that she had nursed was a woman now, and often enough her tremulous eyes were fixed in a delightful look of pride, and pleasure, and shadowy pain upon the full splendour of Hope Wayne's beauty. Hope's figure, tall and queenly; her peculiar golden hair, rippling and clustering about her head; her dark eyes simply and richly; the calm sweetness of her candid blue eyes—all these things transparently revealing the mutually lovelorn of soul, were watched by Mrs. Simcoe with a softer light in her own eyes—with a deeper oversense, even, for the Creator of the good and fair.

Amy Waring and Hope Wayne were still fast friends. Indeed their conversation have been overheard, the listener might have been surprised to discover how often and how much two beautiful women could talk together without discussing men.

It was true that Hope Wayne was too well known to escape the criticisms of society. Although Mr. Dacre had been long dead, there was still a vague feeling that something yet remained to be unravelled. Mrs. Cod and Mrs. Dod, of course, most accomplished social resurrectionists, held many a curious colloquy upon the graves of the past.

"Why on earth didn't Mrs. Dinks secure Hope Wayne for Alfred?" asked Mrs. Cod of Mrs. Dod.

"I can't for the life of me imagine!" returned Mrs. Dod, leaning herself violently. "Have you ever seen Mrs. Alfred Dinks?"

"No," said Mrs. Cod, with interest.

"Handsome woman!" continued Mrs. Dod, looking with a half smile at Mrs. Cod.

That half smile produced the softest of the smile, which fitted exactly; and said, with emphasis,

"You don't mean so! You don't really mean to say that Alfred Dinks was ever after his money? That's too good!"

"Not at all," answered Mrs. Dod. "Oh no! I never heard any body say so. Mrs. Dinks, Junior, is a very smart woman. Her father is said to be very rich. One of those New York merchants, you know."

"Well, well!" said Mrs. Cod, who was always secretly wondering why no young man of proper matrimonial position took a fancy to Miss Selina Cod, and who knew it was the fault of Miss Selina's mother, "what a world it is!" She smoothed her yellow gloves slowly, finger by finger. "There are some of the benefaced-est women in this world. I do feel so. He thought the New York 'el' Positively it is getting to be as bad as Paris!"

Mrs. Dod pondered the fan exercise, Mrs. Cod smoothed her yellow gloves.

"They say," said Mrs. Dod, "that at the time old Burt's will was opened Fanny Dinks looked livid. I remember that young Bane, who was then in Mr. Quiddy's office, came round the evening after, and said it was the greatest sight in the world to see her. He thought she would eat Hope Wayne before their eyes."

"What'll Hope Wayne do?" asked Mrs. Cod.

"Oh, she'll enjoy having the man after her a little while, I guess," replied Mrs. Dod.

The ladies laughed.

"There's some painter, I hear," said Mrs. Dod.

"There's a Mr. Abel Newt, more likely," said Mrs. Cod.

The ladies laughed again.

"Bless me, how late it is!" said Mrs. Cod.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Cod."

"Good-morning, Mrs. Cod."

"I've had such a charming call, Mrs. Dod."

"Oh, Mrs. Cod, you are always so kind!"

"Good-morning."

"Good-morning."

And with degenerate smiles and rustlings and flirtings and bows and bendings the ladies parted.

Arthur Merlin had sketched his great picture of Diana and Endymion a hundred times. He talked of it with his friends and smoked scores of boxes of cigars during the conversations. He had completed what he called the study for the work, which represented, he said, the Goddess alighting upon Latmos while Endymion slept. He pointed out to his companions, especially to Lowrence Newt, the pure antique classical air of the composition.

"You know," he said, as he turned his head and moved his hands over the study as if drawing in the air, "you know it ought somehow to suggest the idea of the Immaculate. I'm no ancient Greece, Diana, and midnight. You see?"

Then came a vast cloud of smoke from his pouch, as if to make seeing impossible.

"Oh, yes, I see," said every one of his companions, especially Lowrence Newt, who did see, indeed, but saw only a head of Hope Wayne in a mist. The Endymion, the mountain, the Greece, the midnight, were but mere suggestions of the artist. The study for his great picture was simply an unfinished portrait of Miss Lent Wayne.

Aunt Winnifred, who sometimes came into her nephew's room for the study one day, and exclaimed, sorrowfully,

"Oh, Arthur! Arthur!"

The young man, who was busily mixing colors upon his pallet and humming, as he usually did when at work, as he had done when a boy, to say that she understood all about it. How could she understand all about it? What right has any body to say that she understands all about it? He asked himself the question frequently because he was very sure that he himself did not understand it, and he answered it by any means understood all about it.

"What is the matter, Aunt Winnifred?" demanded Arthur, in a resolute and distant tone, as if he felt that he ought to deny every thing he was about to hear.

"Yes, yes," continued Aunt Winnifred, musingly, and in a tone of profound sadness, as she still held and contemplated the picture; "yes, yes; I see."

Arthur was quite vexed.

"Now really, my dear aunt," said he, remonstratingly, "I must be aware that it is not becoming in a woman like you to go on in this way. You ought to explain what you mean," he added, decidedly.

"Well, my poor boy, the latter you get the surest if I do," said Mrs. Cod.

Mr. Merlin did not seem to be in the least offended by this reply. It was therefore the indignant tone that he answered:

"Aunt Winnifred, it is not kind in you to come up here and make me my time and temper while you sit there coolly and talk in infernal parables."

"Infernal parables!" cried the lady, in a tone of surprise and horror.

"Oh, Arthur, Arthur! that comes of not going to church. Infernal Parables! My soul and body, what an awful idea!"

The painter smiled. The contest was too utterly futile. He went slowly back to his easel, and, turning his head over his shoulder, began to rub his colors upon the pallet. He was humming a tune which was the higher than a groan to the canvas before him, when his aunt remarked,

"Hymn, Arthur! now that you are reasonable, I'll tell you what I mean."

The artist looked over his shoulder and laughed.

"Go on, dear aunt."

"I understand you why you don't go to our church."

"Was a remark so totally unexpected that Arthur stopped short and turned quite round.

"What do you mean, Aunt Winnifred?"

"I mean," said the lady, with her study as if to overwhelm him with resistless proof, "I mean Christian—and I say as I say in that you are a Roman Catholic."

Aunt Winnifred, who was an exemplary member of a Dutch Reformed Church, or as Arthur gayly called her to her face, a Dutch Deformed one. He knew how simple and sincere in her religious faith to tolerate with equanimity the thought that any one of the name of Merlin could possibly profess to be a Catholic, and he poetically described the Church of Rome.

"Arthur, Arthur! and your father a clergyman! It's too dreadful!"

And the tender-hearted woman burst into tears.

But still weeping, she waved the picture in mournful condemnation of her assertion. Arthur was amused and perplexed.

"My dear aunt, what has put such a droll idea into your head?"

"Because—because," said Aunt Winnifred, sobbing and wiping her eyes, "because this picture, which you keep locked up so carefully, is a picture of the Holy Virgin. Oh dear! dear! dear!

taste it, but she did not. I stitched on for a minute or two, though my blood was running cold, and the boiling of that soup in the large quiet kitchen sounds through my head sometimes even now. Mrs. Williams was standing at the window with her back to me. I never will know what made me do it, for to this day if somebody had bidden me, and without a word or a thought but that it must be done, I ran to the fire, gave the saucepan a poke, and sent the soup blazing up the chimney. As it fizzed up the thought of her anger came over me. I was frightened, but I set up, saying a wild cry of fear, I rushed to the nearest door, and it was the best parlor. The next thing I remember is crouching behind the mahogany, who had started up and stood in the door, as Mrs. Williams came forward with two pails, which had been lying on the window-sill, in her hand.

"Fool, never mind the spilling of the soup," said he, understanding at once what had taken place, which indeed was easily seen. "You would not be angry with the child for that, and could not help it, I dare say. I can dine very well without it. You don't know me, Mrs. Williams," he continued, coming a step nearer where she stood, still looking at me with a deadly glitter in her eyes.

"Don't I!" said she, and I did think she was trying which of the knives was the sharpest.

"Well," said the gentleman, "you may know me to be Edward Wentworth, and you may know that I have married your daughter, and brought her home a lady. I never meant to part with child by her. We were privately married: but while Jo-de-ann lived it was to be kept a secret, and we knew you would not keep it. That is why I have come to-day to surprise you; but you will come to Wentworth Park, and grow as rich as ever my. By-bye, ma'am, you're not going to faint!" She had staggered back against the wall, her white lips set, and her eyes growing glassy. I was half and half a dozen of the servants, whom my scream had brought in, ran to help her, and she shrunk away with a desperate effort, darted up stairs, and we heard her lock herself in her own room. The whole house was terribly frightened at the smash all concluding that Mrs. Williams had seen a ghost. What Mr. Wentworth thought I do not know, but he asked me no questions, and never seemed to suspect any thing about the spilled soup, but left us cook for Mrs. Williams, and me and the servant a little before sunset. We all went about our business, the work went on, and in that house on any account, and the evening coach was expected. Just before it came, Mrs. Williams's bell rung, and the housemaid said she was not to come. When I came into the room she was sitting at the desk, looking herself again, but her face was very white, and she had her long knitted purse full of guineas in her hand.

"Mary," said she, "you are a good girl; take this and go home; I'll take care that you get no blame."

"I want no money, ma'am," said I; "but I'll go home if you let me, and never say a word except to my father or mother."

She held out the purse once more, and then pocketed the deed. She could say nothing, but must have been a hard pull for proud spirit. I got out of the room as quick as I could, threw on my hat and cloak, and was off down the road as fast as it came up, leaving trunk and all behind me.

My father and mother were astonished to see me when it set me down at their door in Clatford, just as the clock struck twelve; they were still more astonished when I told them what had come to pass between me and my master. My father first called me a brave good girl, and then he ordered me not to be proud and tell no one; for he knew, as well as I, that Mrs. Williams would never be forgiven for such a story quiet about former Jo-de-ann's relations, I'll tell you all the rest."

I think I have not much more to tell. Harry did finish the business. There were some people in our village that never got over the wonder of it; but I am proud to say that my husband was the first boy by use, for ten years after, Mrs. Williams died in her own way, and left her property to several distant relations, and her daughter, Lady Wentworth. She had never gone to the Park but once, and then she would not see her mother, sleep in the house, but saw her daughter and grandson, now heir of the estate, and then went straight back to the Golden Shawl. She never took another girl to stay with her; and what she said about her leaving I never heard. And the maids had a story among them, and they always stuck to it, that I would not accept a present of money that came down the chimney, and frightened Mrs. Williams half out of her senses. They said one thing, however, which I am ashamed to think was true, that she never liked to make evil-soup after, but cared to look at red pepper.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM SAN JUAN.

DISPATCHES were received this week at the Department of State from Mr. Campbell, Boundary Commissioner at San Juan. He reports every thing quiet, and does not apprehend any further difficulty or fighting. He announces that negotiations are broken off between him and the English Commissioner. He maintains that our right to the island is clear and conclusive.

COMMODORE TATNALL'S DISPATCHES.

The Washington correspondent of the Associated Press telegraphs:

The dispatches received by the Government narrate with picturesque minuteness the events in Utsira Bay. Mr. Tatnall says that the British officer in charge of the gun-boats having visited him, said nothing about aid, but that his squadron was expected hourly. Mr. Tatnal remarks that he was on board the Pochahon he would look anxiously at his Admiral and at the locks. After he left, continues Captain Tatnall, "I held a conversation with our Commissioner, Mr. Ward, and he agreed with me perfectly that, under the circumstances of our getting into collision, and the sending of the British squadron to the bay before, I could do no less than tow the English gun-boats out with me, when the officer, in his pride and vanity accepted. While the boats were making fast to the steamer, I went below and spoke to Mr. Ward, and found him busily loading the revolvers, and going on board one of the launches, for reasons which I did not know. I, however, did not accompany him, but soon returned in one of the English boats, determined to keep my eye upon the locks, and not to go under for with his superstition and concurrence, he would have done so. I was received on board the flag-ship with pride." Captain Tatnall towed the boats through the fleet, and when he had got them outside of the fleet, he knew they were safe, cutting them off, he retires to the rear of the line, and, with his steamer under way, he keeps his eye upon the flag-ship, ready to aid the wounded, and, should any boats be sunk, to rescue the crews. He says that the fleet fired at the fort in accordance with neutrality. Having been informed by a British officer that the fort was to be reinforced by artillery, Captain Tatnall went in a barge to visit him. When within a few feet of the commander's gig, a musket-ball, fired by the fort, killed the coxswain, Mr. Hart, of Brooklyn, New York, and slightly wounded the Commander of Engineers. They reached the Carysford before the boat entirely sank. Captain Tatnall says that the British Commander-in-Chief personally regretted the loss of their arrangements, and requested him to accompany him to the fort, which he declined, but went with him to the beach. The fort was evacuated, thereby to a certain extent assuming the same place as the Chinese forts. The correspondent of the Commissioners was much doubted at the time.

UNCERTAIN FATE OF AN AERONAUT.

MR. LAMOUNTAIN'S balloon ascended at Concord from Watertown, New York, on 23d inst., in company with a Mr. Haddock, and has not been heard from since. The Boston Herald says: "They were last seen from the town of Hadley, Mass., on the Connecticut River, at about seven minutes of 6 o'clock, going S. E. with great velocity.

Tuesday afternoon, says the New York Herald, a meeting of Lamountain's friends was held at the rooms of several relatives of Mr. Haddock, and others, left Watertown on Friday, and were to meet the party on the 23d inst., and, if possible, to terminate the dreadful uncertainty. [Sad affair.

We find in the Rome Sentinel of Wednesday the following: "Mr. Lamountain's balloon passed this village afternoon, brought by the Watertown train due here at 4 P. M. The car was found in the woods, and a letter that a letter had been picked up in Canada (near Bytown, C. W.) addressed to Mr. Lamountain, stating that the balloon was safely moored and arranged at East Boston, but who have since removed to the Connecticut River, and will meet their friends at Hartford. We think this doubtful's affection. It seems that John returned to Boston Tuesday last, and left for Hartford, where he was to meet with the girl to Were. At first they stopped at the Astor, but subsequently left for Brooklyn, and on Sunday last near the village, the girl sleeping upon the ground with the male companion. Mr. Haddock, who missed his daughter, sought for her in the towns near Boston, but could not find her. On Monday he left Boston and then searched her whereabouts. He paralled from place to place, and at last found her at Hartford. Mr. Haddock kept, where he met his daughter. John stated that he had been married to her in Boston, and that he had gone to Hartford to see his father. He also stated that his father's roof, and thought they had slept in the same two or three nights, and that they were married in Boston. This statement was confirmed by John's brother and his wife, who had met the couple in Boston. Mr. Haddock, John seemed very pointed, while the girl stated that she took this course to avoid the embarrassment of a family estrangement. She will be her sister in a school-house the night before last. Mr. Haddock and daughter left for home to attend school at South Boston, next her Indian career, and that of Mr. Haddock.

GOLD PRODUCE FROM THE NEW GOLD MINES.

THE Governor of Nebraska, in his late visit to the Republican given a statement of the results and shipments of gold, by various parties, from the mines recently opened in Denver and Arapaha, which aggregate as follows: Reported, $60,000; shipped, $40,000; and it is estimated that the gold in at the rate of $17 per ounce, which is much below its true value. The amount of gold brought into the States by private individuals is included in the statement.

THE DEATH OF JOHN BROWN'S WIFE.

A Washington correspondent of the Boston Journal, in his letter of the 16th inst., referring to a large number of letters received from Virginia, says: "Many of them are from the widow of John Brown."

Mr. Buchanan received his guests with that frank and genial cordiality which is a great feature in his receptions. I saw him on the day of his inauguration. He was then in his usual health. He is a hale old man now. He has no necks of being jaded or overwork. He does not sleep in the day time, and his evenings are said to be seen starting for his rural home in the country. He has a beautiful place there, and I have heard many of the ease of the cottages that surround the Retreat, and the kind attentions of the ladies of the neighborhood to the summer house of the President. It is four miles from the city, and the drive is one of the most delightful that it is to be witnessed in a country so full of beauty. Strangers who may choose to call on him; and this ride is becoming quite a fashionable one. Every Wednesday the President may be seen on the piazza of his beautiful cottage, with his arm around the neck of one of his nieces as well as the graceful society that surrounds him."

PERSONAL.

During General Scott's absence, General Wool, as senior officer, will be acting Commander-in-Chief in the United States.

A correspondent of the Courrier des Etats Unis relates the following anecdote of Mr. Webster: "In the year of the Centennial, Mr. Webster, as I am told, was present as one Professor of French at Harvard College, and who, as we all know, was a man of great learning and unadulterated purple. His afterward edited a journal, and in New York was sent back to Europe. Webster was getting, assay support by writing for the Paris press. Mr. Webster, who was then chief, engaged him, and, leaving him hard to a fortune of a million and a half francs.

Mrs. Mary Van Vechten, born in Albany, 1794, is the last surviving descendant of the family of the first settlers of the distinct city. Her father, Mr. Van Vechten, was a prominent citizen residing at Lansingville since 1815.

A correspondent of the Evening Post lately visited Miss Hinkel, and he gives the following account of her:

"Miss Hinkel remains the impression you derive from her books—modest, sensible, sincere. She is tall, slender, with fine blue eyes, light-brown hair, clear English complexion, and a face lighted up by sensibility. There is nothing of the strong-minded about her, but industrious, unaffected, sensible, and even in manner, whatever any ladies are afflicted. She is feminine, to God meant her to be feminine, and has 'a soft, low voice, which is a very pleasant thing.'

"She was enjoying a common cane-backed Yankee rocking-chair, which a friend had sent her. You can see in a moment that the owner of home a rocking-chair can be a wandering Yankee—it is an epitome of New England—an oasis of comfort in the desert of discomfort of four-jagged, stiff, unsuited abominations; the rocking-chair was a bond of sympathy at once. She asked many questions concerning America, and expressed a warm desire to visit it—a wish, I trust, soon day to be accomplished. She is a lovely target as the idea of having been persuaded in New York for so many years.

In the town of Pekin, Niagara County, reside Samuel Hall, aged 100 years, and his wife, aged 98 years. They have been of one hundred acres, the work of which, such as plowing, reaping, &c., they have done themselves. They have lived together, have been performed according to civilized rites, they were again married a few days ago at their residence of St. James. The ceremony, according to the ritual of the Episcopal Church, was performed by the Rev. Mr. Hall, a son of the bridegroom, and has been attended with a very successful mediator between the two Governments.

A few, residing at Lyons, lately lost his purse, containing $1,000, and handwritten offer of reward was issued. The next day he received this letter: "Amidst the loss of your purse, I found it, and return it. Please pay me the reward. Yours, &c." He will never get them back again. I am reading the life of Lord Byron, and have just come to the part where I have both laughed and cried fast and for dinner. At detail of the two meals was here given. The first was a dinner of herbs, and was called Hebrew, until your 1100 francs are exhausted, and I will be married to the wife of wine to spend the night.

Mr. John Minnes, of York, Pennsylvania, astonished the people of that town on Saturday last by riding a race. He performed on a church spire on South George Street, and, standing on the weather vane the top of the spire, 107 feet in height, and, amazed other positions for delight to look at.

Mr. Thomas Hall, of Cincinnati, has received a telegram from a town near Providence and one of his children, a daughter, while walking home from school the day last winter, when the old gentleman slipped, and fell flat on his face, and was insensible for a few moments, and being assured he was not much hurt, and that he had been stunned on a slippery sidewalk. The old gentleman looked up, as if to assure himself of the fact, and said, "Thank God, I am not dead!"

A few days since Mr. Hannah Soper, aged 102 years, of Lee, Massachusetts, died. Mr. Soper's father was a sailor of the Revolution. Mr. Soper formerly resided in Cairo, Greene County, New York, and was the owner of Soper's Mills, in that town.

She was born in 1757,—eighteen years before the Declaration of Independence.

A painting was exhibited on Wednesday in Boston, at the meeting of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, by an Indian of the Natick tribe, named Solomon Jacobs, which is a most remarkable production. It is on a smooth pine board, about five feet long and six inches wide, and represents a forest scene, with animals under the tree, they being considerably taller than the trees, which are of the natural height.

Charles Lamb was a great lover of flowers, and his extensive and most thriving place, orchard in the district of London of Islington, was a perfect wilderness of pinks—the trees being generally in a thrifty and bearing condition.

A man named Vanover, a native of Kentucky, and a follower of Walker's fortunes, was lately executed in the City the other day. He had indulged in the dangerous pastime of shooting at a mark, and some one of the men and females for some time, when his conduct finally aroused the ire of a number of the citizens, who called upon them to arm themselves with rifles and force the bully to leave the place. He was accordingly notified to leave, and in the most impudent way of riding his horse through, and, after a protracted discuss on, it was finally resolved, without a disturbance, that he should be shot. He was discovered, during the proceedings of the people's court, with a pistol in his possession, and, having drunk heavily, and had gulped down some three quarts of it in the course of the morning's proceedings, ought to take charge of his body. The enormous quantity of liquor which he had consumed had not the slightest effect upon him in the manner, and did not appear to be sober. His career was forcibly ended, by dint of a rope and a branch of a tree.

The Columbus Ohio Statesman says that a young Virginia, aged seventeen, of considerable personal and professional appearance, is now residing with the Sheriff of Union, awaiting the action of the Grand Jury of the latter county, having become insane from viewing the corpses buried from time ago, which he was employed to believe followed the approaching end of the world.

Mrs. Eleanor E. Bedell is about to publish a volume of her father's plantation, in Brunswick County, North Carolina, entitled "Old Times." The work is said to be full of interesting anecdotes.

Chief-Justice Taney, of the Supreme Court of the United States, is in the eighty-third year of his age, and all his eight associate Justices, except one, are over seventy years.

There is a rumor that a Southern lady, distinguished for beauty and well-known as a literary achievements, has become enamored of the stage, and will make her first appearance on the boards in New York in the course of the season.

Mr. Kettleney the Governor-General of Canada, Sir Edmund Head, is expected to arrive at Quebec, and will be present at the banquet to be given to Portland, Maine, in honor of the visit of the Grand Eastern. Lady Head will accompany him in his visit.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

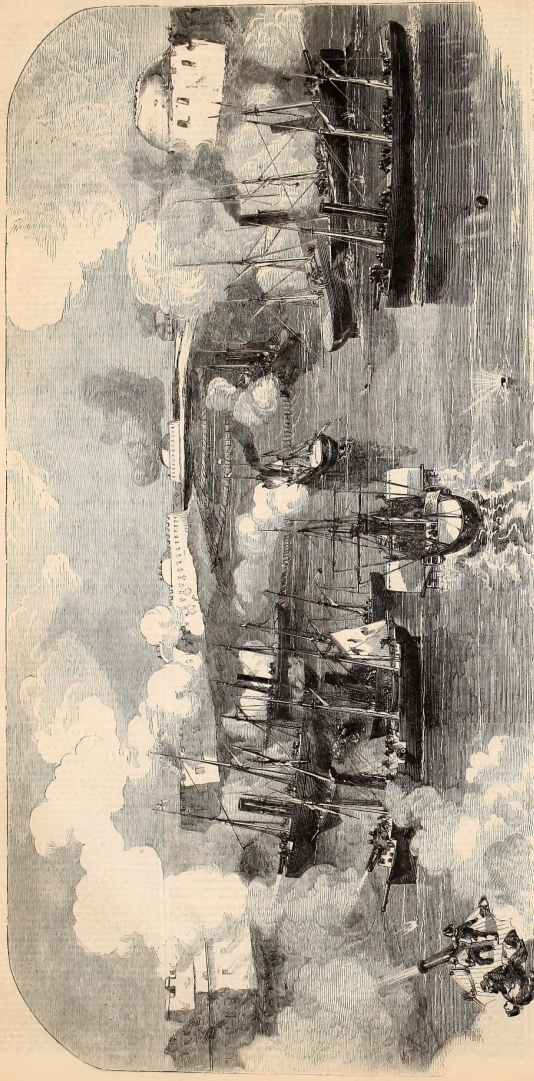
THE GREAT EASTERN EXPLOSION.

THE Times correspondent, in describing the explosion on board the Great Eastern, says: "The scene was awful in the extreme.

"The great struggle was to get out the miserable fireman, who it was supposed, were scalded to death, and terrible groans reached the deck. As soon as the smoke and steam had in some degree subsided, a party of men descent, not safe, but possible, several men at once volunteering to go down to the help. The first party included all the twelve firemen on duty were brought up. One or two were not so completely injured as to require help enough, the worst injured second in the boat-pole, and the rest were taken to the hospital. The first fireman to be taken up from his hold; the boiled flesh was seen to slipped from the bones of his hand while removing his coat, and the skin of others peeled off with their clothing. The room designed for a hospital had been used as a carpenter's shop, and the floor was covered with shavings, upon which mattresses were hastily laid. Two ship's surgeons and one of the London Hospital physicians, besides all other persons who could be profitably employed, at once set to work to alleviate the distress of the wounded men, and even in the midst of their own sorrow could have been done. They were generous to a fault, and now has 'a soft, low voice, which is a very pleasant thing.'

"Mr. Brunel, the chief engineer, superintended the removal of the wounded men from the ship

THE NEW WAR IN CHINA—THE BATTLE OF THE PEI-HO.—[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]



THE BATTLE OF THE PEI-HO.—[FROM A SKETCH FROM THE MAST-TOP OF A VESSEL IN THE RIVER.]

The Battle of the Pei-ho.

FRIGHTFUL MASSACRE OF ENGLISH TROOPS.

BRITISH REPULSED BY THE AMERICANS.

U. S. S. "POWHATAN," June 29, 1859.
At Anchor off the Pei-ho River.

THE terrible engagement at the Pei-ho took place on the 25th inst. at the mouth of this river, between the allied English and French on the one hand, and the Chinese on the other.

I am now going to carry the reader so far back as May, 1858, in order that he may arrive at the cause of this sanguinary conflict.

About the middle of May, 1858, an imposing fleet was anchored just where we are now, composed of the vessels of England, France, the United States, and Russia. England had some twenty; France, seven or eight; the United States, two; and Russia, one. The ministers of these different countries flew their flags from the mast-heads of the four larger vessels, and were here with the avowed object of obtaining an interview with the Emperor of China, and exacting treaties from him that should loosen the long-existing drawbacks upon the commerce of the world with China." This was their common object; but there were two roads to its attainment selected by the differing policies of the Western nations. England and France, taking the past and their knowledge of Chinese character as their guides, came with the sword in one hand, and just and reasonable demands in the other. "Grant our demands, which the century of progress and enlightenment tell us are but just, or we will blow down your forts, advance upon Pekin, and dictate our own terms," they said. The United States and Russia, on the contrary, held aloft the branch of peace, and came, trusting entirely to the ability of their ministers.

England and France, finding their demands avoided by cunning and procrastination, at once turned to war as the only alternative. They got up steam on a dozen or more gun-boats, crossed the bar, and commenced steaming up the river on their way to Pekin. Arrived at a chain which had been stretched from bank to bank between the forts at its mouth, they were fired into by a hundred guns, returned the fire, and let go their anchors. Then was continued a well-contested battle, which, at the end of an hour and a half, was turned in their favor by a body of twelve hundred marines, who landed and carried the fort at the point of the bayonet.

The Allies then steamed quietly up the river a distance of seventy miles and anchored off the city of Tein-sing, situated at the head of gun-boat navigation and some seventy miles short of Pekin. Of course the road was now open for the "bearer of the olive branch," and the next day saw them also safely at anchor off Tein-sing, but undeniably under the protection of English and French guns, and consequently under the necessity of "taking up their beds and walking" as soon as those guns should be withdrawn.

The frightened Emperor now trembled in his threatened capital, and hurriedly commissioned those high officers to proceed to Tein-sing and check the advance of the hostile forces. Four separate treaties resulted from this action. Those of England and France granted all demands—that of Russia was perhaps nearly so fortunate; while that of the United States was little better than so much sheep-skin. And it was only saved from being virgin sheep-skin by the exertions of Mr. William B. Reed, our minister, assisted by the evident good understanding existing between himself and the representatives of England and France. Or, in other words, the commissioners were afraid to ignore entirely the propositions of one who visited, and laughed, and talked, and dined with those who had just blown down their forts.

The four treaties being all thus formed, the Allied guns returned to the anchorage outside the forts with the understanding that they, the treaties, were to be exchanged "a year hence at Pekin." Of course the two olive branches floated down the river several hours ahead of the guns—a fact owing, perhaps, to their being afraid to be left behind.

Now we come to "the present." The "year" being up, the English, French, and United States ministers arrive at Shanghai on their way to Pekin to exchange the ratified treaties. There they find the same commissioners (with one exception) that had treated with their predecessors at Tein-sing, and, more as a mark of consideration than any thing else, they communicate with them. The Allies are informed of nothing indicative of a change of feeling upon the part of the Emperor (in fact, they were told by letter to come to the north), but our minister is notified that the only right which the United States has to go to Pekin flows from "the most favored nation clause of our treaty," and that such right does not therefore exist, while, as yet, "the most favored nation" (English) itself has not been received there. As for the Russian minister, report had long since told us that he had reached Pekin by the overland route and become permanently settled as resident minister near the court of China. Another rumor had spoken of vast fortifications that had arisen from the ruins of the Pei-ho forts; but this was laughed at, while the former was considered barely "possible."

COMMODORE TATNALL VISITING THE BRITISH ADMIRAL IN THE MIDDLE OF THE ACTION.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Well, we arrived here, nine miles from the forts, on the 20th inst., and anchored in four fathoms water, with the English and French vessels around us, and with the forts upon the distant horizon. The Allies had already been at anchor several days; had sent into the mouth of the river; found it ten times more strongly fortified than ever, three barriers (each sufficient in itself to stop a squadron) thrown across; and a very evident determination that nothing in the shape of a for-sign ship should enter. Upon being informed at the forts that the English and French ministers were about to pass up upon their way to Pekin, the reply was,

THE STORMING PARTY LANDING IN THE MUD.

"You can not go to Pekin by this branch of the river. Go to the other outlet farther north, and ask there until the commissioners arrive from Shanghai. This river is not the Pei-ho, but the Nan-ho, and it is barricaded against an expected attack from the rebels, and we can not open it."

"Very well," replied the English Admiral. "This is the way we know it ought to be, and if you do not permit us to pass, we shall remove the barricades by force. I give you until day after to-morrow to do it."

Upon being again visited at the expiration of this time, he said,

"We will be very sorry if you attempt it; for we are ordered not to permit the passage of any thing but what shall be forced to the river by us."

"I will give you until the 25th to reconsider the subject," said the Admiral; "after that I will say I do not find the river clear I shall attack the forts." And this was the position of affairs when we arrived on the 21st.

I will stop here a moment to observe that the threatened attack of the rebels was purely imaginary, and that no chart indicates the existence of any other "outlet" to this river. Hence their assertion was undoubtedly as false as the pretended readiness to let them go to Pekin by another route.

From the 21st until the 25th the rough state of the weather did not admit of boating, and all parties were consequently confined to their vessels. As I had moderated the Hon. John E. Ward visited the other ministers, and upon his return signified his intention of proceeding in the chartered steamer Toey-sum, with his interpreters, to the inner edge of the bar the next day, and, in case we did not patch the latter in a boat to the forts to inform their commander that the American minister was at hand, and anxious to pass the barriers to Pekin.

Well, the next day came, and in went the Toey-sum with the Hon. Minister, Secretary, and Captain of this ship, Flag-lieutenant, and the Captain of Marines. The English Admiral also went in in force at the same time, to be ready for the struggle which the next day was likely to witness. His entire steaming force numbered eight vessels, ten hundred men, six hundred of whom were marines and seamen landed subject to the call of battle being French. Thirteen steamers carried this army, and eight others, of too heavy draught to cross the bar, were left outside of the river enough to take care of them. Their boats, however, were passed into the expedition, and when the attacking vessels were heavy steam gun-boats of 60, 60, and 40 horse power, mounting two eight-inch shell guns, and manned by one hundred men. Two were such larger vessels of the same description, armed with the Admiral's pennant and tender, and the last was a small propeller chartered by the French for the use of their minister. The reader can get their names and armament on the sketch.

Arrived inside of the bar, the Toey-sum accidentally ran on shore under the very guns of the first fort, and the Admiral (who with his fleet had anchored well out of range), expecting to see the first fire from every moment, generously sent a gunboat to pull her off into deep water. He supposed that, if she could not be got off, the flag-officer would hoist her flag at the gun-boat's main, the American ensign at her peak, and abandon her entirely at his service. This was an offer unprecedented in naval history, and was not accepted for as her assistance was concerned; it, however, proved unavailing, and the Toey-sum remained on shore until high tide. The interpreters were sent in the flag-officer's barge to communicate with the authorities of the fort; arrived at a certain point, they were stopped at the bank of the river by a number of ragged-looking Chinese, who ordered their business.

"We wish to see the highest officer present upon the part of the American minister," replied our friends.

"There is no officer here of sufficient rank to communicate with you," was the untruthful reply.

"Where can he be found?" queried the interpreter.

"At a place about thirty li [ten miles] further to the north."

"How can we get there?"

"Outside," was the reply.

"Can you furnish us a pilot?"

"No."

"Can you provide us with sedan-chairs to go overland?"

"It would be useless; there is no road by land."

"We wish to leave our cards. Will you accept them?"

"We can not dare to do such a thing. Our rank is not high enough. We are only poor people from the neighborhood engaged upon the bar."

And here the interview ended. Comment is needless upon the above dialogue, as it has since been proved—as was indeed apparent to all at the time—to have been a series of lies. It is of great value, however, as the opinion of a Chinese as looking toward Americans. It is not an unsafe prediction to indulge in when I say, that within less than five years, China will have so conducted herself toward our citizens resident along this coast as to draw down upon herself the hostility of the United States. We now come to the subject of the accompanying sketch—the second attack of the English upon the Pei-ho forts.

Saturday, the 25th of June, was a cool morning for even our latitude of 39° N., and beautifully clear. The sun got up from his crimson bed as if emerging from a bath of blood before coming forth to gaze upon the sanguinary scenes which were destined to be enacted under his glare during the day, and the winds and sea were still and smooth as if nature itself had been startled into a watchful quiet by the knowledge of some great and approaching evil. The beautiful day grew older and older, and saw the English sentiment, one gun-boat, at 8.30 P.M. Then they were observed to be "move short" upon their cables, while steam was allowed to escape slowly from their pipes, and while the guns' crews were ranged along their pieces in excellent readiness for the Admiral's signal to "go ahead!" This was the greater part of the naval portion of the attacking force, the marines and only some two hundred blue-jackets having been transferred to some captured junks out of range of the forts, there to await a call for their services as a "reserve" or as "stormers" for the capture of a silenced fort.

A few minutes of breathless suspense, and then ascends the Admiral's signal. There is not wind enough to float it out, but every one on board of it knows, and every one proceeds to do his duty—up anchors and away at the enemy. The two leading vessels of the Admiral's gun-boat creates a breeze, and the flags blow out and show the admiral standing in the stern of the Plover, the English ensign, fly out from the mast-heads of every boat in line, and long pennants, which, as if for a holiday, they steam into the conflict. There they go! steadily, swiftly; with their heavy guns standing ever ready, and their crews and their general commanders conveying the most exposed positions to gain the better view. The Plover, with the Admiral, who even as he sits seems taller by a head than the boy-midshipman at his side. He has a calm and unconcerned air, but his glance is slow emphasis, and points with steady hand to the distant works. It is a time for him to show a grand sight to see him thus leading his men into battle against the fearful odds which he then knew to have about twenty-one guns. His countenance can looked desperately formidable, but the steel forts towered over them like volcanoes.

Of some reasons unknown to the lookers-on of the Toey-sum, the gun-boat just astern of that of the Admiral ceased firing. This left the second or "first barrier," passed through an opening which the Taj Coptan had made in the line of sunk junks, and then anchored immediately below the "second barrier." Perhaps captain dreaded the effects of the fire of the forts, which appeared to let his boat, instead of that of his superior, receive it. He is once known to have passed through the barrier, assisted by his utmost boats, which had preceded them up the river for that purpose.

Up to this time the fire of the forts was perfectly devoid of life, the number of their guns even being concealed by hanging screens. The English were as if they were not to be resisted. Not a Chinaman had been seen upon their walls, and an universal silence reigned. The unconcerned air and the silence of sudden death to many brave hearts then full of life. No sooner had the "silencers" passed the first stake of the second barrier than the screens were elevated like the curtains of a theatre, a hundred guns were run triumphantly out, and the next instant a hundred destroying balls were belched forth by flame and smoke. The battle had indeed was awful. Men fell as if dozen hogs scythes had been swooped along their ranks, some to rise no more, others to crawl out of the way to die, and a few—a very few—to seize painfully to light in spite of their wounds, and the engagement now became general. The gun-boats returned the fire before it had been well received, let loose their broadsides of the largest sorts, with her propeller going, and her heavy guns working with the regularity of mere machinery. Another moment, as if upon a pivot, pouring first into one fort and then into the other her rapid broadsides. The Toey-sum found, with his flag on board the Plover, save his captain fell headlong to the deck and taken the command himself. A terrific struggle, but the day is down, severely wounded in the leg. He looks around him, and the decks and guns are now in the remaining out of thirty-five. Was ever such havoc at this before?

Stepping to him the boy-midshipman, he orders:

"Take a boat and pull to the American Commodore. Tell him that all our guns are disabled, and half of my gun-boats disabled. I must have the reserves, to take the places of the dead and wounded. If he can relieve me, I will keep up against the tide; it will be a great service."

Two boats were under the midshipman's lee before he reached the Toey-sum in a third. Begrimed by powder and bloody from a wound in the face, he gave his message, and told of the disaster around. The flag-officer knew not what to do.

"If I can go to the reserves," he reasoned, "I am in command. I can not disobey Captain Chiu, with whom my country is at peace. If I refuse, I leave the wounded admiral and his men exposed to be the mercy of ten thousand treacherous cowards. What shall I do?"

He was not long in answering this question. The increasing fury of the fire from the forts, and the slackened spirit of the English attack, told that life was passing away and that time was precious. Away with every consideration save those of humanity! I can not stand against Captain Chiu, with whom my country is at peace. If I refuse, I leave the wounded admiral and his men exposed to be the mercy of ten thousand treacherous cowards. What shall I do?

I thought on Destiny's deserts pale,
Where Death restrieves the evening gale,
How ever our friend pervades the land,
And freedom fanned the deadly dew.
I thought on Quintana's cliff,
Where, entered from our foundering skiff,
Through the white breakers' wrath I bore
Exhausted Mortimer to the shore;
And when his side an arrow found,
I sucked the Indian venom's wound.
Those thoughts like torrents rushed along
To sweep away my purpose strong.

Observe! this assassin's hand is stayed by memory, not of benefits received, but benefits conferred.

Now Margaret Van Eyck had been wonderfully kind to Margaret Smith, had broken through her own habits to go and see her; had nursed her, and soothed her, and petted her, and cured her more than all the medicines in the world. So when her love opened to the recipient of her goodness, and she loved her new friend wonderfully much as well as her loved Gerard, though, in truth, it was purely out of regard for Gerard she had visited her in the first instance.

When, therefore, she saw the unwonted roses on Margaret's cheek, and read the list of purchases that had brought them there, she gave up her own views without a murmur.

"Sweet-heart," said she, "I did desire he should stay in Italy six or six years and come back rich, and serve all, an artist. But your happiness is before all, and I see you can't live without him, so we must have him home as fast as may be."

"Ah, Madam!" said Peggy, full of new thoughts. And the young woman hung her head a moment and blushed. But her face fell when Mrs. Peggy Mum? That passes my skill. He is gone to Italy but what part, that I know not. Stay! he named the cities he should visit. Florence was one, and Rome. But then—"

Finally, being a sensible girl, she divined that a letter, addressed "My Gerard—Italy," might chance to miscarry, and she looked imploringly at her friend for counsel.

"You are come to the right place, and at the right time," said the old lady. "Why, I have this Hans Memling with me to-day; he is going to Italy, girl, no later than next week—to improve his hand, he says. Not before it was needed, I do assure you."

"But how is he to find my Gerard?"

"Why, he knows your Gerard, child. They have supped here more than once, and were like hand and glove. Now, as his business is the same as Gerard's—"

"What! he is a painter then?"

"He passes for one. He will visit the same places as Gerard, and, soon or late, he must fall in with him. Wherefore, get you a long letter written, and copy out this pardon into it, and I'll swear for the messenger. In six months at farthest Gerard shall get it; and when he shall get it, then will he kiss it, and put it in his bosom, and come flying home. What are you smiling at? And now what makes your cheeks so red? And what put me sometimes in mo for I can not think—My darling! yes! happy days are coming to my it be past."

Meantime Martin sat in the kitchen, with the black-jack before him and Richt Haynes spinning beside him; and, woe! but she pumped him that night.

This Hans Memling was an old pupil of Jan Van Eyck and his sister. He was a painter, notwithstanding Margaret's sneer, and not a bad one enough, with one fault. He loved the "sippetin, dankin, and the brown bowl" more than they deserve. His singular habit enabled him from amassing fortune, and was the cause that he always came to Margaret Van Eyck for a meal, and sometimes for a groat. But this gave her a claim on him, and she knew he would not trifle with any commission she should entrust to him.

The letter was duly written, and left with Margaret Van Eyck to be delivered by Memling, who, strange enough, Hans Memling returned from Flanders. Margaret Van Eyck gave him the letter, and a piece of gold to travel by with economy. Both assured in a hurry to be off.

"All the better," said the old artist; "he will be the sooner in Italy."

But as there are horses who burn and rage to start, and after the first spurt or two relapse quietly to all this hurry cooled into inaction when Hans got as far as the principal hostelry of Tergou, and there all was at his own sumptuous siting-table by the window. He went in for a parting gloss with Dame; and when he had done that he found Martin not bear of it. No; he was going a long journey; they would treat him—every body must treat him, the landlord all the

It resulted from this treatment that his tongue got as loose as if the wine had been oil; and he confided to the convivial crew that he was going to show the Italians how to paint: next he sang his exploits in battle, for he had fought in Flanders, and his amorous successes with females, luckily not present to oppose the version of the incidents. In short, "plenus rimarum erat: hac illuc diffluebat:" and among the miscellaneous matters that oozed out, he was heard to say that he travelled with a letter to a townsman of theirs, one Gerard, a good fellow. He added, "You are all good fellows;" and he slapped Sybrandt on the back so heartily that the breath was driven out of his body.

Sybrandt on this took a long view of the last interest to every word, and learned for the first time that Gerard was gone to Italy. However, to make sure he affected to doubt it.

"My brother Gerard is never in Italy."

"Ye lie, ye cur," roared Hans, taking instantly the irascible turn, and not remarking that he who threw all opposite him was the same he had eulogized and his whom beside him. "If he was ten times your brother he is in Italy. What call ye this? There, read me that superscription!" and he flung down a letter on the table.

Sybrandt took it up and examined it gravely; but eventually laid it down, with the remark that he could not read. However, one of the company, by some immense fortuity, could read; and, proud of so rare an accomplishment, took it and read it out: "To Gerard Gerardsoen, of Tergou. Then by the hand of the trusty Hans Memling with all speed."

"Tis excellently well writ," said the reader, examining every letter.

"Ay!" said Hans, lumbarticularly, "and small wonder; 'tis writ by a learned woman, the sister of Jan Van Eyck. Blessed and honored be his memory. She is an old friend of mine, is Margaret Van Eyck."

Miscellaneous Hans then diverged into forty topics.

Sybrandt stole out of the company, and went in search of Cornelis.

He found the heads together over the novel Italy was an immense distance off: if they could only keep him there.

"Keep him there? Nothing would keep him long from his Margaret."

"Come, be quiet, said Sybrandt. "Why didn't she die when she was about it?"

"I am sure I did my positive the best to vex us." And he was wroth at her solidness in not dying, to oblige.

The three black sheep kept putting their heads together, and tainting each other worse and worse, till at last their corrupt hearts conceived a plan for keeping Gerard in Italy all his life, and so securing his share of their father's substance.

But when they had planned it they were no nearer the execution; for that required talent; so inquity came to a stand-still. But presently, as if Satan had come between the two heads, and whispered into the right ear of one and the left of the other simultaneously, they both burst out at once with the same word.

"THE BURGOMASTER!"

They went to Glybstreckt Van Swieten, and he received them at once for the sake of their money, and the torture of suspense catches eagerly at knowledge. Curiosity (often painful), but seldom, like suspense, intolerable.

"Humph! And you think that will keep him in Italy?"

"We are sure of it, we are not, Cornelis?"

"Ay," said Cornelis, "our Gerard will never leave Italy now he is there. It was always his dream to get there. He would come back for his Margaret, but not for us. What cares he for us? He despises his own family—always did.

"Then you have a little gall in him," said the old hypocrite.

"It will be for his good in the end," replied the young one.

"What avails Famine wedding Thirst," said Cornelis.

"And the grief you are preparing for him so coolly?" exclaimed Sybrandt, sarcastically, but tasted his own vengeances all the time.

"Oh, a lie is not like a blow with a cutlal axe. It knocks no man and breaks no bones."

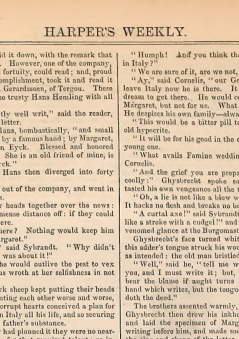
"A cartal axe!" said Sybrandt; "no, nor even like a stroke with a cudgel!" and he shot a sly ensnomel glance at the Burgomaster's broken nose.

Glybstreckt's face turned white with ire when this shaft pierced his body, and made some inquiries as to the size and shape of the letter, when an unlookedfor interruption occurred. Old Jorian Ketel burst hastily into the room, and looked vexed at not finding him alone.

"I have a hasty matter on hand, good fellow."

"Ay, but this is grave. I bring good news; but 'tis not for every ear."

The Burgomaster arose and drew Jorian aside into the farthest recess of his deep window, and then the brother heard them converse in low but eager tones. Left, ended by Glybstreckt sending Jorian out to saddle his mule. He then addressed the



"You have news of Gerard?" said he, eagerly. Then they left, and went the letter and Hans Memling. He listened with restless eye. "Who writ this letter?"

"Margaret Van Eyck," was the reply: for they naturally thought the contents were by the same hand as the superscription.

"Are ye sure?" And he went to a drawer and drew out a paper written by Margaret Van Eyck while treating with the Burgh for her house. "Was it writ like this?"

"Ay," said the same writing," said Sybrandt, boldly.

"Good! And now what would ye of me?" said Glybstreckt, with beating heart, but a carelessness so well feigned that it staggered them. They fumbled with their bonnets, and stammered and spoke a word or two, then hesitated and beat about the bush, and at last by degrees had they arrived at a letter written, to say something that would be sure to keep Gerard in Italy, and this letter they proposed to substitute in Hans Memling's wallet for the one he carried. While them fiendish with their bonnets and their iniquity, and hesitated between respect for a burgomaster and their knowledge that this one was at great a rogue as themselves, and, somehow or other, united only against Gerard, pros and cons were coursing one another to and fro in the old man's spirit. Ambrosius said let Gerard come back and feel the weight of the law. Prudence said keep him a thousand years if he will, but remember that why do dirty work on a doubtful chance? Why put it in the power of these two rogues to ruin both. He put them there, and I said none should move them but you, who had carried them so well of him and me.

"Give me a spade!" cried Jorian, eagerly. "But stay! by he is suspicious man. You can't see they are there still?"

"Sure? I will openly take the blume if human hand hath touched the ground."

"Then keep them but two hours more, I prithee, good Margaret," said Jorian, and ran off to the Stadthouse of Tergou a joyful man.

The rest you have divined.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE Burgomaster was also a joyful man as he jogged along toward Sevenbergen, with Jorian striding beside him, giving him assurance that in an hour's time the missing parchments would be in his hand.

"Ah, master!" said he, "lucky for us it wasn't a thief that took them."

"Not a thief? not a thief? what call you him, then?"

"Well, saving your presence, I call him a jackdaw. This is a piece of jackdaw's work, if ever there was; take the thing you are least in want of, and hidit—that's a jackdaw. I should know," added Jorian, exactly, "for I was brought up with a jackdaw. He and I were born the same hour, but he cut his teeth long before me, and, wow! but my life was a burden for years all along of him. If you had but a bole in your hose no bigger than a groat, in went his look like a gimlet, and in the matter of stealing he was Gerard all over. Ay, and Margaret Van Eyck was poor Christian in the house wanted meat, that was first. Mother was a notable woman, as if she did but look round, away flew her thimble. Father lived by cordwainer, as about sunrise Jack went diligently about the house with his awl and his twine. After that, make your bread how you could! One day I heard my mother tell him to his face he was enough to corrupt half a dozen children; and he coolly cocked his eye at her, and said never a word more. Sometimes I could find it very hot. Now this Gerard is turned with the same bent. Where the parchments are more nuts him than a thimble or an awl to Jack. He took 'em out of pure mischief and hid them, and you would never see them found later on for it."

"I believe you are right," said Glybstreckt, and I have reason to dwell more lately on it."

When they came to Peter's gate he felt uneasy.

"I wish it had been any where but here."

Jorian reassured him.

"The girl is honest and friendly," said he. "Besides, we are long to do with her. Why, I'll be sworn!" and he bit him into the garden. "There, master, if a face is to be believed, here they lie; for there the spade is here."

He ran for a spade which was stuck up in the ground at a distance, and began to scratch away, and uncovered a parchment. Glybstreckt saw it, and thrust him aside and went down on his knees and dug like a dog. At last he had them twisted and his face alone. He threw out parchment after parchment, and Jorian and he hastily examined them and shook them. Now, when Glybstreckt had thrown out a great many, his face began to darken and lengthen, and when he came to the last he put his hands to his temples and seemed to be ill amazed. Jorian looked and cried his frame.

"What, mystery lies here?" he gasped. "Are fiends mocking me? Dig deeper! There must be another!"

Jorian threw the spade in and threw out quantities of loam mould. In vain. And even while he dug, his master stood and changed.

"Treason, treachery!" he cried. "You knew of this!"

"Know what, master, in Heaven's name?"

"Caitiff, you knew there was another one worth all these twice told."

"Tis false!" cried Jorian, made suspicious by the other's suspicion. "Tis a trick to rob me of my hundred crowns. And I know yes, Burgomaster." And Jorian was ready to whimper.

A sweet voice fell on them both like oil upon the waves. "No, good man, it is not false, nor yet is it quite true: there was another parchment."

"There, there, there! Where is it?"

"But," continued Margaret, calmly, "it is not a town record (so you have gained your hundred crowns, good man); it was but a private deed between the Burgomaster here and my grandfather Pier—"

"Hush, hush!"

"—in Brandt."

"Where is it, girl? that is all we want to know."

"Have patience, and I shall tell you. Gerard read the deed, and it was found to be not as much yours as the Burgomaster's, and he put it apart, to read it with me at his leisure."

"Ay, ay!" said the young man, "I said the Burgomaster, recovering his calmness.

"So, sir, I have," said she, gravely, "it is not." Then, in a broken voice: "You hunted—my poor Gerard—so hard—and so close—that you gave him no time to read it. He put it in his bosom, and his grief. The parchment was in his bosom, and hath taken it with him."

"Wither, whither?"

"Ask me no more, sir. What might have you urge to your hurt. I was for your sake, good man, I put force upon my heart, and sore to speak at all to him after the way he had used me; and of the misery he has brought on him and me, the sight of him is almost more than I can bear;" and she put in her apron, and began to weep very sorrowfully bitterly.

Jorian, for the past, and dread of the future—the slow, but, as he now felt, the inevitable future of avarice and fear, all tugged in one direction at this tough job, and Glybstreckt hung his head, and his arms fell listless by his sides. A coarse and brutal nature is not always proof against what Martin Wittenhagen leaning on his bow, and sneering from ear to ear. At sight of the man and her grief, Gerard's foe Glybstreckt's worse passions awoke.

"Ha! attack him, seize him, traitor and thief!" cried he. "Dog, thou shalt pay for all!"

Martin, without a word, instantly obeyed the Burgomaster. Glybstreckt looked and had not a word to say. Martin followed up his advantage. "The Duke and I are soldiers. He won't let you greasy burghers trample on an old comrade. He bade me carry you a message too."

"The Duke send a message to me?"

"Ay! I told him of your masterful doings, of your imprisoning Gerard for having a girl; and says he, 'Tell him this is to be a king, not a burgomaster. I'll have no kings in Holland but one. Bid him to mote humble, or I'll hang him at his own door.—"

Glybstreckt trembled. He thought the Duke capable of the deed.

"'—s I hanged the Burgomaster of Thingemhob.' The Duke could not mind which of you he had hung, or in what part; such trifles don't stick in a soldier's memory, but he was sure he had hanged one of you for grinding poor folk, 'and I'm the man to hang another,' said the good Duke."

These repeated insults from so mean a man, coupled with his invulnerability, shielded as he was by the Duke, drove the choleric old man into a fit of impotent fury; he shook his fist at the soldiery, and tried to threaten him, but could not speak for the rage and mortification that choked him: then he gave a sort of screech, and coiled himself up in eye and form like a rattle-snake about to strike; and spat furiously upon Martin's doublet.

The thick-skinned soldier treated this ebullition with genuine contempt. "Hero's a venomous old toad! he knows a fork from the foot would annd him to his last home, and he wants me to cheat the gallows. But I have slain too many men in fair fight to lift limb against any thing less than a man; and this I count no man. What is it, in Heaven's name? An old goat-herd, egg, foul o' rotten bones!"

"My soul! my mole!" screamed old Ghysbrecht.

Jorian helped the old man up, trembling in every joint. Once in the saddle, he seemed to gather in a moment unanimity of age; and the figure that went flying to Tergou was truly weird-like and terrible: so old and withered the face; so white and reversed the streaming hair; so baleful the eye; so fierce the fury which shook the bent frame that went spurring like mad; while the quavering voice yelled, "I'll make their hearts ache!—I'll make their hearts ache!—I'll make their hearts ache! All of them! All!—All!—All!"

The black sheep sat disconsolate amidst the convivial crew, and eyed Hans Meuling's wallet. For more ears he had taken it off, and flung it on the table. How readily they could have taken out that letter and put in another. For the first time in their lives they were sorry they had not learned to write, like their brother.

And now Hans Meuling began to talk of going, and the brothers agreed in a whisper to abandon their project for the time. They had scarcely resolved this when Dierich Brower stood suddenly in the door-way, and gave them a wink.

They went to him. "Come to the Burgomaster with all speed," said he.

They found Ghysbrecht seated at a table, pale and agitated. Before him lay Margaret Van Eyck's handwriting. "I have written what you desired," said he. "Now for the superscription: What were the words? did ye see?"

"We can not read," said Cornelius.

"Then is all this labor lost," cried Ghysbrecht, angrily. "Dolts!"

"Nay, but," said Sybrandt, "I heard the words read, and I have not lost them. They were, 'To Gerard Gerardszoon, these, by the hands of the trusty Hans Meuling, with all speed.'"

"'Tis well. Now, how was the letter folded? how big was it?"

"Longer than this one, and not so long as this."

"'Tis well! Where is he?"

"At the hostelry."

"Come, then, take you this grout and treat him. Then ask to see the letter, and put this in place of it. Come to me with the other letter."

The brothers assented, took the letter, and went to the hostelry.

They had not been gone a minute when Dierich Brower issued from the Stadthouse and followed them. He had his orders not to let them out of his sight till the true letter was in his master's hands. He watched outside the hostelry.

He had not long to wait. They came out almost immediately, with downcast looks. Dierich made up to them.

"Too late!" they cried; "too late! He is gone!"

"Gone! How long?"

"Scarce five minutes. Cursed chance!"

CAPT. HARRISON, COMMANDER OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

In a few days, God willing, the Great Eastern will be among us. Her commander, Captain Harrison, will be an object of general curiosity. Our readers will be glad to be introduced to him in advance.

Many of them are acquainted with him as the commanding officer of the Cunard steamers Africa, America, Cambria, Hibernia, etc. He is an old sailor. An Englishman by birth, and probably about forty-eight years of age, he left his home when a very young boy to go to sea. After a voyage or two, his friends, finding the propensity irresistible, regularly apprenticed him, and sent him to sea under proper auspices. But it is recorded of young Harrison that he had a natural and irrepressible tendency rather to command than to obey; before his apprenticeship ended he had coerced the bonds which attached him to his owners, and was in command of a vessel on his own book. For many years he was known throughout the East Indies and South America as an adventurous yet a safe captain; and though he frequently commanded ships engaged more or less directly in the wars prevailing in South America, and more than once had to fight his way out of or into port through hostile squadrons, it was remarked of him that his fighting qualities never interfered with his mercantile instincts, and that, whatever happened to the enemy's ships, his cargo was always kept dry, and his insurance policies were never voided.

CAPTAIN HARRISON, OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

Nearly twenty years ago, when the Cunard Company began to aspire to the control of travel on the Atlantic, their managers—shrewd, capricious men—began to pick up, from right and left, the best sailors they could find to command their vessels. They had, even at that early day, resolved upon the wise policy they now pursue, viz., training their officers from the forecastle; but in the mean time, as it takes many years to breed a first-rate captain, they gladly welcomed the cream and essence of other systems, and it was thus that they enlisted Captain Harrison. For fifteen years he remained in their service; during which time he commanded some of the finest vessels they had. It is said that he has crossed the Atlantic over 180 times. He himself observed to a friend: "I counted my voyages up to 157, and then I stopped."

An English biographer tells the following story, which illustrates his presence of mind and rapid thought in emergency:

"Leaving New York once after the prevalence of heavy southwest gales, which had silted up the bar to the extent of a foot or two, and the Africa, of which ship he was then in command, being very deeply laden, the vessel touched the bar as she was passing over it. The pilot in charge called out instantly to 'Stop her.' Our readers should be at once nautical men and commercial men to appreciate rightly the nature of the calculations which in one second of time it was necessary for the captain to make. They may be explained as something of this kind: 'We are on the bar now, and if we stop, the chances are a hundred to one that the ship is a total wreck in a few hours, but all the insurances will be safe; on the other hand, if I jam her across I shall save the ship, but by taking her out of the pilot's hands shall avoid the insurance.' The result was, that within a tenth of the time occupied in writing the above these calculations had been all made, and 'Go on ahead, full speed!' was the order. The ship bounded twice more, but was brought safely across, and came into port strong and sound."

In the month of November, 1855, Captain Harrison left the employ of the Cunard Company to enter that of the Company owning the Great Eastern, and from that time to this he has been unceasingly engaged in superintending the "Great Ship." It is said that his labors in this connection have been more severe than he had ever previously performed.

Captain Harrison will be welcomed as an old friend when he comes here.

MARRIAGE.

Who marry as they choose, and choose
Not as they ought, they mock the priest;
And, leaving out obedience, lose
The finest of the feast.

Till Eve was brought to Adam, he
A solitary desert trod,
Though in the great society
Of Nature, Angels, and of God.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER IV.

CALM IN STORM.

DOCTOR MANETTE did not return until the morning of the fourth day of his absence. So much of what had happened in that dreadful time as could be kept from the knowledge of Lucie was so well concealed that her father had not until long afterward, when France and she were far apart, did she know that eleven hundred defenceless prisoners, of both sexes and all ages, had been killed by the populace; that four days and nights had been darkened by this deed of horror; and that the air around her had been tainted by the stain. She only knew that there had been an attack upon the prison, that all political prisoners had been in danger, and that some had been dragged out by the crowd and murdered.

To Mr. Lorry the Doctor communicated, under an injunction of secrecy, on which he had no need to dwell, that the crowd had taken him through a scene of carnage to the prison of La Force. That, in the prison he had found a self-appointed Tribunal sitting, before which the prisoners were brought singly, and by which they were rapidly conveyed to be put forth to be massacred, or to be released, or (in a few cases) to be sent back to their cells. That, presented by his conductors to this Tribunal, he had announced himself by name and profession as having been for eighteen years a secret and an unaccused prisoner in the Bastile. That, on of the body so sitting in judgment had risen and identified him; and that this man was Defarge.

That, hereupon he had been ascertained, through the registers on the table, that his son-in-law was among the living prisoners, and had pleaded hard to the Tribunal—of whom some members were asleep and some awake, some dirty with murder and some clean, some sober and some not—for his life and liberty. That, in the first frantic greetings lavished on himself as a notable sufferer under the overthrown system, it had been accorded him to have Charles Darnay brought before the lawless Court, and examined. That, he seemed on the point of being at once released, when the tide in his favor met with some unexplained check (not intelligible to the Doctor), which led to a few words of secret conference. That, the man sitting as President had then informed Doctor Manette that the prisoner must remain in custody, but should, for his sake, be held inviolate in safe custody. That, immediately, on a signal, the prisoner was removed to the interior of the prison again; but that he, the Doctor, had then so strongly pleaded for permission to remain and assure himself that his son-in-law was, through no malice or mischance, delivered to the concourse whose murderous yells outside the gate had often drowned the proceedings, that he had obtained the permission, and had remained in that Hall of Blood until the danger was over.

The sights he had seen there, with brief snatches of food and sleep by intervals, shall remain untold. The mad joy over the prisoners who were saved had so rebounded him scarcely less than the mad ferocity against them who were cut to pieces. One prisoner there was, he said, who had been discharged into the street free, but at whom a mistaken savage had thrust a pike as he passed out. Being brought to go to him and dress the wound the Doctor had passed the term quite, and had found him in the arms of a couple of Samaritans, who were seated on the heads of their victims. With a consistency as monstrous as any thing in this awful nightmare, they had helped the healer effectually, and the wounded man with the gentlest solicitude—had made a litter for him, and escorted him comfortably from the spot—had then caught up their weapons and plunged anew into a butchery so dreadful that the Doctor fled from the scene with his hands and swooned away in the midst of it.

As Mr. Lorry received these confidences, and as he watched the face of his friend, now sixty-two years of age, a misgiving arose within him that such dread experiences would revive the old danger. But he had never seen his friend in his present aspect; he had never at all known him in his present character. For the first time the Doctor felt now that his suffering was strength and power. For the first time he felt of imprisoned widowhood and misery to turn it gray.

And yet, observing the strange law of contradiction which obtains in all such cases, the time was long, while it flamed by so fast. A revolutionary tribunal in the capital, and forty or fifty thousand revolutionary committees all over the land; a law of the Suspected, which struck away all security for liberty or life, and delivered over any good and innocent person to any bad and guilty one; prisons gorged with people who had committed no offense, and could obtain no hearing; these things became the established order and nature of appointed things, and seemed to be settled forever, before there were many weeks old. Above all, one hideous figure grew as familiar as if it had been before the general eyes from the creation of the world. That figure of the sharp female called La Guillotine.

It was the popular theme for jest; it was the most cure for headache, it infallibly prevented hair from turning gray, it imparted a peculiar delicacy to the complexion; she kissed La Guillotine, looked through the little window and sneezed into the sack. It was the sign of the regeneration of the human race. It superseded the Cross. Models of it were worn on breasts from which the Cross was discarded, and it was bowed down to and believed in where the Cross was derided.

It sheared off heads so many that it, and the ground it most polluted, were a rotten red. It was taken to pieces, like a toy-puzzle for a young Devil, and was put together again where the executions swarmed. It bathed perpetually, struck down the powerful, abolished the beautiful and good. Twenty-two friends of high public importance—not reckoning those shot dead—it had lopped the heads off, in one morning, in as many minutes. The name and the appellation of Old Scripture had descended to the chief functionary who worked it; but so armed, he so hedged round his substitutes and shadows, and tore away the gates of God's own Temple every day.

Among these terrors, and the hood belonging to them, the Doctor walked with a steady head: cautious, but not suspicious, humane, persistent in his end, never doubting that he would in the end succeed at last. In a few months of the time sweet by so strong and deep, and carried the time away so fiercely, that Charles had lain a year in prison and a month over, when the Doctor was thus steady and confident. So much anxiety had he originally wasted in the Revolution grown in that December month that the rivers of the South were encumbered with the bodies of the victims of Nantes, and the Loire, the Seine, and the Rhone were notorious for the frightful relics they kept unburied. Already the strong death-cart, tumbling through the streets with its load, had become familiar to the eyes that looked for it no more. Lyons was shot and burned out, and Fouché and Collot d'Herbois were bloodily busy there. Couthon was at Clermont, smiling inanely, when he was not biting people. Carrier was at Nantes, reaping the fields with the sickle of the Guillotine, all day long. Fifty-three thousand signatures had been appended to the list of the proscribed. Jourdan Coupe-Tête and Barras were at Toulon, where a learned mathematician had been seen to laugh and shed tears together, as they bore him to the axe that had cut off so many heads that it could hardly sever his own. Lebon was at Arras, reasoning of Liberty and Equality, like a machine that had run down. Paris bore the exact relation to the rest of France that a madhouse bears to the world outside. Anybody there, who was not mad, was counted mad.

Through the prisons, the Doctor walked with a steady head: not deeming himself safe, but knowing that he had many friends working for him, and that, up to that time, he had enjoyed their confidence. Nothing was left undone that could be done. Security was something to him, but he would resign it cheerfully, on the pressing occasion that it was dangerous to the safety of others.

Hence, he had remained in Paris at the peril of his life. Hence, he had not quitted it. Hence, he had access to his friend, on the moonlight night when the mail-coach conveyed him out at the Barrière de Neuilly, and left him behind.

Charles had written, entreating him to do so, and telling him that the danger was thickening every hour. Charles had come back, for the honour of his name; for the honour of his father's name; for the honour of his uncle's name; for his own honour, as a gentleman always ready to do what he undertook to do; for honour's own sake.

When he had seen his friend shut in safely, the Doctor turned his face towards the distant capital, scrutinized the pass that had been given to him, by the Section of Saint Antoine, long before, and set forth to walk back.

He had not gone far, when he was overtaken by a mounted courier, who inquired for Citizen Manette.

"Here is the Citizen Manette," said the Doctor, reining up.

The courier handed him a small folded paper. The Doctor opened it, and found that it contained these words only:

"Do not return. Do not stir from Paris. Destroy this paper. Lucie is in danger. Charles has been denounced from the Tribune, and cannot live more than two days. Save him."

Doctor Manette's first act was to write in pencil on the leaf of his pocket-book, that he would stop for nothing; his second act, to put his horse to the gallop.

He had no time to spare, and he knew it. He had come out at the barrier, because there was no other way of getting out, and because the nearness of his friend's destination made no difference in the speed at which he must travel. He could do nothing to help Charles, except travel as fast as Charles himself could travel, and get to Paris in time.

Within an hour, he was in a light two-wheeled vehicle, with a lamp before each wheel, and a pair of swift horses. Within two hours, he was clear of the town of Compiègne, and was beyond the possibility of being overtaken on the road.

Hour after hour, he left the apparitions of the dead behind, and pressed on towards the living. Hour after hour, the apparitions of the dead were overtaken and passed, and the living remained behind. Many a town, dimly seen in the distance, broke out with lights and bells, and the Doctor's ear filled with the sounds of rejoicing. Many a town, closely approached, was hushed in sleep, or in the profound stillness of fear. At intervals, the postilions exchanged a word or two with the world outside the carriage. Sometimes, after changing horses, and resuming the journey, the Doctor heard the postilions talking to one another about the Guillotine. Sometimes, they were quiet, because the drunken patriot who had been shouting in his ear had fallen into a doze. Sometimes, they moved on at a walking pace, because some barrier had to be passed, or some village was being slept through. Always, the postilions were prepared for a change, and quick to get it.

So, with tremendous changes of sights and sounds in his ears and eyes, but with no touch upon him personally, the Doctor travelled all night. Towards the middle of the night, he got out of the carriage, and walked up a hill. He did the same thing towards daybreak, and again towards sunrise, and again towards noon.

"Courage, my dear Charles!" he said, aloud, as he plodded on foot. "Courage, courage! I am fresher than you! I am collected and composed, and I am sure to do it!"

Consequently, when the relay of horses was ready for him, and he was drawn on towards Paris, he collected his papers for examination, and made ready to present himself in his own character.

He had his papers in his hand, and was ready, when he was challenged by the Guard at the barrier, but he was not asked to get out of the carriage. His papers were looked at by the light of a lamp, and he was permitted to proceed. It was nearly midnight when he passed through the barrier and reentered Paris.

"Directly, I will alight at the first good house," thought the Doctor, "and discharge myself of my trust. Charles shall be delivered to his wife—shall be recalled to life by her side—and when the first joy is over, and he can bear to speak of his dungeon, then I will tell him what I know myself, that he shall see his father to-morrow, and that I shall take him to him."

The first good house turned out to be the residence of Monsieur Defarge. As the carriage stopped there, and the Doctor alighted, he saw the owner in a doorway, looking out for customers.

He was the same Monsieur Defarge with whom he had had some conference in the garret, and he knew him immediately.

Monsieur Defarge looked closely at his fare, too, but he had no conception of the relation in which he stood to it and to the prisoner. The prisoners were so numerous, that it was impossible to know much about them.

"Have the goodness to direct me," said the Doctor, "to the residence of Citizen Evrémonde, formerly Marquis. I am not known in this neighbourhood, and the streets are dark."

Monsieur Defarge glanced at the papers in his hand—at first, cursorily—then, with more attention.

"Citizen Evrémonde," said he, "is not to be found. His citizenship is not in activity at present. He is in England."

"Right, I know he is. I bring his papers with me, to be delivered to his wife."

Monsieur Defarge looked at the papers with a musing face; mused a little while; and then spoke:

"Citizen Manette, I will take you myself to the house; but I shall then return here, to my duties. Madame Defarge must go with us, too. She knows more than I do of such matters, and can speak for the citizen herself. Leave your papers with me; they are safer with me than in your hands, for the present. Come!"

Much astonished, and not at all pleased by this unexpected circumstance, the Doctor got down from his carriage, and followed Monsieur Defarge into a wine-shop. A bright fire was burning in the middle of the room, and Madame Defarge was sitting by it, knitting. Two customers were drinking at the counter. Madame Defarge sat apart, in the manner of one who was there by authority. Monsieur Defarge spoke to her, and handed her the papers that the Doctor had entrusted to him. She scrutinized them closely.

"Does the name of your prisoner begin with a D?" said she, to the husband.

"It does, Madame."

"Is he dead?"

"Alas, no! Fortunately for him, he is recalled to life by the good citizen here."

Upon that, Madame Defarge raised her head from her knitting, and looked at the Doctor.

"Is it well known to you, citizen," she asked, "that this prisoner was delivered to us on the confession of his own servant, and on the denunciation of his own daughter?"

"Madame, it is well known to me."

"And that the citizen is the father of the wife of one Evrémonde, this husband and father having been exiled for life?"

"Madame, it is well known to me."

"And that the citizen is the father of a child who lives in London?"

"Madame, it is well known to me."

"And that the child's name is Lucie, and that she is also known to you?"

"Madame, it is."

"And that you are consequently related to the wife of the first husband of the present husband of the wife of the prisoner?"

"Madame, it is."

"Good," said Madame Defarge, with a complacent air. "Extremely good!"

"Madame," said her husband, who had been looking over the papers leaving Lucie frightened and bewildered in the door-way of the wood-sawyer's house, the feather-grey snow fell as quietly and lay as white and soft as if it had never been.

"Oh, my father!" for he stood before her when she lifted up the eyes she had momentarily darkened with her hand; "such a cruel, bad sight!"

"I know, my dear, I know. I have seen it many times. Don't be frightened! Not one of them would hurt you."

"I am not frightened for myself, my father. But when I think of my husband, and the mercies of these people—"

"We will set him above their mercies very soon. I left him climbing to the window, and I came to tell you. There is no one here to see. You may kiss your hand toward that high-set shelving roof."

"I do so, father, and I send him my Soul with it!"

"You can not see him, my poor dear?"

"No, father," said Lucie, quivering and weeping as she kissed her hand, "no."

A footstep in the snow. Madame Defarge. "I salute you, citizeness," from the Doctor. "I salute you, citizen." This in passing. Nothing more. Madame Defarge gone, like a shadow over the white road.

"Give me your arm, my love. Pass from here with an air of confidence and courage, for his sake. That was well done"—they had left the spot—"it shall not be in vain. Charles is summoned for to-morrow."

"For to-morrow!"

"There is no time to lose. I am well prepared, but there are precautions to be taken that could not be taken until he was actually summoned before the Tribunal. He has not received the notice yet, but I know that he will presently be summoned for to-morrow, and removed to the Conciergerie; I have timely information. You are not afraid?"

She could scarcely answer, "I trust in you."

"Do so, implicitly. Your suspense is nearly ended, my darling. I shall be released to you within a few hours: I have encompassed him with every protection. Come, now, courage."

He stopped. There was a heavy lumbering of wheels within hearing. They both knew too well what it meant. One. Two. Three. Three tumbrils faring away with their dread loads over the pitiless pavement.

"I must see Lorry," the Doctor repeated, turning her another way.

The staunch old gentleman was still in his trust; had never left it. He and his books were in frequent requisition as the basis of accounts and made animated. What he could save for the owners he saved. No better man living to hold fast by what Trust was, and to keeping, and to hold his peace.

A rainy day, and yellow sky, and a rising mist from the Seine, deadened the approach of darkness. It was almost dark when they arrived at the Bank. "Mr. Lorry! Here sooner yet" had been officially said to the stately residence of Monseigneur, and the great door, like a little hammer that had struck in that name it had opened and begun to fall asunder. The costly fittings were all removed, the valuables were gone, and the great staircase was being packed off piecemeal. Mr. Lorry was in his room among the ashes in the court ran the letters: National Property. Republic One and Indivisible. Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, or Death.

Who could that be with Mr. Lorry—the owner of the riding-coat upon the chair—who must not be seen? From whom newly arrived did he come out, agitated and surprised, to take his favorite in his arms? To whom did he appear to repeat her faltering words, when, raising his voice and turning his head toward the door into the room from which he had issued, he said: "Removed to the Conciergerie, and summoned for to-morrow?"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Pat," said a youth, accosting a stranger in a cemetery, "can you direct me to any sporting club in the vicinity?" was the prompt reply: "Ah, but," continued the lad, "I mean comic men." The couple are welcome, and now I'd like something amusing." "Well, that's something like a joke," said Pat, "but as something—well try. And off they went, hunting among the tombs for diversion.

Deacon Johnson is a great temperance man, and eats a good cucumber pickle whenever he can get one for a cent. Not long ago he employed a carpenter to repair the shed, and directed him to be very careful to separate the five-pence it was found necessary to remove the waiting-room, and to put the nails in a pile by themselves, every body. A piece of decoration, a tumbler, and a picture were carefully put away, but the nails were left there from the beginning. The Deacon was summoned, and on his return from attending to the business, said: "Well, I declare, that is curious, sure enough. It must be that old Satan left them when he went out of the house thirty years ago." "Perhaps he did," returned the temperance man, "but he left the cider mill, and have been fain mighty hard to stay all this time."

A very popular preacher harangued his hearers on the importance of perseverance, and finished his sermon by saying: "You that are in the church members must not look back, but go on from strength to strength, and from grace to grace." You may be a happy Christian in the world if you please, religion is like a battle, and Satan are strong; He hates good men, and would like to kill them at once; but, when my dearly beloved hearers, you must go like General Washington did at the battle of Bunker's Hill, and if a stranger in horse was killed by a British cannon-ball, and he grew on a horse, he would not run away, but like a man cut at the top of his voice, 'A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse!' A horse was brought him by Patrick Marion, and he drove the bloody British from the field, and thus secured the liberty of South Carolina."

A couple of strangers from Binghampton were over at Elmira, stopping at the ——— Hotel, when one of the gentlemen asked the landlord if he knew what constituted a man to be disgusted at the Lyceum this evening. After he had left, one of the strangers inquired of the other if that loud-mouthed gentleman was not just from jail? "Oh no," says the landlord, "he's a Universalist."

A lady in Nashville, on mercy hunt, was making a visit to the Penitentiary, as mercy hunters do, took through the various wards, and turning to the keeper, who was engaged in sawing, and said to him, in an undertone: "Dear me! the virtuous-looking women I ever saw in my life! What were they put in here for?"

"They are here," he replied, "because they have no husbands."

But madam was kneeling out as fast as possible.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Kalliston,

As a wash for the complexion, has no equal. It is distinguished for its soothing and purifying effect, allaying all tendency to inflammation, expelling that acrid, irritating bloom of moisture, stings of insects, &c. It is a powerful cleanser of the skin, removing tan, freckles, pimples, and all discolorations. These, with refreshing and invigorating properties, render it an indispensable requisite for the toilet.

Prepared only by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

For sale by druggists generally.

Price 50 Cents a Bottle.

WANTED.—Agents to canvass, for THE AMERICAN FREEMASON'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Tennessee, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama. Also, in the North and South Carolinas and Virginia, New York and Pennsylvania. None need apply but Master Masons of regular standing, accredited members of a Lodge in the State desire to canvass, and to whom the most liberal inducements to work zealously, and effectively, will be offered.

J. T. BRENNAN,
P. O. Box 941, New York.

FROM CLAFF'S

Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

—In our advertising columns will be found the notice of Heimstreet's Hair Restorative, an article advertised by the very reputable firm of W. E. Hagan & Co., of Cincy, N. Y. The quality of this hair preparation and efficacy are numerous, and it is every way worthy of the attention of those who are in need.

Price 50 cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON,
FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal stiffening as saddens the female life, and renders it a burden, this Remedy is a perfect panacea. Where the most eminent physicians have failed, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient, and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by this Catholicon are perfectly astonishing."—New Bedford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our own family."—Leonard's Armenia Herald. "It has created an interest among the recommendations like this: I have been afflicted with Female Complaints for 15 years. Pensions, 30 months, $300. Have used this Catholicon. Pension allowed. Uterine Catarrhus, Flooding and Painful Menstruation cured in a few days, with perfect success. It is worthy of the notice of the Faculty."—Mrs. Lucy Ann Hall, Bangor, Me. "Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon medical men to use it."—Jesse Lewis, M.D., Lawrenceville, Ga. Such letters pour in from a thousand sources, showing it to

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease pertaining to the Female Organs. Dropsies, Wives, and Retinent Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, directions, &c., may be had gratis of the Agent, or delivered by Agents. 1^{00} Do not confound Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon with any other at $1 per bottle, or three bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every town in the United States, or remitted through the Express Companies.

EARNDS & PARK, General Agents,
15 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.
Or J. D. PARK, Cincinnati. Wade, Foster, Boston.; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans. J. B. MARCHISI, M.D.

BRODIE'S
GRAND OPENING
FOR FALL & WINTER
CLOAKS

Will take place on

WEDNESDAY, Oct. 5th

The greatest display ever made on this Continent.

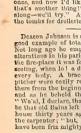
300 Canal Street, and

479 Broadway.

1^{ST} Dr. Hostetter's Bitters have received the warmest encomiums from the press and people throughout the country. Physicians, Clergymen, Editors, Lawyers, Statesmen, Governors, in fact persons of every respectability, it can not be approached. Every day new tests of its great efficacy are received through the most reliable journals. There is nothing equal to the enjoyment to be had with this efficient preparation, and none equals the valuable specific. Its mild tone, its sure and vigorous action upon a disordered stomach, liver, and system of the entire human body should recommend it to all lovers of our community. All that is needed to convince the skeptical of its healthy effects is to purchase it, give and be convinced.

For sale by Druggists and Dealers generally, everywhere.

Principal Depot, 13 and 15 Park Row.



LADIES MUST WEAR H. F. BODY'S PATENT INFLATED BUSTLE. SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS. Warranted not to break down. Wholesale by B. F. MOORE, 211 Nassau Street; W. S. CONANT & CO., 335 Broadway; CALHOUN & ROBBINS, 48 Maiden Lane; CLAFLIN, MILLER & Co., Trinity Building, and retailed everywhere.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
E. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 67 Crosby Street.

Patent Extension Tables.
At Horsfall's Manufactory, 148, 150 Wooster Street.

Trusses, Shoulder Braces, Elastic Stockings, Instruments and Ins. Gloves of new inventions. No. 8 Astor Pl.

Quarterman's Patent Stove Polish,
No. 114 Chatham Street, New York.

Improved Billiard Tables.
W. I. Sharp, Manufacturer, 144 Fulton Street.

The New Books.
MACAULAY'S LORD CLARENDON. $1.
LIFE OF A WIG. HUMBUGGED. $1 25.
AMERICAN CHESS CONGRESS. $2 50.
"Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of the price,
by HURD & CARLETON, Publishers, 139 Grand St., N. Y.

S. HATFIELD'S
NEW STYLES OF SUPERIOR MADE GARMENTS AND NEW READY.
329 Broadway.
CUSTOM DEPARTMENT, No. 1 BARCLAY STREET.

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS
HARNDEN'S EXPRESS
LEAVES EVERY
TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,
AT 5 P. M.
FOR SAVANNAH,
Thence, by Express Contract Lines to
MACON, MEMPHIS, ATLANTA,
AUGUSTA, MOBILE, CHARLESTON,
NASHVILLE, COLUMBUS, MONTGOMERY,
NEW ORLEANS,
And all Towns in the interior of
Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.
Every description of merchandise forwarded at Low rates, and delivered with promptness and despatch.
For further particulars apply at the office of
HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 74 Broadway.

For the Toilet, and Family Use.
The Celebrated
ORIGINAL HONEY SOAP.
Manufactured by
YARDLEY & STATHAM,
LONDON.
The high reputation of this Soap in Europe and America is sufficiently guaranty for its superior qualities.
The genuine article has the makers' names impressed on each piece of Soap.
Sole Agents for the United States,
J. D. BOWDOSS & CO.,
Importers of Druggists' Fancy Goods,
81 Fulton Street, New York.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as a certain remedy for Dyspepsia and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 145 Water Street.
For Sale by Druggists.

Pianos and Melodeons to Let,
At very Low Prices.
$3 TO $12 PER QUARTER, with no charge for rent, if purchased within one year.
CLEVES' PIANO & ORGAN ROOMS,
277 Washington Street, Boston.

A Brave, A Remarkable Book.
Church of England Review.

OUT OF THE DEPTHS.
The Story of a Woman's Life.
192 pages, Theo. Price 51.
Post-paid by mail to any part of the free.
W. A. TOWNSEND & CO., Publishers,
No. 46 Walker Street, New York.

THE "DIAPHRAGM FILTER,"
Manufactured by Messrs. MCKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of pocket filter to which I allotted in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the satisfactory working of this filter, and its moderate expense, to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instructions are plain, simple, and easy enough to be comprehended by persons of the most ordinary capacity.
RUSSELL HASTINGS, M.D., Chemist.
NEW YORK, Aug. 20, 1859.
Messrs. MCKENZIE & O'HARA, 224 4th Street, cor. Mercer.

Guines & Son's Extra Double Stout and Pale Ale.
For sale by their SOLE AGENT for the United States,
JOHN MACKIE,
No. 6 Barclay Street, New York.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my original established 1850, which will force them to grow six weeks sooner than any other preparation. It is perfectly safe on the skin. Price $1, by mail, post free, to any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau Street, New York.

American Guano.
TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

IS GUANO. THIS GUANO from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail, in quantities to suit purchasers, by JARVIS GUANO CO., 76 William Street, New York.

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 15, 24, and 36 tunes.
FAILLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
No. 21 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Soft, Glossy, Luxuriant Hair!—Our fashionable ladies, as well as beautiful lords of waving ringlets, should try JULIA HAZEL & IDA TURTHAIR HAIR DYE. It produces the most natural hair, imparts to it a curious softness and brilliancy, inclines it to curl, and yields to it the delicate fragrance of flowers. Sold by druggists, agents, and by JULIA HAZEL & Co., No. 704 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Wood's Patent Lock Stitch Sewing Machines are well adapted to the use of Families, Tailors, Dressmakers, &c. Price, $50 to $75.
WHITNEY & LYON,
Sole Agents, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

CHESS MONTHLY FOR OCTOBER.
Edited by Paul Morphy and D. W. Fiske. $1 a year, 25 cents a number. Office, 139 Nassau St.

PLATED GOODS AT RETAIL.
I AM OFFERING MY FINE ASSORTMENT OF TABLE CUTLERY, Tea Trays, Coffee, Tea and Ice Pots, Tea Sets, Spoons, Forks, Butter Knives, by retail, at the usual wholesale prices.
LUCIUS HART, 4 and 6 Sterling Slip.

EXCELSIOR BURR STONE FARM AND PLANTATION MILLS.
Agency, No. 45 Gold Street, N. Y.
This Mill, recently patented, grinds and meets the wants of Planters and Farmers, does splendid work with any grist or horse power, and with ease and efficiency: is so perfectly simple, that any man of ordinary intelligence can run and keep it in order. Price $6 Mill without running the morsis of this.
Descriptive Circulars sent from this Agency.
J. A. BENNET.

"THE POOR BLIND BOY OF THE PRAIRIES."

MR. MILBURN'S
Ten Years of Preacher Life.
A new Edition of this Thrilling and Interesting Book
Now Ready.
Price $1.
For sale by all Booksellers.
Single copies sent by mail (postage paid) on receipt of the price, by DERBY & JACKSON,
PUBLISHERS,
119 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

THE LATE PUBLICATIONS.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

THE STUDENT'S HUME. A History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Revolution of 1688. By DAVID HUME. Abridged. Incorporating the Researches of recent Historians. With a Continuation down to the Year 1858. Illustrated by numerous Engravings on Wood. Uniform with Smiths "History of Greece," "Liddell's "History of Rome," and "The Student's Gibbon." 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF GREECE. A History of Greece, from the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest, with Supplementary Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D., Author of the "Classical Dictionaries," &c. Illustrated by Woodcut and Ethnological Maps. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. With an Appendix, by GEORGE W. GREENE, A.M. Illustrated with 100 Wood-cuts. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF ROME. A School History of Rome, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire. With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D., D.C.L. Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. Illustrated by Numerous Wood-cuts. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S GIBBON. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By EDWARD GIBBON. With Notes and Illustrations from the most recent Commentators. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by 100 Engravings on Wood. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LIFE AND LIBERTY IN AMERICA; or, Sketches of a Tour in the United States and Canada in 1857-58. By CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D. F.S.A. With Ten Illustrations. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HENRY ST. JOHN, GENTLEMAN, of Flower of Hundreds, in the County of Prince George, Virginia. A Tale of 1774-75. By JOHN ESTEN COOKE, Author of "Leather Stocking and Silk," "The Virginia Comedians," &c. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE. By the Author of "John Halifax, ——" "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," &c. &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. The Library Edition uniform with the Illustrated Edition of "John Halifax", will be ready in a few days. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MY THIRD BOOK. A Collection of Tales. By LESLIE CRANDER MORTIMER, Author of "This, That, and the Other." 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. Uniform with the above.

ADAM BEDE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

WALTER THORNLEY; or, A Poet at the Past. By the Author of "Alec Forbes of Howglen" and "Annie Sunnyside. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

GERALD FITZGERALD. "THE CRUSADER." A Chalk Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Glenavy," "The Dodd Family Abroad," &c. &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. Library Edition, &c. Complete. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GIVE ME LIBERTY, OR GIVE ME LONG. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "A Good Fight," "Christie Johnstone," "Peg Woffington," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT? By PISISTRATUS CAXTON. A Novel. By EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, Esq., Author of "My Novel: or, Varieties in real English Life," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," "Night and Morning," &c. &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. Library Edition, $1 00.

$\left[\text{F}^{\text{RP}}\right]$ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.

Mrs. Mary J. Holmes' New Story.

THE LONG EXPECTED

HAS COME AT LAST!

THE NUMBER OF THE

NEW YORK WEEKLY,

WHICH WILL BE READY

ON THURSDAY, OCT. 6,

AND FOR SALE

ALL OVER THE UNITED STATES AND THE CANADAS,

WILL CONTAIN THE

FIRST CHAPTERS

OF

MRS. HOLMES' NEW STORY

ENTITLED

MARIAN GREY;

OR,

THE HEIRESS OF REDSTONE HALL.

It is with the greatest pleasure that the publishers lay before their numerous and appreciative readers

THIS, THE LAST AND BEST EFFORT

OF THE

BRILLIANT AND POPULAR AUTHORESS,

MRS. MARY J. HOLMES;

FOR THE FIRST FRUITS OF HER

EXCLUSIVE LABORS

FOR THE

NEW YORK WEEKLY,

SURPASS ALL HER FORMER PRODUCTIONS,

which have won for her such an enviable fame in the World of Letters.

The publishers have not been disappointed in perusing the first chapters of

MARIAN GREY.

They are what their knowledge of the abilities of the authoress led them to expect of the writer of "Lena Rivers," "Tempest and Sunshine," "Maggie Miller," "Dora Deane," "Cousin Maude," "English Orphans," "Homestead on the Hillside," "Meadow Brook; or, Sir Lac," "Dunallen; or, the Youthful Error," and numerous other works of rare merit, and almost unbounded popularity. Had she never written aught but the opening chapters, they would stamp her as one of the very best novelists of the age. They are certain that will stand at the head of all that has gone before, from its pen of the fair and gifted authoress, and will take its first rank among the creations of the day.

MARIAN GREY

THE ORDERS FOR THIS STORY

HAVE BEEN

ALMOST OVERWHELMING!

AND THE CRY IS STILL THEY COME!

The publishers have been obliged to greatly extend their facilities for publication, and to put their edition, containing the beginning of the new story, to press several days earlier than usual, in order to be prepared to meet the

UNPRECEDENTED DEMAND.

But they are satisfied that a

STILL FURTHER EXTENSION of their facilities

WILL BE FORCED UPON THEM

BY

THE INCREASED DEMAND that will follow the appearance of the first chapters of

MARIAN GREY.

The excitement everywhere is WITHOUT A PARALLEL in the history of newspaper literature.

GREAT AS HAS BEEN THE SUCCESS of the publishers, they have no hesitation in saying that their engagement of Mrs. HOLMES is the GREATEST SUCCESS OF ALL.

As a story paper and family journal, the stands at the head of all its contemporaries,

NEW YORK WEEKLY

NOW

AND

WITH WILL BE

second to no paper published in the world.

To their host of readers they extend their warmest friendship and congratulations, knowing that they will be extensively gratified with the perusal of

MARIAN GREY;

OR,

THE HEIRESS OF REDSTONE HALL,

WHICH WILL BE

READY ON THURSDAY, OCT. 6th.

Price FOUR CENTS per Copy.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes in Paris and London.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER imparts a delicate soft hue to the skin, and vel-vetizes and beautifies.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS. —Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

Singer's Sewing Machines.
SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUZES REDUCED TO $4.
Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.
Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Edward Everett's
Great Oration on Daniel Webster,
At the Inauguration of the Statue to Mr. Webster, at Boston, Sept. 17, 1859, is published in the PULPIT & ROSTRUM, No. 8.
The Pulpit and Rostrum is an Elegant Pamphlet Serial, giving Phonographic Reports of the best Orations, Sermons, &c. $1 00 for 12 consecutive numbers. Single number mailed for 10 cents.
H. H. LLOYD & CO., Publishers,
348 Broadway, N. Y.

TO THE NERVOUS OF BOTH SEXES.—A Retired Clergyman having been restored to health in a few days, after many years of severe nervous suffering, is willing to assist others by sending (free) a copy of the prescription used. Address Rev. John M. Dagnall, 160 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Odell Vinegar
is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. Rimmel,
Perfumer, London and Paris.

260 HOW TO LIVE CHEAP. 260
In order to effect a great saving in Family Housekeeping, purchase rooms at TEAS, WINES, GROCERIES, and PROVISIONS of all kinds, at the immense establishment of
THOMAS R. AGNEW,
No. 260 Greenwich Street, cor. Murray.
Goods delivered free.

To Inventors. Important Notice.
Just issued, a pamphlet of advice how to procure patents for

NEW INVENTIONS.
Sent free on application to MUNN & Co., Editors Scientific American, No. 37 Park Row, New York.

Boynton's Self-Clearing, Self-Packing, and Ventilating Gas-Tight Furnace has been thoroughly tested in this country for the last five years, and has proved itself to be the MOST DURABLE, ECONOMICAL, and PERFECT FURNACE in market. Call and examine the merits of this Furnace, or send for descriptive circular, with references to those who have them in use.
RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
No. 210 Canal Street, New York.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS. —Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

$100 A MONTH!!
Agents Wanted!
We want Agents in every City and County in the United States and Canada. Two active and worthy men to be made by addressing, with Post-Office stamp,
DAVIS & CO.,
Macon, Georgia,
who will send full particulars.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP and FAMILY SOAP are celebrated for their remedial properties and delightful aromatic fragrance.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED in all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for "LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION," in Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 beautiful Illustrations. This work will be sold exclusively by Agents, to each of whom a liberal contract will be given. Specimen documents offered. Applicants should name the County they wish to canvass. For full particulars address GEO. W. KELLOGT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

NEW BOOKS.
BLAKEMAN & MASON,
310 Broadway, N. Y.,
Have just Published.
REPRESENTATIVE MEN OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By Rev. C. Bellamy, D.D., of Troy. 1 vol. 12mo. Price $1.
WORDS OF JESUS AND FAITHFUL PROMISES. 1 vol. 16mo, muslin. Price 38 cents.
THE LOST AND FOUND; OR, LIFE AMONG THE POOR. By Samuel M. Hallock. 1 vol. 16mo. Price $1.
DR. HAGUE'S QUESTION BOOKS ON MATTHEW, JOHN, and ACTS. 6 vols. Price 15 cents each.
GLOSSARY OF WORDS formerly used in senses different from their present. By L. J. Trench. 12mo. Price 75 cents.
EDGAR ALLAN POE'S POEMS. 32mo and Gold. Price 75 cents.

ALMOST A HEROINE!
TICKNOR & FIELDS
HAVE PUBLISHED FROM EARLY PROOF SHEETS,
ALMOST A HEROINE.
A NOVEL.
By the Author of "Charles Auchester," "Counterparts," &c., &c.
One handsome 16mo volume, cloth. Price $1.
ALSO,
The Logic of Political Economy, and Other Papers.
A NEW VOLUME.
By THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
One volume, 16mo. Price 75 cents.
☞ Copies mailed on receipt of publication price.

Clear the Track.—Gaslighi has arrived with its attendant, the Lock-stitch SEWING MACHINE, which ranked as good as any in the market, and at the low price of $5. Who is not paying more? Agents wanted.
J. C. BROWN, Agent, No. 8 Ann Street.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.
600 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
620 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
251 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER PAINT of NEW JERSEY, Established 1850. For Roofs, Fences, Barns, Tin, Bricks, Canvas, Metals, Paper, &c., dries readily, forming a metallic coat, equal and cheaper than Tin, and Incombustible. Depot, 74 Maiden Lane, New York.
HICKS & BETTS, Agents.

Bank Note Engraving.
AMERICAN
BANK NOTE COMPANY,
MEDALISTS, ENGRAVERS,
NEW YORK.
OFFICES AT
New York, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Montreal, and Chicago.

PIANO FORTES.
PIANO FORTE Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 125 Grand Street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments may be found, exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.
EVERETT HOUSE,
HAWLEY D. CLAPP, Proprietor,
Nearly Opposite Union Square,
NEW YORK.

361 BROADWAY 539
Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

Saponifier. Saponifier. Saponifier.
No Grease, or Public or Private Institution, should be without this economical and ready Soap Maker.
Full directions for making Soft, Hard, and Fancy Soaps from the refuse grease of the kitchen, fat, or tallow, according to the materials used.
Sold by Druggists and Grocers generally. Beware of Counterfeits. The success of this article has induced unprincipled parties to imitate it, who are being fined and punished for infringing our patented rights.
Manufactured and for sale wholesale only by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company,
Office 396 Penn Street, Pittsburgh, Pa.
LEWIS, JAMES & CO, Agents,
Philadelphia.

HARD TIMES NO MORE. — ANY Lady or Gentleman in the United States, possessing $5 to $10, can enter into an easy and respectable business, by which from $5 to $10 per day can be realized (no particulars, without cash stamp).
W. R. AUTON & CO., 41 North SIXTH Street, Philadelphia.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Public and family medicine warranted. Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR SALE.—Agency, 514 Broadway, up stairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.
H. C. LEE, Agt.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES.—To Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 38th edition, over 400 pages, fine cloth, and above 100 Electrotype Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated New York and London Physician and Surgeon, now in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have an interest in, and should have. Sold and mailed to any part of the country, by M. A. TOWNSEND & CO., No. 16 Walker Street, N. Y.

YOUNG MAN, DO YOU WANT EMPLOYMENT that will pay? Sales on Agency for our publications. Address FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.
This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLDS, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION of the LUNGS; while even CONSUMPTION itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.
The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has proven its remedy superior to anything in value and efficacy, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.
To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several worthless ones, see that each bottle has the written signature of "I. BUTTS," as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.
Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.
SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
For Purifying the Blood.
No remedial agent has ever been produced that has proved more uniformly successful in the cure of the various forms of scrofulous disease, since without hope of a perfect and fully tested remedy. Now reduced to health, and ascribe their cure, as in justly due, to the rare medicinal virtues and

Surprising Efficacy of the invaluable preparation.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 98 pages—and from one third to one half more reading matter than any other Magazine.

A Splendid Number.
HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
No. CXIII. CONTENTS. [OCTOBER
DANIEL BOONE.
Illustrated by Eleven Engravings from Origi nal Drawings by Lossing and Waud.
THE WATER OF LI ARRAIN.
A VISIT TO THE GUAGUIBO INDIANS
Illustrated by Twenty Engravings from Original Drawings by Hermann.
AUDUBON'S HYMN IN THE AMERICA FORESTS.
BEHIND THE CLOUD.
THE PICNIC.
COUNTRY LIFE.
THE LOVERS' QUARREL.
THE BLIND PREACHER.
THE TEACHING OF BIRDS.
TWO MEN AND A WOMAN.
THE BANK OF THE MISSISSIPPI,—CE.
TWO BIRDS WITH ONE STONE.
UP THE STORY.
THE ENGLISHMANS. By W. J. THACKERAY. (To be completed in the December Number.)
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
Illustrations.—Ambitious Populaire sorte.—A Republican Court.—Mrs. Potiphar Drawing by the Author.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
Containing Anecdotes and Reminiscences furnished by more than Twenty Contributors.
FLOWERS AND FRUIT PIECES.
With Seven Illustrations Engraved by HARRAN.
FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.
With Two Illustrations from Original Drawings by VOGHT.

The October Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is composed, with the exception of MACAULAY'S "Virginius," entirely of ORIGINAL ARTICLES furnished by American writers.
The Number contains papers from the following Contributors:

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT,
JOHN ESTEN COOKE, ESQ.
GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, ESQ.
MISS JANE M. EUSEE.
ALFRED H. GUERNSEY, ESQ.
MRS. ALICE B. HAVEN.
EDWARD D. INGRAHAM, ESQ.
REV. A. A. LIPSCOMB, D.D.
CHARLES NORDHOFF, ESQ.
FRANK H. NORTON, ESQ.
THOMAS NELSON PAGE, D.D.
REV. S. IRENÆUS PRIME, D.D.
JAMES PARTON, ESQ.
MRS. H. B. STOWE.
J. T. TROWBRIDGE, ESQ.
W. M. THACKERAY, ESQ.
WILLIAM ROSS WALLACE, ESQ.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
HARPER WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together—One Year, $5.
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS FAMILY PUBLICATION.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.
MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW SERIAL entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," Splendidly Illustrated by PHIZ, will be commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed in April 9.
TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Three Months $1 00
One Copy for Six Months 2 00
One Copy for One Year 4 00
One Copy for Two Years 7 00
Five Copies for One Year 16 00
Ten Copies for One Year 30 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 60 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.
☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing to "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names to the Publishers, and the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

WIND, S.W. FRESH.

TOMKINS, who is not grand in the Leg Department, says "It's a very disagreeable day." The Young Ladies, however, for obvious reasons, enjoy it amazingly.

FLORENCE. "Well, I'm sure! you might have found some better place for those nasty Cigars than sticking them all round your hat."

REGINALD. "Aw, aw, really! I flatter myself it's rather a neat ideaw."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Visit not invited.

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company. Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

Visit solicited.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Shirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Waists and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

NOW OPEN.
DUNLAP & CO.'S
Branch Store, under the 5th Avenue Hotel. Children's Hats and Caps in endless variety, imported, and of their own manufacture.
Gentlemen's fall styles just issued.

Out of the Depths.

THE GREAT NEW NOVEL.—The Story of a Woman's Life. "A brave, a remarkable book."—Church of England Review. Price $1 00, mailed post free.
W. A. TOWNSEND & CO.,
No. 46 Walker Street, N. Y.

Hosiery and Men's Furnishing Goods.

A great assortment of best goods at prices generally paid for inferior qualities.
Call, examine, and compare. One price, and money cheerfully refunded in case of dissatisfaction.
A. RANKIN & CO.,
No. 637 Broadway, and No. 96 Bowery.
Established in 1833.

Perfectly Pure CREAM TARTAR AND BI-CARBONATE SODA.

We have the finest brands and best qualities in this line, for the purpose of supplying the most particular CHEMISTS, DRUGGISTS, CONFECTIONERS, and CHOICE FAMILY STORES with an article perfectly pure and unadulterated. Get our name on the papers and boxes! The CREAM TARTAR is prepared under our own supervision! We sell these goods in any desired package suitable for any trade.
THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
108 and 110 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years!

Farrel, Herring & Co.'s
(Herring's Patent)
Champion Fire and Burglar Proof Safes,
629 CHESTNUT STREET (Jayne's Hall)
PHILADELPHIA,
Sideboard and Parlor Safes for Dwelling Houses, &c.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars sent free Agents wanted. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

Wheeler & Wilson's
Sewing Machines,
With Important Improvements.
THE GREAT ECONOMIZER OF TIME AND PRESERVER OF HEALTH.
Office No. 505 Broadway, N. Y.

It is found by accurate experiment that the stitching of a shirt requiring by hand 15 hours and 20 minutes, can be done by this machine in 1 hour and 5 minutes. Other work is done with equal facility.
The Lock-stitch made by this machine is the only stitch that can not be ravelled, and that presents the same appearance upon each side of the seam. It is made with two threads, one upon each side of the fabric, and interlocked in the centre of it.

GOOD NEWS.

[From the Christian Advocate and Journal.]

A reduction in the prices of Sewing Machines is announced in our advertising columns. Their utility is established beyond question, and at the present prices we see no reason why they should not be found, as they ought to be, in every household. Several varieties are manufactured, adapted to various purposes. So far as public opinion has been formed and uttered, the preference is emphatically accorded to the Wheeler and Wilson Machine for family use, and for manufacturers in the same range of purpose and material. During the past year the trials were numerous, and to the patient investigator the superiority of the Wheeler and Wilson in every case has Wheeler and Wilson Machines won the highest premium. We may instance the State Fairs of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Illinois, Wisconsin, Virginia, Michigan, Indiana, Mississippi, Missouri, and California, and the Fairs in Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Baltimore, Richmond, and San Francisco. At the Fair of the St. Louis Mechanical Association, the Examining Committee was composed of twenty-five ladies of the highest social standing, who, without a dissenting voice, awarded for the Wheeler & Wilson Machine the highest and only premium, a silver Pitcher, valued at $75. If these facts do not establish a reputation, we know not what can.

Glass Shades!
Glass Shades made to order!!
Of all sizes, for covering Clocks, Pictures, &c., constantly on hand and made to order.
Depôt, No. 194 William, corner of Ann Street.

32. HEALTH OF 32.
AMERICAN WOMEN.

It has often been a sad reflection that the physiological anatomy of woman renders her liable to suffering and disease, for which a reliable remedy has never been found in the regular medical profession. Every mother of a family, and most females above 16 years of age, fully experience this. Social position, wealth, and cultivated taste offer no exemption to this rule. So universal are these sufferings of women from the age of 15 to 45 years, that every one is interested in obtaining certain relief.
Irregularities, local displacements, general debility, and nervousness seem to be the common lot of women during the largest portion of their life.
The experience of many years, the severe tests of investigation, and the universal success of the use of this Corset in the practice and in the families of physicians, and its general use in the families of clergymen and among the most cultivated and refined in the country, has resulted in stamping the elegant and well known proprietors of the Grafenberg Company as the only reliable remedy known for the universal and distressing diseases of women.
It is prepared by an educated physician of great experience, and it will always be found fully equal to representations concerning it. It is known as The Grafenberg Company MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.
Price $1 50 per bottle; five bottles for $6. It can be safely sent by express. Address JOSHUA P. HUDNUT, M.D., Secretary and Consulting Physician, Grafenberg Company, No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

Drs. J. P. Hudnut may be consulted professionally, or by letter, at his rooms in the Grafenberg Institution, No. 32 Park Row. Office hours, 9 to 1 and 3 to 4.

English Brussels Carpets,
Tbc., 60c. per yd.; Two-ply Ingrain Carpets, 40 to 50c. per yd.; Oilcloth, Rugs, Mats, Matting, Table and Piano Covers, Gold Window Shades, very cheap, at HILL & ANDERSON'S, No. 99 Bowery,
Sign of the large Gold Eagle.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.—Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

☞ Keep it before the People
THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES.
GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA,
ORIGINATOR
OF THE
Gift Book Business,
AND PROPRIETOR OF THE
OLDEST AND LARGEST
GIFT BOOK ESTABLISHMENT
IN THE WORLD
Calls attention to the fact that he has made such arrangements with other publishers and manufacturers, that it gives him pleasure to offer
GREATER INDUCEMENTS
than ever, and such
THAT CAN NOT BE EQUALED
by any other Gift Book House in the world.
ALL BOOKS
are sold at the
PUBLISHERS' PRICES,
AND A SPLENDID GIFT, WORTH FROM
50 CENTS TO $100,
IS GIVEN WITH EACH BOOK.
A selection can be made from the Largest Stock of Books
IN THE COUNTRY.
And by complying with the directions as given in the Catalogue, you will receive your Book
FREE OF EXPENSE
for carriage or mailing, and a guarantee of
NO RISK OR LOSS BY MAIL.
To give an idea of the extent and the honorable method of transacting business, we would state to you that 223 GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES,
AND OVER
200,000 DOLLARS WORTH OF JEWELRY, have been GIVEN AWAY
during the past six months, each article of which has been of the finest quality, and has given satisfaction in every instance.
SEND FOR A CATALOGUE,
which will be sent gratis, and which contains a list of Books in every department of literature.
Comprising:
HISTORY,
BIOGRAPHY,
ADVENTURES,
MECHANICS,
MANUFACTURES,
ARCHITECTURE,
THEOLOGY,
GEOGRAPHY,
NATURAL HISTORY,
ALBUMS, ANNUALS, BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS HYMN BOOKS, SINGING BOOKS, JUVENILE BOOKS, WRITING PAPER, LETTER PAPER, AND ENVELOPES.
ONE TRIAL WILL ASSURE YOU
of the honorable business transactions of
GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA.

AGENTS WANTED,
Who can, with George G. Evans' Catalogue, obtain more subscribers than by any other, as the Books at Gifts enumerated are superior to those of any other house. Any one, either male or female, who desires to engage
IN AN HONORABLE
AND PROFITABLE EMPLOYMENT,
and one that requires but little time, is requested to address G. G. Evans, and they will receive every information relative to the business.
DO NOT FAIL TO ADDRESS
GEORGE G. EVANS,
ORIGINATOR OF THE
GIFT BOOK BUSINESS,
No. 439 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 146.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Our Serials and our Circulation.

FOR several months past we have printed from EIGHTY to NINETY-THREE THOUSAND COPIES per week of HARPER'S WEEKLY, more than DOUBLE that of any other Illustrated paper in the country.

WE conclude in this number the admirable serial tale, entitled "A GOOD fight," by CHARLES READE, author of "Love me Little, Love me Long;" with Illustrations by C. KEENE. This exquisite Story has been printed from early proof-sheets PURCHASED exclusively by us from the Author.

In reply to several inquiries, we beg to say that Mr. DICKENS'S new serial, "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY on May 7, and Mr. CURTIS'S delicious Story of American Society, entitled "TRUMPS," on April 9. We can send the back numbers from those dates, or from the beginning of the year, to any person who remits the money.

FOR terms, etc., see advertisement on the 15th page of this paper.

Sketches of the People who oppose our Sunday Laws.

No. II.

SUNDAY EVENING IN A BEER GARDEN.

ALONG the sidewalks of the Bowery move multitudes of idlers. The crowd is oppressive, for it is Sunday night; and Germany, knowing no home delights, pours itself forth in social revelry. Mingle for a moment with the throng, and you can not easily extricate yourself. You are drawn irresistibly with its slow but unceasing current. Attempt to disentangle yourself, you are grievously jolted and jammed. Provoked to wrath, you plunge violently forward, and are stranded on a cellar door, or wrecked among the cobble-stones. Notwithstanding a sense of injury, you take, perhaps, a cheerful view of things, and endeavor to yield graciously to the inevitable vicissitudes of a Sunday evening ramble in the Bowery.

From shop windows partially illuminated a feeble light is cast around. As the throng passes you see that the German element predominates. The faces are much the same, heavy and stolid. The lethargic spirit of lager beer seems to have settled upon them. You are convinced that the only liveliness they know is that of hops. The dull, regular murmur of voices is seldom broken, except when feminine shrillness indicates the crushing of a crinoline, or bewails the fracture of a bonnet. Beyond these there are few tokens of animation.

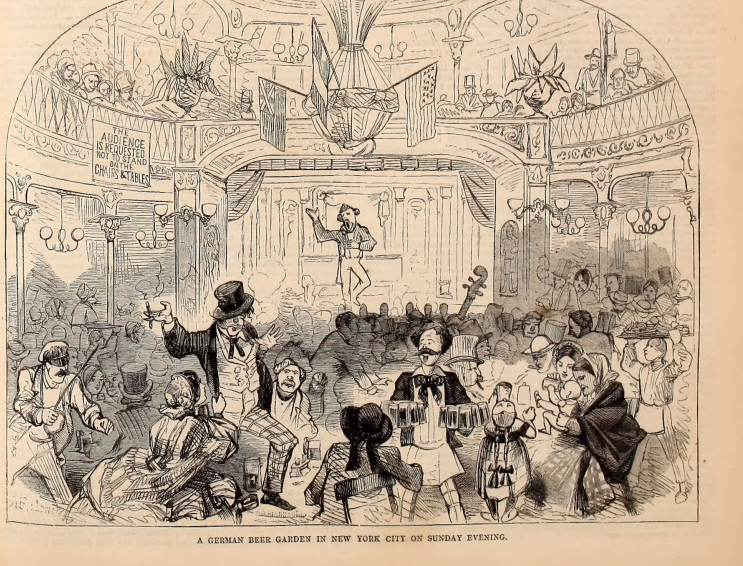
Toward 8 o'clock the flood reaches its height, and begins to drain off into the reservoirs on every side. These are the Beer Gardens—some large, some small, some rich, some rude, but all abundantly provided with the sweet restoring fluid, and with numberless appliances for mental relaxation and the free circulation of current coin.

You join the crowd again, and are straightway borne through a spacious door-way into a well-lighted passage, upon the walls of which you read the old announcement—"Positively no liquors sold here on Sunday," which strikes you as laying it on with a thickness you would hardly have expected. A little further on you are admonished that this is the "Volk's Garten," and that you are to pay twelve cents for the double privilege of entrance and an optional glass of beer after you get in. You receive your ticket and proceed.

Why, this is a show, indeed!

It is a large circular hall, the floor dotted with tables and benches, and all thickly filled—the benches with men, women, and children, the tables with various articles intended to afford internal comfort. A gallery, likewise occupied, is above. The seats are generally so arranged as to command fair view of the little stage erected at the rear, upon which a massive frulein, scantily skirted, is lobbing vigorously to the music of a small orchestra close by. The music, which is good, does not atone for the dancing, which is vaccine. Over the theatre, which is a mere box, is stationed a brazen band, ready melodiously to blow the instant the performance beneath shall terminate. There, it is over; the fraulein squirms a parting salute and retires, while the solemn strains of the Champagne galop echo from above, and cover her retreat.

The "Volk's Garten" has claims to artistic consideration. The walls are decorated with luxurious landscapes, drawn from any number of quarters of the globe. The ceiling is scattered all over with figures of dancing women of every nationality. A rosy Santa Claus, with unbounded stomach, presides jubilantly from the arch of the theatre. There is a dashing balloon suspended by a rope from the centre of the "Garten," which every now and then descends to the ground in all the glory of gold foil and red stripes and waving banners glistening in the gaslight, for no ostensible purpose, after accomplishing which it forthwith rises again. But the artistic taste is more directly cultivated than by displays of gaudy coloring and twisted female forms. There are little dens every where lending off to more distinguished exhibitions. At one of these two small boys in Turkish jackets, and with pasteboard flower-pots on their heads, unlike cherubim continually do cry, "New gentlemen is your chance to see the most wonderful exhibition in the world—only ten cents; step right in, nothing you ever saw like it," and so forth. You are impelled by curiosity, and seize a programme. Mysterious announcements of "optic plastics" appear. Closer examination shows you that it is, after all, a lottery, to receive the prizes of which each purchaser of a ticket will have a chance. Of course there is no resisting this, and your ten cents are unhesitatingly bestowed. You glance at the exhibition, and find a collection of stereoscopes, prominent among which is the Emperor Napoleon from a German point of view, as large as life and twice as blood-thirsty, and with a particular sharpness to the waxed ends of his mustache. After this you will be very likely to turn your attention elsewhere.



A GERMAN BEER GARDEN IN NEW YORK CITY ON SUNDAY EVENING.

Against the wall are little stalls erected in convenient spots. Here one stands a quiet-looking man, who offers you dice, and points to a placard which tells you that you may throw for twenty-five cents, and that every throw wins, but fails to entice you, as you have observed that the winnings are apt to be of a cumbersome character, like huge vases, or camp-stools, or deal tables, which you would find difficulty in carrying about with you for any length of time. In another stall, a complicated machine, similar to a roulette table both in purpose and appearance, presents a difficult with industry and skill. In another, confectionery is sold; in another, fireworks; and anyway, flowers would be, only nobody buys.

Open doors lead to scenes of more active occupation—to the billiard-room, to the bowling-alley, to the shooting-gallery, where two shots for three cents are served out with guns from which the balls are propelled by strong springs instead of powder, and to the oyster-room, whither corpulent Herren may, after much attempting, enter, to try testaceous experiments to the extent of two or three dozen. You fancy you see a sort of twinkle in the eyes of those who eat, as if touched with mirth at the idea of introducing the unsuspecting travellers to a fluid or shivering fruit that in which they have been reared, and you pitiein a year and the peculiar sensations of the oysters themselves upon their immersion in the bubbling beer.

But the crowd swells, individually and collectively, as that your progress is impeded. You soon set from by and by a lucky chance on a vacant seat just left by a stout citizen, who, distended by many draughts, seeks to restore his facilities by locomotion. Here you rest, you are a placed together, quelling the produce of the brewery, while an effort in her arms owns natural nourishment and with a less artificial source. Other children rest their tired little heads upon her shoulder and that of the father. They have been well dressed for the day, but to nine o'clock their capacity is exhausted. Opposite an some ragged fellows, who, with the cause and prolonged study of the wine placards on the walls, call for their favorite schoppes, and give the whole of their minds to them.

All around are men and women, variously attired and variously enjoying themselves. The supply of beer is prodigious. This beverage seems to best satisfy the popular demand. Eccentric tastes there are, however, that rank as high as that of gratification. Here and there tall cylindrical vessels, containing a kind of white wine in small amount of more than a quart, tower above the ordinary glasses like steeples above the city houses-tops. You can perceive that anxious mothers and their children closer when these draw near, inspired by a natural fear that the contents may fall in and get drowned, and be thus unhappily brought to an untimely bier. Then there are whoppies of gratifying wine, which offer considerable attention from a respectable minority. For the children there is no excessive on hand, but cakes are brought into requisition. Cakes and confectionary are made more frequent use of, and are considered not wholly unworthy of parental consideration.

You do not see much evidence of deep delight. There is little excitement of any kind. The most decent approach to it is furnished by a flushed young Teuton at an uprising table, who is earnest in his devotion to a great American air which he has not him. There is vacancy in his face and fullness in his tongue. His English is not only imperfect, it is also mixed. He utters eloquent endearments to his sweet-heart, who does not like to repel them, although she would prefer to have them under other circumstances. Occasionally he leaves off to take alternate pulls at his cigar and his native language, and, with a look of determination in his eye that degree that he puffs out the beer and swallows the smoke. When his attention is for the time way distracted, the young girl urges departure upon him, but he repudiates the proposal with scorn, and orders more beer.

People laugh at him, and he laughs too; and then asks the pretty woman in a stage whisper what the joke is. She seems hurt; and observing that she is a friend, he conceives that the notice has some one has inflicted annoyance upon her, and broaches her to designate the offender, that he may "make" him. She endeavors to remove his suspicion, but he is not to be convinced, and glares around, seeking to argue allusions to his physical capabilities. By way of manifesting vengeance he subsequently turns his thoughts to the stage, where a portly one is singing lustily of the joys of life in love, and asks the young woman which of the two vocalists she prefers. His second examination he says three. When the massive Hercules before mentioned glides into view again, he follows her sprightly movements not only with his eye, but with his whole head. At the next performance of the band, he is taken out of time, and makes futile and very ludicrous attempts to whistle the obligato. Then he frowns, as if to signify that his hand is getting wrong; and, blowing a kiss in the direction of his mouth, pours some of it down the side of his neck—after which he looks fiercer than ever.

Presently his eye rests upon a sign which "requests the audience not to afield on the floor of the tobo." He becomes intent. He ponders. He leans back and scowls at the sign with determination. For a while he doubts; but pretty soon he appears to have come to a decision. He drops his hand upon the table and says, "Why not?" Then he contemplates the perverseness of human nature by determining to defy that sign. He declares that nothing shall prevent him from mounting both chair and table. The young girl's remonstrances avail nothing. He rises, by slow degrees, to his feet. He puts his foot many times through the air, and at length succeeds in planting it infirmly on the bench. He chuckles with a proud consciousness of daring and triumph, and then rolls down among a number of legs. He tempts he is induced to withdraw; and his companion, crying mistakenly, follows him in sorrow, not in anger.

It is past ten o'clock. The band discourses with undiminished energy; the smoke from hundreds of pipes and cigars is spreading; the beer continues its downward flow. Thus eyes, ears, and mouths are filled. The crowd expands each minute. It is a little confining. You find, by inquiring, that the exits are not intended to close before midnight, and you venture to believe that you have not much. You spend some minutes in your resolutions making your way out. The knots of people every where obstruct you. In some places the crush is rather light, but there are others where you eventually bring you forth. You are in the Howling Alley, where the ever-rising tide of humanity you permit yourself to float up town.

On the whole, you are not enamored of the Beer Garden.

THE VILLAGE BARBER.

A mourner, droning is passing by,
As sadly tolls the bell;
The village barber is no more—
Alas! I knew him well.

His heart was always wondrous light,
And gaily was his step;
His like we ne'er shall find, though we
May search from pole to pole.

In him were found those virtues rare
Which in the Christian blend;
He always dines in China square,
Yet often shaved a friend.

He was no Pharisee in thought,
With heart 'gainst pity shut;
There was in his whole worship sought
From choice he never cut.

No cringing sycophant was he,
No flatterer, we may hope;
Yet, strange to say, he knew the art
Of laying on the soap.

He was a true-souled Democrat,
As every action shows;
Anointed oft the pauper's beard,
And polled the nabob's nose.

Of those who mix in politics,
He pitied the poor souls;
Yet hour by hour, election day,
He lingered 'round the polls.

He was a man of peaceful name,
Though not "Quiet Dick;"
He seldom spoke of blood or fame,
Yet often drew his blade.

He never left his native town
Until his sad decease,
Yet strange to say, though dying here,
He passed his life in grease.

His loss the poor old sexton mourns,
Who loves the hearse to toll;
One moment now his hands he wrings,
And then he rings the bell.

But now he's dead, his work is done—
Why should we weep or sigh?
He met the number decently,
He rather liked to dye.

A mournful throng is passing by,
As sadly tolls the bell;
The village barber is no more—
Alas! I knew him well.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1859.

COMMODORE TATTNALL.

MANY leading newspapers seem bent on making Commodore Tattnall, because, in the absence of the one send by an English steamer, he returned the service to young some British boots against the tide to where they were going. Such wonderful conduct is attested by a desire to feed that anti-British prejudice which is indigenous in the ignorant portion of our people, and which is rendered peculiarly noisy in large cities by the brawling of the Irish population. Others seem to have fallen in love with the Chinese because they are the most uncivilized, candid, amiable people, who are being sadly bullied by the British.

We will venture to say that, if the Administration sacrifices Commodore Tattnall, it will inflict a cruel blow on the efficiency of our navy. It is the custom in New Orleans, and doubtless never been nearer to China than Sandy Hook to talk about preserving our neutrality; but all such talk is treason at New Orleans, in China, and distinction between British, Americans, and Frenchmen is hardly perceptible—that the Chinese treat all alike—and that the civilized races were to abandon each other in that part of the world there would be no safety for any of them. Every American merchant and sailor trading to China knows that the British fortress on Hong Kong has been as serviceable to ourselves as to the English. Time and again our people have been saved from massacre by the interference of British sailors and soldiers, who took no thought of any thing save that our people were white men and Christians.

Imbecile and ignorant politicians talk and write of China as though it were France or Spain. The fact is it is another world, and a world radically imbued with hatred of all foreigners. The Chinese make no distinction between citizens of the United States and citizens of Europe. They hate and cheat them all alike. This will be proved by the evidence of every merchant or sailor who has been to China.

For many years we have pursued a policy of concealment with regard to the English. They have bullied them. The consequence is that the English go where they please, and that we follow them wherever they are permitted to go. It is under cover of the British guns that our trade is carried on at Canton and at Foo-Chow. It is the presence of British frigates which protects our ships at Shanghai. It was behind British guns that Mr. Reed ascended the Peiho to conclude the treaty of 1858. When those guns were withdrawn he had to fly. The only result of our policy with China has been that the Chinese grow to fair weather Englishmen, while to the British method they yield not only what the English want, but to us also the crumbs which fall from their table.

Commodore Tattnall—one of the most gallant and popular officers of our navy—has only done what every American officer with any experience in China would have done in the like case. There need be no fear of the position of the United States in China being compromised by what he has done. That position was one of contempt—nothing more. If Mr. Buchanan allows himself to be bullied into censuring him, he will cast a blight on the independence of our naval officers, and will inflict an irreparable injury on American merchants in China.

THE CRICKET MANIA.

We devote a large portion of our space this week to illustrating the game of cricket, and especially the match played on 3d, 4th, and 5th inst. between the "Gentlemen of England" and the "United States Twenty-two." Properly speaking, it was no match at all. No one expected the United States—with the modest exceptions—to make any sort of fight against the trained professionals of England. And it is well that people should see that the latter came here expressly to play with our amateurs, and at the cost of our clubs. Another curious fact about "Twenty-two" is that it includes, in that, with the exception of four gentlemen, all are Englishmen, and have no better claim to represent the United States than any casual foreigner who happens to come here.

Our people, or "that pure and reformed part of them" (to use one of the Episcopal collects, we says) which advocates athletic exercises, excuse the general neglect of cricket in this country by saying that baseball is a more national game. Whether base-ball be a better or a worse game than cricket we do not now propose to inquire; but it is the fact that it is not a national game, the former is or is not as popular among us as is commonly reported in the newspapers.

In New York, it is well known, there are several base-ball clubs which play periodically. The same thing is true of Boston, Philadelphia, and perhaps one or two other cities. There is base-ball so popular that it is a regular and well-understood diversion in most of the counties in many of the States of the Union. But the young men naturally learn base-ball in Massachusetts, in Pennsylvania, in Wisconsin, and in Louisiana. Could we catch the youth of each up in every town of ten thousand inhabitants throughout the country? We leave it to those who are best acquainted with the sporting fraternity than ourselves to answer these queries. For our part, we regret to say that we have very much doubt whether there is a single large game at all in the interior, or in any part of the country except in a few great cities. We do not deny that either base-ball or cricket as an athletic game is so generally practiced by our people as to be fairly called a popular American sport.

In this country the importance of athletic exercises is only just beginning to be understood. Men of thirty can remember the time when they were at school, proficiency in the athletic games of the play-ground was regarded rather as a drawback than a merit. Schoolmasters sneered at fast runners, and held leaping and wrestling in contempt. We received their sneeringness and their favors for little prodigies who had aorists and aleaics at their fingers' ends. To this day many, we believe the bulk, of the school-teachers throughout the country proceed on the Blimber principle, and discourage all athletic sports as interfering unduly with "legitimate studies." As with our boys, so with our men. Bank clerks, young merchants, professional men, and others who have time devoted to manly exercise wasted, and the model clerk him who drudges six days of every week at his desk without an hour of physical labor.

Still, as we write, the world moves, and we are all the time learning. Common sense has made vast strides within the past ten or twenty years. Under the Van Buren Presidency it is doubtful whether any leading family journal would have dared to intimate that it is perhaps as important for boys to learn base-ball as prosody or conic sections. Another twenty years, and no doubt our people will be as devoted to athletic exercises as the English. The result when the American frame will surprise physiologists.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Lieutenant Ives, of the United States Army, who has been detailed on special duty to see to the completion of the Washington Monument, is prosecuting that work with intelligence and vigor. We observe by recent time since to his appeal to Postmasters; he desires every Postmaster in throughout the United States to keep a box in his office in which persons disposed to aid the work may deposit what sum subscription. His calculation is, that if each office throughout the country should collect only fifteen cents a month, the work will be finished as fast as the workmen can proceed. We think the least that Postmasters can do is to comply with the request.

We may add, as many persons have been disgusted with the plain shaft they have seen of the proposed structure, that the Pantheon part of it, or the colonnade round the base, has been abandoned, and that the design now is simply to erect an obelisk, 600 feet high. To this a monument no sound objection could be made.

THE LAST AFRICAN DISCOVERIES.

The opprobrium of geographers is being gradually removed; the Interpolation of Africa proceeds apace. Within the past ten years Livingstone has surveyed and laid down Lake Ngami on our maps, and has traversed the continent from the Zambesi to Loando; Barth has journeyed to Timbuctoo from Tripoli to Lake Tsad; the British expedition has explored what the Niger may be safely ascended in steam vessels; Burton has discovered the sources of the Nile; and other English, which was planned under the command of the intrepid Lieutenant Burton, and which has resulted in the vein of discovery he had opened. Of the French expedition the only intelligence we have received relates to the difficulties which it has been its part at the outset of their labors. Lieutenant Burton's expedition has already yielded substantial fruits.

Captain Speke, Burton's lieutenant, has published an interesting account of the arrival of the party at a point on the lake called Nyanzigia, and which lies between latitude 4° and 8° S. and longitude 29° and 30° E., with most of the long of water extending to the north of or more under the title of Lake Nyassi, or "the Great Water."

The party started from the island of Zanzibar, in S. latitude 6°, and pursued a nearly due-easterly course over the plains and through the mountains to the lake, which lies at about ten degrees from the coast. They were old African travelers, and knew how to hold their own among the natives with whom they came in; but the climate proved so trying, that, by the time they reached the lake, both Burton and Speke were thoroughly worn out, and in need of rest and comfort for them at the end of their journey. The borders of the lake (which reminds one of the great lakes of the North—Superior, 360 miles long, by 30 or 40 broad) swarm with inhabitants of the true negro breed. They are divided into many tribes, and are at war with each other, and each blindly devoted to its chief, invariably a blood-thirsty, covetous rascal. Gain is the only object of the ambitious; and people who dislike being eaten avoid its territory. Burton and Speke, being in ill health, deemed themselves unwholesome eating, and therefore gave the cannibals a wide berth; but the more civilized races of the country tempted them to come to terms, the additional discomfort of being served up for breakfast would have seemed but a slight aggravation of their unfortunate lot. Fortunately, their food, and their very existence, were taxed for the benefit of the chief in whose domains they happened to be.

Notwithstanding all this, and in spite of a complication of diseases, the travelers, both of the intrepid travelers, Captain Speke succeeded in surveying Lake Tanganyika, and ascertaining that it has numerous affluents as well wooded, and producing maize, millet, sweet potatoes, and vegetables in abundance; and the people are the veriest savages, living in miserable huts, using hollow trees for boats, going naked, and generally starving of hunger. The only domestic animal they seem to rear is the common barn-door fowl. Their current coin is American sheeting, which they cut off the cubit, as their ancestors did in the days of Moses. Their food is fish, taken in the lake, monkeys, and what little farm produce they have indulgence to raise. The only excitement they ever feel is due to the periodical fleets which the sea-coast Arabs make in search of slaves. Their women have less maternal affection than many beasts of the field; all will suckle their sons or daughters for the merest trifle. All have heard of the white man, whom they vindictively call the "white man," and all consider him to cheat him as thoroughly as they can. But few Arabs have penetrated to the Tanganyika.

Some may not realize the practical benefit which is to arise from these explorations. At the very least, however, they are valuable contributions to geographical science. And as the country round the great lake is rich and fertile, there is no reason why it should not become, before long, the favorite haunt of the adventurous emigrant. Nature is a generous mother, and will be brought to the last scene of all—kindly going in poverty to Tyburn, and never leaving clothes sitting upon a civic throne. Honesty is the best policy, says the hackneyed saw; and I am the book. Honesty conducts to prosperity and success. Dishonesty goes to the gallows. Insanity goes to Bethlehem or Hanwell. Therefore let all little boys be good little boys, and honest little boys, and they will become rich and great men—for honesty is the best policy.

—Suppose it were not? says some bad little boy.

What would Hogarth and the Hogarthian morals have to say?

The difficulty with the proverb is that it is not always true; and if it were always true, the argument cannot be settled, for there will be a person, who goes to Congress, who gets to be an alderman, or who amasses a million dollars, and whose life is an honest or industrious man; and even if every boy could be sure that honesty would have that result, in what sense is it the best policy? Because, suppose honesty were not the best policy—then what? Why, then, as he were honest he might be rich, he will now be dishonest, and for precisely the same reason—that is to say, because Dishonesty is the best policy.

At the school in "Jane Eyre" the children who wished to be little angels and sing psalms prayed to be translated as fast as they could. But those who did not wish to be angels got only one dough-nut. The result was a pronounced dissatisfaction on the part of the whole school. The argument is still the same: If you pay a man more for honesty than for being bad, the fact of his being good does not prove that he prefers to be good, but that he wants to be better paid.

This is the sense in which the proverb is generally urged. There is another, of course.

If, as F. G., Jr., frequently says, the best policy that which most certainly procures true happiness, then there can be no doubt that honesty is that policy. But the word policy is generally used as opposed to principle. The very force of the argument is, not that it is the best policy, but that it will procure the most palpable profit. It was to understand and illustrate this that the Book was preached and commended to the young now. Let us hope, F. G., that the writer of them see that they are to be honest anyhow, policy or impolicy.

THE PUFF.

A CORRESPONDENT whose signature, "VERY QUEER," is certainly a mask of modesty, asks whether the notices of new publications he reads in the newspapers are written because the writer thinks what he says or because he gets the books for nothing? This is the old story. Whether a lobby or a gentleman has written a work which obtains him or her or his friends appointments, it is to believe it because it is editorial any more than I believe that it is the greatest book of the day? because the publisher says so? or the author says so?

Yet, you generally are to believe it, if you not in a journal of position and character. Few books are noticed now in such papers without being read, and even the grossest puffs imply that. Still, they say the kindest things they can without telling a bad book a good one. Many books have some practice, however, before he can accurately understand what is said. If a work is calling worthy of the world's attention, it is "original, pleasant book," or "interesting," you may always understand that "pretty fair" is meant. If the critic has looked over the pages in the course of his ordinary duties, and has not been warmed or caught and impressed, the character of the impression will appear in his notice. If he has read the book from real interest and likes it, there will be the difference in his notice of it from that of a "pretty fair" book that there is in the greeting of friends and the ceremonious salutation of acquaintances.

But you must not be too hard upon the critic. He should be allowed to inform you that the book's work has been issued, and to give you a flying opinion, not a deliberate judgment, upon it. He may often feel that what he does not particularly like another reader may; and he, therefore, will not prejudice that other. For even critics are not altogether savage, gentle "Very Green"! There are moments when they are not crushing the heads of literary hope, and trampling out the kindling flame of literary ambition.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—M. A. Not if you can try. Never ask a stranger whether you may call upon him. His modesty may certainly not. If you are in such doubt as to ask.

—A. O. Are you sure the quotation "Go among the wind to the storm lamb" is in Sterne's Sentimental Journey? It is a misnomer. Every passage is published with him. It also occurs. "Dies meaux le vent a la brebis tendre." And George Herbert, the Church of England poet (1593-1632), has the line "Like the sheep shorn sheep God gives tempered by measure."

—CURE. The quotation is from Burke's speech at Bristol upon declining the poll in 1780. "The worthy gentleman, who has been pleased to set me up at the moment of the election, and in the middle of the contest, while his influence was at its zenith and the favor of the cure, has feelingly told us what shadows we are, what shadows we pursue."

THE RECENT PRIZE FIGHT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On Thursday, the 6th of October, the progress of our civilization was bravely illustrated by one of those exhibitions which we call for convenience a Prize Fight. An event so hideous and revolting in all its relations to the moral sentiment of every benevolent citizen, here is that to be gained by a glance at its actual characteristics which the ordinary narrative report can not afford. Most merely aiming to satisfy the coarse tastes of the class who took upon the prize fighter as the hitliest embodiment of public glory, the reporter is content to slur neither from a technical pugilistic point of view, or, still generally, in the interest of common brutality. They fail to set forward the truly horrible features of such displays, a tolerably faithful picture of which would be a powerful aid to more and more effective indignation against participators therein than anything else. Let the reporter, therefore, take to describe, as accurately as may be briefly done, the most recent of these offenses against law and humanity.

The fight was between Edwin Enoch Price, of Boston, and James Ryan, of Troy, for the championship of splendid physical powers and good personal appearance. It occurred at Point Alden, a secluded spot on the Canada shore of Lake Erie, fifteen miles from the city of Buffalo. The preparations were of course made with great secrecy, in consequence of a reasonable apprehension that the authorities, in obedience to a law recently enacted to cover such cases, would do what was necessary to seize upon all concerned, and to overthrow, if possible, the whole arrangement. The fact that care of artful managers every thing proceeded undisturbed, and on the morning of Thursday the appointed persons were allowed with but very little vicious crowd which gathers in regular force on such occasions, to take the steamer which should have contributed their share. For a day New York was relieved of much of its overflow of "fancy" acquaintance.

The Ring was planted in the centre of a shelter, or grove, the ground covered with leaves and especially made to blossom thickly with anxious gazers. About the ring itself swarmed hundreds of convicts, mingled with the ordinary spectators, with excitement. It was not a tranquilizing scene. Still no fear that there would be any such sight as with the record of some violent crime. Not an eye but glistened with evil impulses, betraying the depravity which was present. The particular murderers there were two, each bemused in by his band of fond admirers. Of these, distinguished as one of them stalwart Morrissey, showing in every attitude and gesture the burly ferocity of his nature. His wife, beside him, trained to his father's vocation, and already in his youth a "champion," watched all the movements of the fight with a fearless glaring lights a multitude flickered around. Sympathetic lamentations were heard for Sam Collyer, the cook, but for unkind detention at Sing Sing, would have been welcomed here in the arms of his associates, as if, indeed, a stronger infusion of turpitude were needed in that crowd.

Early in the afternoon the ring was in sight as the steamer from the long bushes the spruce which had hitherto been without measure. The seconds bustle industriously to and fro, the spectators, who are strangers to one another, and have never met before, are placed in chairs, the ring is cleared, extremely fine lines are drawn over them, and are wrapped in blankets and coats and furs, lest an intensive gust of wind should blow them away. At first sight of one another, however, they quickly advance, and, with cordial smiles, shake forward to the centre of wishing the other a pleasant way through the little troubles about to ensue. Price appears accompanied by Tom Hyer and Kelly, on the contrary, is given to manifestations of confidence, and taken about the shoulders by Ryan. Before Ryan offered dollars that I win this fight" "I will take seven hundred to one that he never knocks me down!" At this the crowd shouts lustily, and Kelly is moved to acknowledge its homage gracefully.

It is now Price's turn. He steps up, and, assuming modesty, waves his hand deprecatingly toward those who cheer him on. He lets a smaller amount, deposits his money, and then the stripping begins.

They are in a small inclosure, twenty-four feet square, around which stout ropes are stretched. The fighters sit in opposite corners, while their seconds kneel before them, busily engaged with their clothes, and fasten upon their feet gaiters with spiked soles, and bind them in a severe footfold. Meanwhile the betting progresses furiously. Morrissey, who rents his hopes on Kelly, offers three odds in his favor. The youngest of the two murderers upon the ground displays heaps of banknotes, and declares that he, too, burns to prove his trust in Kelly, on whose, indeed, at this time, the great majority of all present appears to place reliance, while the odds are lifted up in Price's cause. The Boscia Boy, like a good-humored Newfoundland dog, and bundles drollories with Price, one of whose seconds he is.

At two o'clock it is announced that the men are ready for battle. They rise to their places. What superb forms! What majestic strength! From the waist upward they are like Greek statues. Their shines white and pure as a woman's. They show little flesh, except upon the chest, where it stands out full and round as the noblest marble ever represent. Their muscular development in every part is prodigious. Bunches upon their arms suggest or like great masses of jelly. Their legs are covered with tight-fitting drawers and stockings, which only reveal the force that also lies beneath them. Around their waists their respective colors are fastened—bodyguard of handkerchiefs. Kelly, moreover, is daintily garnered with white ribbon, and at this moment appears superior to Price, who exhibits less amusement of swelling muscle, though really amply enough endowed in this respect. To this condition men now have been brought by months of most rigorous and severe training. To rise, by abstinence from all exciting or luxurious entertainers, and by a severe course of practical exercises, to the greatest height of physical supremacy has been to these gentlemen the crowning effort. And to what end? That one shall fall before the other, bruised, bleeding, maimed, senseless, perhaps mortally, while the conquer, scarcely less injured, receive a few hundred dollars and the admiration of the most abandoned wretches on the face of the earth.

At two o'clock, then, they walk straight to one another, look defiantly, scowling, and seemingly to beckon playfully with their arms. Kelly clenches his fists tightly, and, with his head bent low, springs forward, directs a blow at Price's left side. In an instant it is stopped, and a return blow falls, with a terrible fall, heavy upon Kelly's face. In a few seconds you can follow their movements the men twine themselves together, their arms locked around one another, and writhe and struggle desperately. The next thing, Kelly is lifted from his feet and flung headlong, and Price, with his knee, presses his breast. The seconds rush in, lift their men in their arms, and carry them to their corners. Kelly is torn from Kelly's cheek, and blood runs down his face. During the half-minute of rest Kelly is always the more active to meet the time with sponge and cloth, the red stains which flow from cheek and mouth, and drop in great gouts upon the floor. Price is untouched, and needs but little care.

At the call they march forward again, Kelly less prodigal of display, and Price more ready to attack. Blows fall but upon neck and face. Kelly, as he receives out, stops short, sharp cries; Price is always silent. With less caution this time they close together, and struggle with each other, each other down. Price again conquers, and Kelly falls beneath him. Again they are removed to their corners. But the enmity is evidently with Price. You can almost see the swellings burst out as his hand lovers from the face after any of Kelly's blows. Very soon Kelly is incapable of controlling his sufferings; he preserves a show of courage, but his cries are more and more wide unsteadily. In every round he is knocked down or thrown about. He comes from the ring-side to fall again in the frightful spectacle. Parts of his cheeks are torn in shreds, one eye is quite closed, and the blood is forced from the natural shape. The raw flesh protrudes above and below from the lids, and purple and black blood scores from the sides, mingling horribly with the discoloration which the skin has assumed. Like a sledge-hammer each of Price's blows falls upon the eyes, and Kelly is again prostrate. In the next round he is overthrown in less than five seconds. He cannot force himself to fall again in this round. In the midst of it all he chuckles and jokes, with a ferocious delight in Price. The quiet, sullen instinct of pluck, for he surely can feel no merriment now. The end must be near. In the intervals between the rounds his seconds wash him in blankets, moisten his lips with lemon, and exhaust all their resources in attempts to revive him. He is now so enfeebled that his antagonist clutches him around the throat and, unresisting, drags him a little distance over the ground, and then falls a dead weight upon him. Once more, and only once, Kelly rests up, and, with a terrible self cruel spirit blood, and presses his hand to his side, sorely distressed. His rib is broken, and would readily to the touch. Price aims his blow; and as Kelly receives it, it seems to enter his very heart. The contest is over. A hat is tossed aloft in token of submission, and an infernal chorus of exultation salutes the victor.

He marches composedly away, with no trace of injury upon him, to the little cottage where he has been quartered. He is asked whether he is weak, and laughs hoarsely in derision. He proclaims his readiness to fight, at the moment and on the spot, a certain man against whom he bears a grudge. Receiving no response, he passes on in triumph.

His victim is carried as tenderly as the case admits to his cottage. He groans with pain. Blood and cries of anguish issue together from his mouth. Physicians are summoned. They discover the fractured rib, and apply such remedies as are within their reach. The wounded man gives ceaseless utterance to his agony. His friends, sensitive souls when ridicule threatens, are shocked at his want of manliness. "Stop, Kelly, stop!" says one, "they'll be laughing at you, now." "Oh my God! what can I do," cries the sufferer. "Die, man, if you can't stand," says another. "Can't you see this bullish howling." And then the crushed and broken-hearted man is left unattended.

Of the scenes of riotous revelry that follow, of the transfer of the thousands of dollars that takes place, of the vicious and fatal attempt of the Buffalo police to apprehend the participators, of the stampede in multitudinous trains, there is no need to speak at detail. To not too difficult to imagine.

This was a prize-fight. Do you find it brutal, barbarous, disgusting, a disgrace to human nature, and a scandal to our nation's name? It is well to know. Why, But, compared with the average of prize fights, this was a simple, weak, and trifling fight. The fraternity of "sportsmen" speak of it only with contempt. They like not to be caused their disgust with tameness. Why, here was one man who came out of the contest unharmed. For shame, Price, to disappoint the lively expectations of your audience. The affair of lleenan and Morrissey, which lasted nearly only twenty-seven minutes, while this was nearly twice as long, was richer a hundred times in all that stirs the soul of a prize-fighter. One compunction is, that there was no rib broken then, as here, and over that consideration the "fancy" gloat with grim delight.

THE ENGLISH CRICKETERS.

WE give on the following page, from an ambrotype by Brady's gallery, the famous English eleven, who have been playing in this city and in Canada. They are, as their portrait shows, fine-looking young men, few of them over thirty. Cricket is their profession. From February to September they play matches in the different cities to where they are engaged; their usual charge is $75 per man for each match. It is very common in all British noblemen to have a party of professional cricketers to his estate when he is residing on it; and many estates have on them cricket grounds. Cricketers have a good time, and enjoy mightily the good fare and fun of shooting over their lord's preserves. To excel at cricket is always an object of ambition to young Englishmen; they are, as may be imagined, very glad to have an opportunity of playing with the crack men of England.

The English cricketers are among us belong to two clubs, each of which consists of twenty-two players. The Captain of one of these clubs is Mr. Parr, and of the other Mr. Wisden. Of the former, first-rate players. Some idea of the admirable manner in which these gentlemen play can be formed from the fact that one of them—Mr. Diver, we believe—made on one occasion 64 runs of 72 yards each in an hour, besides the intervals of playing by taking, by-balls, etc., etc.

We subjoin the following biographical memorandum of the players whose portraits we give, from the English "Guide to Cricketers":

CAPTN. WISDEN, born at Brighton, February 8, 1823. The cricketer whose portrait we have taken the prominent position of one of the best bowlers in England, as well as a batsman and fielder. Much more than this could scarcely be said of him. He is one of the United Eleven. His pace is not of the most formidable, and is occasionally on the spot. He also uses his head effectively for the purpose of deceiving his opponent, and appears to be a great failing in bowlers generally.

LAWRENCE, TARRANT, born at Old Town, Croydon, November 1, 1828. We can not, nor do we wish, to alter our opinion, since the last publication, that this player is the best wicket-keeper England or any other country can boast of. In the most important position he fills in a first match, he frequently will pull a match completely out of the fire, and will often, by his unerring judgment, win a game for a few overs, in which he is generally successful. What else he can do must be regarded as of no account comparison to say, but whenever called upon to perform he is generally at his best, and will stop all the fast bowling he can, and has the excellent quality, unfortunately to a cricketer, of being remarkably good-tempered, whatever may occur.

CREES, JAMES, born at Godalming, March 26, 1830. A very good batsman, but, and will probably loose bowling secret.

FRYDENBERG, HEATHFIELD HARMAN, born at Ecbert, May 2, 1832. A splendid bat, being a severe puncher, as well as a good hitter. He is the best batsman in England, being very difficult to control against, in consequence of the variety of his strokes. Good change bowler. His qualities as a wicket-keeper, too, are equal to the most first rate in England, and have often proved very useful in that department.

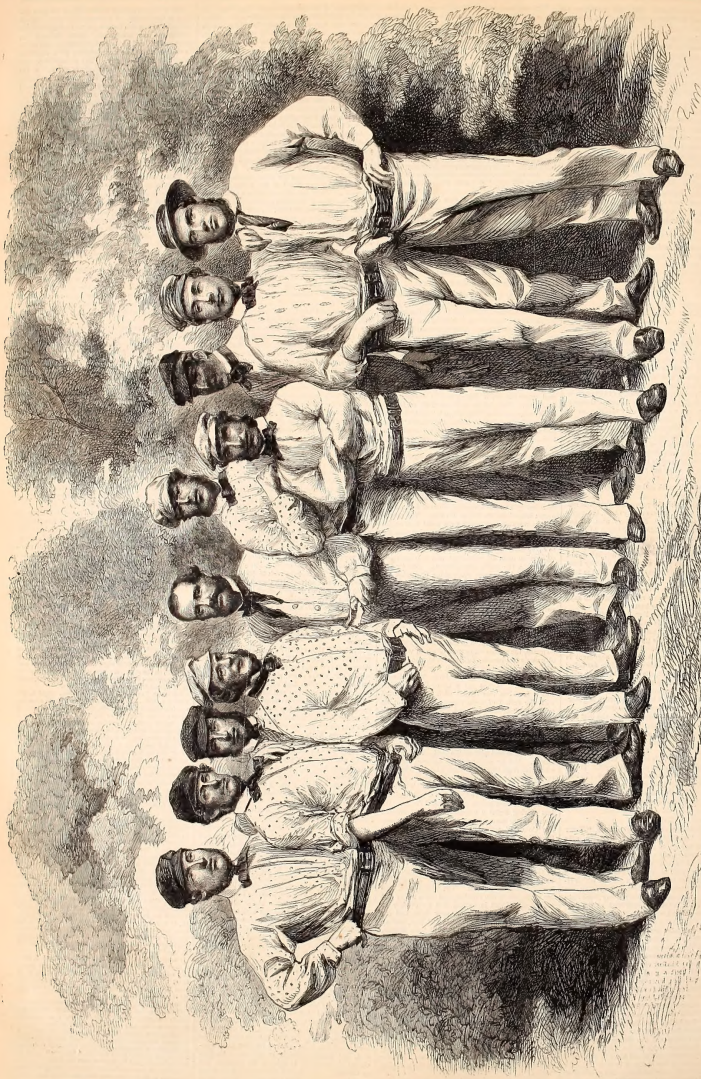
WENMAN, JOHN, born at Hastings, September 5, 1852. First-rate bowler and bat, and therefore one of the best players in the Eleven. Splendid fielder.

PARR, GEORGE, born at Radcliffe-on-Trent, May 23, 1826. Notwithstanding the number of years he has been in the Eleven, since, under the patronage of the H. C. C. crowned last season, under the name of the H. C. C., he is still at the "top of the tree" as a bat. He is a most reliable player in any eleven, and he still stand in the most first-class batsmen of the day. He is also a very strong fielder.

DIVER, EDWARD, born at Cambridge, July 6, 1834. A first-class bat, having a very strong defence. He is also said to be excelled as a long field, and is a very good round-arm short and underhand (slow) bowler.

CLARKSON, RICHARD, born November 18, 1831. A first-rate bat—one of the best "cutts" that have made an appearance for some years; his defense is masterly, and he will be sure to be at "top of the tree." A good change-bowler, and "stinger" well in the field.

HILLYARD, THOMAS, born at Charlotte, March 21, 1825. Promises to be first-class as a bat, also a very good bowler and excellent field.



THE ENGLISH CHARACTERS—THE QUEENS OF ALL ENGLAND.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LX.

RENDEZVOUS.

During the week before his twenty-first birthday Gabriel Bennet was called into Lawrence Nowe's private room.

"Gabriel, you are twenty-one next week."

"I am, Sir."

"You are also an industrious, faithful, and intelligent merchant."

Gabriel bowed. He was a boy still, and he blushed.

"Also honest," said Lawrence Newt, with a smile glimmering in his eye.

"Honesty is the best policy, Sir," replied Gabriel, with an answering ghost of a smile.

"Not always, Sir; and if it were, what then? A man who is honest because it is the best policy is not an honest man. If dishonesty seemed to him the best policy he would be dishonest."

Gabriel laughed.

"I want you and your sister and your father and mother to dine with me on your birthday. I shall ask Miss Amy Waring and Miss Hope Wayne and Mr. Arthur Merlin."

Gabriel said how glad he should be; and when he went home he announced the invitation. Dining out was an event in the Bennet family, and it was discussed around the evening lamp.

Ellen Bennet, like May Newt, was a child no longer—hardly yet a woman, or only a very young one. Rosy cheeks and clustering hair and blue eyes showed only that it was May—June almost, perhaps—instead of gusty March or gleaming April.

UNDER THE PORTRAIT.

"Ellen," said Gabriel, in a low voice—while his mother, who was busily sewing, conversed in a murmuring undertone with her husband, who sat upon the sofa, slowly swinging his slippered foot—"Ellen, he didn't say that he should ask Edward."

Ellen's cheeks answered—not her lips, nor her eyes, which were bent upon a purse she was netting.

"But I think he will," added Gabriel. "I think I have mistaken Lawrence Newt if he does not."

"He is usually very thoughtful," whispered Ellen, as she netted busily.

"Ellen, how handsome Edward is!" said Gabriel, with enthusiasm.

The young woman said nothing.

"And how good!" added Gabriel.

"He is," she answered, extremely audibly. Then she said she had left something up stairs. How many things are discovered by young women, under curious circumstances, to have been left up stairs! Ellen rose and left the room.

"I was saying to your father, Gabriel," said his mother, raising her voice, and still sewing, "that Edward comes here a great deal."

"Yes, mother; and I am glad of it. He has very few friends in the city."

"He looks like a Spaniard," said Mr. Bennet, slowly, dwelling upon every word. "How rich that lustrous tropical complexion is! Its duskiness is mysterious. The young man's eyes are like summer moonlight."

Mr. Bennet's own eyes half closed as he spoke, as if he were dreaming of gorgeous summer nights and the murmur of distant music.

Gabriel and his mother were instinctively silent. The click of her needle was the only sound.

"Oh yes, yes—that is—I mean, my dear, he does come here very often. I do go off on such foolish fancies!"

"He comes very often when you are not at home, Gabriel," said Mrs. Bennet, upon a kind glance at her husband, and still sewing.

"Yes, mother."

"Then it isn't only to see you?"

"No, mother."

"And often when your father and I return from an evening stroll in the streets we find him here."

"Yes, mother."

"It isn't to see us altogether, then?"

"No, mother."

Mrs. Bennet turned her work, and in so doing glanced for a moment at her son. His eyes were upon her face, but he seemed to have said all he had to say.

"I always feel," said Mr. Bennet, in a tone and with an expression as if he were looking at something very far away, "as if King Arthur must have lived in the tropics. There is that sort of weird, warm atmosphere in the romance. Where is Ellen? She has read some more in this little edition of the old story?"

He laid his hand, as he spoke, upon a small copy of old Malory's Romance of Arthur. It was a kind of reading of which he was especially fond, and to which the rest were always willing and glad to listen.

"Call Ellen," said he to Gabriel; "and now then for King Arthur!"

As he spoke the door-bell rung. The next moment a young man, apparently of Gabriel's age, entered the room. His large melancholy black eyes, the massive black curls upon his head, his transparent olive complexion, a natural elegance of form and of movement—all corresponded with what Mr. Bennet had been saying. It was evidently Edward.

"Good-evening, Little Maid-ie" cried Gabriel, gayly, as he rose and put out his hand.

"Good-evening, Little Maclacs," returned he answered, in a soft, ringing voice; then turned and spoke to Mr. and Mrs. Bennet.

"Gabriel doesn't forget old schooldays," said the newcomer to Mrs. Bennet.

"No, he has often told us of his friendship with Little Maclacs," returned the lady, calmly, as she resumed her work.

"And how little I thought I was to see him when I came to Mr. Nowe's story," said the young man.

"Where did you first know Mr. Lawrence Newt?" asked Mrs. Bennet.

"I don't remember when I didn't know him, Madam," replied Edward.

"Happy fellow!" said Gabriel.

Meanwhile Miss Ellen had evidently found the mysterious something which she had left up stairs; for she entered the room, and bowed very calmly upon seeing Edward, and seating herself upon the side of the table farthest from him, was presently industriously netting. As for Edward, he had snapped his fingers, passionate eyes, who seemed to bear a family likeness to Mrs. Bennet.

The more closely he looked at the handsome youth and the lovely girl the more curious Mr. Bennet's eyes became. He watched the two with such intentness that his wife several times looked up at him surprised when she received no answer to her remarks. Evidently something had impressed Mr. Bennet exceedingly.

His wife bent her head a little nearer to his. "My dear, did you never see a pair of lovers before?"

He turned his dreaming eyes at that, smiled, and pressed his lips silently to the face which was so near his own that if it had really been there for the express purpose of being caressed it could hardly have been nearer.

Then slipping his arm around her waist, Mr. Bennet drew his wife toward him and pointed with his head, but so imperceptibly that only she perceived it, toward the young people, as if he saw something more than a pair of lovers. The fond woman's eyes followed her husband's. Gradually her became as intently fixed as his. They seemed to be curiously comparing the face of the young man who sat at their daughter's side with the face of the portrait that hung above her head. Mrs. Bennet grew perceptibly paler as she looked. The unconscious Edward and Ellen murmured softly together. She did not look at him, but she felt the light of his great eyes falling upon her, and she was not unhappy.

"My dear," began Mr. Bennet in a low tone, still studying the face and the portrait.

"Hush!" said his wife, softly, laying her head upon his shoulder; "I see it all, I am sure of it."

Gabriel turned at this moment from his Encyclopedia. He looked intently for some time at the group by the table, as if studying all their complex, and then said, gravely, in a loud, clear voice, to Miss Ellen dropped a stitch, Edward stopped whispering, and Mr. and Mrs. Bennet sat erect.

"Lawrence Newt knew how it was. It says distinctly, 'This plant is supposed to be a native of India; but it has long been naturalized and extensively cultivated elsewhere, particularly in Russia, where it forms an article of primary importance.'"

"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE."

CHAPTER LXI.

DINING WITH LAWRENCE NEWT.

There was one other person of whose presence at the dinner Gabriel had no doubt, although Lawrence Newt had not mentioned the name. And if that person were at the table the blue eyes would certainly not be at the upper window in Boniface Newt's house: the blue eyes which Gabriel had, somehow, learned were to be there; the blue eyes which were, somehow, always there when the quick springing footsteps came down the street; the blue eyes under whose glances those footsteps lingered, and which glistened with happy light as they looked at the pills those steps announced.

Sometimes the footsteps stopped at the front door longer than usual: there was a fluttering down the stairs from the upper story—there were a few words, very simple, ordinary words —sometimes even a few flowers were given without the customary message of Mr. Lawrence Newt's compliments to his dear May—a message which was always carefully delivered in full—a few flowers given, in fact, without any message or compliment at all, but which seemed to be received and cherished quite as fondly and expectedly as if they had been accompanied with the most elegant flattery. The interviews were very short. The messenger must return immediately. He had asked leave to come. After a time the bold messenger sometimes asked if he might bring little memento of the pretty flowers. He brought, were it only a thorn from the poorest rose.

Sometimes his modesty was always rewarded, and instead of the thorn he bore away a rose-bud, and if there were twin roses, he got one of them—although he did not know that—and always bore away forward sweetening the most secret storehouse of his treasures, its fellow was sweetening another treasury into which these blue eyes fondly and often gazed.

There was no knowing. Lawrence Newt with the inscrutable eyes that looked out upon the ships and the river and saw so many things that many people did not suspect, may also have seen a pearl lying in the midst of turbid waters, and may have sent a diver down upon it to the chance of his finding it.

There were reasons enough why Gabriel Bennet did not care to visit the family of Boniface Newt. He had no very kindly remembrances of Abel. While Fanny was at home she was much older than he; and now that Mr. and Mrs. Newt with Miss May composed the family, he did not call except in the mornings when he brought messages from Lawrence Newt. But sometimes, if he saw Miss Newt and delivered the message in person, there was something said which resulted in a meeting in some pleasant street, and a walk together—and talk—and silence—and thought.

Gabriel Bennet was very sure that May Newt would be at the dinner, and so she was. It was at Delmonico's; and a carriage arrived at the Bennets' just in time to convey them. Another came to Mr. Boniface Newt's, to whom brother Lawrence explained that he had invited his daughter to dinner, and that he should send a young friend, in fact, his confidential clerk, to accompany Miss Newt. Brother Boniface, who looked as if he were the eternally relentless enemy of all young friends, had nevertheless the profoundest confidence in brother Lawrence, and made no objection. And the hero of the day conducted Miss May Newt to the banquet.

Ten Warings came, and Hope Wayne with them. Arthur Merlin was at the door when they arrived, and handed them out of the carriage. Mrs. Bennet sat at the right of Lawrence Newt, Hope Wayne not far away. Amy Waring was quite at the other end of the table.

It was a very pleasant dinner. Every body chatted cheerfully.

"But some of us are not so fond of birthdays, Mrs. Bennet," said Lawrence Newt, smiling, to Gabriel's mother.

"I am not afraid of them," she returned, gayly.

"You have no reason, my dear," said her husband, bowing.

The hero of the day was so engaged in conversation with Miss May Newt that he said very little to his neighbor upon the other side, who was no other than Hope Wayne. She had been watching very curiously a young man with black curls and eyes, who seemed to have words only for his neighbor, Miss Ellen Bennet. She presently turned and asked Gabriel if she had never seen him before. "I have, surely, some glimmering remembrance of that face," she said, studying it closely.

THE JUNIOR PARTNER ROSE AND SAID:

Her question recalled a day which was strangely remote and unreal in Gabriel's memory. He even half blushed as if Miss Wayne had reminded him of some early treason to a homage which he felt in the very bottom of his heart for his blue-eyed neighbor. But the calm, unsuspicious sweetness of Hope Wayne's face consoled him. He looked at her for a moment without speaking. It was really but a moment, yet, as he looked, he lay in a heavily-oppressive dream—he heard the beating of the sea upon the shore—he saw the sage Nestor, the ghastly Mentor putting aside the curtain—for a moment he was once more the little school-boy, bruised and ill at Pinewood; but this—no longer a girl's face —no longer anxious, but sweet, serene, and tender—as the little school-boy had seen it in the old and worshiped in the old village church—the face whose every sympathy, but not its love, had filled his heart with such exquisite pain?

"That young man, Miss Wayne, is Edward Wynne," he said, in reply to the question.

It did not seem to resolve her perplexity.

"I don't recall the name," she answered. "I think he must remind me of some one I have known."

"He is as black as Abel Nwe," said Gabriel, looking with his clear eyes at Hope Wayne.

"But much handsomer than Mr. Nevi now is," she answered, with perfect unconcern. "His eyes are softer; and, in fact," she said, smiling playfully, "I am not altogether sure what a willing listener his neighbor is. I wish I could recall it. But I don't think that he resembles Mr. Nevi at all except in complexion."

Arthur Merlin heard every word, and watched every movement. Still marked every expression of Hope Wayne's, at whose other hand he sat, during this little remark. Gabriel said, in reply to it,

"The truth is, Miss Wayne, you have seen him before. For the first time you ever saw him he was with me."

The clear eyes of the young man were turned full upon her again.

"Oh yes, I remember now!" she answered. "He was present that time I called with Mrs. Abel Nevi. It seems long ago, does it not?"

However far away it may have seemed, it was apparently a remembrance that roused no especial emotion in Miss Hope Wayne's heart. Having established that, she relaxed her attention to Gabriel, who had other subjects of conversation with Miss Wayne than his meeting with her brother for the favor of Hope Wayne.

But Hope Wayne, while she listened with her ears to Arthur Merlin, still kept her attention to Lawrence Newt. His simple, unselfish, and therefore unconscious urbanity—so gentle and kindly humor—and the soft, manly earnestness of his face, were not unheeded—how could they be?—by her. Even the day the ship was cast she had been a faithful friend and counselor. It was he who explained for her benefit the part he who daily called and gave her a thousand counsels in the details of management, of which every woman who comes into a large property has such constant need. And in all the minor arrangements of business she found in him the same skill and knowledge, combined with a womanly reserve and softness, which had first so strongly attracted her.

Yet his visits as financial counsel, as he called himself, did not please her. They talked of nothing—the pleasure of the meetings of the Round Table. For the group of friends still met. They talked poetry still. They talked of many things, and perhaps thought of but a few. The pleasure to all of them was evident enough; but it seemed more perplexed than formerly. It was sooner still in their intercourse—the warmth should say. But the day was not an hour so in the morning. Somehow there was a mist. Very thin, perhaps—more like—an almost imperceptible veil; still it was there. Until now not portend storm or tempest, perhaps; but it was a cloudy day.

Hope Wayne felt it. Amy Waring felt it. Arthur Merlin felt it. But not one of them could tell whether Lawrence Newt felt it. There was a vague consciousness of something which nearly concerned them all, but not one of them could say precisely what it was—except, possibly, Amy Waring; and except, certainly, Lawrence Newt.

For Aunt Martha's question had drawn from her lips what had been literally an unbreathed suspicion in her mind, until it leaped to life and rushed out from her mouth. Amy Waring saw how beautiful Hope Wayne was, how lovely how lovely in character she was. And she was herself beautiful and lovely: so she said in her mind at once. "Why have I never seen this? Why did I not know that he must of course love her?"

Then, if he reminded herself of the conversation she had held with Lawrence Newt about Arthur Merlin and Hope Wayne, she was only surprised for a moment. She knew that he could not but be honest; and she said quietly in her soul, "He did not know at that time what will surely have the use."

Amy Waring sat in her chamber on the evening of the day Lawrence Newt had said to her, "At least, Miss Amy, at least, we shall be friends." Her long rich brown hair clustered upon her shoulders, and the wonderful gray eyes were fixed upon a handful of withered flowers. They were the blossoms she had laid away at various times—gifts of Lawrence Newt, or consecrated by his touch.

She sat musing for a long time. The womanly brown eyes were soft with a look of aching regret rather than of sharp disappointment. Then she rose—still holding the withered remains—and paced thoughtfully up and down the room. The night hours passed, and still she softly paced, or tranquilly seated herself, without the lighting of a taper, and only now and then a long deep breath rather than a sigh.

At last she took all the flowers—dry, yellow, lustreless—and opened a sheet of white paper. She laid them in it, and the brown womanly eyes looked on them with yearning fondness. She sat motionless, as if she could not prevail upon herself to fold up the paper. She laughed: she sank gradually to her knees—a sinless Magdalen; her brown hair fell about her bending face, and she said, although her lips did not move, "To each, in his degree, the cup is given. Oh, my God, grant me strength to drink, as you believe!"

She rose quietly and folded the paper, with the loving care and lingering delay with which a mother smooths the shroud that wraps her baby. She tied it with some white ribbon, so that it looked not unlike a bridal gift; and pressing her lips for a long and silent kiss, laid it in the old drawer. There it still remained. The paper was as white, the ribbon was as fresh, the flowers as fair, as when they were withered.

Possibly Amy Waring knew the meaning of the vague constraint that impalpably oppressed the pleasant meetings of the Round Table.

CHAPTER LXII.

THE HEALTH OF THE JUNIOR PARTNER.

"I CALL for a bumper!" said Lawrence Newt when the fruits were placed upon the table.

The glasses were filled, and the host glanced around his table. He did not rise, but he said

"Commercial prosperity is uncertain—but it is rare. I do not say that merchants are worse than other people—but I do say that temptations are as great, and that an honest man—man honest every hour and every where—is rare. Whatever of success may have been added to all the rest of us. If he become a lawyer, justice is more secure. If he become a doctor, it is a danger; if a clergyman, the devil trembles; if a shoemaker, we don't wear rotten leather; if a tinker, we get thrifty—as Gabriel can tell you. I have been long in business. I have met many honest merchants—but I will deny that I was long for a merchant to be honest in New York. Will you show me the place where 'tis easy? When we are all doing business beyond the best policy, then we are all ruined, because that is no honesty at all. I have made and spent a million of dollars and lose his manhood? He does when he has won them, and what are the chances that he will win his manhood again in the next world as easily as he has won the dollars in this? I say, then, that honesty is seldom with him. Any firm, therefore, that gets an honest man into it gets an accession of the most available capital in the world. And I intend to celebrate the fact that my firm has been so enriched. I propose to drink the health of Gabriel Bennet, junior partner of the firm of Lawrence Newt & Co."

There was a moment of perfect silence. They every body looked at Gabriel expectantly, before whose eyes there was a mist which he could see nothing. Gabriel himself was entirely surprised. He had had no hint from Lawrence Newt of this—and the former, who had worked faithfully, constantly, and intelligently—honestly, of course—was all Gabriel knew about his position. He had been for some time confidential clerk, so that he was fully cognizant of the state of affairs. And yet, in this moment of delight and astonishment, he had but one feeling, which seemed entirely alien and inadequate to the occasion. It was a feeling of the hope that now he might be a regular visitor at Lawrence Newt's house.

Hope Wayne's eye had hung upon Lawrence Newt, during the little speech he had made, so intently, that Arthur Merlin's movement had been entirely checked. He found himself curiously out of the picture. Until now—and especially after the little conversation between Clare and himself, in which Abel Nevi's name had been mentioned—Arthur had thought that upon the whole, the pleasantest little dinner he had ever known. He was not of the same opinion now.

Edward Wynne and Ellen Bennet shared a certain satisfaction with the dinner, and especially with Lawrence Newt's toast. And when the wine had gone round, and pleasure had ceased, Edward cried out loudly.

"A speech from the junior partner! A speech! a speech!"

There was a general call. Gabriel could not help rising, shaking, and hesitating, and hesitating, and sitting down again, amidst tempestuous cheering, without the slightest coherent idea of what he had said, except that he was very happy, and very glad, and very sure, and very, etc., etc.

But he did not care a song for what he had said, now for the applause that greeted it, when he saw certain blue eyes glistening, and mischievous open certain cheeks and lips, as if they had designed speaking, and had not yet been saying—what was palpably, undeniably, confessedly true—that they were very happy, and very glad, and very sure, and very, etc., etc. Very, indeed!

LITERARY.

THE STUDENT'S HUME, published by Harper & Brothers, in uniform style with "Liddell's Rome," "The Student's Gibbon," and "Smith's Greece," is a most valuable addition not only to the general literature but to the school text-books of the day. With the other-named volumes the American public are already familiar. Some of the best passages of the present volume may be enumerated as follow:

1. It is a very readable and complete history of England, in one small volume, admirably illustrated.

2. It contains all that is necessary to a thorough knowledge of that history from the earliest periods to the present time, including the modern history of the East Indian possessions of England.

3. The portions relating to America have been revised by a distinguished American historian.

4. The style is remarkably attractive, and without changing history into romance. The volume, by its attractive narrative, gives to history all the charm of story, and thus attracts the young reader to historical study.

5. As a school-book, it is the only thorough and complete history extant, and the only one of which we know which can be recommended to the teacher or as certain to engross the mind of the student as he reads it for the first time.

6. For general readers, it gives in one volume, at the moderate price of $1, what can only be found in a dozen volumes, and at a cost of from $10 to $50.

John Esten Cooke, Esq., is one of the most effective writers of fiction in America. When the "Virginia Comedians" was published anonymously we read it with interest, and we now welcome HENRY ST. JOHN, GENTLEMAN, as a similarly attractive volume. The scenes and incidents are in Virginia in the old time. The actors are the frank, hearty, gay, and glorious people of the Old Dominion. The author has a keen eye for the picturesque, and without too much passion. We do not know of any writer who draws his actors on the stage with more life and character.

No book of the season has more justly attracted attention than this, and, as such, we refer to it here briefly. She is unwilling to be beholden to any man for support. She is willing to labor for a bare loaf of sorrowful years, much wandering and pain, physical and mental; and the end, what it must be. She is a woman, and a great humanity, and in confusion of weakness and the need of guidance and help. She is a woman, and a great humanity, and a great deal too much time (for a novel) is given to Beulah's Gemeinschaft (let us use the word—it is much needed just now) with Dr. Rutledge, which justifies our high estimate. It is particularly good in some scenes, and we regret especially to the death-bed of Cornelia Graham as an admirable work of art.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

STATE ELECTIONS.

THE State election in California on the 7th ult. resulted in the success of the entire Union ticket. The Lecompton Democratic candidate for Governor, by a very large majority, defeated the Anti-Lecompton Democrat, Latham, and the Republican candidate, Downey. The opponents, Messrs. Baker and M'Kibben, who headed the ticket and carried the State in the interests of both parties, have the benefit of a slight doubt in their favor. The Democratic majority in the Legislature, which also supported by the Republicans, has a slight chance of doubt. The Democratic majority in the Legislature of Lecompton State ticket is elected by an immense majority. The Union ticket is thus successful over the Democratic.

The Legislature of the Mississippi election show Democratic gains. The Louisiana Vigilance Committee still retains their ascendency.

The Kansas election returns do not, on the question of the Slave Code, change the aspect of the Wyandotte Constitution, passed by the Republican delegates of the Convention is generally conceded.

The Georgia election returns for Governor have not yet but leave no doubt of the re-election of Governor Brown, who has 10,000 majority over Hill. The returns for the Eighth Congressional District the returns indicate the election of Mr. Jackson (Democrat).

SENATOR BRODERICK KILLED IN A DUEL.

THE Hon. David C. Broderick, United States Senator from California, was killed in a duel fought on the 13th inst., by Judge Terry, of the Supreme Court of California. The duel was fought with pistols, at ten paces, at Lake View, about five miles from San Francisco. Mr. Broderick fell. Mr. Broderick, Judge Terry spoke of Mr. Broderick in offensive terms, and the latter, considering himself insulted, met in the presence of Terry, but to his friend, Gen. D. W. Perley, that the expressions of Judge Terry reflected to fight, but intimated his willingness to meet Judge Terry on the field of honor. Gen. Perley, after the conclusion of the late election Judge Terry sent a challenge to Mr. Broderick, which was accepted. The duel took place near San Francisco on the morning of the 13th inst., and resulted as above. Mr. Broderick fell, his antagonist's ball having pierced his lungs.

EXPLORATIONS IN THE ADIRONDACKS.

THE accounts, MESSRS. Lamoutain and Haddock, attached, have been received by Governor Morgan, and forwarded from Watertown, in this State, and after a flight of between three and four hundred miles, accomplished in one hundred and fifty miles north of Ottawa, in the great Canada wilderness. Every day's journey occupied about four days without food or even the means of striking a fire, and for relief by a gentleman who was hunting with Indian guides.

THE ASCENT.

MR. Haddock has published an account of the trip, from which we make the following:

"As we rose into the light fleecy clouds, they looked darkness on all sides, and the sensation of rising and falling the inclosure is raging time; but when we reached the top, the sun was shining brightly above the clouds, and the cold white mosses below us had precisely the same look that a field of snow presents immediately after the sun has risen down upon it from a higher mountain. In six minutes we passed through the clouds, and then we were free to fore. We saw the time after that when his fare boiled very fair to us. In eight minutes after leaving the earth the thermometer showed a fall of 40° Fahrenheit, and at 2,000 feet it had further reduced a good deal, showing that she was ascending with great rapidity. At 8:45 the thermometer stood at 45, and falling very fast. At 9:30 we were at least two miles high; thermometer 34. At this point a suggestion was made just before starting by Judge Clerk, of Florida, was found to be a very good one. He had selected the tallest among the mountains, with the idea that the air would be at great heights, and my father had secured me some. He had brought a small bottle of brandy for each person, and filled both cups with spirits. This made my head feel a good deal as a very large pumpkin may be supposed to feel when it is filled with lager beer. The mere comparison with which doubtless many who read this article will be familiar. At 9:50 we were in the clouds and shrank, an extra pair for Lamoutain being found in Edward Fayel's overcoat; therefore, at 10 o'clock we had kept our knees stiff with cold—they were frozen. Ascending very rapidly. At 9:54 thermometer 29, and falling. Here we could see the curvature of the earth by daylight. I recognized the St. Lawrence, the northern of the Antwerp shoved was seen drifting many north. At six o'clock we thought we were descending rapidly. At 11 o'clock thermometer stood at 20. Ascended twenty pounds of ballast. This shut us up somewhat. At 11:30 thermometer 18. Ascended rapidly. The Atlantic was now full, and presented a most splendid sight. We could see the whole of Lake Champlain, which looked as blue as the sky, and the Hudson River, which looked as blue as the sky, and the Hudson River, which looked as blue as the sky, and the Hudson River

"Discharging gas as rapidly as possible, we came down, the balloon settling between two large trees."

THE TRAMP THROUGH THE WILDERNESS.

They at once decided to try to walk out of the woods. Mr. Haddock thus describes the beginning of the journey:

"We the southeast we started. After traveling about a mile and a half we came to the bank of a small creek, flowing directly to the southeast. At this point we were agreeably surprised to find that some human being had been there before us, for we found here a small canoe, made from the bark of the elm tree, and a long pole, which had contained pork. I eagerly examined the stamp. It read, 'Mess Pork, W. T. Sherman, Memphis.' The question that we were in Canada—for I very well know not the Montreal business of pork now being sent up into the interior of New York State. Was traveled all day Friday by the woods, and encamped on the bank of a small creek to the south of west, crossing it about noon on a floating log, on which we had constructed a kind of 'animal' track, which led up to a deserted timberroad, both sides of which were from 3 feet to 4 feet deep. This road of the lumber-roads might take us to a settlement, but we concluded to continue in a straight course into the wilderness, as we could not cross the creek to the shanty, and stay in it all night. Lamentable experience had taught us that we must keep our bins, and the raft let me into the stream. I sank in all over, and swam out, thought it would not my strength to do so, and on reaching the bank I found myself so chilled as scarcely to be able to stand. I took off my clothes, wrung them, and we proceeded to the shanty, where we found plenty of rotten straw, in which I and under a pile of it we crawled, pulling it over our heads and knees in the hope that our breath might aid in warming our chilled bodies. I think the most recognized fact, since I have written, was pitied our sufferings that night.

THAT RAY A FROG BACH.

"During the day Mr. Lamontagne, who found several lumber roads leading into the woods, all of which he followed to their ends, suggesting we might find some men cutting timber. Disappointment again. At the roads terminated in the wilderness, and we found that we was nothing to indicate human presence.

"In one of these roads, we found two old hay stalks frogs. They were the first 'food' we had seen in twenty-four hours. Perhaps they were not the first we had seen. Not bird-quarters alone: we were not dainty; fox-quarters, bear-quarters and all. Any quarters were welcome to my life; and my companion came to the conclusion that they were the most delicious morsels ever imagining moved. Yet the constituted, longing cry of our stomachs for food. We had not tasted food since the previous Sunday night, and our eyes, as already stated, were red and we could not see. We thought we knew what it was to feel hungry then, but we have since found that we were only taking the first rudiments in our lesson.

THE SECOND DAY'S JOURNEY.

Mr. Haddock continues: "The second day of night at last were away, and we held a new council. It was evident, we reasoned, that the creek was running west, and for 'driving' logs in the spring season. If then, we followed it to the southeast, we should find the lumber stream which emptied into the Ottawa, we could in time go out the same way we had come in—that is, by the way the shanty was covered with the haires of logs, scraped off by the 'drivers' in the spring season. Acting on this spirit and fire, and having eaten a piece of pork, we dragged the logs down to the creek, and Lamontain and them together, as we considered him more used to water than myself. We got under way, and as we pushed off a crew set up a shout—a shout of exultation—and the noiseless of fog great trials and sufferings in store for us. We could down stream at about ten miles an hour, and nearly upon an immense pine-tree which had fallen across the stream, completely blocking our way. Here was the other alternative we left but to untie the pieces, and start to push them up stream. This was a task, but it was not done; and the raft together again, and poled her down stream. For about two hours we kept on the raft, and found that, and began to feel that we were hungry. We had not tasted food since Sunday night, and it was now Tuesday. About the middle of the afternoon we heard the creek we went into a lake some two miles long, and into which we of necessity must go, as the creek was lost in the big outlet at the lower end. We followed down the western bank, keeping close in shore, and when the logs or poles could touch the bottom, until we arrived at the bottom of the lake. Here we found that the creek came back upon the southern bank in quest of it. On reaching the head of the lake we found that the creek came in a rock turned abruptly to the right, which was the reason of our losing it.

"We felt happy to have found it again, and piled our raft like heroes. We could not have gone far from here where we had first struck the creek, and where we had left the shanty, and we were in hopes that we should be in in finding the shanty, and we ever wish to do so in order to get her out. At night we did not stop, but kept the raft going down through the middle of the lake, whose solemn stillness seemed to hold the unrevealed mystery of our destiny. About two o'clock in the o'clock it began to rain again. We stopped the 'canoe' and crept in under our 'dog' tail which we had on the raft, where our extreme weariness enabled us to get, perhaps, half an hour's sleep.

THE SABBATH EVE AND MORNING.

He adds: "Regarding our dire it was necessary to pole at night in the rain down an unknown stream than to lie on the ground and drown ourselves. We were afloat at the leave, until about three o'clock, when pure exhaustion forced us to stop again. This time we found a place where the clayey bank lacked a little of coming down to the water. On the top of this bank we built a rough straw, and sat down with our feet drawn up under us, as our last hard night's rest reminded us that we should provide for the rain to beat upon. But we could not stand with an unconsidered hope that it would be the last night of the Sabbath broke upon us we were poking down the stream with a drizzling rain.

Lamontain writes: "About seven o'clock we reached the head of the lake, and found the creek running west. We followed in the bed, and, after a short distance, found the solution depended upon our going back and getting it down the creek. We then had it again, and followed it down stick by stick; waiting up to our waists on the slippery stones of this shallow creek. Before leaving the lake Mr. Haddock fell three times in doing this work, at one time breaking the compass and bending the instrument by valves. About 10 o'clock the raft was below the brush, together again, and we were ready for the Sabbath services. It was Sabbath—not in those words Sabbath services and sanctuary. Night in the wilderness was our only Sabbath for us!" However, we dismissed gloomy thoughts and with a prayer of thanksgiving for the past we launched as many hands had spoken us, loaded warily.

THE THIRD DAY.

We continue to quote from Lamontain: "At twelve o'clock we entered a lake, which we found to be somewhat cramped space and in voices. Perhaps weeks must pass before we shall be able to forget the sensations of that hour! Never mind; as we went, striking to the right, close to the bank, and going 'ashore' to search for the numerous bays and indentations. Its never looked upon more magnificent appearance. Embosomed in a dense and rugged out amidst noble hills; surrounded by beautiful evergreen trees; dashing over rocks and stones, and falling its pellucid breeze the deep blue of the sky—painter could not have had more noble study.

"Night found us not more than one-fourth of the way through the lake, and still no signs of its outlet. We had nothing but high-bush cranberries, acrid and destitute of sweetness, to satisfy our hunger. We had built a fire when we left the wind commenced blowing, and as we were on the lee-shore, we decided to travel no further that night. So we drew our raft up on the bank, went into the woods and lay down. We had nothing also to do. We supper thoughts of digestion. Lamentable experience, dreary night—and a gray, hazy, cantiferous morning. We were dying—absolutely starving for food. We, and yet, something whispered to me that we should be saved. It seemed as if I could hear a voice telling me that I must rise to cross some stream, and behold. Any hopes so encouraged me that I could not help singing to myself, with which sailors cheer themselves in times of storm and danger:

"'Cheer up your hearts, while the billows
Are rolling high and free;
Let nothing fright you!
Be of a gallant mind,
Let that delight you.'

"I could hardly muster more than a whisper; but the sentiments were wonderfully encouraging to both myself and my companion.

THEY SEE A FIRE.

"Next day," continues Lamontain, "we started on empty; the wilderness seemed to be the home of the dead. Three miles' progress brought us to what appeared to be the outlet of the lake, but it was a smaller lake. This entered it, and we followed it up two and reached a large stream. But when we reached the mouth of this stream we were again thrown back upon our fate the lake. With hope almost gone, we started wearily back toward the large lake to which we had first come. Before we had took upon our fate as ended. He was brave as man could be. The wilderness had no terrors for him. But he mourned to think of the desolation of his wife and family. He would say, 'Lamontain, I am sorry for you, but I cheered my friend as well as I could, and, with a heavy heart, pushed on. At 2 P. M. we came to a halt, when we heard the report of a gun—quickly succeeded by another. We were saved! We were saved! We shouted with joy. We were like madmen as loudly as our feeble strength would allow us. Mr. Haddock's voice had heard no sound for days and days, and it was a most spair again, when Mr. Haddock called my attention to smoke curling up from the trees on the opposite side of the lake. He sighted but became dim, and he could not speak distinctly for joy. But mine was better. I knew it came from a fire. And as I looked, oh, joy! there was a canoe coming out of the bank—though it looked like a log at first.

OUR RESCUE.

"We were strong men again. Noiselessly, we paddled ourselves, fearful that we was but a dream. Nearer the shore we might be frightened away without assisting us. We came on to the western side of the lake, where, in fact it was a pen, two coats, and a sack containing a deal of flour. Mr. Haddock called out, 'Hallo!' and a man, who I seized and commenced stripping the duck, intending to eat it immediately. The first words spoken to us was then five minutes as Indian boy appeared upon the bank. Mr. Haddock called to him, and asked him to follow. He answered in the latter, and asked me to follow him. I did so, and found that he led to a shanty, where I found a rude fire-place in the corner. Here I was led to the shanty from which the smoke had curled. I soon found. There were two Indians and a white man, and a gentleman-looking Scotchman; crossed him a number of pitiable tinder-cases and rags, and who were living on potatoes, potatoes, pork, and no fowls—all the heart could wish for. The gentleman was Mr. Lamontain, and a Providence was kind. Every body can imagine the rest. At first, I could not eat much, but I soon did so. We are sparingly at first, as our stomachs were able to digest, and with prudence we soon recovered. Mr. Haddock's story will tell the story. The party was under the charge of Mr. Lamontain, and was on its way from Lake Temiscamingue to Ottawa. He as noble, and Indians, and Scotchman.

THE RETURN HOME.

"We were one hundred and fifty miles from Ottawa and civilization. Mr. Lamontain was anxious that we left alive had we not found the party. They only lacked provisions. They had left with a large supply of canoes, animals, or nutritious vegetation: and in about five days we were on the shores of Lake Temiscamingue. We remained with our generous preserver two days, then set out for Ottawa. We had a fine time of it, and reached Ottawa safely, and had been but a perfect week on the trip; and as I look back upon it, it seems more like a dream than a reality. Mr. Haddock's story is not closed. From Doucet, we were accompanied by Indian and a fifty mile journey. We had canoes and a pair of boats, traveling night and day, we reached Ottawa at 10 o'clock P. M. Mr. Haddock's wife was there. She had wonderfully glad to 'get out of the wilderness.' Mrs. Ottawa, and Mr. Haddock's son, and a host of friends and triumph. The public are already apprised of our experiences, and I will close my narrative of this remarkable voyage. To all with whom we come in contact we are indebted for kindness, and to Mr. Lamontain I will only pause to say that a more generous, heroic, self-sacrificing man never lived. He has been a friend indeed, and I shall ever remember him with love. God bless him! A warm place in my heart."

JOHN LANGWORTHY.

GENERAL WALKER APLOAT AGAIN.

General Walker and his party of filibusters, to the number of several hundred, are again off to Central America. They sailed from Mobile for Key West, and thence for Philadelphian, on Monday last. From the published statements of Walker's friends, it appears that the new filibusters are very complete and extensive. The Government expedition will be under the command of Colonel

ANOTHER BRITISH OUTRAGE.—THE AMERICAN FLAG D—D.

The brig Hazard, Captain Goodrich, arrived at Boston on October 5, from London, on the west coast of Africa. While lying at anchor in the harbor of Cape Coast, she was fired into by the British steamer Bonetta, Captain Goodrich declined permitting them to board, and the steamer then fired a shot across the bows, bringing the American flag, to which their attention was directed, to the peak.

THE CRICKET MATCH AT HOBOKEN.

The return match between the Union Cricket Eleven and Twenty-two of American closed with the second innings of the Union Eleven, which was left with the score with the 33 made during their first innings, gave them a total of 66 runs, and left the Twenty-two 67 runs to win their innings. There has been since another game, in which the Philadelphia and Union Cricket clubs, assisted by five of the Twenty-two on each side.

THE LONG TULLED CRICKET.

The long tulled of prize fight between Australian Sully and Tom Price, of Pennsylvania, which has been the long-standing of interest ground, at Point Alden, on Saturday last. The fight was for the sum of $1,000 a side, the first blood, and the battle, and came out of the contest victorious, Sullivan, after 37 rounds of severe punishment, having had two tbe broken in the tenth round. The fight lasted two hours and fifteen minutes, and the thirty-two minutes. The affair was witnessed by an immense crowd of spectators.

DEBIAL BEFORE DEATH.

We read in the Boston Transcript that "Dan Merritt is beaten of ready all the Edge Conductors. It is stated, with some positively, that a fac-simile has been executed by the arrival of a cheap and unattended funeral. Dan was a man of a very few words, and he died at the end of the conductor. After a short time the men came to the house of the dead man, accompanied by a hearse, they could not bury that man, but he was sitting up in bed, and he was not dead. He was sitting up in bed, indignation, seized a spade and went back to the grave himself, where, sure enough, he found the undertaker sitting up and looking quietly down below.

"'Dan,' said the undertaker, gently, 'that you're interfering with my arrangements and my business in this sort of a way.'

"'You're not dead,' said the resuscitated, 'and I don't feel like being buried yet a while.'

"'Not dead?' shouted Dan, jerking the doctor's certificate out of his pocket and reading it; 'not dead! Here you've been and certified to my death, and now and when you died of, and I'd like to know who knows how we can bury you.'

"I can't help what the doctor says, Mr. Merritt,' said the man in the coffin; 'but I know I ain't dead, and I want you to help me out of this place.'

Dan, then, responded him, getting more hot than ever, the matter says you're dead, and I say you're dead, and I'll be dead if I don't get out of this hole,' and he hit him a bat or two over the head with his spade, and buried him with his own hands.

The hero, undaunted Dan, as he left, 'of the following interesting in my business in that sort of a way, and I'll be dead if he has a difficulty with the doctor that sent him out.'"

HOW AN EDITOR DID NOT GET A FASS.

The following story is told by the Syracuse Journal:

"The editor of the Buffalo Evening Post has been very violent at times in his denunciations of the Hon. Millard Fillmore. He has been severe in his attacks, and he thought it would be very convenient to get a pass over the Erie Railroad. Mr. Fillmore is a gentleman, and marked that if he had not been as violent toward the Post he thought he might get a pass. A friend of the friend assured him that if he would apply to Dean Richmond, the Vice-President of the road, a pass would be given him he concluded to make the attempt. He accordingly wrote to Mr. Richmond, as follows:

"Mr. Richmond,' said the editor, 'I am going East, and I want a pass. Will you please send me one by return mail?'

"'Certainly, Sir,—certainly, Sir,' with the greatest politeness, replied Mr. Richmond, and he proceeded to fill out the pass.

"Mr. Richmond' said the man handed to the editor, who, expressing his thanks, glanced over it and saw that it only took him to Dunkirk, 'will my pass take me to Buffalo?'

"'Mr. Richmond,' said the editor, very modestly, 'I have changed my mind, and will go to Buffalo after all.'

"'Tis I—you di?' said Richmond, seizing the pass, and tearing it to pieces, 'I have no pass any pass for you then!' And he tore the pass into pieces.

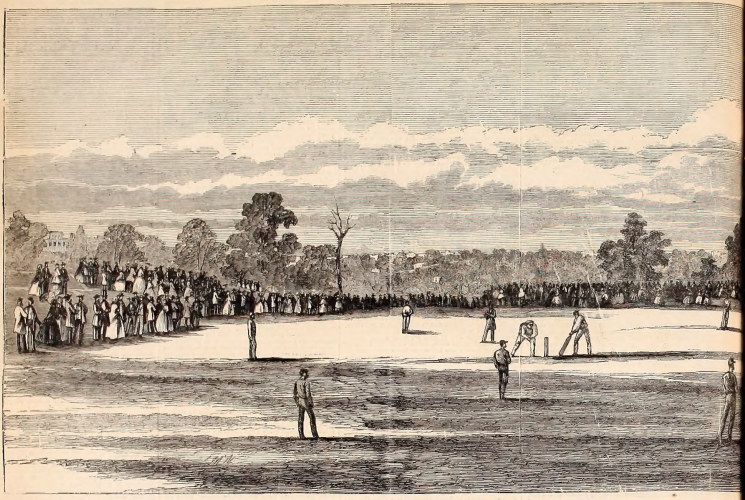
THE FIRE FIEND.

On Wednesday evening Mr. Charles M. Leupp, a leading and wealthy merchant residing at Flushing, Long Island, while in a state of insanity, by shooting himself through the head with a pistol, put an end to his existence. He was a man universally esteemed, and his death will be much lamented.

The Boston Herald gives an account of the death of Mr. Ezra Bacon, of Hartford, Connecticut, who attempted to save the head of a lion, and was attacked by a rescued animal. The lion was in a cage, and Mr. Bacon was attempting to feed it with a piece of meat on the end of a long iron pole, a sickening sensation of the latter, when the animal seized the meat, and with a single bite bit the pole in two, like a cucumber took place. He drew his entire frame together, as though to gain strength for a spring, and the noise broke forth like the crowing of a rooster. This was the signal for a general roar from the lion, and the shrieks of voices that the sensitive listeners assorted their belief that all was a terrible affair. After two days' intense suffering he died, and ceased to exist.

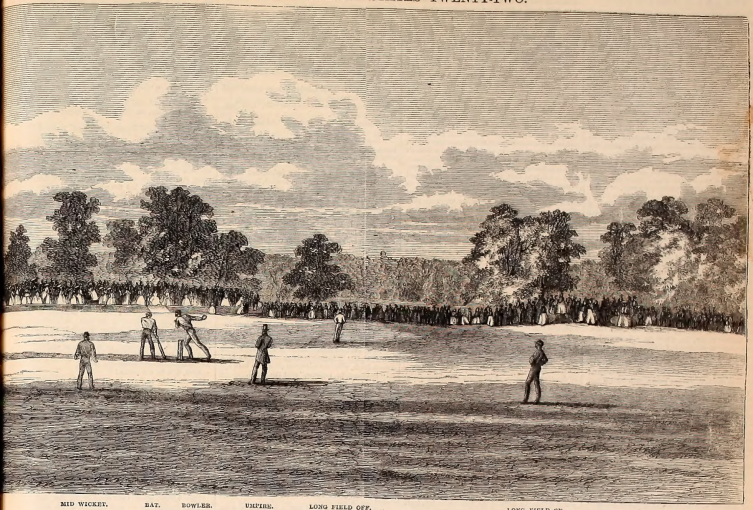
The Boston Herald gives an account of Frederick Ludwig, Virginia, had an undertook for a bed filled with feathers. He was in the habit of sleeping on a feather bed, and he had a fancy that he would die on a feather bed. Mr. E. The young lady was a daughter of Mr. E. The young lady examinations revealed no disease of the heart or any other organ. The cause of death was simply exhaustion, but

THE CRICKET MATCH PLAYED AT HOBOKEN ON OCTOBER 3–6, 1859, B



A BASE-BALL MATCH A

THE ALL ENGLAND ELEVEN AND THE UNITED STATES TWENTY-TWO.



USIAN FIELDS, HOBOKEN.

CRICKET AND BASE-BALL.

On the preceding pages we give engravings of the game of Cricket as played at Hoboken last week between the Eleven of All England and the Twenty-two of the United States; and of the game of Base-ball, as played by the clubs in this part of the country.

It is impossible, in the space allotted to us, to describe either of those two games. Both would require several columns even to give the ordinary rules which govern each game; and the attempt would be unintelligible to persons unacquainted with the game and superficially read about it.

Only up to a certain point can the best of rules be understood these games played, and only then by those who have seen them, or who, having read the rules, have been enabled to understand the accounts in the newspapers, and will thereby develop their memories and improve their stamina.

For the benefit of those, however, who are intrigued by the accounts which are appearing in the papers of the cricket games which are being played by our English visitors, we may, in a few words, give some rough notion of the game.

Cricket, or double wicket, is the only kind of cricket played here; it is played by eleven players on each side. The ground chosen should be a smooth plain. In the middle, at a distance of 22 yards from each other, two sets of wickets (consisting of three stumps of wood 28 inches long and surmounted set by one or two cross pieces called bails) are planted, one inch in the ground. In front of each of these wickets stands a batsman or striker. Opposite to the striker, rather behind the opposite wicket, stands the bowler. At the other "end" to the bowler there are the ball to the striker, aiming at it the wickets; the striker protects his wickets by striking the ball with his bat. When he strikes the ball he may run from wicket to wicket, the opposite striker running to the same wicket. The striker is out, 1st, when the ball bowled to him strikes his wickets and knocks down a stump or the bails; 2d, when the ball is caught from his post on a run or otherwise, one of the opposite parties succeeds in throwing the ball regularly at either of them in "bowler," and throws the ball to the striker. Another is "wicket keeper," he stands behind the wickets to stop balls which pass them without being struck; and behind him stands "long stop," because any ball which he misses will have escaped both striker and "wicket keeper." In a line with the striker, as he left stands "leg," by which "leg-bail" ball which comes to his direction and on the opposite side are stationed "short slip," "long slip," "point," and "cover," whose duties are to catch the ball if it comes their way, or at all events to stop it as soon as they can, and to throw it forward to the wicket. Around behind the bowler, on either side, are "middle wicket," "long field on side," and "long field off," who are charged with the duty of looking after balls which have been hit hard and are traveling over the field in their direction.

Almost all games at cricket are played in two innings—though at Hoboken last week this was not necessary. The winning side is the one which counts most runs. A striker may be put out when he has hit the ball, or when the bowler has bowled it out of reach. He may run as often as he can, subject only to the penalty of being put out if the opponents can knock down his wickets while he is away from his post.

We wish that this were more intelligible than it must prove to such of our readers as are not familiar with cricket; but we can only request—not advise—go and see the game for yourselves.

Base-ball differs from cricket principally, in there being no wickets. The bat is held high in the air. When the ball has been struck the "outs" try to catch it, in which case the striker is "out;" or, if they can not do this, to strike the striker with it when he is running, which likewise puts him out. Instead of wickets, there are at this game four or five marks called bases, one of which, being the one at which the striker stands, is called "home." As at cricket, the point of the game is to make the most runs between the bases, and that side which counts the most runs wins the day. For the particular rules of the game we must refer to the treatises on the subject.

TOM ROCKET.

TOM ROCKET was a highwayman. No one ever christened him Tom, and his father's name was not Rocket. When he was tried for his life at Warwick Assizes he was arraigned as Charles Jackson, and they were particular about names there. If you talked of Tom Rocket, the fact that his name was Joe, he got off; and when the Joe was offered—in the second set speech—he got off on the trial—people said that the British Constitution was being pulled up root and branch.

I can not tell you what it was that he came to be known as Tom Rocket, and if I could, it would not have any thing to do with my story. He was for years he was the most famous thief in the Midland counties, and for six years no one knew what he was like. He was a lazy fellow, was Tom; he never came out except when there was a good prize to be picked up, and he had his scouts and his spies all over the place to give him information about booty, and to warn him of danger. But to judge by what people said, he was "the real" at half a dozen different places at once every day of his life.

My father was a Gloucestershire man. He stood six feet three in his stockings, and measured thirty-six inches across the chest. He could double up a half-crown between his finger and thumb, and was as brave as a lion. So, many a time and oft, when any one talked of the dangers of the road, he would set his great teeth together, smoke his head, and say that he should like to see the man that could rob him on the highway; and, as I said before, he did see him, and it was Tom Rocket.

My father was a lawyer, and was, at the time I am mentioning, in practice at a little village that was to be tried at Warwick Spring Assizes. So, shortly before Christmas, he left his wife and child up in town, as there was no cross-country coach, so he rode; and being, as I have said, a brave man, he rode alone. The reason for his business; and my poor mother being ill, and not liking to leave her alone longer than was needful, he set out to ride home again about half past nine o'clock that same evening. It was as beautiful a winter's night as ever was seen in the sky. He was a first-rate hunter, as docile as a dog, and fit to carry even his weight all over, or past any thing. He had a pair of excellent pistols in his holsters; and he jogged along, humming a merry tune, neither thinking nor caring for any one or any thing ill. All of a sudden, it struck him that the pretty horse mold of an inn just such a place that he had broken his leg about to have a girth that he had broken pitched together, had been very busy with three gallants playing at cards and drinking. One might have been tempering with them, he drew the charges and replaced them carefully. This done, he jogged on again as before.

He had ridden about ten miles, when he came to a wooden cloth-yard gate, which led up to a field of the Avon. Just beyond it rose a stiffish hill, at the top of which was a thick wood. It was at this gate, as my father reached this turn, a masked horseman suddenly wheeled round upon him, and said to him "Stand and deliver!" "Tom Rocket!" In a second my father's pistols were out, cocked, and presented at the head of the highwayman's chest; but, one after the other, they missed fire! The pretty barmaid—a special favorite of Jack's—must have had the priming out, and dodged of drawing the balls, or dumping the charge: she filtered a bit into each touch-hole, and then knocked off.

"Any more?" Tom inquired, as coolly as you please, when he saw the vexed, gaze flashed in the pan.

"Yes!" shouted my father, in a fury, "one for your nob!" And seizing the weapon last used by the muzzle, he hurled it with all his might and aim at Richard's head. The highwayman ducked, flew over the hedge, and my father, thrown out of balance by the violence of his effort, fell heavily on the grass by the road-side. In less time than it takes to say so, Tom dismounted, seized my father's horse, and, presenting a pistol within an inch of his face as he lay, bids him be quiet, or it would be the worse for him.

"You've given me a deal of trouble," said Tom, "as just hand over your purse without any more ado, Mr. Lawyer, or I'll blow your brains out, shall—just there;" and he laid the cold muzzle of his pistol on my father's forehead between his eyes.

It is bad enough to have to look down the barrel of a pistol when you have full cock, with a highwayman's finger upon the trigger; but to have the cold muzzle pressed slowly upon your head—ugh!—it makes me crop to think of it.

My father made a virtue of necessity, and quietly gave up his purse.

"Much good may it do you," he said; "for there's only thirteen shillings in it."

"Now for your pocket-book," said Tom, not heeding him.

"Pocket-book?" inquired my father, turning a little pale.

"Ay, pocket-book!" Tom repeated; "a thick black one; it is in the left-hand pocket of your riding-coat."

"Then it is," said my father, "you know so much about it that perhaps you can tell what is enclosed in it."

"I'll see," Tom replied, quietly taking out and unfolding half a dozen legal-looking documents.

"Pish! these low-paper-work words is not to my or any one else," said my father.

"Ay, indeed!" Tom replied; "I may tear them up, and he made as though he would do so.

"Hold! on your life!" my father shouted, struggling hard to get up his feet.

"Oh! they are worth something, then," said Tom, with a laugh.

"It would take a deal of trouble to make them out again," my father replied, sullenly—"that's all."

"Pocket-book?" Tom again inquired, with a meaning look.

"Well, my father answered, "I suppose I know what you are driving at. Hand me them back and let me go, and I promise to send you a hundred pounds when I get to my journey's end."

"You know very well that these papers are worth more than a hundred pounds."

"A hundred and fifty, then," said my father.

"Go on," said Tom.

"I tell you what it is, you scoundrel," cried my father, "I'll stake five hundred against them if you'll loose your hand from the pistol and fight me."

Tom only chuckled.

"Be quick with it, unless you must take me for," he said. "Why should I bother myself fighting for what I even get without?"

"Here's a watch, then, and what you see," my father shouted, in a fury.

"Don't be cross," said Tom. "It don't become you to look red in the face. Now attend to me," he continued, in an altered tone. "Do you see that bridge? Well, there's a heap of stones in the centre, don't there? Very good! If you will place five hundred guineas in gold, in a bag, among those stones at twelve o'clock at night the day week, you shall find your pocket-book and all its contents in the same place, two hours after."

"How am I to know that you will keep your word?" my father replied, a little softened by the hope of regaining, even at so heavy a price, the papers that were invaluable to him.

"I'm Tom Rocket," replied the robber, securing the pocket-book upon his person, "and what I mean I say, and what I say I stick to. Now get up, and mind," he added, as my father sprang to his feet, "you don't turn fire."

"I shall live to see you hanged," my father muttered, adjusting his disordered dress.

"Shall I help you to catch your horse?" Tom asked, politely.

"I'll not rest till I lodge you in a jail," said my father, savagely.

"Give my compliments to your wife," said Tom, mounting his horse.

"Confound your impudence," howled my father.

"Good-night!" said Tom, with a wave of his hand, and turning sharp round, he rode into the wood on the left, and was out of sight in a moment.

It was not quite fair of my father, but he determined to set a trap for Tom Rocket, baited with the five hundred guineas, at the bridge. The post-boy up to London, now Bradshaw, a famous Bow street runner, and arranged that he and his men should come down in full help to catch Tom; but just at the last moment Bradshaw was detained upon some important government affair, and so another runner, Fraser, a no less celebrated officer, took his place.

It was settled that the runners should come by different roads, and all meet at a way-side inn about five miles from the bridge, at which Tom was to stop on his way my father's pocket-book was to be returned. An hour afterward they were to join him on the same miles footing as Tom. Their object, you see, in taking this roundabout course was to baffle Tom's spies and communications, and to get every bird about the appointed spot long before the appointed time.

My father arrived late at the place of meeting; but when he arrived there he could see no one about, except a rough-looking countryman in a smock-frock, who was swinging on a gate hard by.

"Good-night, minister," said the yokel.

"Good-night, my man," replied my father.

"Can ye tell me who this yer letter's for?" said the yokel, producing a folded paper.

My father saw in a moment that it was his own letter to Bradshaw.

"Where did you get that?" he said, quickly.

"Ah!" replied the yokel, replacing it in his pocket, "that 'ad be tellins. Be yer expecting any?"

"What's that to you?" said my father.

"Oh, nuthin' at all, sir," replied the yokel, a gentleman from London—"

"I'll tell you my father; "what gentleman?"

"Will a none beginning with F. suit you?" asked the yokel.

"Fraser!" The word fell involuntarily from my father's lips.

"That's the name," replied the yokel, jumping down from his seat, and changing his tone and manner in a moment. I'm Fraser, Sir, and Mr. Bradshaw has sent me instead of a pocket-book containing valuable papers; and we're going to catch Tom Rocket at the bridge. That's our game, Sir. All right, Sir; and now to business."

"But where are your men?" my father asked, when Fraser had explained the reason for his disguise.

"All right again, Sir," said the runner, "they will join us. We have not much time to lose, so please to lead the way."

So my father led the way, followed by Fraser; and by the time that they came to the foot of the bridge they had been joined by four London officers, in different disguises, and from different directions. Some came as a tramp, some as a pedlar, another as a gentleman's servant leading a horse, and the fourth as a soldier. No one could have guessed that they had met before, much less that they were engaged together in a prosecution of schemes. That they were met with good cause for the dextrous way in which he had collected his forces.

The bridge upon which the money was to be placed consisted of two arches across the river, and was joined on each side by a long, low sort of causeway, built upon piles over meadows that in the winter time were generally covered with water.

It so happened that the very next morning after the robbery heavy rain set in, and soon the river began to rise, so that there was no sign of lighting on the bridge but by going along the causeway, which extended a distance of a hundred yards, sloping down gradually to the road, on each side of the river. This causeway was built of wood, with open spaces that allowed water to pass through, and stones, but at others the roadway had wood cut and laid over both, so that any one looking down underneath, could see who was passing overhead. Mr. Fraser's sharp eye took in the position in a moment. He got two bundles out of a field close by, and with some rope, that he had found in the pocket, formed two temporary rafts of piles, so that they hung like shelves between the roadway and the flood, one at each side of the bridge, and about twenty yards from it. On this was his plan: two of his men were to lie hidden on each raft, and when Tom Rocket had left the stolen pocket-book left in exchange for it. As soon as Tom Rocket, or any of Mr. Fraser, removed the bag in which the gold was packed, Fraser was to whistle, and his men were to climb from their hiding-place, and secure whoever it might be. If he leaped over the railing of the causeway, and took to the water, there was the boat in which to follow and capture him.

Mr. Fraser was very particular to practise his allies in the quickly three parts of coolness, self-command, and in impressing upon them and my father the necessity of all acting together, keeping careful watch, and strict silence. "And now, Sir," he said to my father, as a distant clock chimed a quarter to twelve, "it's time to get to our places and to bait the trap, so please to hand me the bag that I may mark it, and some of the coins, so as to be able to identify them at the trial." He took one bag up his mind, you see, to nail Master Tom this time.

My father gave him the bag, saw him write upon it, and make some scratches on about a dozen of the guineas, and then my father placed a purse in into the boat, in which he was immediately joined by the runner.

"It's all right," said Fraser, in a low tone.

"Do you think he will come?" whispered my father.

"Certain," replied Fraser; "but, hush! we must not talk, Sir, time's up."

For three several hours did my father sit in that boat, and the runners lay stretched out on the bread of their backs upon those open gratings for Tom Rocket to come for his money; and for three mortal hours not a soul approached the bridge, not a footfall was heard, and not a coach river was heard. By the time that the clock struck three, my father, who had been awake for the last twenty minutes, fell fast asleep as he sat covered up in his cloak, for it was a bitter cold night; but was very speedily aroused by hearing other of the runners call them in the dark; and when my father arrived there, he found all the men in a "row," he found, to his great surprise, that the officers had left. He rushed to the heap of stones, and there he found the pocket-book his eye was his pocket-book—the money was gone!

Lord, how he stormed!

Determined to have it out with that runners for deserting their posts, he hurried on to the inn where they had put up their horses, and there Hi knocked at the door. No answer. He knocked again, louder. No answer. He went in the room of the keepers, but no sign was there. He went out of keepers, but no sign was there. He went out of the yard, and there he found Jack ostler fast asleep. Tied into five chains, hand and foot, trussed up like so many Christmas turkeys, with five gags in their five mouths, and their five pairs of eyes staring at him, awfully, at the real Mr. Fraser and his four fine men, who had been, it seems, all managed the business at the bridge himself!

How he managed to get scent of the plot, and how he came there, all together, is the nick of time, my father never could find out, and no one knows to this day.

Upon examining his pocket-book my father found all his documents, and a paper on which was written these words:

"By destroying these writings I could have ruined you. In doing it, I shall have injured your client, whom I respect. For his sake I keep my word, though you have played me false.—TOM ROCKET."

As for Tom, after having been tried three times, and getting off upon some law quibble on each occasion, he—who had robbed to the worth of thousands of pounds, and escaped—was executed at Nottingham for stealing an old bridle!

A Gown Fight.

BY CHARLES READE.

AUTHOR OF "LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG," ETC.

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER XXXII.

"YOU must come to the Burgomaster at once," said Diederich Brower.

"To what end?"

"No matter; come!" and he hurried them to the Burgomaster's house.

Ghyskreckt Van Swieten was not the man to be kept waiting. "Well," said he, on hearing the ill news, "suppose he is gone. Is he mounted?"

"No."

"Then what hinders you to come up with him?"

"But what avails coming up with him? there are no beetrices on the road he is gone."

"Fools!" said Ghyskreckt, "is there no way of emptying a man's pockets but liquor and sleight of hand?"

A meeting took, that passed between Ghyskreckt and Diederich, ended in a most handsome fashion. Duy changed color, and lost all zeal for the business.

"Ay," said he, "but we won't get ourselves hanged to spite Gerard," said Sybrandt; "that would be a fool's trick."

"Hanged!" cried Ghyskreckt. "Am I not the Burgomaster? How can ye be hanged? I see how it is. Ye are afraid of the man, being two hearts of hare, that ye are! Oh! why can not I be young myself? I'd do it myself, then."

The effect was magical. Their eyes glittered with desire. Their whole bodies seemed to swell, and rise into noble stature.

"Swear it, then," said Sybrandt.

"I swear it."

"No. On the crucifix."

Chrysbrecht swore upon the crucifix.

The next minute the brothers were on the road, in pursuit of Hans Heming. They came in sight of him about two leagues from Torgau; but though they knew he had no weapon but his staff, they were too prudent to venture on him in daylight; so they fell back.

But being now three leagues and more from the town, and on a grassy road—sun down, moon not yet up—honest Hans suddenly found himself attacked before and behind at once by men with uplifted knives, who cried in loud though somewhat husky voices, "Stand and deliver!"

The attack was a sudden, and so well planned, that Hans was dismayed. "Slay me not, good fellows," he cried: "I am but a poor man, and ye shall have my all."

"So be it, then. Live! But empty thy wallet."

"There is nought in my wallet, good friends, but one letter."

"That we shall see," said Sybrandt, who was the one in front. "Well; it is a letter."

"Take it not from me, I implore. 'Tis worth naught, and the good dame would fret that writ it."

"There," said Sybrandt, "take back thy letter: and now empty thy pouch. Come,! tarry not!"

But by this time Hans had recovered his confusion: and, by a certain flutter in Sybrandt, and hard breathing of Cornelis, aided by an indescribable consciousness, felt sure the pair he had to deal with were no heroes. He therefore felt feasible for his money: then suddenly thrust his staff firmly into Sybrandt's face, and drove him staggering, and lent Cornelis a back-handed slash at the ear that sent him twirling: then whirled his weapon over his head and danced on the road like a bear that on springs, shouting "Come on, ye thieving loons! Come on!"

By "come" they understood "go," took to their heels directly, with Hans after them, he shouting "Stop there!" and they howling with fear and pain as they ran.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ABOUT this time a change pasted over Margaret Brandt. She went about her household duties like one in a dream. If Peter did but speak a little quickly to her, she started and fixed her terrified eyes on him. She went less often to her friend Margaret Van Eyck, and sat for a far less time when there. Instead of meeting her warm old friend's caresses, she used to receive them passive and trembling, and then retire to a chair, fetch from them. But the most extraordinary thing was she never would go outside her own house in daylight. When she went to Tergou it was after dusk, and she returned before daybreak. She would not even go to matins. At last Peter Brandt noticed it, she was noticed it, and asked her the reason.

"THE FOLK ALL LOOK AT ME SO."

One day Margaret Van Eyck asked her what was the matter. A scared look and a hasty denial were all the reply. The old lady expostulated gently.

"What, sweet-heart, afraid to confide your sorrows to me?"

"I have no sorrows, madam, but of my own making. I am kinder treated than I deserve, especially in this house."

"Then why not come oftener, my dear?"

"I come oftener than I deserve," and she sighed deeply.

"There, Rich! is crying out for you," said Margaret Van Eyck; "go, child! what on earth can it be?"

Turning possibilities over in her mind, she thought Margaret must have quarrelled with the contupt with which she was treated by Gerard's family. "I will take them to task for it, at least such of them as are women. I am not very sure they'll say she put on her hood and cloak, and, followed by Rich, went to her friend's house. Margaret received her with much respect, and thanked her with tears for her kindness to Gerard. But when, encouraged by this, her visitor ventured to ask Margaret Brandt, Catherine's eyes dried, and her lips formed to hold the seal, and she looked as much intimate, ingenuous woman can look. When they set on this coat of features you might as well try to soften or open a vice with a key. Margaret Van Eyck tried, but all in vain. So then, not being herself used to be thwarted, she got provoked, and at last went out hastily with an abrupt and multitudinal courtesy, which Catherine returned with an air rather of defiance than politeness. Outside the door Margaret Van Eyck found Richt conversing with a pale girl on crutches. Margaret Van Eyck was passing them with heightened color, and a forceful tone intended for the whole family, when suddenly a little delicate hand was placed on her sleeve, and looking round she saw two down-like eyes, with the water in them, that seemed to implore and fly, and, at the same time, imploringly. The old lady read this wonderful look, complex as it was, and down went her clothes. Then,

Holland. Hans Memling passed his little window twice, but Gerard never saw him.

At peep of day Gerard left Florence.

Friend and foe had shot at him with love and with hate, and each missed him alike. Neither Margaret's inquietude nor to him to return reached him, nor did the false report of her death reach him, though it grazed so horribly near him.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

MARGARET stole away to Sevenbergen at peep of day; there she found the soldier had left her a long letter from Gerard. The thousand tender words of love filled her with joy; but the letter was short, and the distance from Florence filled her with dismay. "Oh, Gerard!" she cried, "why are you so far from me? What will become of me if you get me by letter? I shall die disgraced, for live ashamed I can not." Soon after breakfast Catherine came, but to her grumble, and was as warm, so cheerful, and motherly, that she received the drooping flower. Little Kate was unable to come. She was in more pain than usual. From this time the visits of Catherine were frequent. Margaret's despondent state caused her endless able anxiety. She never would come to Tergou; and indeed would not leave her room. "I hold my head too high," she said, "and now I can look no one in the face. The dame Van Eyck tries to forgive me, but the others? how can she? I hold no one save me but one, and he comes not; well-a-day!"

"I tell you," said Catherine, "I am quite his wife, and my daughter; and don't ye go fretting now, for the sake of the precious burden you are trusted with." But what is transpired publicly had the clergy were proceeding against Glyshrecht, Catherine came to Sevenbergen haystrait with the news; and as she told it with a fair share of exaggeration, it brought life into Margaret's pale face for a moment or two.

One day, as Peter was reading and Margaret leaning her weary head on her new mother's bosom and kissing her hand, and the kind Catherine leaning her head down with assumed cheerfulness, but secret anxiety, over this her pining daughter, so dear to her now, there stood in the door-way the figure of a man in rags, weary with travel, pale, large eyed. Peter glanced off his book, and said, "Pass on, good man, we are too poor to give," then back to his book again.

There was a swift rush, a staff rattled on the floor, and the worn man was on his knees, with his arms round both the women, speechless and panting for joy.

"Ah! my darling! my darling! cried his mother, as only a mother can cry; and Margaret clung tight to him with one long moan of love, and sobbed, and laughed, and wept upon his neck.

But words have not the power to paint a joy so sudden, so wild, so all-overpowering.

An hour later Gerard sat between the two, a hand of each in his hand, and over and anon kissing a cheek of each alternately as he told his story.

"Dear Gerard, 'twas my letter brought you?"

"No, Margaret, I got no letter. 'Twas this brought me, this that which shows me your father is a wealthy man; his father's goods being wrongfully kept from him by Glyshrecht Van Swieten. I only found it out at Florence. Was I to go on, and leave you in poverty, when I held this talisman to make you rich?"

"I am rich in your love. I ask no more. Oh, mother, can this be real? can any woman be so happy and live?"

"Why not? what would she gain by dying? Gerard, you and I must talk about that; this one is too simple; and now, quick, to Tergou."

"I go, but how can I leave Margaret so soon?"

"Mother, he loves me still. I'll come too, Gerard, sooner than the rest should want you."

And Margaret's head as how made up the little changes in her clothes and hair, that of late had not kept her to-day.

And she came down transformed: elastic, and radiant with beauty

"Good lack!" cried Catherine, "we shall want no candles with this one in the room!"

And in Burgundy's court word flew round to Tergou, with a dear hand in each of his, the happiest he in Holland.

Arrived at Tergou, his Spartan sire fell on his neck and kissed him; and no word was uttered but of love and concord; and little Kate's face was seraphic, and her hand crept alternately into Margaret's and Gerard's. And as they talked, and sometimes sighed — sometimes rejoiced — all their troubles now happily ended—their glistening eyes and ninefold fingers were all busy making a rapid a suit of decent clothes. They hadn't far to go for the cloth, you know.

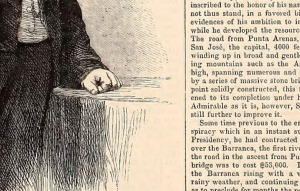
Next day, when Gerard went to ask the curé to marry him, an objection was raised: "This has been dissembled, and the matter of doubt, doubt whether you are not married: if so, it were a sin to repeat the ceremony. This were to throw doubt upon a sacrament." Gerard consulted and contested, and at last it was settled thus: no fresh banns; the words Gerard had uttered were to be repeated; the service to be taken up from the point reached at the last attempt; the marriage to be registered as having taken place at that date, Glyshrecht's interruption having been lais, profanum, illegal, null. On these terms the curé consented to read the rest of the mutilated service—and to ask no fees.

The piece of parchment was a covenant by which Glyshrecht had advanced money, many years ago, to Floris Brandt, on the security of certain lands and houses; Glyshrecht to draw the rents until said sum should be repaid: but, comparing the income with the debt and date of loan, it was clear it had been repaid this sixteen years. Yet Glyshrecht had quietly gone on holding the property without a rag of title; and trusting to the learned Peter's stupidity, had set it about as he had bought it of Floris Brandt. Thus not only the property was Peter's, but the back-rents for many years. As for the title-deeds, Gerard rummaged the philosopher's house without much hope. "He has cut them up for labels," said he. Unjust! They were eventually found innocously lining a drawer, which was full of the seeds of medicinal herbs, and really arranged with considerable method—the seeds. Gerard's father was a shrewd man, and had many friends in Tergou: he and his party took the matter up, and threatened to indict Glyshrecht if he did not instantly refund; these pressing him hard on one side, and the clergy on the other, he had affronted, on the other, Glyshrecht's ruin and disgrace impended.

But the old fox contrived to give his foes the slip. He was found dead in his bed one morning; not without some suspicion of having committed an exit desirable for himself and others.

His heir, a distant relative and a just man, deprecated scandal, and accounted to Peter, or rather to Gerard, his sundries are and must of business, for every farthing. Gerard and Margaret then removed to Rotterdam, taking with them Peter, who met with more honor in the city than in the village, and had the glory of curing several personages, among the rest a heathen belonging to the Duke. He lived to a great age, decided tenderly by his good son and daughter. He soon ceased to be aware that they were not both his children by blood.

Gerard and Margaret, like many that meet in youth more than their share of trouble, enjoyed more happiness and tranquillity than falls to the usual lot of man.



JUAN RAFAEL MORA, EX-PRESIDENT OF COSTA RICA.

The Duke, on the report of his giant, not dreaming anymore for Gilen to cause to be slain. Vain was all remonstrance. The Duke's word was law. Catherine made Gilen ready, weeping bitterly. It was an irreparable loss. She could have spared Sybrants or Cornelis. She had two black sheep. But she had but one dwarf.

Gilen was patted and bedizened, and invested with privileges. Ban—on account of his small size he was permitted to speak the truth. He sounded so odd at court. It is a disagreeable thing at best; but he contrived to make it more so by bellowing it.

Sybrants achieved a traken neck without help of halter, I forget how. Cornelis, free from all rivals, and forgiven long ago by his mother, who loved him more and more as all her blood was scattered, waited, and waited, and waited, for his parents' decease. But his mother's shrewd wore came true: ere she and her mate were out, this worthy rusted away. At sixty-five he lay dying of old age in his mother's arms, a hale woman of eighty-six. He had him unconscious a while; but came to himself in strictly mortal, and seeing her near him, told her how he would transmogrify the step and promises as soon as they should be his. "Yes, my darling," said the poor old woman, soothingly: and in another minute he was clay. And that clay was followed to the grave by all the thoes he had waited for.

After his death the old couple were lonely. Gerard guessed as much, and came for them, and made them sell their shop and goods, and live under his wing, as he had once under theirs. His house was large, his heart was larger. He set them by his chimney-corner, and he and his good wife poured forced comforts on them for a while by force of habit have denied themselves. They say some years by Gerard's hearth, and fondled little heads, and smiled at one another, and spoke of early days, and grew like one another; and their wrinkled faces had still a beauty, for they shone with benignity. Oh, happy end of lives well spent! All the passions gone, all the affections left. Good citizens these, and good spouses. They reared many children in purity and piety, and never did holy wedlock show holier nor more lovely than in this aged happy pair, whose solace it had been the threescore years and ten.

Long and long before this little Kate had left her trouble behind her. There was too much angel in her face for a long abode on earth. She smiled too in pain, another sign. Life gave her but few joys, so it was just that death should come to her without his frown: and thus he came. She was seized with sudden lassitude, and a sensation of that pain which had been her companion from infancy. Her mother tried to think this was a change for the better. But the gossips looked at her face and shook their heads, and said, "She is halfway to the saints." Thus paindrest she lay two days foretasting heaven. When she was near her end she asked for Gerard's little boy; he was three years old. They brought him and set him on the bed; by this time she was past speaking: but she pointed to a drawer: they looked, and found the two gold pieces Gerard had given her years ago. Then she nodded her head toward the boy, and looked anxious lest they should not understand her. But they did, and put the tokens of the father's love, so faithfully guarded, into the boy's hands: and when she saw his little fingers close on them she smiled content; and as, having disposed of her little earthly treasure, she yielded her immortal jewel to God, and passed from earth to calmly now saw her go. Gerard begged to have her crutches, that she had changed so well for angel's pinions; and he set them in his oratory in form of a cross, for he said, "They were my darling sister's crutches, but now they are the relics of a saint." He never forgot her, nor did his memory of her ever wax dim: when quite an old man he still spoke of her, with tears in his eyes, as of one mortal creature he had known, pure from all earthly dross.

JUAN RAFAEL MORA, EX-PRESIDENT OF COSTA RICA.

JUAN RAFAEL MORA, EX-PRESIDENT OF COSTA RICA.

Also on that the smiled content; and as, having disposed of her little earthly treasure, she yielded her immortal jewel to God, and passed from earth to calmly now saw her go. Gerard begged to have her crutches, that she had changed so well for angel's pinions; and he set them in his oratory in form of a cross, for he said, "They were my darling sister's crutches, but now they are the relics of a saint." He never forgot her, nor did his memory of her ever wax dim: when quite an old man he still spoke of her, with tears in his eyes, as of one mortal creature he had known, pure from all earthly dross.

JUAN RAFAEL MORA, EX-PRESIDENT OF COSTA RICA.

The Duke, on the report of his giant, not dreaming anymore for Gilen to cause to be slain. Vain was all remonstrance. The Duke's word was law. Catherine made Gilen ready, weeping bitterly. It was an irreparable loss. She could have spared Sybrants or Cornelis. She had two black sheep. But she had but one dwarf.

Gilen was patted and bedizened, and invested with privileges. Ban—on account of his small size he was permitted to speak the truth. He sounded so odd at court. It is a disagreeable thing at best; but he contrived to make it more so by bellowing it.

Sybrants achieved a traken neck without help of halter, I forget how. Cornelis, free from all rivals, and forgiven long ago by his mother, who loved him more and more as all her blood was scattered, waited, and waited, and waited, for his parents' decease. But his mother's shrewd wore came true: ere she and her mate were out, this worthy rusted away. At sixty-five he lay dying of old age in his mother's arms, a hale woman of eighty-six. He had him unconscious a while; but came to himself in strictly mortal, and seeing her near him, told her how he would transmogrify the step and promises as soon as they should be his. "Yes, my darling," said the poor old woman, soothingly: and in another minute he was clay. And that clay was followed to the grave by all the thoes he had waited for.

After his death the old couple were lonely. Gerard guessed as much, and came for them, and made them sell their shop and goods, and live under his wing, as he had once under theirs. His house was large, his heart was larger. He set them by his chimney-corner, and he and his good wife poured forced comforts on them for a while by force of habit have denied themselves. They say

York have been quick in acknowledging his excellent traits, the practical patriotism, the durable successes, and fair fame of his administration. No is it in the least unreasonable for him to reckon upon his speedy restoration to Costa Rica, and to assuage his chagrin at what has recently occurred there, with the hope that he will be enabled before long to resume those good offices on behalf of Costa Rica in the midst of which he was interrupted; and, in a renewed career of usefulness and enlightenment, disprove the charges of his enemies.

Born the 8th of November, 1815, Señor Mora is this day in the prime of life. Blessed with excellent health, diligent in his habits, active in mind and limb, studious, methodical, he is living, he has a long life still before him, and the faculties of maturity and the experience of years are ripe and statesmanship. San José, the capital of Costa Rica, was the scene of his birth. His father, who occupied the highest offices in the state, was one of the few merchants resident in the country at the time, was also a native of Spain. The grandfather of Juan Rafael emigrated in the earlier part of the last century from Catalonia—that rugged, boutteous Pyrenean province of old Spain—and his uncle, Don Juan, was the first to succeed, in the supreme magistracy of Costa Rica, to the Royalist deputies of Madrid. The subject of this memoir, following in his honest father's footsteps, took to business at the age of sixteen. In the way of business he visited the principal cities of this continent, North and South. In 1838 he paid his first visit to Europe, his only visit to the Old World. His intercourse with the leading commercial men of those cities confirmed the practical bias of his mind. What he learned in commerce he transferred to politics. His statesmanship has been essentially practical, bordered with the pluck of the practiced soldier, not insensible to the enthusiasm which is suggested by mixed with exclusively the patriot of romance, he has sternly abstained from the waterfall career of the one, and in instance has allowed himself to indulge in the delusive dreaminess of the other. In this respect he stands aloof from and high above all the other Republican rulers of Spanish America, the illustrious and venerable José Antonio Pinez, of Venezuela, alone excepted. Señor Mora is the founder of the vaccanes which girdle it, watered by lounding streams which are the first performed of the hundred rich coffee-plantations which extend on every side beyond it, practical, industrious, and prosperous, no less born within its modest walls could fail to love it. During his Presidency, which commenced in October, 1848, several public edifices, erected at different points throughout the little city, bear witness to the pride with which he has labored to embellish the capital of the republic. The University of St. Thomas, which cost $56,000; the theatre, which cost $30,000; the Palace of the Government, which cost $130,000; the Hospital of San Juan de Dios, which cost nearly $60,000—these are the monuments which stand to-day, and for years will stand, indelibly inscribed to the honor of his name. But they will not thus stand, in a fevored birth-place, the rolls evidences of his ambition to improve the aspect, while he developed the resources, of the country. The road from Punta Arenas, on the Pacific, to San José, has been made and thrown across the sea, winding up in broad and gentle slopes, and crossing mountains such as the Aguacate, 6000 feet high, spanning ravines and dangerous torrents by a series of massive stone bridges, and at every point solidly constructed, this fine road was bestowed to its completion under his administration. Admirable as it is, however, Señor Mora desired still further to improve it.

Some time previous to the eruption of the conspiracy which is an interval of two years from the Presidency, he had contracted for an iron bridge over the Barranca, the first river which interrupts the road in the extent from Punta Arenas. This bridge was to cost $55,000. It is much needed, the Barranca rising with a violent rapidity in rainy weather, and continuing so high and swift as to preclude for months the possibility of fording it. The produce of the rich plantations—nets, goods, and cattle—cross it by means of a raft hauled across by ropes. From Punta Arenas—one of the busiest and brightest between Valparaiso and San Francisco—owes to him, in the development of its resources, its activity and the future it is assured. Urging the Costa Rica Congress to declare it a free port, he was led to extend indefinitely its privileges as such, he has cordially encouraged the commercial enterprise which has made it so prosperous.

The efforts of the Panama Railroad Company, in establishing steam communication between the principal Pacific ports of Central America, have, with a bounteous good-will, been seconded by him. For carrying the mails one of its vessels sails from Rio to Panama, and up the coast to Realejo, La Union, and Isalan. Señor Mora obtained from the Congress at San José an annual appropriation of $8000. More than this—he secured a perpetual exemption from all duties on the fuel which is annually brought into the country by the steamships of this Company, and he has made in this and other ways substantial a similar liberality on the part of the Governments of Nicaragua, San Salvador, and Guatemala.

Señor Mora has also made treaties with and San Ramon—the one containing 5000, the other nearly 3000 inhabitants—have grown up under his administration. Add, moreover, that a treaty with Spain, and recognizing the independence of Costa Rica, and a treaty with Great Britain, establishing friendship of the former was concluded by him in 1851, and that other treaties, including a Concordat with Rome, established with the principal governments of South America and Europe the friendliest relations, while they obtained many sound commercial and ecclesiastical benefits for Costa Rica, and we have said enough for the present to justify the respect in which Juan Rafael Mora, the deposed President of Costa Rica, is held even among strangers, and even among those to excite a suspicion of the parties who have forced him into exile.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

worked. She was in a front row by the side of a man whom he had never seen since his arrival at the Barrier, but whom he directly remembered as Defarge. He noticed that she once or twice whispered in his ear, and that she seemed to be his wife; but what he most noticed in the two figures was, that, although they were posted as close to himself as they could be, they never looked toward him. They seemed to be waiting for something with a dogged determination, and they looked at the Jury, but at nothing else. Under the President sat Doctor Manette, in his usual quiet dress. As well as the prisoner could see, he and Mr. Lorry were the only men there, unconnected with the Tribunal, who were not in usual clothes, and had not assumed the coarse touch of the Carmagnole.

Charles Evrémonde, called Darnay, was accused by the public prosecutor as an aristocrat and an emigrant, whose life was forfeit to the Republic, under the decree which banished all emigrants on pain of Death. It was nothing that the decree bore date since his return to France. There he was, and there was the decree: he had been taken in France, and his head was demanded.

"Take off his head!" cried the audience. "An enemy to the Republic!"

The President rang his bell to silence those cries, and asked the prisoner whether it was not true that he had lived many years in England?

Undoubtedly it was.

Was he not an emigrant then? What did he call himself?

Not an emigrant, he hoped, within the sense and spirit of the law.

Why not? the President desired to know.

Because he had voluntarily relinquished a title that was distasteful to him, and a station that was distasteful to him, and had left his country—he submitted before the word emigrant in its active signification by the Tribunal was in use—to live by his own industry in England, rather than by the industry of the oversiders people of France.

What proof had he of this?

He handed in the names of two witnesses: Theophile Gabelle, and Alexandre Manette.

But he had married in England? the President reminded him.

True, but not an English woman.

A citizeness of France?

Yes. By birth.

Her name and family?

"Lucie Manette, only daughter of Doctor Manette, the good physician who sits there."

This answer had a remarkable effect upon the audience. Cries in exultation of the well-known good physician rent the air. So capriciously were the people moved that tears immediately rolled down several ferocious countenances which had been glaring at the prisoner a moment before, as if with impatience to pluck him out into the street and kill him.

On these few steps of his dangerous way Charles Darnay had set his foot according to Doctor Manette's wishes expressed aforetime. In the same cautious counsel directed every step that he took from him, and had prepared every inch of his road.

The President asked why he had returned to France when he did, and what proof he had?

He had not returned sooner, he replied, simply because he had not thought it safe. As to proof how he had resigned; whereas, in England, he lived by giving instruction in the French language and literature, he had returned when he did, on the pressing and written entreaty of a French citizen, who represented that his life was endangered by his absence. He had come back to save a citizen's life, and had put his safety at willingly secondary hazard, to the truth. Was that criminal in the eyes of France or no?

The populace cried enthusiastically, "No!" and the President rang his bell to quiet them. This is all not, for they could not, say cry "No!" until they left off of their own will.

The President required the name of that citizen? The accused explained that the citizen was his first witness. He also referred with confidence to the citizen's letter, which had been taken from him at the Barrier, but which he did not doubt would be found among the papers then before the President.

The Doctor had taken care that it should be there—had assured him that it would be there—and at this stage of the proceedings it was produced and read. Citizen Gabelle was called to confirm it, and did so. Citizen Gabelle hinted, with infinite delicacy and politeness, that in the pressure of business imposed on the Tribunal by the multitude of enemies of the Republic with which it had to deal, he had been slightly overlooked in his prison of the Abbaye—in fact, had rather passed out of the memory of his patriotic townsmen—until three days ago, when he had been summoned before it, and had been set at liberty on the Jury's declaring themselves satisfied that the accusation against him was answered, as to himself, by the Presidence of the citizen Evrémonde, called Darnay.

Doctor Manette was next questioned. His high personal popularity, and the clearness of his answers, made a great impression; but as he proceeded, as he showed that the accused was his first friend on his release from his long imprisonment; that the accused had remained in England, always faithful and devoted to his daughter and himself in their exile; that so far from being in favor with the Aristocrat government there, he had actually been tried for his life by it, as the foe of England and a friend to the United States—as he brought these circumstances into view, with the greatest discretion and skill, and the straightforward air of truth and earnestness, the Jury and the populace became one. At last, when he appealed by name to Monsieur Lorry, an English gentleman then and there present, who, like himself, had been a witness on that English trial, and could corroborate his account of it, the Jury declared that they had heard enough, and that they were ready with their votes, if the President were content to receive them.

At every vote (the Jurymen voted aloud and individually) the populace set up a shout of applause. All the votes were in the prisoner's favor, and the President declared him free.

Then began one of those extraordinary scenes with which the populace sometimes gratified their fickleness, or their better impulses toward generosity and mercy, or which they regarded as some set-off against their swollen account of cruel rage. No man can decide now to which of those motives such extraordinary scenes were referable; it is probable, to a blending of all the three, with the second predominating. No sooner was the acquittal pronounced than tears were shed as freely as blood at another time, and such fraternal embraces were bestowed upon the prisoner by as many of both sexes as could rush at him, that, after his long and unwholesome confinement, he was in danger of fainting from exhaustion—none the less because he knew very well that the very same people, carried by another current, would have rushed at him with the very same intensity to rend him to pieces and strew him over the streets.

His removal, to make way for other accused persons who were to be tried, rescued him from these caresses for the moment. Five were to be tried together next, as enemies of the Republic, forasmuch as they had not assisted it by word or deed. So quick was the Tribunal to compensate itself and the nation for a chance lost, that these five came down to him, before he left the place, condemned to die within twenty-four hours. The first of them told him so, with the customary prison sign of Death—a raised finger—and they all added in words, "Long live the Republic!"

The five had had, it is true, no audience to lengthen their proceedings, for when he and Doctor Manette emerged from the gate, there was a great crowd about it, in which there seemed to be every face he had seen in Court —except two, for which he looked in vain. On his coming out, the concourse made at him anew, weeping, embracing, and shouting, all by turns and all together, until the vast tide of men over on the bank of which the mad scene was acted seemed to run mad, like the people on the shore.

They put him into a great chair they had set among them, and which they had taken out of the Court itself, or one of its rooms or passages. Over the chair they had thrown a red flag, and to the back of it they had bound a pike with a red cap on its top. In this car of triumph not even the Doctor's entreaties could prevent his being carried to his home on men's shoulders, with a confused sea of red cap heaving about him, and cutting the air from the stormy deep such wrecks of face that he more than once misdoubted his personal safety in confusion, and that he was in the tumbril on his way to the Guillotine.

In wild, dreamlike procession, embracing whom they met and pointing him out, they carried him on. Reddening the stony streets with the prevailing Republican color, in winding and tramping through them, as they had reddened them before the new era of a deeper dye, they carried him thus into the court-yard of the building where he lived. Her father was gone on before to prepare her, and when her husband stood upon his feet she dropped insensible in his arms.

As he held her to his heart and turned her beautiful head between his face and the bleeding crowd, so that his tears and her lips might come together unseen, a few of the people fell to dancing. Instantly all the rest fell to dancing, and the court-yard overflowed with the Carmagnole. Then they elevated into the vacant chair a young woman from the crowd to be carried as the Goddess of Liberty, and then, swelling and overflowing out into the adjacent streets, and along the river's bank, and over the bridge, the Carmagnole absorbed them every one and whirled them away.

After grasping the Doctor's hand, as he stood victorious and proud before him; after grasping the hand of Mr. Lorry, who came panting up in breathless from his struggle against the waterspout of the Carmagnole; after kissing little Lucie, who was lifted up to clasp her arms round his neck; and after embracing the ever-faithful and faithful Pross who lifted her, he took his wife in his arms and carried her up to their rooms.

"Lucie! My own! I am safe."

"Oh, dearest Charles! let me thank God for this on my knees as I have prayed to Him."

They all reverently bowed their heads and hearts. When she rose again in the room as said to her:

"And now speak to your father, dearest. No other man in all this France could have done what he has done for me."

She laid her head upon her father's breast as she had laid his poor head on her own breast long, long ago. He was happy in the return he had made her, he was recompensed for his suffering, he was proud of his strength. "You must not be weak, my darling," he remonstrated; "I don't tremble so. I have saved him."

CHAPTER VII.

A KNOCK AT THE DOOR.

"I HAVE saved him." It was not another of the dreams in which he had often come back; he was really here. And yet his wife trembled, and a vague but heavy fear was upon her.

All the air around was so thick and dark, the people were so passionately revengeful and fitful, the innocent were so constantly put to death on vague suspicion and black malice, it was so impossible to forget that many an innocent life passed away in the open air of the streets, or was taken relentlessly in its sight, that her husband, though he had been released, and that her heart could not be as lightened of its load as she felt it ought to be. The shadows of the afternoon were beginning to fall, and even now the dreadful carts were rolling through the streets. Her mind pursued them, looking for him among the Condemned; and then she clung closer to his real presence and trembled anew.

Her father, observing her, showed a compassionate superiority to his weakness, which was wonderful to see. No garret, no shoe-making, no One Hundred and Five, North Tower, now! He had accomplished the task he had set himself, his promise was redeemed, he had saved Charles. Let them all lean upon him.

Their housekeeping was of a very frugal kind; not only because that was the safest way of life, involving the least offense to the people, but because they were not rich, and Charles, throughout his imprisonment, had had to pay heavily for his bad food, and for his guard, and toward the living of the poorer prisoners. Partly on this account, and partly to avoid a domestic spy, they kept no servant; the citizen and citizeness who acted as porters at the court-yard gate rendered them occasional service; and Jerry (almost wholly transferred to them by

"THE CITIZEN EVRÉMONDE, CALLED DARNAY."

Mr. Lorry had become their daily retainer, and had his bed there every night.

It was an ordinance of the Republic One and Indivisible of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, or Death, that on the door or door-post of every house the name of every inmate must be legibly inscribed in letters of a certain size, at a certain convenient height from the ground. Mr. Jerry Cruncher's name, therefore, duly embellished the door-post down below; and on the afternoon alluded to, the words "Jerry" were painted on it, over the smaller inscription "Mrs. Cruncher," by the jerry-builder who had contracted for the whole work, and had done it for so little, that he must clearly have relied on being able to put in the plaster afterwards, as the fittest occasion should present itself, to add the words "and Son."

Mr. Cruncher had discharged the office of purveyor of the dead (a branch of the profession of which he was by no means ignorant) for some time, and was in the habit of driving to his place of work at all hours of the night and early morning. On the night of the day on which the knitting-woman had been disturbed at her work by hearing the name of Defarge pronounced, Mr. Cruncher, having been knocked up at midnight, made ready to go out.

"I am going to work to-night, Jerry," said Mr. Cruncher's wife, when he had risen and dressed himself.

"Then take me with you, father!" said Young Jerry, who always assisted in those affairs, and who participated in his father's taste for them.

"I'll see about it," said Mr. Cruncher, with business caution. "Have you been to bed, Jerry?"

"No, father."

"How long do you mean to lie there, then?"

"Shall I go to bed, father?"

"Well, I suppose you had better," was the answer, given with some hesitation.

So, young Jerry, who had only been watching his opportunity for the question, lay down again on the shavings and rubbish, and fell asleep.

Mr. Cruncher's wife was a pale, thin woman, whose peculiarity seemed to be, that she was all the time thinking about herself. She was the person most continually present to her husband's mind, because he could not fail to discern in her the capacity of rendering him uncomfortable. Indeed, she rendered him so frequently uncomfortable, that he had directed his mind to the consideration of what he should do, when she should die. He had come to the conclusion, that as she must be provided with a certain set of infirmities, and would be incapable of bearing the loss of them, he would have her die of a painful disease. He had begun to contemplate this scheme before he had taken to the trade of which he was now a member; and he had got it well matured in his mind, when he was knocked up at midnight.

"Now, Mrs. Cruncher," said Mr. Cruncher, "if you're ready, I am."

Jerry, who had fallen asleep, was heard to snore.

"Are you going to take that boy?" asked Mrs. Cruncher.

"Yes, I am."

"Then you had better not."

"Why, I thought you wished me to?"

"I don't wish him to do anything but what he's used to, and you know he's used to nothing but drowsing and thieving. Why should you contaminate the child?"

"Contaminate!" Mr. Cruncher looked at her, pondering on her peculiarities of speech.

"Yes, I said it once, and I say it again, contaminate. Don't wallow in roots, if you must dig."

"Dig!" Mr. Cruncher growled, with an angry sense of injury.

"Yes, dig. Are you short of patience?"

Mr. Cruncher growled obscurely.

"Are you short of breath, that you use worse language than usual?"

Mr. Cruncher growled more obscurely.

"Then keep clear of the subject. Don't wallow in it. Jerry, you listen to me. Your father's business is honest, and nothing but honest shall you say before me. Mind that. Now, you've been and dug up your last, and you've been and got drunk your last. Mind that."

Young Jerry, who had heard these words often, and knew them by rote, thought that enough had been said, and that he might safely close his eyes again. He did so, and the words were spoken.

"Now, Mr. Cruncher," said his wife, "if you're ready, I am."

Mr. Cruncher hoisted Young Jerry out of the shavings, and began to wrap him round his throat. The boy was at once alert and active, and assisted readily.

"Are you all right, Jerry?" said his father, when he had finished.

"All right, father."

"Then come along. Mind! I don't want to hear a word from you."

Jerry obeyed, and they went out at the door. Mr. Cruncher's wife followed them to the door, and stood there looking after them.

"Mind!" she said, emphatically, to her husband's back.

The back took no notice, and passed on.

"Mind!" she said, louder.

Mr. Cruncher looked back.

"Are you capable of it?"

"I am going to work," he answered, doggedly.

"I ask you, are you capable of it?"

"I am going to work," he answered, doggedly.

"Then be careful."

Finding that she had spoken her worst, she shut the door.

"Is she calling after us?" said Young Jerry.

"No," returned his father, looking straight before him.

"She's calling after us, father, that she is."

"Don't know her."

"Don't know her, father?"

"No."

"She knows you, father."

"Don't care if she does."

"She's a-looking after us, father, still."

"Don't look back, then. Look before you."

"Which way, father?"

"Any way. Don't keep talking."

Impressed by the remembrance that his mother had cautioned him to be careful, Young Jerry, who had a large experience of his father's character, and who had a great mind to ask him whether he was going to rob anybody, thought it best to hold his peace. He therefore said nothing, and kept his eyes straight before him.

The night was raw and misty, and the two went their way along the streets, until they came to Temple Bar. Here, Young Jerry plucked his father's sleeve, and asked him if he were going fishing?

"Why do you ask?" said Mr. Cruncher.

"Because of the rods."

"Shan't want 'em."

Not another word passed between them, until they had crossed Fleet-street and Cheapside, and were in Newgate-street. Here, Young Jerry, whose thoughts had been wandering in search of subjects for the morning's sport, plucked his father's sleeve again.

"Father! There's the Devil!"

"Where?"

"There!" pointing through the railings.

"Don't see him," said Mr. Cruncher, looking hard at the inscription over the debtors' door.

"Yes, father, there he is. He's a-looking straight at us."

"Don't see him," said Mr. Cruncher, looking hard at the turnkey who kept watch within the debtors' door.

"Father! Look! What a game he is a-playing at! He's a-making faces at us."

"Don't see him," said Mr. Cruncher, looking hard at the thief-taker who had collared him.

"Father! He's gone now. He's disappeared."

"Good job, too," said Mr. Cruncher, with a relieved mind.

"Father, I'm a-going to speak to him, unless you tell me not."

"Then don't tell me not."

"What a game he is a-playing at, father! Making faces at the gentleman in the pillory."

"Oh, indeed," said Mr. Cruncher, looking at the pillory.

"Father, I'm a-going to ask him to have a drink with us."

"If you do, I'll kick you home when we get you."

Apparently animated by this parental promise, Young Jerry, who had shown symptoms of an intention to dart across the road, thought better of it, and kept close to his father. Mr. Cruncher walked him up and down near the pillory for some time, exchanging occasional remarks with the populace in the shape of compliments on the position of the criminal; and when he thought his son's curiosity sufficiently allayed, he pushed him up the street before him, and entered a tavern known to him, where he gave him a meal of bread and meat, and a mug of beer.

Mr. Cruncher sat at his meal on one side of a small table in the common room of the tavern, and Young Jerry sat on the other side, strengthening himself with beer. Mr. Cruncher was not unmindful that the beer would have a tendency to expedite his son's digestion of his food, with a view to the preservation of his own temper.

A tavern-clock in the room informed Young Jerry that the hour was twenty minutes short of midnight, when Young Jerry's repast was finished. His father had preceded him in refreshing himself, and had risen from table to stand before the fire, where he was now picking his teeth with a pair of knives, stolen from the pockets of passengers who had been confided to his care. Perceiving that Young Jerry had concluded, he said, "Wait here, you," and went out.

Young Jerry waited, speculating on the amount of his father's takings for the night, until his father returned, and directed him to walk out. They recrossed Fleet-street, and went down to the river.

Before the water-side public-houses, there were many scows lying at their moorings, and Mr. Cruncher looked for one of these scows with an experienced eye. He selected one, and directed his son's attention to the side of the boat on which the letters G. R. were painted.

"Now, Jerry, look at that, and look out."

Young Jerry looked at it, and looked out.

Mr. Cruncher, shaking his head at the boat, as if he were compelled against his will to speak to it, growled:

"Keep a sharp look-out for the Stanley Black Cow!"

Some grave fishermen, who had their eyes on the same object, seemed to think that it might be somewhere in the direction of Southwark Bridge. Mr. Cruncher, however, turned his back upon it, and walked up the river-side.

The light of the fire at the top of the Monument was seen, and high towers of churches rose against the stars, and the night was fair and calm, when Mr. Cruncher and his son, arm in arm, but neither looking at the other, came near to the Custom-house Quay.

"Father! Look out!"

"Don't see him," said Mr. Cruncher, looking out keenly.

"He's gone, father!"

"Good job, too," said Mr. Cruncher, with a grave nod.

"Father, I'm a-going to speak to him, unless you tell me not."

"Then don't tell me not."

"What a game he is a-playing at, father! He's a-making faces at the Custom-house."

"Don't see him," said Mr. Cruncher, looking hard at the Custom-house.

"Father! He's gone now. He's disappeared."

"Good job, too," said Mr. Cruncher, with a satisfied air.

"Father, I'm a-going to ask him to have a drink with us."

"If you do, I'll kick you home when we get you."

Apparently animated by this parental promise, Young Jerry, who had shown symptoms of an intention to dart across the road, thought better of it, and kept close to his father. Mr. Cruncher walked him up and down near the Custom-house for some time, exchanging occasional remarks with the populace in the shape of compliments on the position of the criminal; and when he thought his son's curiosity sufficiently allayed, he pushed him up the street before him, and entered a tavern known to him, where he gave him a meal of bread and meat, and a mug of beer.

Mr. Cruncher sat at his meal on one side of a small table in the common room of the tavern, and Young Jerry sat on the other side, strengthening himself with beer. Mr. Cruncher was not unmindful that the beer would have a tendency to expedite his son's digestion of his food, with a view to the preservation of his own temper.

A tavern-clock in the room informed Young Jerry that the hour was twenty minutes short of midnight, when Young Jerry's repast was finished. His father had preceded him in refreshing himself, and had risen from table to stand before the fire, where he was now picking his teeth with a pair of knives, stolen from the pockets of passengers who had been confided to his care. Perceiving that Young Jerry had concluded, he said, "Wait here, you," and went out.

Young Jerry waited, speculating on the amount of his father's takings for the night, until his father returned, and directed him to walk out. They recrossed Fleet-street, and went down to the river.

Before the water-side public-houses, there were many scows lying at their moorings, and Mr. Cruncher looked for one of these scows with an experienced eye. He selected one, and directed his son's attention to the side of the boat on which the letters G. R. were painted.

"Now, Jerry, look at that, and look out."

Young Jerry looked at it, and looked out.

Mr. Cruncher, shaking his head at the boat, as if he were compelled against his will to speak to it, growled:

"Keep a sharp look-out for the Stanley Black Cow!"

Some grave fishermen, who had their eyes on the same object, seemed to think that it might be somewhere in the direction of Southwark Bridge. Mr. Cruncher, however, turned his back upon it, and walked up the river-side.

The light of the fire at the top of the Monument was seen, and high towers of churches rose against the stars, and the night was fair and calm, when Mr. Cruncher and his son, arm in arm, but neither looking at the other, came near to the Custom-house Quay.

"Father! Look out!"

"Don't see him," said Mr. Cruncher, looking out keenly.

"He's gone, father!"

"Good job, too," said Mr. Cruncher, with a satisfied air.

"Father, I'm a-going to speak to him, unless you tell me not."

"Then don't tell me not."

"What a game he is a-playing at, father! He's a-making faces at the gentleman in the pillory."

"Oh, indeed," said Mr. Cruncher, looking at the pillory.

"Father, I'm a-going to ask him to have a drink with us."

"If you do, I'll kick you home when we get you."

Apparently animated by this parental promise, Young Jerry, who had shown symptoms of an intention to dart across the road, thought better of it, and kept close to his father. Mr. Cruncher walked him up and down near the pillory

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 67 Centre Street.

Patent Extension Tables,
At Herodin's Manufactory, 143, 159 Wooster Street.

Trusses Shoulder Braces, Elastic Stockings, bandages, and Dr. Glover's new lever truss. No. 4 Ann St.

Quarterman's Patent Stove Polish,
No. 114 Nassau Street, New York.

Improved Billiard Tables.
W. I. Sharp, Manufacturer, 141 Nassau Street.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Sore Throat, Incipient Consumption, Whooping Cough, Croup, Asthma, Inflammation of the Lungs; while even Consumption itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other remedies seem have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly produce one of equal value.

To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several worthless ones, see that each bottle has the written signature of "I. Butts," on the face of the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

YOUNG MAN, DO YOU WANT EMPLOYMENT that will pay—take no agency for our publications. Address LONGLEY, WELLS, N. Y.

Saponifier. Saponifier. Saponifier.

No Family, or Public or Private Institution, should be without this economical and ready Soap Maker.

Full directions for making Soft, Hard, and Fancy Soaps from the refuse grease of the kitchen, fat, or tallow, accompany each pound iron can.

For sale by Druggists and Grocers generally. Beware of Counterfeits. The success of this article has induced unprincipled parties to imitate it, who are being prosecuted for infringing our patent Rights.

The genuine manufactured only by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company.

Office 306 Penn Street, Pittsburgh, Pa.
LEWIS, JAMES & CO, Agents,
Philadelphia.

HARD TIMES NO MORE.—ANY Lady or Gentleman in the United States, possessing from $5 to $5,000, can make life an easy and respectable business, by which from $5 to $50 per day can be realized. For particulars, address (with stamp),
W. R. ACTON & CO., 61 North SIXTH Street,
Philadelphia.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office building, Washington City, D. C.

Bank Note Engraving.

AMERICAN
BANK NOTE COMPANY,
MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE,
NEW YORK.
OFFICE 7
New York, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Montreal, and Chicago.

PIANO FORTES.—
RAVEN, BACON & CO.,
Piano Forte Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 135 Grand Street, near Broadway, New York. A assortment of Instruments may be found, exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted for five years.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, ARE UNRIVALLED BY ANY.

500 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
620 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
203 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
6 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

301 BROADWAY 339
BRIDAL SUITS,
Tonkin's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items,
Are all reliable.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER PAINT of 1859 is now ready. Established 1850. For Roofs, Wood, Iron, Tin, Bricks, Canvass, Muslin, Paper, &c., giving durability, beauty, and economy. Sells and cinder proof. Durable and Economical. Depot 74 Maiden Lane, New York.
HICKS & BETTS, Agents.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION. To Ten Volunteer Agents, one commencing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations, will be sent free of charge. Address, for full particulars, stating where you have been engaged in the business and reference, BENSON J. LOSSING, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Applications should name the County, City, or State in which you desire to operate.

GEO. W. ELLIOTT, late HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES, Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE. 280th edition, over 200 pages, 12mo cloth, and above 100 Electrotype Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York. Sent, free, to any address, on receipt of price. Nothing like it. Only book extant, as it imparts knowledge all have sought after in vain in any other book, and should be in every part of the country. by W. A. TOWNSEND & CO., No. 36 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

THE ORIGINAL HAIR RESTORATIVE.

Heimstreet's Inimitable Hair Coloring.

The Only Reliable Article in Use.

The attention of the public is called to this article, which is now being extensively advertised and sold in all parts of the country. FIFTEEN YEARS' EXPERIENCE proves it to be the best relied for RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR, BRINGING HAIR OUT ON BALD HEADS,

AND CAUSING IT TO GROW STRONG AND HEALTHY.

It is not a WATERY preparation, which freezes upon the approach and during cold weather, but is composed of Oil and Stimulating Spirits, and IT WILL NOT FREEZE.

Those who desire an article which they can use and ALWAYS recommend, are invited to read the following, from a well-known Apothecary:

FOUR YEARS' EXPERIENCE WITH HAIR RESTORATIVES.

MESSRS. W. E. HALLS & CO.,—Gentlemen: I have been selling HEIMSTREET'S "INIMITABLE HAIR RESTORATIVE" for three or four years with good satisfaction and success. I have tried two or three others, but for some years has the decided preference among them. I have never hesitated to recommend it for all it claims to, and Several ladies of our town who had been wearing false hair for several years have had it sold, and now have a full and luxuriant head of hair of original shade and color, produced by using two or more bottles of your article; and when by some means they have been induced to try something else, pulmed upon them as being superior, they have almost invariably returned to the use of your Hair Coloring, as more satisfactory and reliable article in use—finding it as a toilette article as cheap as any of the Hair Oils or Washes with which the market is flooded.

I am, yours, very truly, S. B. EMMONS.

RETAIL PRICE, 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE. SOLD AT WHOLESALE BY ALL LARGE DEALERS IN THE UNITED STATES.

W. E. HAGAN & CO, Proprietors,
Troy, New York.

Who also manufacture ROYCE & ESTERLY'S DENTIFRICE, and KNIGHT'S INDELIBLE INK.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S, PERFUMERY,
Sold by all Druggists in every city.
Wholesale Agents,
J. PHILLIPS,
87 Pearl St. New-York.

EVERETT HOUSE,
HAWLEY D. CLAFF, Proprietor,
NORTH SIDE UNION SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S NO. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S NO. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $50.
HEMMING GAITERS REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL,
Perfumer, London and Paris.

200 HOW to LIVE CHEAP. 200
For 10 cents per year. Address
THOMAS R. AGNEW,
No. 259 Greenwich Street, cor. Murray.
Goods delivered free.

To Inventors. Important Notice.

Just issued, a pamphlet of advice how to procure patents for

NEW INVENTIONS.

Sent free on application to MUNN & CO., Editors Scientific American, 128 Fulton Street, New York.

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR Family and Plantation use. Agency, 514 Broadway, up stairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.
H. C. LEE, Agt.

Boynton's Self-Clearing, Self-Packing, and Vanishing Gas-Tight Furnace has been thoroughly tested in this community for the last two years, and has proved itself to be PERFECTLY REliable, Economical, and POPULAR. Furnace in operation. Call and examine the merits of this Furnace, or send for descriptive circular, with references to those who have them in use.
RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
No. 350 Canal Street, New York.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS. —Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

$100 A MONTH!! Agents Wanted!

We want Agents in every City and County in the United States and Canada. The above and more can be made by addressing, with Post-Office Stamp,
HODGES, DAVIS & CO.,
Macon, Georgia,
who will send full particulars.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP —and FAMILY EXTRACTS are confidently recommended for their excellent properties and delightful aroma.

Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

Lyceum Lectures.

By
Rev. J. C. Fletcher.

27th Address the Lecture, care of Messrs. Tickner & Fields, Boston, Mass. ☞

The undersigned is now making his engagements for the Lecture Season of 1859-60. The subjects to which he calls the attention of Lecture Committees are as follows: (1.) Naples, Pompeii, and Mount Vesuvius. (2.) Scenes and Incidents. (3.) The Land of Tell. (4.) Northern Italy and the Waldenses. (5.) The Palm Tree. Those will be delivered separately or in courses. Mr. Fletcher having lectured before the N. Y. Historical Society, Mercantile Library, Boston Mercantile Library Association, Smithsonian Institute, and many Lyceums in different parts of the United States, feels pleasure in referring to Hon. Luther Bradish, Rev. Dr. Bethune, Rev. Dr. Osgood, Rev. Dr. Adams, Rev. Dr. Hilland, Esq., Boston, Mass., Dr. Holland (Timothy Titcomb), Springfield, Mass.; Prof. Henry, Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D. C.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,

FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A PURGATIVE MEDICINE.

FOR COSTIVENESS;
FOR THE CURE OF DYSPEPSIA;
FOR JAUNDICE;
FOR THE CURE OF INDIGESTION;
FOR HEADACHE;
FOR THE CURE OF DISORDERS
FOR A FOUL STOMACH;
FOR THE CURE OF BILIOUSNESS;
FOR THE FEVER;
FOR THE CURE OF SCROFULA;
FOR ALL ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN;
FOR THE CURE OF RHEUMATISM;
FOR DISEASES OF THE SKIN;
FOR THE CURE OF LIVER COMPLAINT;
FOR DROPSY;
FOR THE CURE OF TETTER, TUMORS, AND SALT RHEUM; FOR WORMS;
FOR THE CURE OF GOUT;
FOR A DISORDER FEEL;
FOR THE CURE OF NEURALGIA;
FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

They are sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and being purely vegetable, no harm can arise from their use in any quantity.

Price 25 cents per Box; Five Boxes for $1.00.

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.
Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET—ALL THE year round, and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes of Paris and London.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER is superior to any other rouge for the skin, and renders it soft and beautiful.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS. —Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

EXCELSIOR BURR STONE FARM AND PLANTATION MILL
Agency, No. 48 Gold Street, N. Y.
This Mill, recently improved, meets the wants of Planters and Farmers, does splendid work with any one or horse power, and will last a lifetime; is perfectly simple, that any man of ordinary intelligence can see and keep in order. Buy no Mill without examining the merits of this.
Descriptive Circulars sent from this Agency.
J. A. BENNET.

EXTRA INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS. —Send for one of our new Circulars and Price Lists.
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

TO THE NERVOUS OF BOTH SEXES. A Retired Clergyman, having been restored to health in a few days, after many years of great nervous suffering, is willing to make known to his fellow-sufferers the prescription used. Direct the Rev. John M. Bagnall, 140 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WESTERN BELL (THE). A New Collection of Sacred Music, Original and Selected, by E. H. Pease and E. A. Perkins. This volume will be found of unusual excellence. The great variety and originality of its contents will fully meet the wants of those who, wearied with the continued repetition of old songs in books of this nature, have long demanded something new. Price, $1.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Fair of the American Institute,
At Palace Garden,
W. 14th Street, near the 6th Avenue,
NOW OPEN.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our large and elegant assortment of this jewelry, consisting of bracelets, brooches, ear-rings, sets, busts, studs, lockets, bangles, &c. &c.
OSBORNE, BOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
No. 337 Broadway, corner of Leonard Street.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.
THE PERUVIAN SYRUP, OR PROTOXIDE OF IRON IN THE BLOOD, a tonic of long standing, and well established reputation, is now offered to the afflicted. Its wonderful effects in restoring to perfect health the worst forms of debility, dyspepsia, liver complaint, and all diseases that arise from a poor state of the blood, are known to thousands who have used it, and are ready to testify to the facts which we are prepared to lay before them.
HARRIS & CO., No. 60 Broadway.
A pamphlet "On the Importance of Iron in the Human Organism" can be had on application.

Guinea & Son's Extra Double Steel and Porter. In Imperial Pints and Common Pints.
For sale by their AGENTS in the United States,
C. E. HARRIGHT,
No. 171 Pearl Street.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach, etc.
PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 313 Water Street.
For Sale Everywhere.

For the Toilet, and Family Use.
THE GENUINE
ORIGINAL HONEY SOAP.
Manufactured by
YARDLEY & STATHAM,
LONDON.

The high reputation of this Soap in Europe and America is a sufficient guarantee for its superior qualities. The genuine article has the makers' names impressed on each cake as follows:
Sole Agents for the United States,
J. W. BORGOSS & CO.,
Importers of Fancy Soaps,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 128 to 144 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

The October Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is commencing with the publication of Lever's "Virginians," a story of ORIGINAL ARTICLES furnished by American writers.

This Number contains papers from the following Contributors:

D. R. CASTLETON, Esq.
JOHN ESTEN COOKE, Esq.
GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, Esq.
MISS JANE M. FLEET.
ALFRED H. GUERNSEY, Esq.
MRS. ANNA C. LOWELL.
EDWARD LIVERMORE, Esq.
MRS. A. LOMBARD, M.D.
CHARLES NORDHOFF, Esq.
FRANK B. NORTON, Esq.
REV. SAMUEL OSGOOD, D.D.
REV. S. IRENÆUS PRIME, D.D.
GEORGE HOUSE, Esq.
MRS. H. B. STOWE.
T. G. SUTHERLAND, Esq.
W. M. THACKERAY, Esq.
WILLIAM ROSE WALLACE, Esq.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . . 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

Postage within the State of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, Sixpence, one year.

The postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The postage is Twenty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," illustrated by FRED. BARNARD, Esq., was commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

NEW AND VALUABLE CONTRIBUTORS:

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS, Esq.
MRS. ANNA C. LOWELL.
MRS. A. LOMBARD, M.D.
CHARLES NORDHOFF, Esq.
FRANK B. NORTON, Esq.
REV. S. IRENÆUS PRIME, D.D.
T. G. SUTHERLAND, Esq.
W. M. THACKERAY, Esq.
WILLIAM ROSE WALLACE, Esq.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise by the Year.

The Postage to any City of New York within "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names at the Office of the Publication, without money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

SCENE—A FASHIONABLE PLACE ON THE SEA-SHORE.

FIRST IRRESISTIBLE BRITISHER (on Horseback.). "Ullo, 'Arry! Why, what has brought you here?"
SECOND DITTO. "Why, yer see, Bill, I'm precious sick of Working for my Living, so I've come here to Pick up an 'Airess!"

ON BOARD THE RIVAL LINE TO CALIFORNIA.

PASSENGER. "I say, Steward, you don't mean to say that you charge a feller Five Dollars for Two Drinks!"

STEWARD. "Guess so, Mister. You don't suppose we kin carry you to California for Forty-five Dollars, and not make an profit noways? Do yer?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IRVING'S WASHINGTON is Complete, in 5 vols. Price from $7 to $35.

IRVING'S WORKS are Complete. 21 vols. Price from $37 50 to $85.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S WORKS, Complete. (Next month) in 8 vols.

Send for lists.

G. P. PUTNAM,
10 Park Place, N. Y.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S GREECE AND RUSSIA. $1 25.

BININGER'S OLD LONDON DOCK GIN.

"Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the exploded "Gins"—"Aromatic," "Cordial," "Medicated," &c., is endorsed by all of the prominent physicians, chemists, and confectioners as possessing all of those curative medicinal qualities (acids and diuretic) which belong to an old and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and sold by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 338 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON,
FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as endears the female life, a really efficient medicine must be their best friend. Where the most eminent physicians have failed, this Catholicon has performed cures. Call or send for pamphlet to the Sole Agent. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—New Bedford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our own family."—Worcester's Advocate, Phila. "No article ever answered the recommendation like this. I use it in my practice with astonishing results."—E. B. Foote, M.D., Marietta, O. "I have tested it in cases of Irregularities, Uterations, Leu.rhea, Bleeding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteris, &c., with great success. It is worthy of the notice of the Faculty."—Dr. Genese, M.D., Baltimore, Md. "Travel upon medical men to use it."—Jesse Lowe, M.D., Lawrenceville, Ga. Many letters prior in from a thousand sources, showing it to

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the Female Sex. Druggists, Wives, and Mothers! Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by Agents. ☞ Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It is sold at $1 per bottle, or three bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every town. When not found, enclose money, and order by Express. Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
15 and 16 PARK ROW, N. Y.
Or J. D. Park, Cincinnati; Weeks & Potter, Boston; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans. J. B. MARCHISI, M.D.

NOW OPEN
DUNLAP & CO.'S
Branch Store, under the 5th Avenue Hotel. Children's Hats and Caps in endless variety, imported, and of their own manufacture.
Gentlemen's fall styles just lasted.

John S. Andrews'
Gift Book Establishment.
37 PARK ROW,
Opposite City Hall, New York.

INDUCEMENTS FOR GETTING UP CLUBS.

On an order for 10 Books,	1 Extra,	$1 Book and	1 Gift.
" "	18	"	2	"	$1	"	2 "
" "	25	"	3	"	$1	"	3 "
" "	50	"	6	"	$1	"	6 "
" "	75	"	9	"	$1	"	9 "
" "	100	"	12	"	$1	"	12 "
" "	150	"	18	"	$1	"	18 "

I sell many books for one dollar the same as sold at other stores for $1 75. I will guarantee to give more valuable Gifts than can be obtained at any other establishment, and will include a Silver Watch, with an order for a Book; also, a Gold Watch, with an order for 100 Books.

I WILL FILL ORDERS FOR BOOKS FROM THE CATALOGUES OF ANY GIFT BOOK ESTABLISHMENT AS WELL AS FROM MY OWN. Should there be an overcharge on Books selected from other catalogues, I will refund the amount. Every exertion will be made to give satisfaction to those who may favor me with their patronage. A new and revised Catalogue sent to any address.

J. S. ANDREWS, 37 Park Row, N. Y.

Thomas Andrews'
"Excelsior" Yeast Powder

Is sure to supersede all other preparations where quick yeast is required! Nothing can excel the purity or efficacy of this compound. Every good housekeeper should try our Yeast Powder; it is ready for use in one minute! Only 25 cents per can—and this yeast. Get our "EXCELSIOR" YEAST POWDER from your grocer, and take no other. Manufactured by

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
No. 140 and 138 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years.

Out of the Depths.

THE GREAT NEW NOVEL.—The Story of a Woman's Life. "A brave, a remarkable book."—Church of England Review. Price $1 00, mailed post free.

W. A. TOWNSEND & CO.,
No. 46 Walker Street, N. Y.

Glass Shades!

Glass Shades made to order!!

Of all sizes, for covering Clocks, Flowers, &c., constantly on hand and made to order.
Depot, No. 156 William, corner of Ann Street.

Vest not inflated.

Vest inflated.

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.
Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Shirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Waists and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

☞ Keep it before the People
THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES.

GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA,
ORIGINATOR
OF THE
Gift Book Business,
AND PROPRIETOR OF THE
OLDEST AND LARGEST
GIFT BOOK ESTABLISHMENT
IN THE WORLD

Calls attention to the fact that he has made such arrangements with other publishers and manufacturers, that it gives him pleasure to offer

GREATER INDUCEMENTS

than ever, and such

THAT CAN NOT BE EQUALED

by any other Gift Book House in the world.

ALL BOOKS

are sold at the

PUBLISHERS' PRICES,

AND A

SPLENDID GIFT,

WORTH FROM

50 CENTS TO $100,

IS GIVEN WITH EACH BOOK.

A selection can be made from the

Largest Stock of Books

IN THE COUNTRY,

And by complying with the directions as given in the Catalogue, you will receive your Book

FREE OF EXPENSE

for carriage or mailing, and a guarantee of

NO RISK OR LOSS BY MAIL.

To give an idea of the extent and the honorable method of transacting business, we would state to you that

223 GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES,

AND OVER

250,000 DOLLARS WORTH OF JEWELRY,

have been

GIVEN AWAY

during the past six months, each article of which has been of the finest quality, and has given satisfaction in every instance.

SEND FOR A CATALOGUE,

which will be sent gratis, and which contains a list of Books in every department of literature.

Comprising:
HISTORY,
BIOGRAPHY,
ADVENTURES,
MECHANICS,
MANUFACTURES,
ARCHITECTURE,
THEOLOGY,
GEOGRAPHY,
NATURAL HISTORY,
ALBUMS, ANNUALS, BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, HYMN BOOKS, SINGING BOOKS, JUVENILE BOOKS, WRITING PAPER, LETTER PAPER, AND ENVELOPES.

ONE TRIAL WILL ASSURE YOU

of the honorable business transactions of

GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA.

AGENTS WANTED,

Who can, with George G. Evans' Catalogue, obtain more customers than by any other, as the Books and Gifts enumerated are superior to those of any other house. Any one, either male or female, who desires to engage and one that requires but little time, is requested to address G. G. Evans, and they will receive every information relative to the business.

IN AN HONORABLE

AND PROFITABLE EMPLOYMENT,

DO NOT FAIL TO ADDRESS

GEORGE G. EVANS,
ORIGINATOR OF THE
GIFT BOOK BUSINESS,
No. 439 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA.

Farrel, Herring & Co.'s
(Herring's Patent)
Champion Fire and Burglar Proof Safes,
629 CHESTNUT STREET (Jayne's Hall)
PHILADELPHIA.
Sideboard and Parlor Safes for Dwelling Houses, &c.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 147.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

OUR CIRCULATION.

FOR several months past we have printed from EIGHTY to NINETY-THREE THOUSAND COPIES per week of HARPER'S WEEKLY, more than DOUBLE that of any other Illustrated Newspaper in the country.

For terms, etc., see advertisement on the 15th page of this paper.

Sketches of the People who oppose our Sunday Laws.

No. III.

THE STADT THEATRE.

Or the Sunday night allurements of the Bowery the beer gardens, although the most numerous, are not always the most absorbing. There are other means of entertainment which frequently claim a closer attention from the German community. The announcement of a new singer or an exciting drama at the Stadt Theatre sinks the gardens into immediate inferiority, and insures, by the keener fervor of its attraction, an audience larger in numbers, more liberal in clamor, and somewhat looser in deportment than any that the less ambitious of the surrounding resorts can command; and this, too, in spite of the advance in prices, which has the effect of compelling, in many cases, a most unwilling abstinence from the soothing pleasures of malt.

The Stadt Theatre stands in the midst of that lively district where on Sunday nights the Germans most do congregate. Where the throng is thickest—where the turmoil rises to its highest excess—where the sidewalk is a scene of perpetual struggling and writhing—there you will find it. It is not an imposing structure, nor yet is it altogether contemptible in appearances. You would consider it a fair specimen of a fourth-rate edifice. Its portal is ample, but the passage is seldom clear—for the cautious patrons, not to be taken unawares, cluster together in masses, and devote much time to the study of posters. But as managerial wisdom, gained by experience, reserves its most enticing programmes for the Sunday evening performances, the usual result is an impetuous assault upon the ticket-office, which only terminates when aisles and lobbies overflow, and officials come forth with earnest assurance that no inch of room remains.

An early entrance gives you a comfortable point of observation, and leaves to get yourself up on the bill of entertainment, which, being in the highest possible German, and rendered furthermore obscure by a peculiarly fantastic species of typography, naturally demands considerable scrutiny before complete comprehension is attained. After a proper amount of study, you are prepared to assert that the programme is a disingenuous production. You are even ready, if necessary, to proclaim it a delusive fiction, tolerably well calculated to mislead the innocent and unsuspecting American mind. For the first two words which it contains, in the English language, and more prominently printed than all the rest, are, and the rest, all in German, give the detailed order of coming events, here foreshadowed as short plays of the class known as "roaring farces," gay vaudevilles, and orchestral performances of quadrilles, waltzes, and other similar musical hilarities. You speculate upon the cause of this little symptom of mendacity. You wonder whether it arises from a desire to respect the sentiments of that portion of the community in whose eyes this sort of Sunday commemoration does not find favor; or whether it is an attempt to evade in our language the responsibility of what is done in another.

SACRED CONCERT;

Your course of inquiry is cut short by the scene of increasing discomfort which you find yourself subjected to. The audience is flowing in steadily, and settling itself compactly. Like all around you, you are put upon a short allowance of seat. You are forced to undergo a process of compression which fills you with apprehensions as to the result. You grow warmer and warmer, until you boil with indignation. But reflecting that in the Stadt Theatre-goers do, you endeavor to compose yourself, and to divert your attention from your own distress by the consideration of that of others.

But you are amazed to discover that nobody else appears disturbed. Beside you crowds a fair maiden, of the best type of German comeliness, who sits smiling and unconcerned, as if her life had been passed in an oven, or as if nothing were more natural to her than to be surrounded by flames, which, judging from her personal attractiveness, is not, after all, so unpreferable. Your own heart, perhaps, warms to her, but that may be in consequence of the general heat that prevails. Certainly she is a dulcifying object to contemplate. Light flaxen hair, falling profusely, half hides her face, but discloses one cheek, rosy with excitement, and the tip of an ear that must have forgotten to grow since her infancy. She turns, and you are dazzled by her big bright eyes, flashing like blue lights with animation. She smiles, and you are partially intoxicated. She lets fall her handkerchief; with convulsive jerks and twists you stoop, grope, clutch it, and restore it; she thanks you audibly, and you are supremely blessed, notwithstanding the exertion, which was fearful, and which added double intensity to the humid fever which had already fastened upon you.

The impropriety of bestowing incessant gazes upon her occurs to you, and you start off upon a survey of the house. The hour for commencing the performances is close at hand, and the crowd has culminated. Humanity so closely packed you never saw before, not even in the beer gardens. Germans preponderate, but there is also a strong infusion of the Jewish element. Jews of all ages and two sexes are scattered around; old Jews with malignant countenances, unwashed and meanly attired; young Jews with half-developed cunning in their leer, tawdrily dressed and liberally jewelled, at whom watch guards you involuntarily look to see the symbolical three balls, and are disappointed at missing them; Jew de nuels, stern and stately, and often marked by the particular beauty of their race. Of the Germans, you notice whole families sitting in rows, relieving the heaviness of delay by unsubdued jocularities. Some overanxious mothers bear infants in their arms, whose rising tendency to create disturbance by their noises they anxiously strive to restrain. There is one just before you, who cuddles her unruly charge in her arms, and tosses it aloft, and lays it very flat upon its back, and even goes so far as to walk up and down the densely-peopled passage with it, trotting it vigorously the while, but all in vain. A prolonged struggle ends in the triumph of the infantile insolent over the maternal handicraftsmen, and baby is borne reluctantly away, the intention of the audience to behave decorously ended as it starts being checked by the ominous frown of the father, who looks severely round, as to say, "I was an infant at that child; moreover I am strong and my hand is heavy; therefore beware!"

THE NEW YORK GERMAN STADT THEATRE ON SUNDAY EVENING.

Without the artistry of her or establishment for German entertainment could exist. Here, as elsewhere, brisk sale keeps pace with brisk trade. Ready-made wurst from foaming fountains. They will difficulty respond to the unceasing applications which from all sides assail them. Bread and more lishment come in shape of cakes and candy and fruits, but more than equal distribution of the universal impulse is bestowed. Matrons and maidens share it with the rest.

Eight o'clock has passed, and no signs of vitality in the orchestra or upon the stage. First reverberations, then murmurs of impatience, then tumult indicate to turn the temper of the audience. Catcalls, distracting screams, and buttetings of bonbons express a deep dissatisfaction. The Thalia regular Bowery trans sets in, accompanied by the congenial melody of the Black Marsh, which is relished by a hundred pairs of lips. This gives way again to a confused and desperate uproar, in the midst of which the gallery-fit blaze with great accession, and a long-drawn exclamation of content signifies that the footlights have been turned on.

The orchestra appears, and, with all possible spirit, does the "Crown Diamonds" overture—music most glittering and brilliant, but the man it bears would suggest. The first play of the evening begins. It is called "The Uncle from the Province," and is evidently full of good things and smart things and funny things; for the actors are over excited and there is an air, and protrusive vein in the agony of circumscribed ecstasy. You look closely to see what it is all about. There is a scene which represents a country home, with a big balcony, and garden blooming with red roses and gold. There is an old gentleman, a sort of Sir Anthony Absolute, who is passionate by virtue of the conventional heavy style, pictorially snuff-box, and respectable by reason of his white neckcloth. Fury and careless passion him in rapid alternation. He is imperfect in his part, but admirably conceals this deficiency by repeatedly snatching whatever article is at hand, with "Mein Gott!" until the prompter comes to his rescue. There is a young gentleman, who is not a lover, because he wears white pantaloons and has his hair parted in the middle, and is always trying to shake the influence of the provincial uncle beforementioned. There is a pert soubrette in the full blush of rose pink, and a fresh young lover hid in the deathliest pallor of prepared chalk, who is always in a white dress, and never out of misery. These four persons are handed about in the most mysterious complication. The course of true love runs very rough. The young gentleman tries topics, but makes matters worse than ever; and the heartless soubrette puts poisons while he raves about and endangers the lives of the young lover at her suit. Finally, a ladder is brought, and the young lady, conquering her parent's objection to the second to the young gentleman's chamber, the stage having been darkened to signify that evening has arrived. She takes a step or two, and is seen suddenly remembering that the audience can see her as like, stops down, covered with confusion, and is wildly applauded. A second attempt, in a more secluded spot, where interactive eyes can not reach, is more successful, and the young lady carries in happiness with her through the window. Every body is satisfied, and the play ends.

The little enchantress beside you laughs at all the jokes, and claps her hands together until you think they must be tied indeed. Despite this imperfect knowledge of the language, fail to be penetrated by even the broadest points. You, however, with some trepidation, to acquaint your neighbor with the state of the case, and implore a little assistance. She puts you immediately at a pleasant footing by graciously consenting to explain every thing, with the aid of a most quaint broken English in the world. You do not understand any the better after all she says, but it is a comfort to receive her wise smile, and to feel that you need to look knowing, and to laugh whenever she does. In the best you can do.

During the intermission she converses pleasantly, though not always to the point with you. Something is said about the excessive warmth. You summon one of the lads in waiting, and request her to bring you a tin to the extent of a cooling draught at your expense—some lemonade, or a fragrant sobeyade, notwithstanding of that sort. She smiles, and murmurs "Bier."

You wish she had not said beer. It jars against the delicate fancies you had indulged in respecting her. A stout lady in the next behind becomes interested at the mention of beer. You learn that she is the mother of your pretty neighbor, and you find that a proposition to include a mug for her in the supply of the national beverage is received with evident favor.

The mugs are brought, are lifted, are set down empty. The celerity of the operation excites your wonder.

"Another, if you please," says the fair one with the golden locks.

"Another, if you please," echoes mamma.

Not to be singular, you swallow your unpleasant feeling with the remaining contents of your mug, and also say "Another," and the obedient lad performs his duty.

You are less inclined to receive explanations while the second farce proceeds. You perceive that it is boisterously merry, and that the faces of the actors in the middle scenes are deeper tinges as they give themselves up to unrestrained delight. You that they "redder and redder than shall glow," and wonder if the spectators really are accustomed to this Pandemoniac condition of atmosphere. And yet you do not see any sufficient reason to doubt it. You for yourself, you feel that you are not much used to the melting mood, and that you are not fond of it.

The stage is once more vacated and the soft voice of your neighbor rouses you. You talk a while. She is really good to look upon, but you can not lose sight of her mother in point. You believe that a thing of beauty is not in all cases a joy forever; not in the present, for instance. But still you will not be educated. You smile again, and at that moment she intimates, confidentially, that the previous beer was not of the best quality. Of course you have only to call for more, in the absorption of which the complacent mamma will be pleased partake. It is done.

"Another, if you please," says the children.

"Another, if you please," echoes mamma.

You feebly mutter "Another," and sink into torpor. For the last hour or so, the audience has been secured, listen with that horrible distortion printed, and with chesten thickly-coated stage-whisper that the footlights are turned down. Still at the same moment she accepts cheese, mustard, and pretzel, heterogeneously aggravated, within the range of vision.

You think her with some fervor, but declining. You cannot even look complacent, which you hurriedly mention, and, heedless of the farces, the operatic fragments, the ballet, endeavor yet to conceal your feelings through the multitude, and reach the open street and the free atmosphere much relieved.

You conclude, on reflection, that romance has no spirit to listen in a Sunday night performance in the Stadt Theatre.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1859.

THE DEATH OF BRODERICK.

SOCIETY has been shocked by the announcement that Senator Broderick, of California, was killed in duel, on 12th September, by Chief Justice Terry. Most of the papers here characterize the event as a murder. It seems certain that many politicians, among whom Dr. Gwin occupied a conspicuous place, had determined to fight Broderick; had in exasperated Terry, and that the result was to be such. A conviction of the successful duelist can hardly be expected, perhaps; but we may look for some legislation on the subject, and for more nerve to the advantage of Californian society.

There are parts of the United States where a politician must fight a duel, or consent to be called ducks. In the origin, the practice is said to have arisen from the want of a common code or receive of the prevailing rudeness of social customs among the early settlers. Men got into habits of using violent language in order to resent insult; just as Texans carry bowie-knives so as to insure peace and order. Whether the explanation be sound, and we have received its purpose; whether duellists are more tender of each other's feelings than members of the Peace Society; whether bravery is the best virtue to be smarmed, and rare among the General Colleges it is not now worth while to inquire. However it may be, it is a fact that in the present day, as well in California as in every other State of the Union, society could get on very well without duels. Not that we by any means will assert that the abolition of the duello would now involve injurious social consequences.

Yet it is undoubted that, in many States of the Union, a politician who will not fight must stand aside, and can not command the popular suffrage. Better, then, by all considerations, to fight or not as he pleases, but a public man must be ready with the pistol. Whence comes the duel.

We think the problem may be profitably studied by the light of general experience of human nature. Man is carnivorous and bloodyminded creature. Civilization, even of the partial kind, by which we know it, is a result of the best of men have a secret relish for blood, and slaughter, and horrors. Christianity prevents the fierce fights of gladiators and armies; and our brutal instincts rebel against the privation, and Jenkins is tasked to serve us up in the papers daily accounts of murders, carnages, prizefights, and horrid accidents, which are eagerly devoured and gloated over. No topic is as widely attractive as a fiendish murder, or a heart-rending catastrophe. If it were announced to-morrow that a man was going to jump from the top of the City Hall and dash his brains out on the pavement, the Park would be the narrow to contain the spectators. A public execution would draw a larger audience than Ullman's best opera troupe. The most experienced editor in New York, in reply to his inquiry what class of events created the greatest demand for his paper, unhesitatingly replied—"Fires and murders."

Political duellists are the prize-fighters of their part of the country. They are the only men of the community who are known by the phrase the public, and it is on them that the public rely for the gratification of their love of horrors. Broderick, of California, was a man not like being shot at; but the people of Arkansas —like the rest of us—relish the excitement of a duel, and this is the price they set on their suffrages. They have no Jenkins to regale them with newspaper horrors, and they look to their politicians to supply the deficiency. Candidates for office among them they require to be fighting men, just as Mrs. Partington required a footman to be six feet in height. In any other capacity in life these persons might dispense with the chief characteristic of a waiter, the confidence for the foot-board might be spindle-shanked yet successful; as a merchant or a doctor, Jones might succeed without ever handling a fire-arm. But if they will be footmen and statesmen, they know the price.

That is not without its drawbacks. A man may be calved like Goliath of Gath, and yet be a stupid blockhead; and a mere duellist is not necessarily a profound statesman. On the other hand, it is possible to conceive an admirable servant with thin legs, and agacious statesman who will take care to have him the barrel of a loaded pistol. People who glut their love of horrors by insisting on dealing in their political affairs will be apt to be careless in losing the services of such men as these. Conscientious which will vote for none but duellist to run in the field, enjoy the advantage of the services of thoughtful, conscientious, Christianminded men. The flower of Nature's existence may will have the pleasure of seeing their favors for the entertainment of a brutal-minded rabble.

LIGHT BREAKING ON THE CHINESE QUESTION

BEYOND all question the most important document which has been published in reference to the recent affair of the Pei-ho, in China, is the letter from our representative, Mr. Ward, published in the New York Times of 11th instant. That letter, it seems, was written on 26th June—only five days after the fight—and addressed to a private friend in this country, and was by that friend sent to the Times for publication.

We may say, in brief, that it confirms in the fullest manner the view which we have taken of Commodore Tattnall's conduct. That our attitude of neutrality between the maritime powers of Europe and the Chinese has conferred upon us no advantages, and has not been recognized by the Chinese; that we have been indebted to the protection of the fleets of the Allies on the way to and trade in China, and for the slender opportunity we have enjoyed of concluding a satisfactory treaty. For the evidence of the support of the latter proposition we refer to our letter from the Pei-ho, published two weeks ago. The statement that we have always been understanding in the United States navy—states positively that our representative in China was only able to conclude a treaty last year because the Chinese dared not refuse the demands of one who had such powerful friends as the French and English; that we owed our safety on the way to that of the European fleets, and did his business under shelter of their guns; that when they left he was compelled to leave also. In a word, we do not be dwelt upon with too much stress, as illustrating the value of the neutrality by which our home politicians and editors set such store. Mr. Ward now furnishes additional evidence. Some of the newspapers here have blamed him that a more energetic independent way than the State Department concurs in the censure) for having mixed himself up with the European fleets in battle. Better, Why did he not, says an authority which claims to be inspired in high quarters, proceed to have his credentials received by reference to the French and English? Mr. Ward supplies the answer. He says:

"We were in company with the other Powers, not to fight, but to assist. I had distinct orders to cooperate with them; and to secure this end I had left Hong Kong in immediately on my arrival as he afterwards left on the consuls at one of the Hong Kong journals. The Chinese Commissioners agreed to visit our vessels, but when the Commissioners at Shanghai having insisted upon my visiting them, I declined, as I had previously declined visiting with them. In consequence of this we had been incessantly receiving from them acts of courtesy and kindness. Now, should they be successful, we should profit by their success. In opening the road to Pekin to their own Ministers, they would also open it to us."

In plain language, the Chinese at the Pei-ho made no distinction between the Americans and the Europeans. They were ready to ratify our treaty, if they ratified the treaties with Great Britain and France—which they were resolved to evade as long as possible; but there is not a tittle of evidence to show that any favors or consideration were reserved for us which were denied to the European allies. Mr. Ward's attempt to negotiate separately was at once frustrated by the Chinese. He must, they told him in substance, take his chance with the other outside barbarians.

We pity Mr. Buchanan if he has allowed the superficial reasoning which lately found vent in the newspapers here to influence his censure. Mr. Ward for acting in concert with the representatives of England and France.

The point of the question, as we stated two weeks since, turns on the truth or falsity of the representation made to Mr. Ward by the Pei-ho officials, to the effect that he and the other embassadors must proceed to the north mouth of the Pei-ho, where they would be met by means of a tank waiting for them, and prepared to conduct them to Pekin. A correspondent of the London and Paris Weekly Times thinks this statement positively that after the battle Mr. Ward had sent messengers to this northern mouth, and had in effect discovered that the Chinese representations were correct, and that he and his colleagues were anxiously expected there. It was even stated that Mr. Ward had gone to Pekin. That gentleman himself seems singularly unaware of these various proceedings. He says:

"As I was on the way in my steamer for the fulfilment of my mission, I determined to make the effort (to reopen negotiations with the Chinese) which was to establish a basis of action in the Governor-General of this province, who was said to be somewhere on the coast when the steamer left the bar. I accordingly sent Captain my brother, with the interpreters, in search of the place and its men, and they left this anchorage at 7 P.M. and returned about 11 A.M., carrying my letter, in which I informed the Governor-General of the object of my mission to China, and by the invitation of the Commissioners at Shanghai; and they returned with an answer from him, from the President of the United States to His Majesty the Emperor of China, which I was to deliver to the Governor-General of this province to Pekin. The Toey-sun returned at 2 P.M., and my brother reported that they had gone inside about the coast, about ten miles from this anchorage, they discovered the junks and the fleet of gunboats that had returned to their bar, as a force body of cavalry had been collected to oppose any further advance of troops to the positions among foreign barbarians. While they were thus discovered, a shot was fired from the junks, which wounded, actually opposed in sight, rapidly advancing with the intention of being returned to their bar, followed them to the water's edge."

These Tattar horsemen who "recognize no distinction of among foreign barbarians," and who fired upon the vessels under a flag of truce, had their instructions from the Governor-General upon the advantages of the "neutrality," so highly prized by some of our editors. Mr. Ward and the officers of his friends had not made the best of their way to their boat, it seems that their neutrality would have been saved their scalps, and they and the United States flag saved American ships in 1857. Had these gentlemen been massacred in cold blood they would have been the first they staid to discuss the question—it would have been curious to see what the eulogists of our Chinese policy would have said. When the Canton was attacked two years ago, the late Governor Yeh declared that for the life of him he could not distinguish between an American or an Englishman, and, therefore, that our fellow-citizens must look out for themselves; the officials in the north are, it seems, equally free of all distinctions among the barbarians.

We repeat what we said in our last number —that there should be no distinction between the Europeans and ourselves. The Government must, of course, discriminate; but it should not discriminate; the people do not discriminate. The advantage which some Government grants pretend that we have gained over the Europeans by our policy of conciliation is imaginary and delusive. We have gained nothing at all, except a saving of expense. And, while we are not prepared to advocate a war with China without more substantial ground for hostilities than is presented in the affair of the Pei-ho, Chinese have always treated us as badly as the most arrive of their enemies, and that our success, unaccompanied by diplomacy, in that quarter of the globe, have hitherto been mainly due to the awe struck into the Chinese mind by the warlike manœuvres of the Europeans, ought to render people extremely tender of censuring Commodore Tattnall for any aid which he may have rendered to those who have so often protected us against those who have invariably injured us to the full extent of their capacity.

THE LOUNGER.

THE DUEL

No one familiar with the habits of civilized society can be surprised at the recent duel in California, in which a Senator of the United States was killed. Whatever may be the abstract moral judgment pronounced upon the practice of dueling, a man is generally justified by his associates if he fights with another man who has called him a liar or thrown a glass of wine in his face. We have not yet forgotten the question: "Would you ess a man do?" when a representative from this city in Congress was challenged by a representative from another State. The gravest people in the purlieus of Wall Street, who are absurdly called conservative, shrugged their shoulders, and said, "Oh yes, dueling is a fine—a shocking business. But if a man challenges you, what can you do?" You can, at least, refrain from taking the advice of men who ask the question, and then you will have a chance of not being a murderer.

What is called "honor" is a relic of martial principle or social decency—by black-legs, swindlers, and fancy "gentlemen"—is something to indicate exactly that it is not. Honor is not a quality that no question, not even relative skill in sporting or the use of the sword, and by which a bet is a truism. That a man does not prove another to be a liar by shooting him, or himself not to be dishonored by being shot, is no longer denied. The grand conservative argument for dueling urged by grave people in the conservative property—that if a man knows he is to be held accountable for what he says, he will be very careful of his tongue.

The only difficulty with this argument is that it is entirely refounded. The very case in point shows that it is so. Mr. Broderick knew, as well as Judge Terry or Senator Gwin, that when he had finished the current sentence he would be at a duel. He was challenged when he began to speak, and he declined—but only until the election was over. He knew the men with whom he had to deal—the public opinion of the State, which justified dueling—but for once he was not careful of denouncing what he considered the dishonesty of his opponents, and subjected to shame them to the basest and most profligate of men. He knew distinctly that when speaking had ended shooting would begin. But he knew that he must not be allowed to be quiet with one duel, but that he must fore the machine of the party to the pistols in the country. In his case there was no running for luck. And how much did it restrain him? Does any thinking man suppose that given his saying? What possible decency of speech or manner did that consciousness impose upon the orator?

And so it always is, and always must be. When you attempt to promote public morality by the fear personal peril instead of the loss of the esteem good men, you simply put a premium on vice. Mr. Broderick—who, from all we can gather, was deserving of sincere sympathy as a man who, although in public life, was pure—was challenged prior to the election by a man and citizen—and Judge Terry, of whom we know only that he is a secessionist—that the Vigilance Committee seriously thought of hanging him—and that he is Chief Justice of California—and by the publication of the kind of man that ripens under a system which recognizes dueling as an able ally of public decency.

If Senator Broderick, after having stated what he did, had refused to substantiate it, or to be contentious, he would justly have incurred the condemnation of serious and good men. But if he had refused to fight a duel, on the ground that a duel could not possibly settle any point in dispute, and that he had said only what he thought, and was willing to prove, all the bar-rooms and clubs and non-courses and political conventions in the country would have cried craven; and conservatism, saying, "What can a man do?" might have crooked a feeble Amen.

As it is, he is dead; and nothing is changed—nothing is touched. The public mind is no longer open to any thing differently because he is gone. No body's honor is any brighter or better; nobody's character is any less tarnished; nobody's heroism is any more evident. The only practical result seems to be, that if the Chief Justice of California chooses to challenge any body, that body will not be dead if the soul in it does not know how, or is afraid, to assert its rights.

THE INDIAN SUMMER.

THE question is finally answered by our friend O. L. R.:

"DEAR LONGLEGS,—It is in New England alone that they understand the Indian Summer. In the first place the name first originated, and under those skies it is found genuine. And what is the philosophy of the thing of it first and best? It is due there in the first fortnight in November, though it may sometimes be in such haste to blaze that it comes too soon, and sometimes it seems too late, but generally it is due. The northwestern is well nearly till Christmas, and indeed I have been as far there (and farther) as the Indian Summer ever is accustom, but that was when I was young. But it always comes.

"As for St. Martin's summer, the people over the way in Europe will know that it is so called from the 11th day, which is the 11th of November, when the gales of the old autumn are sure to priest in honor of that gentle saint. In England they call it Martlemas. But it is by no exact season named for him, the loveliest of saints, the most loved for merciful deeds and words of any that shall when he reproached him, mockingly, for having neived to favor the Indian Summer, replied, 'No man tolerable than that art! If thou couldst come to perfection and weather wrestled with the cold and storm, thou shouldst find mercy and forgiveness.' What professionally distinguished it in the old country was, very unfailing serenity; no one had ever seen him angry, or cold, or glad. There was nothing but the sweetness to God and pity for men. The legends about him are blossomed and beautiful. Every one has heard of him as a young soldier he met in the bitter winter a naked beggar shivering with cold, and he dismounted from his horse, having nothing but his cloak and his arms, he with his sword divided the cloak in two, and gave one half of it to the beggar, covering himself as well as he might with the other half. And the same night, being asleep, he beheld in a dream the Lord Jesus, who stood before him, having on his shoulders the half of the cloak which he had bestowed on the beggar; and Jesus said to the angels that were around him, 'Know ye who hath thus arrayed me? My servant Martin, though yet unbaptized, hath done this!'

"On this occasion the Emperor invited him to a banquet, and wishing to show the saint particular honor, he handed the wine-cup to him before he drank himself, according to the usual custom, that St. Martin would wish it with his lips and then present it respectfully to his imperial host; but, equally to the astonishment and admiration of all the guests, St. Martin turned round and presented the beverage, dripping as it was, over the steed behind him, thus showing that he accounted the least of the creatures of God before the greatest of the rulers of the earth. From this incident St. Martin has been chosen as the patron saint of cheerfulness and conviviality.

"I think I have proved that St. Martin of Tours is worthy of having the loveliest season upon the high seas. If an assault be made upon a vessel lying within the river or inland waters of any country, the native authorities may take cognizance of the case; but in case of assault four miles outside of Liverpool harbor, the British authorities have no control over it, although it is made the duty of an American consul, upon complaint, to require that the accused shall be given up to him to be sent home for trial. This rule is limited by the Extradition treaty of 1842 to certain specified offenses, as that of the year 1856, when such a requisition was made by the American consul at Liverpool, for the arrest of a party of manslaughter had been brought by a Cormer's jury against the third mate of a ship, the Home Rule, from Liverpool to Boston, and as the offense was not included in the treaty, the man must be discharged.

But even when the American consul has power to send accused persons home for trial, he can not send all the witnesses. The most important witnesses sometimes refuses to go, and there is no help for it.

The most usual crimes are assault and abuse. By act of Congress the consul is empowered to deal with these offenses summarily, without a "Liverpool merchant" says is rarely the case) three months in the county jail.

Clearly there should be a competent authority in every chief port of England and the United States to deal with offenses at sea within thirty miles. The author of this letter has frequently suggested that there should be a jury made up of the shipowners, which took place on the 20th. How he would do in the case of sailors of other nations he does not suggest. But national chivalry is rapidly disappearing, and to begin at home. "If we have once admitted that a practice is a public nuisance, every day (or upon the next day) makes it. In this case, to be sure, whatever is done must be done from pure humanity. But we still believe that humanity is a very powerful consideration. The class of humane statesmen is not entirely extinct.

A VERY GOLDEN WEDDING.

NOT golden by virtue of the half century of years which usually confers that commemorative distinction of title, but golden in its gorgeous profusion of vast disbursements and fabulous luxuries of entertainment, was the wedding of Miss Francesca Amelia Beutivoli with Don Esteban Sancta Cruz de Orvieto, which took place on the 20th inst., the 13th of October, at St. Patrick's Cathedral, in this city. It was an event of rare and regal interest. In its consummation Society might, for months ago, beyond all power of recovery. The beauty and innocent grace of the bride, the solemn and archaic and personal characteristics of her betrothed; and the reckless prodigality with which the slim purse of the bridegroom was made to serve—were combined to attract the attention of fashionable New York to the event in the highest degree. Public feeling reached a height from which the descent—now that all is accomplished and over—is inevitably to be dangerous. The mysteries of most sacred privacy were penetrated and openly revealed to the eager and excited world. No particular—delicate or otherwise—of the origin of the affair, its progress, its culmination, has been permitted to escape curiosity. That Don Esteban first encountered the lady of his love last New-Year's Day while assisting at the levee of one of his near friends with whom she was residing, and of whom he chanced to call; that he strove with unremitting zeal to pass first on that occasion through his interpreter into her ear; that his heart leaped with joy when the hidden discovery that his physical capabilities included his native tongue; that their two souls were thus welded by idiomatic sympathy; that love and fervor—that Don Esteban, overcome roon after by fever and ague, was nursed to convalescence by the gentle hand of Miss Beutivoli, and that, finally, on the 20th of October, St. Nicholas was betrothed, and the awareness of his miseries were alleviated, by the tender and devoted attentions of the fascinated Spanish girl that his gratitude found sumptuous expression in the presentation of the most costly and rare articles of jewels and parent metals; that the bonds of affection, already made fast and firm, were afterward drawn into a yet stronger form of union and Sextuge; that for many months the bridegroom has been the possessor of one of the most valuable estates in Cuba, has received proper consideration As to the number of millions over which he exercised control, there has been much idle discussion. A series of anxious feminine conclaves have failed to arrive at any definite result. Society has been interested at its inability to determine whether the income of five or ten millions of dollars is lavished by Don Esteban, and has revenged itself for betweening with zest upon every fragment of intelligence respecting his manners, customs, and appearance. It has discovered that he is fifty-five years old, and of short stature, somewhat shorter than his bride; that the dark Castilian tinge of his countenance finely relieves the blonde purity of her complexion; that the cast of his head and the flash of his dark eye bespeak a bold energy and decision of character. It has discovered that a noble generosity animates his actions—a generosity first exemplified at a ball long ago given by him at the St. Nicholas, for which occasion he provided that the hair of every lady invited should be dressed at his expense, and since more clearly shown by his lavish expenditures in favor of his young bride and her friends. The examples are multitudinous, and can no more be gathered here together than ocean sands. The more prominent, however, are the ownership of record. We know not where to turn with most of admiration—to the seventy-five gay and brilliant silks purchased of Stewart, and which, being fashioned into flounced dress-skirts or to the gleaming coffers of snowy linen, richest in texture and most abundant of any the city has fancied, also perfected by Genin; or to the hundred pairs of boots and shoes, joyfully supplied by the firm of Arnold; or to the same of scintillating fashionables which Tiffany and Ball were called upon to furnish. Whatever the consideration may seem to be, and details crowd before our eyes in huge aggregations, inseparable in their compacted glory. Such unseemly quarrelers, indeed, are unfitted for the culminating crash. On Thursday, the 13th of October, it came. The anguish was unbearable. The original intention of a double marriage, which had been consummated by uniting both Protestant and Catholic ceremonies, was given over, the lady having decided to adopt the Roman Catholic belief. The scene of the event was St. Patrick's Cathedral, in Mott Street. Here the agony was concentrated. In early morning the bustle in the neighborhood gave evidence of the coming festivities. The passages to the church were blockaded. Policemen, gilded and gorgeous, were there for the fire movements of democratic vehicles. Butchers were momentarily expected, and the scourge cries of millions were unheard. The arrangements betokened nice distinctions of rank and station. Of the elegant display of fashionable equipages within and without the edifice I will not dare to speak in red. Persons who had not been specially enlivened by invitation could not be the private entrance from Mulberry Street was open to them alone. The rods flushed with the unpleasant blood that their pallid cheeks were not in Mott Street multitude. At ten o'clock the doors were opened. The church was filled. Terror was accumulated to a degree of fashionable jam not often known in that locality, pressed in, regardless of crushed toes and wilful pinchings, by the multitudes lating in all the fury of anticipation. Loftiness and loveliness, dignity and degradation were strangely mingled. It was a curious conjunction of opposite extremes. In less than half an hour the church presented scenes of confusion, yet still the crowd dilated. By eleven o'clock the excitement had reached a climax

THE KING OF THULE.

FROM GOETHE.

Is Thule dwelt a king, and he
Was leal unto the grave;
A cup to him of red red gold
His leman dying gave.

He quaff'd it to the dregs, whene'er
He drank among his peers,
And ever, as he drain'd it down,
His eyes would brim with tears.

And when his end drew near, he told
His kingdom's cities up,
Gave all his wealth unto his heir,
But with it not the cup.

He sat and feasted at the board,
His knights around his knee,
Within the palace of his sires,
Hard by the roaring sea.

Then up he rose, that toper old,
A long last breath he drew,
And down the cup he loved so well
Into the ocean threw.

He saw it flash, then settle down,
Far down into the sea,
And as he gazed his eyes grew dim,
Nor e'er again drank he.

FLAG-OFFICER TATTNALL, U.S.N.

THE exciting news recently received of the attack and repulse of the British and French naval forces at the mouth of the River Pei-ho, and the active sympathy displayed by Commodore Tattnall, commanding the American squadron, in China, in towing the British reserved force with his small chartered steamer, in order to enable the Admiral to extricate himself from the disastrous conflict in which he had suffered so severely, have elicited severe strictures from some portions of our press. He has been accused of violating our neutrality by yielding to the promptings of his humane feelings. We think, however, that the American public, in their admiration of whatever springs from noble and generous impulses, will view his conduct on the occasion with approximation, particularly when it is remembered that the Chinese have, at times, forgotten their neutrality toward Americans, choosing, when it suited them to do so, to confound them with their English foes by firing on and killing them—as, for instance, on the occasion which produced the bombardment and demolition of the Barrier Forts by the U. S. ships Portsmouth and Levant only two years ago.

Commodore Tattnall entered the navy in the year 1812. He was attached to the U. S. brig Experser, which had been captured from the British, and had been put into commission; but owing to her being blockaded in the Savannah River she was laid up and her officers and crew transferred to other vessels. When the city of Washington was captured by the British, young Tattnall enrolled himself and marched as a private in the ranks to Bladensburg, where he participated in the conflict at that place. His next service was on board the U. S. frigate Constellation, in the Algerine frigate by the squadron under Commodore Decatur. The long peace which ensued afforded no opportunities to our navy for acquiring distinction, and he was employed, as Lieutenant, in the discharge of the ordinary duties of his grade in cruising ships. In the year 1820 he was the First Lieutenant of the sloop-of-war Erie, Captain Dani. Turner, which conveyed General Harrison (afterward President) to Bogota as minister. On the passage out the Erie touched at the island of St. Martin, and there received intelligence that a Buenos Ayrean privateer named the Federal had overhauled at sea an American brig, the Nymph, from Bahia, bound to Boston, and had plundered her of such portions of her cargo as it suited him to take.

At the neighboring island of St. Bartholomew the plunder was landed and exposed for sale, notwithstanding the protest made by the American Consul against this proceeding. Upon the receipt of this information, Capt. Turner at once sailed for St. Bartholomew, and denouncing the Federal as a pirate, demanded from the authorities the surrender of the cargo to the American Consul, to be held by him for the benefit of its owners. This demand the authorities refused to comply with, and Capt. Turner determined to cut the Federal out. This was successfully accomplished during the night by the boats of the Erie under the command of Lieutenant Tattnall, and under the fire of the Fort, which opened on him. The Erie returned to St. Martin and dispatched the Federal with a prize crew to Pensacola, where she was tried and condemned for piracy by the United States court there.

His next service was in command of the United States schooner Grampus in the Gulf of Mexico, where he captured a Mexican privateer called the Panchita, which had committed depredations on our commerce; for which, and other services rendered in rescuing and relieving vessels in distress, the insurance offices in New Orleans made him a complimentary presentation of a handsome service of plate.

In his next grade of Commander, after a cruise performed in the Mediterranean and another on the coast of Africa, he volunteered and was appointed to command a small steamer named the Spitfire, in the Mexican War. He led the "mosquito fleet" in between the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa and the city of Vera Cruz and bombarded that city, remaining in that position (which General Scott in his dispatches characterized "as too daringly assumed") until recalled from it by signal from Commodore Perry, who could not afford to risk the destruction of his flotilla.

In the year 1850, the Lopez Expedition sailed for the invasion of Cuba. The Spanish Minister at Washington had repeatedly called the attention of the Administration to the fact of their preparations being made for it; but his warnings seemed to have but little effect in inducing them to adopt measures of repression. They probably thought that it would all end in smoke. When, however, the expedition actually got off, they became very much alarmed. Captain Tattnall was at that time in command of the steam-frigate Saranac, and was on his way to Washington with his vessel, to complete her outfits and receive the complement of officers of which she was deficient. Orders were forthwith dispatched to him, which reached him when twenty miles below the city, to proceed, in all haste, in search of the expedition, and endeavor to arrest it. He started at once for Havana. When he arrived there he learned that Lopez had made a descent with a portion of his force only, at Cardenas, the other portion having refused to take part in it; that the Captain General of Cuba had sent a naval force to the Island of Mugeres, had captured the remaining portion of the expedition with their two vessels, and they were hourly expected at Havana. Captain Tattnall entered the harbor and first sought an interview with Mr. Campbell, who, he very soon saw, was a warm sympathizer with the filibusters. He next proceeded to have a conference with the Governor General. He explained to him that the President had issued a proclamation declaring the expeditionists to be outlaws, and had dispatched him to arrest them. They discussed the right of the Captain General to capture them on neutral territory.

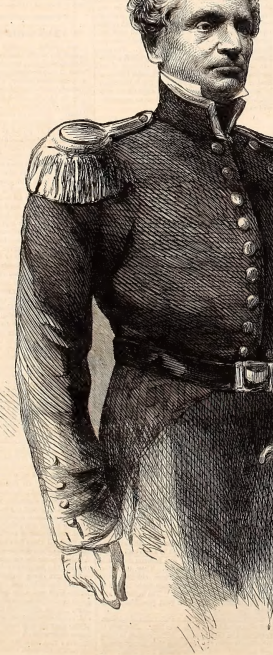
The conference having ended, Captain Tattnall left Havana for Key West.

Some of Lopez's party had been arrested on their landing at Key West, and tried in the United States Courts for the violation of our neutrality laws, and it was on their trial that the evidence had been given of the refusal of the other party to accompany them. Captain Tattnall induced the United States Judge and the Collector of the port to accompany him over to Havana, the former taking with him the record of his court. On his arrival, he found that the expeditionists had been brought into port with their vessels. He called on the Captain General, and, after satisfying him of the existence of the proof required, he said,

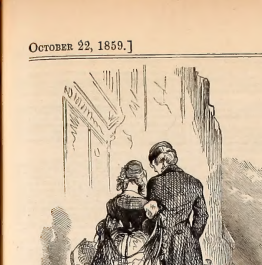
"Now, Governor, the question of peace or war is lodged with you. If these persons are harshly dealt with, and especially if any blood is spilled, the American people will hold your Government to the strictest accountability."

The result is known. The filibusters, after a detention of a few months in prison, were released, and conveyed by the Albany to Mobile. Some of the public journals, then as now, contained very harsh comments upon him for permitting the filibusters to be carried into Havana; but General Taylor, then President, expressed himself very warmly in commendation of Captain Tattnall's judicious course, and the navy department addressed him a complimentary letter of approval of his conduct, the like of which—to use the language of the chief clerk—had not emanated from the department for many a year.

Of Commodore Tattnall's recent service in China we have spoken at length in our last issues.



FLAG-OFFICER TATTNALL, U.S.N.—[FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.]



LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXIII.

MRS. ALFRED BISKEY.

It was but a few days after the dinner that the junior partner was taking the old path that led under the tower of the fairy princess, when lo! he met her in the way. In her eyes there was that sweet light of expectation and happiness which illuminated all Gabriel's thoughts of her, and which as it now shone upon him persuaded him that he was the happiest and unworthiest of men.

"Where are you going, May?"

"I am going to Fanny."

"May I go too?"

May Newt looked at him and said, gravely, "No, I am going to ask Little Malacca to go with me."

"Oh, very well," replied Mr. Gabriel Bennet, with equal gravity.

"What splendid, melancholy eyes he has!" said May, with unusual ardor.

"Ah, you think so?"

"Of course I do, and such hair! Why, Mr. Bennet, did you ever see such magnificent hair—"

"Oh, you like black hair?"

"And his voice—"

"Now, May—"

"Well, Sir."

"Please—"

What merry light in the fairy eyes! What dazzling splendor of love and happiness in the face that turned to his as he laid her arm in his own! One would have thought she, too, had been admitted a junior partner in a most desirable firm.

They passed along the street, which was full of people, and Gabriel and May unconsciously looked at the crowd with new eyes and thoughts. Can it be possible that all these people are so secretly happy as two that we know, thought they? All my life, said Gabriel to himself without knowing it, have I been going to and fro, and never imagined how much honey there was hived away in all the hearts of which I saw only the rough outside? All my life, mused May, with sweet girl-eyes, have I passed lovers as if they were mere men and women? And under her veil, where no eye could see, her cheek was flushed, and her eyes were sweeter.

They passed up Broadway and turned through to the Bowery. Crossing the broad pavement of the busy thoroughfare they went into a shabby row street beyond, and so toward the East River. At length they stopped before a low, modest house near a quiet corner. A pretty kitchen-maid stood upon the area steps abreast of the street. A few miserable trees, clung to death in the stone desert of the town, were boxed up along the edge of the sidewalk. A scavenger's cart was jogging along, and a little ragbath, a ragman's wagon with a string of jangling bells. The smell of the sewer was the chief odor, and the long lines of low, red brick houses, with wooden steps and balustrades and the blinds closed, completed a permanent camp of dreariness.

"Does Fanny Newt live there?" asked Gabriel, in a tone which indicated that there might be hearts in which honey was not abundantly hived.

"Yes," said May, gravely. "You know they have very little to live upon, and—and—oh, dear, I don't like to speak of it, Gabriel, but they are very miserable."

Gabriel said nothing, but rang the bell.

The sloppy servant having stared wildly for a moment or two at the apparition of blooming love that had so incomprehensively alighted upon the steps, ducked under them, and in a moment reappeared at the door. She seemed to recognize May, and said,

"Yes'm" before any question had been asked.

Gabriel and May walked into the parlor. It was dark and formal. There was a black hair-cloth sofa with wooden edges at either end, so that nobody could lean or lounge, or do any thing but sit very comfortably upright. There were black hair-cloth chairs, a table with two or three books; one of them with glass drops upon the mantle; a thin cheap carpet; gloom, silence, and a completed triumph of grease — as if the ghosts of all the wretched dinners that had ever been cooked in the house haunted it spitefully.

May went up stairs to find Fanny, Gabriel Bennet looked and smelled around him. He thought that no more wretched room could be so dismal, and he could not understand how harsh furniture and discomfort could exist in it so. His father's house was certainly not very large; and it was scantily and plainly furnished, but no Arabian palace had ever seemed to his eyes did to his imagination as that home was dear to his heart. No, it isn't the furniture nor the smell, thought he. I am quite sure it is something that I neither see nor smell that makes the difference.

As he sat on the uncomfortable sofa and heard the jangling bells of the ragman's wagon fade into the distance, and the loud, long, mournful whoop of the chimney-sweep, his fancy was busy with the figures of the room, and what it might be—of a certain nameless somebody, mistress of that poor somber home. He was looking it up with grace and gay sweetness that the hard sofa became the most luxurious lounge, and the cheap table some Florentine model of Italia; and of a certain other nameless somebody coming home at evening—coming down the rustic in the hall as of women's robes—a singular sound as of mesting lips—then a coming together arm in arm into the room, a certain little parlor, but with such a bright fire blazing under the wooden mantel, and Gabriel rising as the pattering of little feet down the stairs—Hem! hem! said Gabriel Bennet, clearing his throat as the sense himself of a sudden grew dry.

For there was a sound of feet upon the stairs, and the next moment May and her sister Fanny entered the room. Gabriel rose and bowed, and held out his hand. Mrs. Alfred Dinks said, "How do you do?" and looked at him without taking the hand.

Time had not softened her face, but sharpened it, and her eyes were of a fierce blackness. She looked forty years old; and there was a permanent frown of her dark brows.

"So this silly May is going to marry you?" said she, addressing Gabriel.

Surprised by this kind of congratulation, but also much amused by it, as if there could be nothing so ludicrous as the idea that they not marrying a man who loved her as he loved, Gabriel gravely responded,

"Yes, ma'am, she is set upon it."

Fanny Newt, who had seated herself with an air of utter and offended composure and indifference, and who looked away from Gabriel the moment she had spoken to him, turned toward him again suddenly with an expression like that of an animal which pricks up his ears. The keen fire of the dark eyes shot for a moment into her eyes, for it was the first word of kindness or humor that Fanny Newt had heard for years.

"A woman who is such a fool as to marry ought to be whipped," she replied, with her eyes fixed upon Gabriel.

"Fanny can't provide her to do it ought to be taken out and hung," answered he, with aphoristic gravity.

Fanny was perplexed.

"Better to be the slave of a parent than a husband," she continued.

"I'd lock him out," retorted Gabriel, with pure irrelevancy. "I'd scrub his shoes; I'd cover wicket in his boots; I'd edit sand in his hair-brush; I'd spatter vitriol on his shirts. A woman who marries a husband deserves nothing better."

He wagged his fote carelessly, took up one of the books upon the table, and looked into it indifferently. Fanny Newt turned to her sister, who sat smiling by her side.

"What is the matter with this man?" asked Mrs. Alfred Dinks, snikily, of May.

"There is a pregnant text, my dear Mrs. Dinks, née Newt, a name which I delight to pronounce," said Gabriel, striking in before May could reply, with the lightest tone and the soberest face in the world, "which instructs us to answer a fool according to his folly. Charming sentiment, my dear Mrs. Dinks."

Fanny was really confounded. She had heard Abel in old days speak of Gabriel Bennet as a spoiney—a saint in the milk—a goody-goody, boobey, booby—a sort of youth who would turn pale and be snuffed out by one of her glances. She found him incomprehensible. She owed him the first positive emotion of honest interest she had known for years. She felt the instinctive loyalty which character attracts from eyes to character.

May Newt looked and listened without speaking. The soft light glimmered in her eyes, for she knew what it all meant. It meant precisely what her praises of Little Malacca meant. It meant that she and Gabriel loved each other.

The junior partner was still holding the book when a heavy step was heard in the entry. Fanny's eyes grew darker and the frown deeper. There was a blundering movement outside as the door-knob came strangling—and Gabriel knew as perfectly as if he could look through the wall what kind of man was coming. The door opened with a hurry, and Mr. Alfred Dinks stopped as his eye fell upon the company. A heavy, coarse, red-faced, dull-eyed man, with an air of brutish obstinacy in every lineament and movement, he stared for a moment without a word or sign of recognition, and then looking at his wife, said, in a grumbling, surly tone,

"Look here; don't be fooling round. The old man's bust up."

He lunged the door violently to, and they heard his clumsy footsteps creaking up the stairs.

CHAPTER LXIV.

POLITICS.

"Is course; I see to ma—why, Lord bless me, it must have been three or four years ago—that 'twould n't last, you know. What's rotten will always be pieces, ma, sez I. Every year she sez to me, sez she, why ain't the Newts foiled yet? Why, sez I, my dear, I'm a ma, it's comin'. So 'twas. I know'd all about it."

President Van Bouseburg unburdened his mind and justified his vaticinations to the knot of gentlemen who were perpetually at the bank. He looked wise and said ah! and yes, and shook their heads; and the shaky ones wondered whether the astute financier had marked them and had said to ma, see he, that Filch and Blague, the dry-goods men, or Percy Arlincourt and Chamber, the waterpools, have for all they look so bright and crowd canvas so smartly, are shaky, mo-ney-ed men.

General Belch heard the news at his office. He was sitting on the end of his buck-bone, with his coat-tails over the back and legs of a wooden chair, while the two forlegs and his own were tilted in the air. His overcoat, however, went up at a more precipitate angle and rested with the feet apart upon the mantle. By a skilful succession of pauses the General ejected tobacco-juice from his mouth, between his legs, and usually lodged it in the grate before him. It was evident, however, that many of his friends had not been so successful, for the grate, the hearth, and the neighboring floor were spotted with the fluid.

The Honorable Mr. Ele was engaged in conversation with his friend Belch, who was giving him instructions for the next Congressional session.

"You see, Ele, if we could only send something of the right stamp—the right stamp, I say, in the place of Watkins Bodley from the third district, we should be all right. Bodley is very uncertain."

"I know," returned the Hon. Mr. Ele, "Bodley is uncertain. He has not the true party feeling. He is not willing to make sacrifices. And yet I should n't say that—that—perhaps—"

He looked at General Belch inquiringly. That gentleman turned, beamed with approval, and squirted a copious cascade.

"Exactly," said Mr. Ele, "I was saying that I think if Mr. Bodkins, who is a perfectly unobjectionable man—"

"Oh, perfectly; nothing against his character. Besides, it's a free country, and every body may have his opinion," said Gen. Belch.

"Precisely," resumed Mr. Ele; "as I was saying, being a perfectly unobjectionable man—in fact, unusually honorable, I happen to know that he is in trouble — ahem! ahem! pecuniary trouble."

He paused a moment, while his friend of the military title looked hard at the grate, as if selecting a fair mark, then made a clucking noise, and drenched it completely. He then said, musingly,

"Yes, yes—ah yes—I see. It is a great pity. The best men get into such trouble. How much money did you say he wanted?"

"I said he was in pecuniary trouble," returned Mr. Ele, with a slight tone of correction.

"I understand, Mr. Ele," answered the other, a little pompously, and with an air of saying, "Know your place, Sir."

"I understand, and I wish to know how large a sum would relieve Mr. Bodley from his immediate pressure."

"I think about four thousand dollars. Perhaps, a thousand more."

"I see," said General Belch, slowly, still looking into the blank, dismal grate, and rubbing his fat nose sturdily with his fat forefinger and thumb, "I suppose that a man situated as Mr. Bodley is finds it very detrimental to his interests to be engaged in public life, and might possibly feel it to be his duty to his family and creditors to resign his place, if he saw a promising way of righting his business, without depending upon the chances of a Congressional race."

As he drew to the end of this hypothetical harangue General Belch looked sideways at his companion to see if he probably understood him.

The Honorable Mr. Ele shook his head in turn, looked solemnly into the empty grate, and said, slowly and with gravity:

"The supposition might be entertained for the sake of the argument."

The General was apparently satisfied with this reply, for he continued:

"Let us, then, suppose that a sum of four or five thousand dollars having been raised—and N'r. Bodley having resigned—that a new candidate is to be selected who shall—who shall, I s'e, serve his country from our point of view, who ought the man to be?"

"Precisely; who ought the man to be?"

The two gentlemen looked gravely into the grate. General Belch squirted reflectively. The Honorable Mr. Ele raised his hand and shaded his eyes, and gazed steadfastly, as if he expected to see the candidate emerge from the chimney. While they still sat thoughtfully a knock was heard at the door. The General started and brought down his chair with a crash. Mr. Ele turned sharply round, as if the candidate had taken him by surprise in coming in by the door.

A boy handed General Belch a note:

"MY DEAR BELCH,—B. Newt, Son, & Co. have stopped. We do not hear of an assignment, so desire you to take steps at once to secure judgment upon the indorsed account.

"Yours,

"PERTWINS & BUDD."

"Hallo!" said General Belch, as the messenger retired, "old Newt's smashed! However, it's a great while since he has done any thing for the party.—By Jove!"

The last exclamation was sudden, as if he had been struck by a happy thought. He took a fresh quid in his mouth, and, putting his hands upon his knees, sat silently for five minutes, and then said,

"I have the man."

"You have the man?" said Ele, looking at him with interest.

"Certainly. Look here!"

Mr. Ele did look, as earnestly as if he expected the General to take the man out of his pocket.

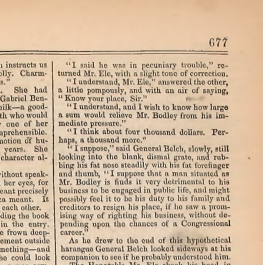
"You know we want to get that grant, at any rate. If we only have men who see from our point of view, we are sure of it. I think I know a man who can be persuaded to look at the matter from that point—a man who may be of very great service to the party, if we can persuade him to see from our point of view."

"Who is that?" asked Mr. Ele.

"Abel Newt," replied General Belch.

Mr. Ele seemed somewhat surprised.

"Oh—yes—ah—indeed. I did not know he was in political life," said he.



PATRIOTISM.

"He isn't," returned General Belch.

Mr. Ebe looked for further instructions.

"Every body must begin," said Belch. "Look here. If we don't get the print from Congress, what on earth is the use of having worked so long in this devilish old harness of politics? Haven't we been to primary meetings and conventions and elections, and all the other tomfoolery, specifiching and plotting and setting things right, and being lied, by Jupiter!—lied to the tune of more hundreds than I mean to bet on, right now, just as we when a bold push will save every thing, and make it worth while to have worked in the nasty mill so long, we must have our wits about us. Do you know Abel Newt?"

"No."

"I do. He is a gentleman without the slightest superstition. He is perfectly ready to set things from particular posing of view. He has great knowledge of the world, and is a friend of the people, Sir. His politics are of the right kind," said General Belch, in a tone which seemed to be setting the tune for any future remarks Mr. Ebe might have to make of Mr. Newt—at public meetings, for instance, or elsewhere.

"I am glad to hear he is a friend of the people," returned Mr. Ebe.

"Yes, Sir, he is the consistent enemy of a purse-proud aristocracy, Sir."

"Exactly; purse-proud aristocracy," repeated Mr. Ebe, as if coming a lesson by rote.

"Dandies in the lap of luxury, Sir, do not hesitate to descend from it to espouse the immortal cause of popular rights."

"Popular rights," returned the Honorable Mr. Ebe, studying his lesson.

"Animated by a glowing patriotism, he stands upon the people, and waves above his head the glorious flag of liberty, liberty."

"Glorious flag of our country," responded the other.

"The undaunted enemy of monopoly, he is equally the foe of class legislation and the friend of those rights."

"Friend of State rights."

"Aha!" cried General Belch, looking blankly at Mr. Ebe, "where was I?"

"Friend of State rights," parroted Mr. Ebe.

"Exactly—yes! And if ever I do give my firm cadaic of our country's—our country's—our country's—d—n it! our country's what, Mr. Ebe?"

That honorable gentleman was engaged with his own thoughts while he listened to the tongue the words of his friend, so that, perhaps a little maliciously, perhaps a little unconsciously, he went on in the same wooden tone of repetition.

"Our country's what, Mr. Ebe?"

General Belch looked at his companion. They both smiled.

"How they sort o' slip out, don't they?" said the General, spurting.

"They do," said Mr. Ebe, taking snuff.

"Well, now, don't you see what kind of man Abel Newt is?"

"I do, indeed," replied Ebe.

"I tell you, if you follows from the city don't lack out for purposes, you'll find a friend in me upon your shoulders. He is a smart fellow. I am very sorry for Watkins Bodley. Any family?"

"Yes—a good deal," replied Mr. Ebe, vaguely.

"Ah indeed! Pity! pity! I suppose, then, that a proper sense of what he owes to his family—eh?"

"Without question. Oh! certainly."

General Belch rose.

"I do not see, then, that we have any thing else than ought to detain you. I will see Mr. Newt, and let you know. Good-morning, Mr. Ebe—good-morning, my dear Sir."

And the General bowed out the representative so impenetrably that the Honorable Barbara Jawley Ebe felt very much as if he had been kicked down stairs.

CHAPTER LXV.

GONE TO PROTEST.

There was an unnatural silence and order in the store of Herodotus Newt, Esq., No. 17. The long linen covers were left upon the pieces of goods exposed. The cases were closed. The boys sat indolently wondering at the silence. The porter lay upon a bale reading a newspaper. There was a wagon regularly and vapose, like that of a house in which the corpse lies, upon the morning of the funeral.

Books—fixed but in his office haggard and gray. His face, like his daughter Fanny's, had grown shabby, under force. The shutters were closed, and the room was darkened. His porter-lady lay before him upon the desk, open. The papers were smooth and white, and the pile of ten-hundred pens lay carefully by the standard. But the merchant did not write. He had not written that day. His white, bony hand rested upon the port-folio, and the long fingers drummed upon it at intervals, while his eyes alternately wandered out into the store and saw the long shrouded wagon over the goods. Occasionally a slight sigh of weariness escaped him. But he did not suppose he was distract his mind from its gloomy intentness; for the passing prayer lay beside him unopened, although it was afternoon.

In the outer office the book-keeper was still at work. He looked from book to book, holding the leaves and letting them fall carefully—comparing, computing, writing in the huge volumes, and filing various papers away. Sometimes, while he yet held the leaves in his hands and the pen in his mouth, with the appearance of the utmost abstraction in his speculations, he wandered in to the inner office, and dimly saw his employer sitting silent and listless at his desk. For many years he had been Boniface Newt's clerk. For many years he had been a still, faithful, hard-worked servant. He had two holidays, besides the Sundays—New-Year's Day and the Fourth of July. The rest of the year he was in the office by nine in the morning, and did not leave before six at night. During the time he had been quietly serving in those great red books he had married a wife and seen her rose fade in her cheeks—he had had children grow up around him—his two sons apprenticed and his Sunday hours with light—marry, one and settled, one into the business and now as he was before a child was born to him, and then gradually grew bright and musical again with the eyes and voices of another generation. Glad to earn his little salary, which was only enough to keep him from debt, but by no saving and ambition, he was bound by a kind of feudal tenure to his employers. It never occurred to him to criticise his character. If he possessed defects, it was as a trusty squire in his liege lord's castle.

As he looked at his employer and observed his silent, despondent face, he thought of his own his family, and of the frightful secrets hidden in the huge books that were every night locked carefully upon the iron safe, as if they were written all over with beautiful romances instead of terrible truth—and the secret of the prudent plodder were so blurred that he could not see, and turning his head that no one might observe him, he winked until the tears came again.

A young man entered the store hastily. The porter dropped the paper and sprung up in the same expectantly forward. Even the bookkeeper stopped to watch the new-comer as he carefully closed the door, and, for the length of the house sat unconcernedly at his desk—his back to the door—and drumming on the portfolio—his hard eyes looking out at the mesenger.

"This way," said the book-keeper, suddenly, as he saw that he was going toward Mr. Newt's room.

"I want Mr. Newt."

"Which one?"

"The young one, Mr. Abel Newt."

"He is not here."

"I know that."

"I don't know."

Before the book-keeper was aware the young man had opened the door that communicated with Mr. Newt's room. The haggard face underwent a change at the sight of the well-dressed messenger. There was something in the sitting figure that made the youth lift his hand and remove his hat, and say, in a low, respectful voice,

"Can you tell me, Sir, where to find Mr. Abel Newt?"

The long, pale, bony fingers still listlessly drummed. The hard eyes rested upon the questioner for a few moments; then, without any evident interest, the old man answered simply, "No," and looked away as if he had forgotten the stranger's presence.

He received him from General Belch.

The grey head beckoned mechanically toward the outer room, as if all business were to be transacted there; and the young man bowing again, with a vague sense of awe, went in to the outer office and closed the door after the book-keeper.

"I will step short and simple, as Abel found when he read it:

"My Dear Sir,—I have just heard of your misfortune. Don't be dismayed. In the history of life every body must have his hard strokes two or three times, and in our country 'is a man's duty to fall up.' Such men as Abel Newt are not made to fail. I want to see you immediately.

"Yours very truly,

"Archibald Belch."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE KILLING OF SENATOR BRODERICK—THE CHALLENGE.

The following was the challenge:

"Oakland, September 8, 1859

"Hon. D. C. Broderick,—Sir: I understand that, since, at the public table of the International Hotel in San Francisco, you saw fit to indulge in certain remarks concerning me, which were offensive in their nature. Before I left San Francisco I addressed a note of the 13th of June, addressed to Mr. D. W. Perley, in which I stated that you would avoid me, if possible, on the personal character during the political crusade just concluded, but which you have not.

"I have, therefore, not been permitted to take my seasonable revenge, and I am now forced to call you to account for your conduct. I am the humblest opportunity to require of you a retraction of those remarks, or a meeting. I refer you by permission to Messrs. Gilbert Isen, Esq., who is acquainted with the contents, and will transact your business.

"Yours, &c., &c., &c., David C. Terry."

Some correspondence followed which led to an agreement for a meeting.

THE TERMS OF THE DUEL.

The following terms of the duel were agreed upon:

1. Distance—Ten paces, the word to be given and any person each; also by a person to lead the weapons. This to be done at the time the word is given. In case of the other parties advertise, the time and place may be changed by the seconds mutually agreed.

2. Position—Meeting, on the farm adjoining the Lake House ranch. The line to be established from the Lake House road to where you strike the fence on the Lake House property, about a mile before you reach the Lake House. There you take a road to the left, which brings you to the farm-house, on the upper end of the lake (Lagoon Merced), occupied by William Higgins. This is the general neighborhood; the precise spot to be determined when the parties meet.

3. Weapons—Dueling pistols.

4. Time—Position to be taken before firing each other, pistols to be held with the muzzle vertically downward.

5. Word to be given as follows, to wit: "Gentlemen, are you ready?" "I am ready." "I am ready." "Fire," "Fire," each party replying "Ready," the word "Fire" shall be given, to be followed, if need be, by the word "Fire," for party to raise his pistol before the word "Fire," or to discharge it after the word "Fire." The intervals between the words "Fire" and "Fire" to be exemplified by the party uttering the word as near as may be.

6. The weapons to be loaded on the ground in the presence of a second of each party.

7. Choice of position and the giving of the word to be determined by chance—throwing up a coin, as usually.

8. Choice of the two weapons to be determined by chance, as in Article 7th.

9. Choice of the respective weapons of parties to be determined by chance, as aforesaid, by throwing up a coin, as usual—that is to say, each party bringing their pistols, and the same to be loaded and examined by seconds, as in Article 7th.

Dated, Monday, 12th September, 1859, at 6½ o'clock A.M.

THE MEETING.

The first meeting took place on the 12th ult., at the appointed time and place. The parties were conducted and accompanied by their friends.

The parties met next morning, the 13th, in the vicinity of San Francisco, and were attended by the same officers as before to interfere. Terry was seconded by Messrs. Gilbert Isen and Thomas Hayes. Broderick by Messrs. Duncan, county clerk, and had also fallen, like his principal, under the displeasure of his employers. Broderick was seconded by the Hon. Joseph Hobbins, member of Congress from California, and another gentleman, who is said to have been either ex-Sheriff Colton, of Yreka, or Mr. John A. Stevenson, of Sacramento.

THE DUELISTS PLACED.

"When all were ready, Gen. Broderick," says the reporter of the San Francisco Herald Call, "I counted the word 'one' very slowly—very—very—one, standing principals, present. Mr. Terry's seconds and advisers were standing by his side, and Broderick's seconds and advisers were standing by his side. Broderick's friends were attending to 'outside' matters, and were not in a position to see what was transpired with him in a lively tone. On the other hand, Terry's friends seemed to be absorbed in the duel, interested with the issue, and was talking earnestly with each other. Terry's friends were on the left of Broderick's friends. At the word 'one' the time Mr. Broderick was cool and self-possessed. His countenance was pale, and his eyes were fixed intently on his principal, with a steady and anxious trust. The seconds approached the answer to the word 'two,' when, all of a sudden, Terry was pointed to the white marks that had been placed on the left of Broderick, and fired. Mr. Terry, in raising and taking the pistols, snapped a cap with an air of satisfaction, as if to assure himself that his weapon was right. Some conversation was had, Mr. Benham (or Aylette, I am not sure which) interposing. Mr. Terry, in addressing him, in reply to which Terry seemed to smile, and before the word 'two' was given he, as the other party, was in a position to fire, and Terry's eye was turned on the combatants.

"Mr. Broderick's friends had a short and hurried conversation, and retired. Mr. Brooks did the same with Mr. Terry, and both moved to a point on the ground, and then notified the combatants to take their relative positions. Mr. Broderick's friends had a few words of caution and advice to him. Mr. Broderick's friends then retired, as an observer unanimously close. In fact, more than one person observed the movements of the party on the portfolio—his hard eyes looking out at the messenger.

"This way," said the book-keeper, suddenly, as he saw that he was going toward Mr. Newt's room.

"I want Mr. Newt."

"Which one?"

"The young one, Mr. Abel Newt."

"He is not here."

"I know that."

"I don't know."

Before the book-keeper was aware the young man had opened the door that communicated with Mr. Newt's room. The haggard face underwent a change at the sight of the well-dressed messenger. There was something in the sitting figure that made the youth lift his hand and remove his hat, and say, in a low, respectful voice,

"Can you tell me, Sir, where to find Mr. Abel Newt?"

The long, pale, bony fingers still listlessly drummed. The hard eyes rested upon the questioner for a few moments; then, without any evident interest, the old man answered simply, "No," and looked away as if he had forgotten the stranger's presence.

He received him from General Belch.

The grey head beckoned mechanically toward the outer room, as if all business were to be transacted there; and the young man bowing again, with a vague sense of awe, went in to the outer office and closed the door after the book-keeper.

"I will step short and simple, as Abel found when he read it:

"My Dear Sir,—I have just heard of your misfortune. Don't be dismayed. In the history of life every body must have his hard strokes two or three times, and in our country 'is a man's duty to fall up.' Such men as Abel Newt are not made to fail. I want to see you immediately.

"Yours very truly,

"Archibald Belch."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE KILLING OF SENATOR BRODERICK—THE CHALLENGE.

The following was the challenge:

"Oakland, September 8, 1859

"Hon. D. C. Broderick,—Sir: I understand that, since, at the public table of the International Hotel in San Francisco, you saw fit to indulge in certain remarks concerning me, which were offensive in their nature. Before I left San Francisco I addressed a note of the 13th of June, addressed to Mr. D. W. Perley, in which I stated that you would avoid me, if possible, on the personal character during the political crusade just concluded, but which you have not.

"I have, therefore, not been permitted to take my seasonable revenge, and I am now forced to call you to account for your conduct. I am the humblest opportunity to require of you a retraction of those remarks, or a meeting. I refer you by permission to Messrs. Gilbert Isen, Esq., who is acquainted with the contents, and will transact your business.

"Yours, &c., &c., &c., David C. Terry."

Some correspondence followed which led to an agreement for a meeting.

THE TERMS OF THE DUEL.

The following terms of the duel were agreed upon:

1. Distance—Ten paces, the word to be given and any person each; also by a person to lead the weapons. This to be done at the time the word is given. In case of the other parties advertise, the time and place may be changed by the seconds mutually agreed.

2. Position—Meeting, on the farm adjoining the Lake House ranch. The line to be established from the Lake House road to where you strike the fence on the Lake House property, about a mile before you reach the Lake House. There you take a road to the left, which brings you to the farm-house, on the upper end of the lake (Lagoon Merced), occupied by William Higgins. This is the general neighborhood; the precise spot to be determined when the parties meet.

3. Weapons—Dueling pistols.

4. Time—Position to be taken before firing each other, pistols to be held with the muzzle vertically downward.

5. Word to be given as follows, to wit: "Gentlemen, are you ready?" "I am ready." "I am ready." "Fire," "Fire," each party replying "Ready," the word "Fire" shall be given, to be followed, if need be, by the word "Fire," for party to raise his pistol before the word "Fire," or to in a recumbent position over the right shoulder, the arm bent outwardly, and at length, gently and easy as a child retiring to rest, Mr. Broderick eased to the earth, pressing the right breast with the hand still holding the pistol, and lying on his left side.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"Terry, after he had fired, deliberately raised his pistol, hung it by his forefinger, and looked at the effect of his fallen man. In a few minutes he was told that Broderick could not rise, and then he walked off the field. It has been said that he used a loud remark when Broderick fell. He did not. Whatever he said in his seconds was not heard by the spectators."

AFTER THE DUEL.

The Bulletin says that Judge Terry, with his friends, left the field, and rode rapidly into town, and started at once from North Beach, on board the steamer for Vallejo, where he took the train for Stockton, and on to private conveyance to Marlieve. A telegraphic dispatch was sent to Stockton, announcing the fact of the duel, and requesting the arrival at Martinez, found some difficulty in getting a conveyance, and when he did get one the roads being very glary (sugg were mixed at half-mast, caused by the heavy rains of the night before), and the fact that Deputy Sheriff Jessica Judge Terry took overland conveyance to Sacramento.

"Mr. Broderick was taken to the house of his friend, Judge Terry, on Bush street, where he was very tenderly cared for by Mrs. Gilbert, and was seated in a bed with his head toward the head of the bed, and his feet toward the foot.

"Dr. Hoff, Dr. Gibbons, and Dr. Stillman, during the day, and hundreds of the friends of the Senator, from all parts of the city, were in and around the house, the hall of his receiving. He was able to speak during the day, and said, when he first received the ball, that the articulation was generally unlimited and unintelligible. He was perfectly conscious almost during and a short time after the fatal wound.

THE DEATH OF BRODERICK.

We read in the San Francisco Herald: "The Hon. David C. Broderick expired on Sunday, the 16th inst., at 3 o'clock A.M., at the residence of Judge Terry. He appeared favorable for his recovery—the wounded gentleman having passed a tolerably comfortable night, and his symptoms continued improved. At 2 o'clock A.M. a change for the worse took place, and at 3 o'clock A.M. Senator Broderick had ceased to exist. At 5 o'clock A.M. the last rites of the Catholic Church were administered by Father Maginnis. At 6 o'clock Mr. Broderick had fallen into a state of insensibility, from which he never awoke to life, and at 7 o'clock uttered a word after 4 o'clock.

THE LAST WORDS—THE LYING IN STATE.

On Saturday, at ten o'clock A.M., the lower part of the City Hall was thrown open to the public, and the body of the public throughout is to see the body of Senator Broderick lying in state. The coffin was placed on a catafalque, in the inner apartment, the approach to which was hung with shaded lights. The body of the dead Union was draped with battlements of wee, and every thing that could be done to render impressive the scene that some public calamity has fallen upon the community. The hall was crowded from the time the doors were opened until late in the evening, and so out through another door. The body was dressed in a suit of black broadcloth, with white vest, and wore no crape, no scarf, no badge, and no sumerour at last did these become, the deceased being found in the habiliments of the sepulchre, and in the hair. The corpse was dressed in a suit of black reception, he expressed his thanks for the intended honor, stating that he preferred entering the grounds in the same manner as the rest of his fellow-citizens. He spent several hours on the grounds examining the various articles on exhibition, etc."

THE ALL ENGLAND ELEVEN TO PLAY BASE-BALL.

The All England Eleven have received a challenge from a baseball club of Philadelphia, but as the time had no precedent to govern in the grass they fear they will find it a tricker, and intend to decline the challenge for the present. They have, however, ordered books of instruction and a specimen bat, and during the winter and spring will practice the game, so that if they visit this country next year (and they expect so invitation to this effect), they will be able to compete with him with their American friends, and become students instead of professors. They propose to commence next year. The only engagement that interferes with this plan is the Canadian tour, which commences in the middle of August. This match they will either play at home or on the Canadian altogether.

DISLOCATIONS IN TEXAS.

On the 25th of August, at Waxahachie, Texas, was attacked by a party of gentlefolks, tea hundred strong, who killed five of the citizens and broke open the jail, and freed all the prisoners. While they were committing further depredations General Cureton arrived from Matamoros, and persuaded the attacking party to desist. They were headed by Col'nthes, who was wounded, and so he alleges, for injuries which he had received at the hands of the lynchers and authorities. The origin of the city put no faith in the promises which their gentlefolk gave the Mexicans to hold their fingers from the jail-bird to Matamoros, while expresses were dispatched to San Antonio for troops.

A HEROINE.

Porter's Spirit of the Times regrets to learn that one of our most extensive breeders of blood-stock at the North, J. E. Mansfield, of Westchester county, New York, has met with a most serious loss—the burning of his whole stud of horses. It appears that on Wednesday of Tuesday, the 4th instant, Mr. Monnot left home with the intention of going to Albany on business, and Fahy, leaving his place in charge of his wife, shortly after dinner went to the village of Mount Kisco. Soon after discovered dense smoke issuing from the stables. She was alone with her women—not a man within call—the blood-horses, worth nearly $100,000, in the most imminent danger. For a moment she was paralyzed, but soon recovered her presence of mind to perform the most splendid a religious duty—to save her husband's property, even at the risk of her own life. Rushing to the door soon in various directions in search of assistance, she alone rushed into the stables, from which, in a few short the flames were by this time bursting in every direction. Logan, then the head and pet of two mares to be saved: to unchain and lead him to the door of his stall was the work of a few moments, but the terror of the flames which met his sight, as he reached the door, and resisted every attempt to lead him out; until, when nearly exhausted by her exertions, Mrs. Mansfield succeeded in blindfolding him with part of her dress, when he became tractable, and submitted to be led out in safety. The foreman and helpers of the farm at last arrived, and soon had the fire under control.

HOW THE HORSES WERE CAUGHT.

Now commenced a scene the wildest and most appalling eye ever witnessed. The stables, which were sufficiently extensive to accommodate 150 horses, and burnt contained only 40. The loss of any one of these was enveloped in flames. The horses, which, in the entire confusion, had been left to themselves, had all of them turned into a state of delirious madness, and, with frenzied fighting furiously, kicking, biting, and tearing each other in the most horrible manner, made it almost apparently foot-hurty in the extreme to attempt to separate them. The two favorite mares, Wildfire and Peerless, succeeded in catching by the mane one of the most ferocious of the blood-colt, who became so infuriated at such a rate that the an was soon seen flying under the hands of the two heroines. Mrs. Mansfield then divided her nerve and courage by untying the insilence and setting the horse free from the stable, from which he soon recovered himself and procured a halter, with which he was led out in safety.

Old Ironsides, he proved to be, was the next horse to be saved by Mr. Monnot, was very near being lost; the was surrounded by flames, and he had to be led out through a hole cut in the side of her stable. Having secured the safety of the mares and colts, Mr. Monnot sent an express messenger to convey the tidings of the disaster to her husband, who was then in Albany, so he was on the point of embarking for Albany. On hearing the news the thoughts were all of his wife, and on his wife. His first exclamation was, "My God! and then poor Mansfield, all alone!" He then ordered that that poor woman, all aging, had really saved his immense property.

ALMOST A SHIPWRECK.

The steamship Quaker City arrived at Hampton Roads at 7 P. M. on 17th, in tow of the steamer State of Georgia. The following letter from Mr. Bayard Taylor says:

"The engine was smashed when thirty-six hours out from New York, and thirty-eight miles off the Cape of Hatteras.

"After the separation from the Dunkerton, on the 7th, the Quaker City made her way north and east under canvas. At 6 P. M. on the 9th she was in latitude 37° 30', longitude 74° 37', 190 miles from the first point named. There a steamer was seen, and the commander entertained our signals of distress at the firing of our guns, although the weather was very rough. She was the steamer State of Georgia, of Savannah, bound to Boston. She was not known, here away for us, and with the true characteristics of a generous steamer, she came down as close by us to the lee, which promise he faithfully performed. The 'Big Sister' of Alexandria, was ordered to our signals, and laid by us until sent in search of a steamer. At 7 o'clock on the morning of the 10th, after a night of great force, struck the ship, when she laid with her head to the south-east, achieving admirable work for 36 hours. During this time it became necessary to have overboard the deck-load of coal, the bulwarks, the life-boats having stoved, in the heavy sea. At 7 A. M. on the 10th, the steamer Ben Morgan, of Boston, was sighted by our own and signaled to assist the Quaker City. She was, at midnight, the State of Georgia ran down and took us in tow for Hampton Roads. Captain Wilson and his Sandfish desires publicly to thank the captains of the Dunkerton, State of Georgia, and Ben Morgan for their prompt and cheerful manner in which they rendered him assistance. Captain Wilson also desires to mention, unless particularly to express his gratitude to the officers of the Quaker City. He is also desirous to thank the seamen for their consideration toward himself, and to the love he has exerted during the trying hours of the gale."

(Signed) "H. SUCKALEY."

THE GREAT OYSTER-BED.

The Newark Gazette of October 4 says, that up to Saturday night, a period of about three weeks, seventy oysters have been taken off in smacks, schooners, and other craft. A vessel in the week, from six to eight hundred of vessels were engaged in dredging—and again on Sunday a hundred and odd could be counted at the bed from the Connecticut highlands. A gentleman competent to judge, says he has been upon the ground, and is of his opinion that the entire bed can not be exhausted in five years.

The oysters are of the finest quality, and the size of the spot is stated by the Newark paper to be, at the lowest figure estimation, 250 a day. The discovery is more remunerative and valuable than any gold mine ever discovered in California. The excitement all along the Sound continues, and the New York papers publish columns about the discovery. The steamboats have not been so unable as to turn any considerable quantity of their catch at any of the markets in the vicinity of Newarkin. A few have been brought in to bait the public appetite, but most are transported to the market during the next the months of rivers and creeks, where their replenishing will more than pay for the trouble of taking, besides giving to the oystermen the control of the market when the choicer varieties are scarce and in loud demand.

PERSONAL.

We read in the Tribune: "Senator Seward has gone to Egypt. It is a bold step—at least, so it is considered in Paris—for an American to make such an expedition so early in the season. Except the instability of the season, he has chosen the best time to visit one of the countries he has visited, especially Rome, Spain, and Egypt, for the reason that the Mediterranean is the period and the steam they have to encounter. The Senator has a strong constitution, and thus his view of the people and the country will be more valuable. It is doubtful whether he will be able to go down the Nile, but he will see enough that he may be detained longer in quarantine than will be agreeable."

The Bangor Times says that recently a divorce suit was tried at Houlton, in which Mrs. Coolbeth, daughter of Lot Derry, Esq., of Houlton, was the plaintiff, and a separation from her husband on the ground of his drunkenness and abuse. The jury found the charges of improper conduct on the part of his wife, but without sufficient ground for a divorce, and the case was left as it was. The parties had been married fifteen years, and before the verdict was rendered, which, however, she entered to her wife of her husband's property. All the verdict was in favor of her daughter, she was so deeply wronged upon her by the real circumstance of the case, as to suspend, that she committed suicide by drowning herself in a brook near her residence.

In the late fall or early winter of 1841, an elderly gentleman was overthrown in a sleigh on the Hoosac road with some violence, striking upon one of his shoulders, the side of his head, and his face. He was not much injured, but when he was raised up it was found that his head had received a severe contusion, and that his face was in a frightful condition, and that his shoulder was dislocated. The following morning, except what arose from the twisted condition of the muscles of his face, which was very serious, some gentle manifestations, not daring to exert much force in moving, and expected to be, in a few days, or some days passed, the old gentleman remaining quite comfortable. One morning, however, he was found by those who do which he was obliged to lift his head with his hands, and that he had died in the night. He had fallen into its usual position, and the family were astonished to find that he was dead, without any indications, by no sight as before the accident. Nor was any subsequent medical examination able to discover the cause of a few days.

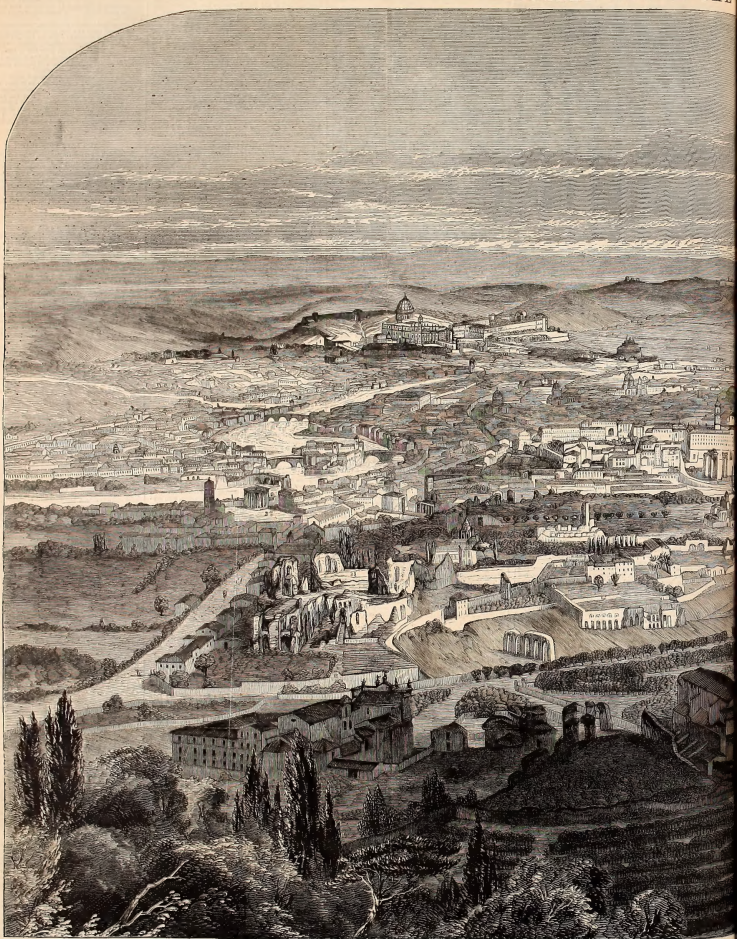
Letters have been received in England from Dr. Livingstone, dated Tette, August 1. He was preparing for an Expedition Inland, having witnessed various bodies between the Portuguese and the natives in the district in which the latter were badly defeated. In one case the Portuguese were driven to the necessity of using artillery cannon. He had a very narrow escape from death by drowning, and expected to proceed in a few days. The journey he speaks of having seen some curious and remarkable customs.

The Paris (Kentucky) Flag states that the country in the vicinity of Paris is overrun with rabbits. The Flag says: "A lady had her garden completely destroyed by them in a 'big wedding,' at which every body was to be present, and which was to be a most splendid affair. She had a parties to be married were Mr. James Hi——— and Miss Mary A———. Every thing was complete till the night before the wedding the marriage was to take place in the house and the garden of Uncle Billy Ha———, when the young lady, instead of going to her bed, packed up a few articles and left home. She has since left company with Mr. Frank C———, and, as fast as horses could carry them, went to Paris, where, on Tuesday last, they were married.

The Boston Post says: "Mr. Samuel Lawrence three horses in his Concord harness, which are the finest team of the kind ever seen in this city. They are all of a dark bay color, against boys, a carriage team, and a black. The horses have exhibited on the Common, and in the streets attracted the attention of the Governor, who is said to be a good judge of horses, and pronounced them the finest carriage horses are sixteen and a half hands high, and the same size from the nose to the commencement of the tail. There is not a tail-bit beat.

The Boston Post says that M. Marie has entered into a contract to supply the Russian Government with his Excellency on this point. The single horse was sole to be on the Governor's estate, Nahant, where he will have to it as a table

GENERAL VIEW OF THE



1. Ports and Piazza del Popolo.—2. Monte Pincio.—3. The French Academy.—4. Mausoleum of Hadrian.—5. The Vatican.—6. St. Peter's.—7. Piazza Navona.—8. Pantheon.—9. The Quirinal Palace.—10. The Capitol.—11. P
30. Mount Palatine.—31. Ruins of the Palace of the Cæsars.—32. Temple of Vesta.—33. Temple of Cicestus

THE CITY OF ROME.

EVERY traveler has been to Rome. Every one who has been there will be glad to see the above picture, in which he will be able to trace out the localities on which he once gazed with such interest; to people who have not been to Rome the view will serve as a substitute for the voyage.

In these limits no description of the ancient city is possible. We must, for this, refer to the guide books and descriptive works on Italy. We may say, however, that our picture includes the whole city from end to end, and that a careful study of it will enable the beholder to make out almost all the buildings and sites which possess historical fame.

This old city has a never-ending history. One may study the old Roman Republic in its ruins for years; to master the remains the Roman Empire requires a lifetime; a long period may be employed in unearthing the vestiges of mediæval and the early Papal Rome; and now, in these latter days, Rome promises us a new history, perhaps as interesting, perhaps as useful as the old. Two thousand years—from the dawn of light to our day—is recorded on the stones and the dust of the noble old city.

If indeed, we can admit that the fables generally called the early history of Rome have any substantial foundation in fact, then the tale told by the "stones of Rome" stretches over a period exceeding two thousand years; for, as every schoolboy knows, the Cloaca Maxima, or great sewer, is said to date from the kings. But it is well to be incredulous on these pre-historical facts. Before the column of Duillius—of which, we believe, the original long since perished—there is no monument of old Rome which constitutes a stable landmark for the historian. That column carries us back to the beginning of the Punic War. Then follow a couple of centuries which have left little or no mark on the soil. It was not till the commencement of the age of dictators that any thing considerable was done in stone, or marble, or bronze, which still survives. For rare and round the that he concerned the most corded in massed there a mausoleum carry us

OF ROME.—[From a Photograph.]

...theatre.—12. Temple of Antoninus and Faustina.—13. The Arch of Titus.—14. Constantine's Basilica.—15. Temple of Venus and Rome.—16. Monte Fiscio.—17. The Meta Sudans Fountain.—18. The Colosseum.—19. St. Peter in Vincoli.—...John and St. Paul.—20. Villa Mattei.—21. Remains of the Arch of Dolabella.—22. Mount Janiculum.—23. The Farnesina.

...ian Age, the relics are ...ine out that broods ...s never reminded ...for as habitation is ...these reign witnessed ...art and learning re... ...more advanced, per... ...ed. Here an arch, ...temple, on another a ...shield; bath-house; ...and teach us that the old stories of the Roman Empire are not fable, but practical reality. For two to three hundred years almost each Emperor left some memorial which diligent search will bring to light. As we approach the 5th century, however, these relics grow scarcer, and by A.D. 400 they almost disappear.

From the removal of the seat of government to the East to the revival of learning, nearly one thousand years afterward, very little was done toward keeping up the history "written on the stones." A great savage-looking castle or two, frowning in sullen ugliness; a few Gothic churches, less numerous than might have been expected; and the "house of the Tribune Rienzi," are almost the only landmarks which dot the great blank. With the revival of learning the scene changes, and once more Rome writes its annals in characters of stone and marble and bronze, as magnificently and as durably as in the age of the Cæsars. Statues, which Praxiteles might have owned, adorn edifices which neither Augustus nor Hadrian could have built; the relics of old Rome, highly prized as they were by the learned men, are swept away to make room for works of art more splendid still. This age lasted a century or so, and then the historians stopped again.

The past two centuries have not written their names on Roman soil. Every thing that is worth looking at is at least two hundred years old. Only lately, in our own day, have the incapable Romans begun to do a little something toward marking the fact of their existence by improving their ...on-port; digging up statues out of the earth; and, quite latterly, in laying a railroad. But the visitor who sees Rome five hundred years hence will never have his attention drawn to the 18th or the first half of the 19th centuries.

Perhaps, if the Papal incubus were got rid of, and the curse of priestly despotism removed, the Romans might once again revive to life and energy, and inscribe more characters on the old page. There is ample room, ample taste, ample money, for monuments as grand as the Pantheon or St. Peter's.

LOIS THE WITCH.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART I.

In the year 1691, Lois Barclay stood on a little wooden pier, steadying herself on the slack braid, in much the same manner as, eight or nine weeks ago, she had tried to steady herself on the deck of the rocking ship which had carried her across from Old to New England. It seemed a strange row to be on solid earth as it had been not long ago to be rocked by the sea, both by day and by night; and the sense of rest in the land was equally strange. The forests which showed in the distance all round, and which, in truth, were not very far from the wooden houses forming the town of Boston, were of different shades of green, and different sizes, to any of the timbers to those which Lois Barclay knew well in her old home in Warwickshire. Her heart sank a little as she stood alone, waiting for the captain of the good ship Redemption—the kind rough old mate, who knew her well enough on this unknown continent. Captain Holderness was busy, however, as she saw, and it would probably be some time before he could be ready to attend to her; so Lois sat down on one of the casks that lay about, and wrapped her gray duffle cloak tight about her, and sheltered herself under her hood as well as might be from the piercing wind, which seemed to follow them when it had penetrated over at sea with a dogged will of still tormenting them on land. Very patiently did Lois sit long, although she was weary and shivering with cold; for the day was severe for May, and in England, for the day was severe for May, and in England, with scores of conventional comforts for the Puritan colonists of New England, was the earliest whip that had ventured near the seas.

How could Lois help thinking of the past, and speculating on the future, as she sat on the pier, at this transition hour of her life? In the dim moonlit which she gazed upon with aching eyes (filled, against her will, with tears, now and then), there rose the little village church of Barford (not three miles from Warwick), and it remained and black with the stones and the mud they had been throwing at her, and her cat tied round her neck. I hid my face, I know, as soon as I saw the fearsome sight, for her eyes met mine as they were glaring with fury—poor, helpless, baited creature!—and she caught me the sight of me, and cried out, 'Parson's wench, parson's wench, you're my turn now, and she had both never tried for to save me, and none shall save thee when thou art brought up for a witch.' Oh! the words rang in my ears when I was dropping over for years after. I used to dream that I was in that pond, all men hating me with their eyes because I was a witch; and at times her black cat used to seem living again, and say over them dreadful words."

Lois neglected to say that she laughed at her excitement with a kind of shrinking surprise, for the tears were in her eyes. Elder Blackburn shook his head, and muttered texts from Scripture; but cheerful Will Sandell, not liking the gloomy turn of the conversation, tried to give it a lighter cast by saying, "And I don't doubt but what the parson's bonny face has bewitched many a one since with her dimples and her pleasant ways—eh, Captain Holderness? Or you must tell us tales of this young hus's doings in Indiaa."

"Ay, ay," said the Captain, "there's one under her charms in Warwickshire who will never get the better of it, I'm thinking."

Elder Blackburn shook. He stood leaning on his hands, which were placed on the table. "Brethren," said he, "I must uproad you if ye speak lightly of love and wickedness in such things. I trust this maiden hath had nothing to do with them, yet, though even in thought, engrimes we at her story. The hellish witch might have power from Satan to infect her mind, she being yet a child, with the deadly sin, instead of vain talking, I call upon you all to join with me in prayer for the purgation in us both that her heart may be purged from all iniquity. Let us pray."

"Come, there's no harm in that," said the Captain; "but, Elder Hawkins, when you are at work, you'll please to put a bit asleep into your prayers on us need purging from iniquity a good deal more than Miss Barclay, and a prayer for a man never does hinder!"

Captain Holderness had business in Boston which detained him there for a couple of days; and during that time Lois remained with the Widow Smith, seeing what was to be seen of the new land that contained her former home. The kind heart of Dame Smith was set on Salem, meanwhile, by a traveler going to it, in order to purchase for her out of its need purging from iniquity a good deal more than Miss Barclay, and a prayer for a man never does hinder!"

Captain Holderness had business in Boston which detained him there for a couple of days; and during that time Lois remained with the Widow Smith, seeing what was to be seen of the new land that contained her former home. The kind heart of Dame Smith was set on Salem, meanwhile, by a traveler going to it, in order to purchase for her some of the needful articles of household use and comfort which could be had there cheaper than in the sea-board town of Boston. Lois, therefore, had to wait for the arrival of the Salem coach before she could see the old place of her birth; and she was glad of the delay, for it was a good day's journey to Salem, and the road was rough and uncertain, and she felt that trying a minute longer than necessary for refreshment. English roads were bad enough at that period and for long after, but in America they were simply the cleared ground of the forest; the stumps of the felled trees still remaining in the fields and forming obstacles which it required the most careful driving to avoid; and in the hollows, where the ground was swampy, the pulpy nature of it was obviated by logs of wood laid across the boggy part. The deep green forest, tangled into dense masses even so early in the year, came within a few yards of the road all the way, although effort were popularly made by the inhabitants of the neighboring settlements to keep a certain space clear on each side four of the leading highways, who might otherwise come upon them unawares. The cries of strange birds, the unwonted color of some of them, all appeared to the imaginative or unaccustomed traveler the ideas of war-whoops and painted deadly enemies. But at last they drew near to Salem, which rivaled Boston in size in those days, and boasted the name of one or two streets, although in an English eye it would indeed rather more like irregularly built houses, clustered round the meeting-house, or rather one meeting-house, for a second was in process of building. The whole place was surrounded with two circles of stockades; between the two were the gardens and grazing ground for those who dreaded their cattle straying into the woods, and the consequent danger of reclaiming them.

The lad who drove them flogged his spent horse into a trot as they went through Salem to Ralph Hickson's house. It was evening, the leisure time for the inhabitants and their children was over and before the houses. Lois was struck by the beauty of one was tedding child, and turned to look after it; it caught its father's eye as it passed, and, tell with a cry that brought the mother out in affright. As one man, not very quick of mind, two lois time to think long upon the matter, for the lookout after the horse was paid at the door of a good, square, substantial, wooden house, plastered over into a creamy white, perhaps as handsome a house of the size in Salem as there was told by the driver that her uncle, Ralph Hickson, lived. In the flurry of the moment she did not notice, but Captain Holderness did, that no one came out at the unwonted sound of wheels, to receive and welcome her. She was lifted down by the old sailor, and led into a large room, almost with the hall of some English mansion-house as to size. A tall, gaunt young man of three or four and twenty rose as Lois's uncle entered the room, reading a great folio by the fading light of day. He did not rise when they came in, but looked at them with surprise, no gleam of intelligence coming into his stern, dark face. There was no woman in the house-place. Captain Heath in the same moment, and then said—

"Is this house Ralph Hickson's?"

"It is," said the young man, in a slow, deep voice. But he added no word further.

"This is his niece, Lois Barclay," said the Captain, taking the girl's arm, and pushing her forward. The young man looked at her steadily and coldly, but made no answer, only closing and marking the page in the folio which hitherto had lain open before him. At last, in the same heavy, indifferent manner, "I will call my mother, she will know."

He spoke as those who looked into a warm bright kitchen, ruddy with the light of the fire over which hung a huge bubbling cauldron engaged in cooking something, while a fourth, an old Indian squaw, with a bright handkerchief, shriveled up and bent with apparent age, moved backward and forward, evidently fetching the others the articles they required.

"Mother," said the young man; and having asserted her existence, he pointed over his shoulder to the newly-arrived strangers, and returned to the study of his book, from time to time, however, fixing steadily something in the kitchen with his shaggy eyebrows.

A tall, largely made woman, past middle life, came in from the kitchen, and stood reconnoitering the strangers.

"Is Ralph Hickson at home?"

"This is Lois Barclay, Master Ralph Hickson's niece."

"I know nothing of her," said the mistress of the house, in a deep voice, almost as masculine as her son's.

"Master Hickson received his sister's letter, did he not? I mean the one in which Richard Elias Wellsloved, who left Boston for this place yesterday morning."

Ralph Hickson has received no such letter. He lies bedridden in the chamber beyond. And letters for him are not to be received by others, wherefore I can affirm with certainty that no such letter has been delivered here. His sister Barclay, she that was Hannah Hickson, should know how to bank took the oath to Charles Stuart, and stuck by his living and his estate much like Hickson."

Lois, who had thought her heart was dead and cold a minute before at the ungracious reception she met with, felt it beat violently, and her mouth at the implied insult to her father, and spoke out, to her own and the Captain's astonishment:

"They might to godly men who left their country and their all for conscience' sake, and that they alone were not the godly men, and no one has a right to limit true godliness for men opinion's sake."

"Well said, lass," spoke out the Captain, looking upon her with a kind of admiring wonder, and patting her on the back.

Lois and the young man met each other's eyes unflinchingly for a minute or two of silence; but the girl felt her color coming and going while the latter seemed unmoved. At the end of the time the young maiden were filling fast with tears, while those of Grace Hickson kept on their stay, and unwavering.

"Mother!" said the young man, rising up with a quicker animation than he had yet shown, and in his house, "it is ill speaking of such matters when my cousin cannot answer again. Let her carry down her grass hereafter, but she has traveled from Boston city to-day, and she will sea-faring man must need rest. Go!"

He did not attend to see the effect of his words, but sat down to the table again, and was absorbed in his book in an instant. Perhaps he knew that his word was law with his grim mother, for he had hardly closed the door before she had pointed to a wooden settle, and smoothing the lines on her countenance, as if by a strong effort, began to speak in a true. Sit down here, while I bid Faith and Nattee get food ready; and meanwhile I will go tell my son Ralph that his sister's wife calls him sister's child is come over to pay him a visit."

She went to the door, waiting into the kitchen, and gave some directions to the elder girl, whom Lois now knew to be the daughter of the house. Faith stood listening before she received speech, scarcely caring to look at the newly-arrived strangers. She was a tall, slight girl, with a brunette complexion, but had handsomer features, and large, mysterious-looking eyes, as Lois saw, when once she had dared to look at her. Nattee, the aspect of the sea-captain and her cousin with such evil, suspicious glances as her mother, her grandfather mother, and the scarce less pliant figure of the daughter, a girl of twelve years old, or thereabouts, and appeared to be her mother's child, subdued by them, as if it were her accustomed habit to peep about, creep, and listen, never to be seen aside, now at that, making grimaces all the while at Lois and Captain Holderness, who sat facing the fire, and could not observe the child's mute reception. The Captain pulled out tobacco, and began to chew by way of consolation, and in a moment or two his usual elasticity of spirit came to his rescue, and he said in a low voice to Lois—

"That wounded Elias, I will give it him! If the letter that he has written to Ralph Hickson have had a different kind of welcome; but as soon as I have had something to eat and find out where I can, and bring back the letter, and then make all right, my wench. Nay, don't be downhearted, for I can not natural women's tears. They're just worn out with the shaking and the want of food."

Lois brushed away her tears, and looking round to try and divert her thoughts by fixing them on present objects, she caught her cousin Nannah's deep-set eyes furtively watching her. It was with an unfeigned look of fear that she encountered this, particularly as he did not withdraw his looks after he must have seen that she observed him. She was glad when her aunt called her into an inner room to see her uncle, and she escaped from the steady observance of her gloomy, silent cousin.

Ralph Hickson was much older than his wife, and his illness made him look older still. He had never had the force of character that Grace, his spouse, possessed, and age and indisposition had now rendered him almost childish at times. But his nature was affectionate, and stretching out his trembling arms from where he lay bedridden, he drew his niece's head down to his own, and was waiting for the confirmation of the missing letter before he acknowledged her to be his niece.

"Oh! 'tis kind in thes to come all across the sea to make acquaintance with thine uncle; kind in Sister Elias to spare thes both!"

Lois had to tell him but there was no one living to miss her at home in England, and as for the letter he had no home in England, no father nor mother left upon earth; and this she had been bidden by her mother's last wish to seek him out, and ask him for a home. Her words came up, half choked, from a heavy heart, and his child-like mind could take their meaning in without several repetitions; and then he cried like a child, rather at his own grief than hers, and would not rest for more than twenty years, than at that of the orphan's shading. Lois felt, by trying hard not to cry, that she was bravely in his new strange home. What must of all helped Lois in her self-restraint was her aunt's unsympathetic look. Born and bred in New England, Grace Hickson had a kind of jealous dislike to her husband's English relations, and had increased since of late years his weakened mind regarded after time, and he forgot the good reason he had had for his dislike, and only roused over the decision which had led it to as the great mistake of his life. "Sister Elias," said she, "was ever one in all this sorrow for the loss of one who died full of years ye are forgetting in Whoso hands life and death are?"

Iron words, but ill-spoken at that time. Lois looked up at her with a bewildered disgusted indignation; which increased as she heard the contemptuous tone in which her aunt went on talking to Elias Hickson, even when she was pressing his best with a regard to his greater comfort.

"Sister Elias will think these matters have no the mean than art always making over spilt milk; and truth, it is, that she has had much in thing old age. When we were wed, thou left all to me, and the Lord; I would never have married thee else. Nay, lass," turning to Lois, in explanation as Lois's face, "thou art never going to brow-beat me with Lord's name. I do my duty as I read it, and there is never a man or woman under speak a word to Grace Hickson about either my works or my ways. Sister Elias Mother hath said that even he might learn of me; and I would not have thee to think that I would say that if the Lord may not convert thee from thy ways, since he has sent thee to dwell, as it were, in Zion, where the wisdom dow fair and the people be godly."

Lois felt ashamed and sorry to find that her aunt had a different kind of religious reputation expression of her features; she blamed herself a little for the feeling that had caused that expression to appear. But it was a fact that she might have been troubled with something before the unexpected reception of her uncle and aunt again hoping that the remembrance of this little misunderstanding would soon pass away. So she sat down to the supper-table, and went to the gray wat her uncle's tender trembling pressure of her hand, as he muttered his thanks for some little good night, and returned into the outer, or "keeping"-room, where all the family were now assembled, except the two maid-of-all-work and various-steaks which Nattee, the Indian servant, was bringing in from the kitchen. So every one set to have been speaking to Captain Holderness while Lois had been away. Mansseh sat quiet, with his head bent down over his book; opposite to him, his eye thoughtfully fixed on vacancy, as if he saw a vision of something beyond the wall, still seated by the table, lazily directing Nattee in her preparations; and Prudence lolled against the door-frame, between Mansseh and the fireplace, playing tricks on the old Indian woman as she passed backward and forward, the child's countenance in a strong state of expressed irritation, which she tried in vain to repress, as whenever she showed any sign of it Grandmother Nattee stood still and scolded her. When all was ready Mansseh lifted his right hand and "asked a blessing" in a monotonous voice, that grace became a long prayer for abstract spiritual blessings for strength to combat Satan and to overcome the flesh, and for the conversion of Lois though, a partly personal character, as if the young girl had been in search of salvation, and even the people present, but was searching into the nature of the diseases that beset his own and his family, and praying them out of the world. He was brought back by a pluck at the coat from Prudence; he opened his eyes, looked with a sharp glance at the child, who made a face at him for all reply, and then he sat down, and they all fell to their supper. Grace Hickson would have thought for hospitality at fault if she had allowed Captain Holderness to go to bed without a meal of food, and in spite of all the cares and troubles, temptations, and sorrows of the day, Lois discovered that they were all asleep before the town-clock struck ten.

In the morning the Captain's first care was to go out in search of the boy Elias and the missing letter. He met the boy bringing it with an easy conscience, for, thought Elias, a few hours sooner or later will make no difference; tonight or the morrow morning will be all the same. But he was startled into a sense of wrong-doing by a round box on the ears from the very man who had charged him, to deliver it specially, and whom he believed he had duly delivered it to the night before.

The letter delivered, all possible proof being given that Lois had a right to claim a home from her nearest relations, Captain Holderness thought it best to take leave.

"Then'll take to them, lass, maybe, when there is no one here to make thee think on all the country. Nay, nay! parting is hard work at all times, and the sea-faring man's work done out of hand. Keep up thine heart, my wench, and I'll come back and see then next spring, if we are all spared till then; and who knows what fine young sailor-man's coming with me? Don't go on and get wet to a prayer, my darling, my darling. Then, there—I'm off! God bless thee!"

And Lois was left alone in New England.

To be continued.

THE LATE ISAMBARD KINGDOM BRUNEL.

The late Mr. Brunel was the son of a French engineer, who, having left his country at the time of the first French Revolution, came to this country, constructed many important engineering works, and finally returned to England, where he settled. His genius soon secured for him a prominent place among the engineers of the day. He was the originator and contriver of the famous Thames Tunnel, a day path-way under the bed of the Thames river, which, though a failure in a commercial point of view, remains nevertheless one of the most remarkable engineering works in the world. Mr. Brunel the elder married in England. His son, Isambard Kingdom, was born in Portsea, Hants, on the 9th April, 1806. Even in Normandy, and, when his education was complete, known as a rising engineer. He was the superintendent of the works on the Thames Tunnel. More than once during the excavation of that tunnel, the overlying mass of the rock above caused the waters to rush in upon the workmen, and half-drowned the men in the tunnel. Young Brunel was on one occasion washed fairly out of the tunnel by the resistless rush of the waters, and barely escaped alive.

The skill he developed as resident engineer of this work brought him into general notice, and obtained for the position of engineer of the Great Western and other leading British railways. He also built a number of bridges, in England and Wales, and in Hungary and Belgium, a suspension one, across the Thames. Quite lately he and Mr. Stephenson constructed and assistant in the construction and establishment of the tubular bridges which have become so celebrated. These bridges are constructed by laying down tracks for railways, cutting tunnels through mountain ridges, and building bridges over rivers, he was maturing a scheme for a gigantic steamship which should astonish the world and revolutionize navigation.

He succeeded in his aim. His steamship—The Great Eastern—was launched, and was successful. Many who read these lines will remember her arrival in New York, and the interest excited by the visit of Mr. Brunel, builder, and every thing connected with her. This was Isambard K. Brunel's first triumph in marine architecture.

For many years after the success of the Great Western and the launching of his vessel, he confined his practice of his profession. He built bridges, dug railways, and made harbors, not only in Great Britain, but throughout the European Continent. During the late Crimean War the British Government selected him to go to Turkey to build a grand military hospital on great scientific principles. This work is in every thing else, he succeeded.

It was in 1854, as we have said, that his colossal ship, the Great Eastern, or Leviathan, as she was at first called, took shape, and he laid his scheme before the British public. Ever since the plan was adopted, and the construction of the vessel began, Mr. Brunel's heart was identified with the work. Though the building proper was the work of Mr. Russell, manufacturer of Millwall, Poplar, Mr. Brunel it was he who superintended the launch, and a large part of the machinery and other appliances was constructed under his directions. The difficulties and disappointments which the enterprise involved are matters of public notoriety. When—as we shall hereafter have occasion to relate—the vessel was finally launched, the great ship stuck on the ways, the press derided the futile efforts that were made to launch her, and the shareholders in the Company called at the engineers whose failures were raising them, Isambard K. Brunel lost his pluck, his energy, or temper. On the darkest day of the Great Eastern's career he was serene, placid, and confident; the despondency surrounding the great stockholders never caused him any irritation.

It is very sad to think that this great man should have died before the success of his experiment was established. Though illness and his accompanying the great ship down the Thames, he was duly made aware of her success; whether he ever heard of the explosion, and, if yes, whether his was properly acquainted with the details, we are ignorant of the real strength of the ship we know not. On 15th September, at his residence, he unexpectedly died, and passed itself upon his body, and he died of paralysis.

Only a year or two since he escaped a singular and inglorious death. He was playing with the child of a friend, and to amuse it was throwing sovereigns into his mouth, and pretending to make them disappear with the conjurer's cry of Presto. His throw one sovereign into his mouth with such force that it entered the gullet, and stuck, there, edgewise, wholly closing the passage. Friends and doctors were unable to remove it; and had she doctor, who was sent for, been delayed a few minutes later, the great engineer would have been a corpse when he arrived.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian tells the following story in illustration of his coolness:

"The death of Isambard Brunel has excited much sympathy. The verdict on him might be 'Killed by the Great Eastern,' but less by the anxiety consequent upon the completion and starting of the big ship than by the mortification and disappointment at the cost and bungling of her launching. With that daring independence, or rather defiance of settled opinion, which distinguished Brunel, he had made arrangements for the moving of the Great Eastern to the water which were in contradiction with many doctrines hitherto accepted as axioms in ship-launching. Mr. Scott Russell made an offer to the Company to contract for the launching for an expense of £15,000. Mr. Brunel pooh-poohed the figure as needlessly costly. His own arrangements cost the Company close on £100,000. Yet he never swerved after once determining on his course. Audacity was one leading feature of Brunel's engineering character. I heard an anecdote which illustrates this strikingly. Brunel held views in contradiction to those of his brethren, as to the employment of a peculiar kind of Roman cement in railway bridge building. Other engineers objected to its use, as it hardened too fast to allow the work to settle properly. Not so Brunel. Trusting to his own view, he used this mortar in one of the first large bridges constructed by them for the Great Western line. It fell soon after its erection. Brunel entered the room where the directors were assembled, in discomfited conclave, to discuss the accident. 'I congratulate you, gentlemen, on the fall of —— bridge,' was Brunel's entry on the subject. 'Congratulate us! on an accident involving disaster and the loss of —— pounds?' was the angry and amazed rejoinder. 'Certainly,' said Brunel, coolly. 'I was just about to put up two hundred bridges on the same principle.'"

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER VIII.

A HAND AT CARDS.

HAPPILY unconscious of the new calamity at home, Miss Pross threshed her way along the coach-stones and crossed the river by the bridge of the Pont-Neuf, reckoning in her mind the number of indispensable purchases she had to make. Mr. Cruncher, with the basket, walked at her side.

They both looked to the right and to the left into the streets that they passed, had a wary eye for all gregarious assemblages of people, and turned out of their road to avoid any very excited group of talkers. It was a raw evening, and the misty river, blurred to the eye with blazing lights and to the ear with harsh noises, showed where the barges were stationed in which the smiths were making guns for the Army of the Republic. Woe to the man who played tricks with that Army, or put unbalanced ammunition in it! Better for him that his beard had never grown, for the National Razor shaved him close.

Having purchased a few small articles of grocery, and a measure of oil for the lamp, Miss Pross bethought herself of the wine she wanted. After peeping into several wineshops, she stopped at the sign of the Good Republican Brutus of Antiquity, not far from the National Palace, once (and twice) the Tuileries, where the aspect of the theatre rather took her fancy. It had a quieter look than any other place of the same description that she had tried, and though red with patriotic caps, was not so red as the rest. Sounding Mr. Cruncher, and finding him of her opinion, Miss Pross resorted to the Good Republican Brutus of Antiquity, attended by her cavalier.

Slightly observant of the smoky lights; of the people, pipe in mouth, playing with limp cards and yellow dominoes; of the one bare-breasted, bare-armed, soot-begrimed workman reading a journal aloud, and of the others listening to him; of the weapons worn, or laid aside to be resumed; of the two or three customers talking forward asleep, who in the popular high-shouldered, shaggy black spencer, looked in that attitude like slumbering bears or dogs; the two outlandish customers approached the counter, and showed what they wanted.

As their wine was measuring out, a man parted from another man in a corner, and rose to depart. In going, he had to pass Miss Pross. No sooner did he face her than Miss Pross uttered a scream and clapped her hands.

In a moment the whole company were on their feet. That somebody was assassinated by somebody vindicating a difference of opinion, was the likeliest occurrence. Every body looked to see somebody fall, but only saw a man and woman standing transfixed, staring at each other; the man with all the outward aspect of a Frenchman and a thorough Republican; the woman evidently English.

What was said in this disappointing anti-climax by the disciples of the Good Republican Brutus of Antiquity, except that it was something very voluble and loud, would have been as to much Hebrew or Chaldean to Miss Pross and her protector, though they had been all ears. But they had no ears for any thing but their surprise. For it must be recorded, that not only was Miss Pross lost in amazement and agitation, but Mr. Cruncher—though it seemed on his own separate and individual account—was in a state of the greatest wonder and perplexity.

"What is the matter?" said the man who had caused Miss Pross to scream, speaking in a vexed, abrupt voice (though in a low tone), and in English.

"Oh, Solomon, dear Solomon!" cried Miss Pross, clapping her hands again. "After not letting eyes upon you or hearing of you for so long a time, do I find you here!"

"Don't call me Solomon. Do you want to be the death of me?" asked the man, in a furtive, frightened way.

"Brother, brother!" cried Miss Pross, bursting into tears. "Have I ever been so hard with you that you ask me such a cruel question?"

"Then hold your needlessome tongue," said Solomon, "and come out, if you want to speak to me. Pay for your wine, and come out. Who's this man?"

Miss Pross, shaking her loving and dejected head at her by no means affectionate brother, said, through her tears, "Mr. Cruncher."

"Let him come out, too," said Solomon. "Does he think me a ghost?"

Apparently Mr. Cruncher did, to judge from his looks. He said a word, however, to Miss Pross, exploring the depths of her reticule through her tears with great difficulty, paid for the wine. As she did so, Solomon turned to the followers of the Good Republican Brutus of Antiquity, and offered a few words of explanation in the French language, which caused them all to relapse into their former places and pursuits.

"Now," said Solomon, stopping at the dark street-corner, "what do you want?"

"How dreadfully unkind in a brother nothing has ever turned my love away from," cried Miss Pross, "to receive me with a greeting like this, or no affection!"

"There. God-found it! There," said Solomon, making a dab at Miss Pross's lips with his own. "Now are you content?"

Miss Pross only shook her head, and wept in silence.

"If you expect me to be surprised," said her brother Solomon, "I am not surprised; I knew you were here; I knew of most people who are here. If you really don't want to endanger my existence—which I half believe you do—go your ways as soon as possible, and let me go mine. I am busy. I am an official."

"My English brother Solomon," mourned Miss Pross, casting up her tear-fraught eyes, "that had the makings in him of one of the best and greatest men in his native country—an official among foreigners, and such foreigners! I would almost sooner have seen the dear boy lying in his—"

"I said so!" cried her brother, interrupting. "I knew it. You want to be the death of me, as I shall be rendered Suspect by my own sister. Just as I am getting on!"

"The good and merciful Heavens forbid!" cried Miss Pross. "Far rather would I see you dead—and I have seen both—than have ever loved you truly, and ever shall. Say but one affectionate word to me, and tell me there is nothing angry or estranged between us, and I will detain you no longer."

The words were kind, and as if the estrangement between them had come of any subjativity of hers. As if Mr. Lorry had not been in the right, years ago, in the quiet corner in Soho, that this precious brother had spent her money and left her!

He was saying the affectionate word, however, with a far more grudging condescension, and patronage than in the days when events lit their relative merits and positions had been reversed with him by his twenty-four years of the world over), when Mr. Cruncher, touching him on the shoulder, hoarsely and unexpectedly interposed with the following singular question:

"I say! Might I ask the favor? Whether your name is Solomon, or Sydney, sir, which is it?"

The official turned toward him with sudden distrust. He had not previously uttered a word.

"Come!" said Cruncher. "Speak out, you know." (Which, by-the-way, was more than he could himself.) "John, Solomon, or Solomon John? She calls you Solomon, and she must know, being your sister. And I name you for John, you know. Which of the two goes first? And regarding that name of Pross, likewise. That wasn't your name over the water."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, I don't know all I mean, for I can't call to mind what your name was, over the water."

"No?" repeated Solomon.

"No. But I'll swear it was a name of two syllables."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. T'other one's was one syllable. I know you. You was a spy-witness at the Old Bailey. What in the name of the Father of Lies, own father to yourself, was you called at that time?"

"Barsad," said another voice, striking in.

"That's the name for a thundering pound!" cried Jerry.

The speaker who struck in was Sydney Carton. He had his hands behind him under the skirts of his riding-coat, and he stood at Mr. Cruncher's elbow as negligently as one might have stood at the Old Bailey itself.

"Don't be alarmed, my dear Miss Pross. I arrived at Mr. Lorry's, to his surprise, yesterday evening; we agreed that I would not present myself elsewhere until all was safe, or unless I could be useful; I present myself here to help a little talk with your brother. I wish you had a better employed brother than Mr. Barsad. I wish for your sake—Mr. Barsad under-stands me—he was a man, and not a bully and coward, before the Revolution."

Sharp was the cant word of the time for a spy, under the jailers. The spy, who was pale, turned paler, and asked him how he dared—

"I'll tell you," said Sydney. "I'll tell you, Mr. Barsad, coming out of the prison of the Conciergerie while I was contemplating the walls an hour or more ago. You have a face to be remembered, and I remember faces well. Made curious by seeing you in that connection, and having a reason, to which you are no stranger, for associating you with the misfortunes of a friend now very unfortunate, I walked in your direction. I walked into the wine-shop here, close after you, and sat near you. I had no difficulty in deducing from your wareserved conversation, and the rumor openly going about among your admirers, the nature of your calling. And gradually, what I had done at random seemed to shape itself into a purpose, Mr. Barsad."

"What purpose?" the spy asked.

"It would be troublesome, and might be dangerous, to explain to the street. Could you favor me, in confidence, with some minutes of your company—at the office of Tellson's Bank, for instance?"

"Under a threat?"

"Oh! Did I say that?"

"Then why should I go there?"

"Really, Mr. Barsad, I can't say, if you can't."

"You mean that you won't say, Sir?" the spy irresolutely asked.

"You apprehend me very clearly, Mr. Barsad. I won't."

Carton's negligent recklessness of manner came powerfully in aid of his quickness and skill in such a business as he had in his secret mind, and with such a man as he had to do with. His practiced eye saw it, and made the most of it.

"Now, I told you so," said the spy, casting a reproachful look at his sister; "if any trouble comes of this, it's your doing."

"Come, come, Mr. Barsad!" exclaimed Sydney. "Don't be ungrateful. But for my great respect for your sister, I might not have let up so pleasantly to a little prompting which has made for our mutual satisfaction. Do you go with me to the Bank?"

"I'll hear what you have got to say. Yes, I'll go with you."

"I propose that we first conduct your sister safely to the corner of her own street. Let me take your arm, Miss Pross. This is not a good city, at this time, for you to be out in, unprotected; and as your escort knows Mr. Barsad, I will invite him to Mr. Lorry's with us. Are we ready? Come, then!"

Miss Pross recalled soon afterward, and to the end of her life remembered, that as she pressed her hands on Sydney's arm and looked up in his face, imploring him to do no hurt to Solomon, there was a braced purpose in the arm, and a kind of inspiration in the eyes, which not only contradicted his light manner, but changed and raised the man. She was too much occupied then with fears for the brother who so little deserved her affection, and with Sydney's friendly reassurances, adequately to heed what she observed.

They left her at the corner of the street, and Carton led the way to Mr. Lorry's, which was within a few minutes' walk. John Barsad, or Solomon Pross, walked at his side.

Mr. Lorry had just finished his dinner, and was sitting before a cheery little log or two of fire—perhaps looking into their bleze for the picture of that younger elderly gentleman from Tellson's, who had looked into the red coals at the Royal George at Dover, now a good many years ago. He turned his head as they entered, and showed the surprise with which he saw a stranger.

"Miss Pross's brother, Sir," said Sydney. "Mr. Barsad."

"Barsad?" repeated the old gentleman, "Barsad? I have an association with the name—and with the face."

"I told you you had a remarkable face, Mr. Barsad," observed Carton coolly. "Pray sit down."

As he took a chair himself, he supplied the link that Mr. Lorry wanted, by saying to him with a frown, "Witness at that trial." Mr. Lorry immediately remembered, and regarded his new visitor with an undisguised look of abhorrence.

"Mr. Barsad has been recognized by Miss Pross as the affectionate brother you have heard of," said Sydney, "and has acknowledged the relationship. I am pass to move news. Darnay has been arrested again."

Struck with consternation, the old gentleman exclaimed, "What do you tell me! I left him and them within these two hours, and am about to return to him!"

"Arrested for all that. When was it done, Mr. Barsad?"

"Just now, if at all."

"Mr. Barsad is the best authority sensible, Sir," said Sydney, "and I have it from Mr. Barsad's communication to a friend and brother sheep over a bottle of wine, that the arrest has taken place. He left the messengers at the gate, and saw them admitted by the porter. There is no earthly doubt that he is retaken."

Mr. Lorry's business eye read in the speaker's face that it was less of time to dwell upon the point. Confused, but sensible that something might depend on his presence of mind, he commanded himself, and was silently attentive.

"Now, I trust," said Sydney to him, "that the long and intimate relations of Doctor Manette may stand him in as good stead to-morrow—you said he would be before the Tribunal again to-morrow, Mr. Barsad?—"

"Yes; I believe so."

"In as good stead to-morrow as to-day. But it may not be so. I own to you I am anxious, Mr. Lorry, for Doctor Manette's not having had the power to prevent this arrest."

"He may not have known of it beforehand," said Mr. Lorry.

"But that very circumstance would be alarming, when we remember how identified he is with his son-in-law."

"That's true," Mr. Lorry acknowledged, with his troubled hand at his chin, and his troubled eyes on Carton.

"In short," said Sydney, "this is a desperate time, when desperate games are played for desperate stakes. Let the Doctor play the winning game; I will play the losing one. No man's life here is worth purchase. Any one carried home by the people to-day may be condemned to-morrow. Now, the stake I have resolved to play for, in case of the worst, is a friend in the Conciergerie. And the friend I purpose to myself to win is Mr. Barsad."

"You mean, have good cards, Sir," said the spy.

"I'll run them over," returned Sydney; "I'll see what I hold.—Mr. Lorry, you know what a brute I am; I wish you'd give me a little brandy."

It was put before him, and he drank off a glassful—drank off another glassful—pushed the bottle thoughtfully away.

"Mr. Barsad," he went on thoughtfully, in the tone of one who really was looking over a hand at cards: "Sheep of the prisons, emissary of Republican committees, now turnkey, now prisoner, always spy and secret informer, so much the more valuable here for being English that an Englishman is less open to suspicion of subornation in those characters than a Frenchman, represents himself to his employers under a false name. That's a very good card. Mr. Barsad, now in the employ of the republican French government, was formerly in the employ of the aristocratic English government, the enemy of France and freedom. That's an excellent card. Inference clear as day in this region of suspicion, that Mr. Barsad, still in the pay of the aristocratic English government, is the spy of Pitt, the treacherous foe of the Republic crouching in its bosom, the English traitor and agent of all mischief so much spoken of and so difficult to find. That's a card not to be beaten. Have you followed my hand, Mr. Barsad?"

"SO YOU PUT FUN IT HIS COFFIN?"

"Not to understand your play," returned the spy, somewhat uneasily.

"I play my Ace, Denunciation of Mr. Barsad to the nearest Section Committee. Look over your hand, Mr. Barsad, and see what you have. Don't hurry."

He drew the bottle near, poured out another glassful of brandy, and drank it off. He saw that the spy was fearful of his drinking himself into a fit state for the immediate denunciation of him. Seeing it, he poured out and drank another glassful.

"Look over your hand carefully, Mr. Barsad. Take time."

It was a poorer hand than he suspected. Mr. Barsad saw losing cards in it that Sydney Carton knew nothing of. Thrown out of his honorable employment in England through his own unsuccessful hard swearing there—not because he was not wanted there; now, indeed, reasons for wanting our superiority to secrecy and spies are of very modern date—he knew that he had crossed the Channel, and accepted service in France: first, as a tempter and an eavesdropper among his own countrymen there: gradually as a tempter and an eavesdropper among the natives. He knew that under the overthrown government he had been a spy upon Saint Antoine and Defarge's wine-shop; had received from the watchful police such heads of information concerning Doctor Manette's imprisonment, release, and history, as should serve him for an introduction to the prisoner's confidence; had realized from that confidence (as Madame Defarge, and the register of her wine-shop, were well aware) the inestimable value of such intelligence as his own countrymen there: gradually set a number of them on their own destruction: and all the while had striven with the decision of his character to hold some place among the forces working out the Revolution, which should not bring him to the guillotine. Sydney Carton knew nothing of all this; but he knew enough to deem the character of his hand very bad indeed.

"Take time!"

Mr. Barsad began to scan his cards anxiously, but presently brightened very much. Sydney Carton's breathing had become more difficult, and he had filled himself another glass of brandy. The spy felt certain that he saw losing cards in his hand when he played one.

"Mr. Barsad," said Carton, in his usual tone, "you are not unacquainted with the manner in which the prisoner has been denounced, and how he is charged with being in the pay of England, and what evidence there is against him. Now, I am well acquainted with the facts that can be brought home to you, and I undertake to show you that your case is hopeless. Would you like to compare notes with me before playing?"

"Thank you, sir, no. I prefer," said the spy, grasping at every card as it came to him, "to make my discoveries here."

"As you please, sir. Only, let me remind you that you have not many cards in your hand, and that they are very poor ones."

Mr. Barsad looked hard at his adversary, who was gazing at the ceiling, with his head thrown back, and his right hand clutching the neck of the bottle from which he had taken his last glass of brandy.

"Mr. Barsad," said Carton, steadily, "I am a spy myself."

"You!"

"Yes. Informed against, and betrayed, and gone to the Devil. Now, you see my game. Poor game as it is, I play it alone, and it is worth playing. Do you see?"

Mr. Barsad saw it, but he could not believe it. He looked at his cards, shook his head, and smiled.

"Mr. Barsad," said Carton, "I am a ruined gamester, driven to the desperation of play

oilet Vinegar

is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. Rimmel,

Perfumer, London and Paris.

260 HOW to LIVE CHEAP. 260

In order to defend ourselves against the present high prices of Provisions, we have opened our Stores, WINES, GROCERIES, and PROVISIONS of all kinds, at the immense establishment of THOMAS E. AGNEW, No. 569 Greenwich Street, cor. Murray. Goods delivered Free.

$40—NEW SEWING MACHINE—$40

—THE "PARKER MACHINE, manufactured by the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, and sold by us, is a beautiful first-class, double-thread, lockstitch, reindeer and fast machine. All orders must be addressed to the general agents.

WHEELER & CO., 469 Broadway.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar,

513 Broadway,

Under the St. Nicholas Hotel.

HUDSON BAY SABLE, RUSSIAN SABLE, MINK, MARTEN, ROYAL ERMINE, OF THE LATEST STYLES FROM EUROPE. CHILDREN'S FURS, IN ELEGANT VARIETY, STOCK LARGE, ASSORTMENT COMPLETE, PRICES MODERATE.

GENIN'S BAZAAR,

513 Broadway.

Café de Costa Rica C&C

THIS SUPERIOR Strong-bodied delicate-flavored Mountain COFFEE, For sale by COUDAR & CO 165 & 167 Front Street.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $80.

HEMMING GAUZES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $60 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, &c., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,

INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR

IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH

Sewing Machines,

WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.

910 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.

620 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.

80 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

361 BROADWAY 539

BRIDAL SETTS,

Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

EVERETT HOUSE,

HAWLEY D. TUCKER, Proprietor.

NORTH SIDE UNION SQUARE.

NEW YORK.

PIANO FORTES.

PAYEN, BACON & CO.,

PIANO FORTE MANUFACTURERS, Warerooms No. 115 Grand Street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments may be found exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

FOR THE CURE OF ALL DISEASES

ARISING FROM

AN IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD.

In this purely vegetable preparation, the properties of an Antiseptic, a mild Cathartic, and a Tonic Medicine are combined. It purifies the blood, and expels the impurities of unhealthy secretions, which engender and feed disease, thus starving it at the root of the malady.

Prepared and sold by A. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 369 Fulton Street, New York.

REMOVAL.

JAMES BOGARDUS,

Architect in Iron, Originator, Constructor, and Patentee of Iron Buildings,

Has removed to the Factory of

FOUNDERS'S Improved Iron Universal Mill,

Machine Room corner of White and Elm Streets,

In Hudson Square,

Office No. 321 Canal Street, near Centre, New York.

Iron Building corner Cortlandt and Duane Sts., formerly occupied, has been removed in widening Duane Street.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars, address, The Jarvis Island, American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.

S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.

B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.

O'Connor & Calladay, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

Patent Extension Tables.

At Herdtle's Manufactory, 148, 150 Wooster Street.

Trusses. Shoulder Braces, Elastic Stockings, bandages, and &c. Glover's new liver truss. No. 4 Astor St.

Quarterman's Patent Stove Polish,

No. 164 John Street, New York.

Improved Billiard Tables.

W. I. Sharp, Manufacturer, 342 Bowery.

All kinds of Picture Frames cheap at 142 Fulton St., near Broadway. J. B. BRADLEY, Agt.

"Piggy" Waterproof is cheap and unperishable. one coat injure the cork nor enlarge the rupture. Sold by druggists.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

In an article on

BEULAH.

Written by one of their oldest editors, says:

"We look of the season has more justly attracted attention than BEULAH, a novel by Miss Augusta J. Evans, published by Derby & Jackson. It is emphatically a strong book, and we place it at once in the foremost rank of novels by American ladies. Possibly we might indeed hazard de more, and say that it is the best of that class."

"BEULAH"

Is a large and handsome 12mo. Price $1 25.

STEREOTYPED AND NOW READY.

For sale by all Booksellers and News Agents.

Kelty Brothers & Lum.

291 UPHOLSTERY GOODS, 291

BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CHURCH WINDOW-SHADES, STORE WINDOW SHADES, FRENCH WINDOW SHADES, LACE CURTAINS, DAMASK CURTAINING, BAND CURTAINING, BUFF, WHITE, AND GREEN HOLLAND SHADES, BY THE YARD OR PIECE.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry. — We invite attention to our late importation of Coral and Garnet Jewelry, consisting of bracelets, brooches, earrings, necklaces, charms, hair-pins, combs, bracelets, clasps, &c.

CHISHOLM, BOGARDUS & STONEHOUSE,

No. 577 Broadway, corner of Spring Street.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its wonderful efficacy in relieving, curing, and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Croup, and Consumption of the Lungs: while even Consumptive itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The white history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, is one of which there are several worthless ones, not that each bottle has the written signature of I. BUTTS, as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

Saponifier. Saponifier. Saponifier.

The best article for Public or Private Institutions, should be without this economical and ready Soap Maker.

Full directions for making Hard and Soft Soap. Every Soap from the refuse grease of the kitchen, fat or internal, amongst a quantity of rosin.

For sale by Druggists and Grocers generally. Beware of Counterfeits. The success of this article has induced unprincipled persons to imitate it, who are being prosecuted for infringing our patented rights.

The genuine manufactured only by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company.

Office 390 Penn Street, Pittsburgh, Pa.

LEWIS, JAMES & CO, Agents,

Philadelphia.

STRANGERS should not fail to call and see D. the PARAGON SELF - GENERATING GASLIGHT at No. 371 Broadway, N. Y. All are welcome, sale or no sale. BUTLER, HOSFORD & Co.

Bank Note Engraving.

AMERICAN

BANK NOTE COMPANY,

MERCANTILE BUILDING,

NEW YORK.

OFFICES AT

New York, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Montreal, and Chicago.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions for Patents, and prepare Specifications. Their Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Washington, D. C.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER PAPER COMPANY, (ESTABLISHED 1817),

For Bank Notes, Iron, Tin, Bricks, Canvass, Muslin, Paper Hangings, Wrapping Paper, Boards, and every description under proof. Durable and Economical. Depot 72 Maiden Lane, New York.

HICKS & BETTS, Agents.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for "LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION." In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations. This work will be sold exclusively by Agents, to each of whom a special District will be given. Liberal inducements offered. Applicants should name the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address JOHN W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, AND WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes in Paris and London.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER

imparts a delicate rosy hue to the skin, and renders it soft and beautiful.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

TO THE NERVOUS OF BOTH SEXES.

A Retired Clergyman having been restored to health in a few days, after many years of great nervous suffering, is willing to assist others by sending (free) a copy of the prescription used. Direct the Rev. John M. Dagnall, 186 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Fair of the American Institute,

At Palace Garden,

W. 14th Street, near the 6th Avenue,

NOW OPEN.

Guiness & Son's Extra Double Stout and Porter, in Pints, Quarts, and Imperials Pints.

For sale by their AGENT for the United States,

C. E. HARRISON,

No. 357 Pearl Street.

WANTED—Agents to canvass, for THE AMERICAN FREEMASON'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Tennessee, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, Texas, Georgia, North and South Carolina and Virginia, New York and Pennsylvania. None need apply but Master Masons in regular standing, accredited members of a Lodge in the States they desire to canvass, and to such most liberal inducements to work zealously, freely, and fervently will be offered.

Address the Publisher,

J. F. BRENNAN,

P. O. Box 4317, New York.

A. S. Barnes & Burr's

New Publications.

No. 51 & 53 John Street, New York.

1.

MODERN PHILOLOGY: its History, Influence, and Discoveries. By D. W. Dickson. With Maps, Tables, Views, and Plates. $4 50.

2.

THE HIGHER CHRISTIAN EDUCATION. By B. W. Dwight. $1 00.

3.

LECTURES ON MENTAL AND MORAL CULTURE. By Nevins, Bascom, and Hopkins. 1 00.

4.

NORMAL METHODS OF TEACHING THE COMMON BRANCHES OF EDUCATION. By Alfred Holbrook. $1 50.

5.

McNALLY'S SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY. Enlarged by new Maps, and a Treatise on Physical Geography. $1.

6.

SMITH AND MARTIN'S PRACTICAL BOOKKEEPING, for Youth, by Slate and Double Entry. $1.

7.

CÆSAR'S COMMENTARIES. ILLUSTRATED! With Notes. By Prof. Spencer, of Dickinson. $1 25.

8.

NORTHEND'S NEW SERIES OF SPEAKERS, viz: 1. Little Orator, 20 cents; 2. National Orator, 70 cents; 3. Entertaining Dialogues, 75 cents.

9.

SCHOOL MANUAL OF DEVOTION. Containing Selections from Scripture, Hymns, and Prayers. 75 c.

10.

TEACHER'S REGISTER, for Record of School's Names and Attendance. 75 cents.

11.

ELEMENTS OF MECHANICS. By W. G. Peck. Professor of Mathematics, Columbia College. $1 25.

12.

NEW ELEMENTARY ALGEBRA. Embracing the First Principles of the Science. By Charles Davies, Author of Complete Course of Mathematics. 75 cts.

Single copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of above prices.

A. S. BARNES & BURR,

51 and 53 John Street.

F. S. CLEAVER'S

PRIZE MEDAL HONEY SOAP.

The only genuine, possessing a free and creamy lather, a lasting and delicate perfume, and is warranted not to injure the skin.

Beware of Counterfeits.

F. S. Cleaver's celebrated Musk, and Brown Windsor, and Glycerine Soaps, also Superfine Scented Soaps, for the bath and gauze, to be had of all the respectable Druggists and Grocers in the United States.

Manufactory in London.

Wholesale Depot 21 and 23 Dey Street, New York.

J. O. ROYSTON, Agt.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, on pay expected until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. SIX LECTURES on the causes, prevention, and cure of Nervous Debility, Mental Depression, Hypochondria, and Male and Female complaints. On the modes of Preserving Health to Old Age. 453 pages, with Engravings. Price 50 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.

2nd. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia: why we grow old and what causes disease. 131 pages, 6 engravings. Price 36 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county town and post office.

BUSTLES.—B. F. MOORE'S PATENT INFLATED BUSTLES.—THIS BUSTLE IS SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS. It is a perfect Skirt Supporter, manufactured by B. F. MOORE, 111 Nassau Street; retailed everywhere.

Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages of reading and three to one half more reading than any other in the country.

Close of the Nineteenth Volume.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXIV.] CONTENTS. [NOVEMBER.

THE RICE LANDS OF THE SOUTH. By T. Addison Richards.

With Eighteen Illustrations from Original Drawings by the Author.

THE VOLCANOES OF CENTRAL AMERICA.

With Twenty Illustrations, Original and Copious, by Hitchcock.

TEA CULTURE IN THE UNITED STATES.

With Twelve Illustrations.

ROBERT FENTON'S VICTORY.

MATCH-MAKING.

THE LAND OF MAURIALA.

THAT DISAGREEABLE BIGGS.

SONG OF THE TIMES.

PROTEUS. By Bayard Taylor.

A MAN AT LITTLE.

THE PHIAL OF DEBAD. By Fitz Hugh Ludlow.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS. By Mr. Strahorn and Others.

Concluded.

EDITOR'S LITERARY NOTICES.

With Two Illustrations by Vogt.

The present Number closes the Nineteenth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In the Introductory Notice prefixed to the first Number, the Publishers announced their intention to present a periodical which no one who had the slightest relish for miscellaneous reading, or the slightest wish to keep himself informed of the progress and results of the literary genius of his own time, could afford to be without, and they intend to publish it at so low a rate, and to give it a value so unprecedented, that it will make its way into the very hands of the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design the Nineteen Volumes already published will show. Each of these contains as much matter as an ordinary octavo volume of 400 pages, cutting, if illustrated in the style of the Magazine, at least three dollars. The Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine form a complete Library of more than a Hundred Volumes, comprising the best productions of the foremost Novelists, Historians, Essayists, and Poets of the day.

Without entering into a comparison with other American periodicals, the Publishers may be permitted to say that HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains 75 per cent. more reading than any other publication of the country. Monthly Magazine. While giving place to many of the best productions of the leading British periodicals, HARPER'S MAGAZINE is distinctively American in character. Every number contains an article illustrative of the social life and character of some State of the Union. By thus welcoming contributions from every part of the country, HARPER'S MAGAZINE has effectually prevented the Magazine from assuming a sectional character, and of becoming in any sense of the word "National Monthly."

Is an Illustrated Magazine. HARPER'S is wholly without a rival. The volumes already published form a complete Library of the most beautiful engravings, most of them executed in the highest style of art, from original Drawings by Darley, Parsons Hitchcock, Fredericks, Schell, Hennessy, Strahorn, Vogt, Ludlow, Bellew, Nelligan, Stephens, Rogers, Dalziel, and others. The Illustrations for the year just closed cost less than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars. The cost of the Illustrations for the present volume will exceed this amount. HARPER'S MAGAZINE has more than ten times the space, and more than a Quarter of a Million of Dollars to American Authors and Artists.

The Publishers gratefully acknowledge that the unprecedented patronage it receives beyond the most sanguine expectations. They hope that the first Number of the succeeding would "make its way into the hands or the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States," but the number of these readers has proved far greater than they anticipated. They believe that the circulation of the Magazine will continue to increase with the growth and population of the country, and that the time will come when it will hereafter be conducted, they can offer at the same price more than the contents of the Volumes already issued.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00

Two Copies for One Year 5 00

Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, $4 00.

The Postage on HARPER'S MAGAZINE must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW STORY, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," Splendidly Illustrated by Phiz, is now appearing in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of "POTIPHAR PAPERS," are commenced in "Harper's Weekly" for June 4.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00

One Copy for One Year 2 50

One Copy for Two Years 4 00

Five Copies for One Year 10 00

Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00

Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Deduction will be made to those wishing to advertise by the Year, Half-year, or Month.

Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,

Franklin Square, New York.

THE INTERNATIONAL GAME OF CRICKET.

A LONG STOP, brilliantly performed by FITZ ALLEN FITZ UGH from a Round-arm Shot by one of the Eleven. Fits declares himself in favor of Byes or Leg bits, instead of Long or Short Stops about the 'ol.

(Two distinguished AMERICAN CRICKETERS enjoying their National Drink of 'Ar-fan'-'Ar-f.)

"I say, 'Anny, then Hinglish Coves 'ave gone an' done us this time. Eh!"

"Exsay, my boy, they 'av; but hi am ev the hopinion hit will not be long before we can 'old an' 'and with them. Hall we want in a little more practice, and a few more Professionals from Hold Hingland, and then we will teach 'em that Hamerica can cry 'Hexcelsior! eyur an' eyrest!' in the noble game o' Cricket!"

WHIPPER. "Dooced nice place, this—only one can't speak to a Gal without it's being reported you're engaged to her."

SNAPPER. "Hah! I took the precaution to give out when I first came that I wasn't a Marryin' Man!"

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
BEIGE DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
CHESTERFIELD STRAIGHT BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all the finest of CASSIMERES and Beaver suits, and all the latest styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS

in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.

D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 255, 259, and 299 Broadway.

Old Sachem's Bitters & Wigwam Tonic.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 145 Water Street.
For Sale Everywhere.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP and FAMILY BAR SOAP are confidently recommended for their emollient properties and delightful aroma.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

Perfectly Pure
CREAM TARTAR
AND
BI-CARBONATE SODA.

We have the finest brands and best qualities in this line, for the purpose of supplying the most particular CHEMISTS, DRUGGISTS, CONFECTIONERS, and CHOICE FAMILY STORES with an article perfectly pure and unadulterated. Get our name on the papers and boxes! The CREAM TARTAR is prepared under our own supervision. We sell these goods in any desired packages suitable for any trade.

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
116 and 118 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years.

A Beautiful New Picture,
By BURRY,
Artist of "The Motherless," &c.

The Rector's Ward.

From the new Episcopal novel, that is so popular at this time. It is nearly ready. A sweet face, a life size, crayon head. Price $1 00.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, Publishers.

Send for a list of our pictures, and information regarding the different styles of drawing, painting, &c., free.

Dupuy's "Kiss-me-Quick,"

Exquisite French Perfumery, Liquid Bouquets, Fragrant Powders, Pomades and Cosmetics. At the Family Drug Store, 609 Broadway, corner of Houston Street.

Glass Shades!
Glass Shades made to order!!
Of all sizes, for covering Clocks, Flowers, &c., constantly on hand and made to order.
Depot, No. 106 William, corner of Ann Street.

A SAVING OF SIXTY PER CENT. BY GOING UP STAIRS BEST FRENCH YOKE

SSSSSSSS
SSSSSSSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSS
SSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSSSSSSS

IIIII IIIII
IIIII IIIII
IIIII IIIII
IIIII IIIII
IIIIIIIIIII
IIIIIIIIIII
IIIII IIIII
IIIII IIIII
IIIII IIIII
IIIII IIIII

IIIII
IIIII
IIIII
IIIII
IIIII
IIIII
IIIII
IIIII
IIIII

RRRRRRRRR
RRRRRRRRR
RRR RRR
RRR RRR
RRRRRRRR
RRRRRRRR
RRR RRR
RRR RRR
RRR RRR

TTTTTTTTTTTTT
TTTTTTTTTTTTT
TTTT
TTTT
TTTT
TTTT
TTTT
TTTT
TTTT
TTTT
SSSSSSSS
SSSSSSSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSS
SSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSS SSSS
SSSSSSSSS
SSSSSSSS

RETAIL AT WHOLESALE PRICES.
SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS, OR $1 60 EACH.
READY MADE, ALL SIZES, IN CUSTOM STYLE
OR ORDER.
MADE OF BEST WAMSUTTA MUSLIN AND FINE LINEN,
AND WARRANTED AS GOOD A SHIRT AS SOLD
IN RETAIL STORES AT $2 50 EACH.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $3 EACH.
BEST ENGLISH SILK SCARFS, $1 50 EACH.
HONEY-COMBE WOOL SCARFS, 50 CENTS TO 75 CENTS.
GOLD SCARF PINS AT LONDON PRICES.
BEST THREE-PLY LINEN COLLARS, $1 75 PER DOZEN.
—WHOLESALE DEALERS SUPPLIED.
P.S.—Those who think I can not make a good shirt for $3 are mistaken. Here is the cost of one dozen $3 shirts:

10 yds of York Mills muslin, at 14c. per yd	$1 40
7 yards of fine linen, at 50c. per yard	2 50
Making and cutting	4 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit	2 60
Total	$15 00

SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.
Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure for shirts. 2 two-cent stamps to be paid to the express company on receipt of order.
Shirt bosoms cut to fit at 50 cents.
Shirt bottoms, all lines, 37 cents to $1 each.
WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
between White and Walker Streets.

SHELDON & CO., 115 Nassau St., N.Y.,
Have nearly ready
A NEW VOLUME OF SERMONS BY THE Great London Pulpit Orator,
"THOSE SERMONS HAVE ALREADY REACHED
A SALE OF OVER
200,000 VOLUMES
IN THIS COUNTRY ALONE.
This Volume is
THE SIXTH SERIES,
WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE AUTHOR,
AND CONTAINING A STEEL PLATE ILLUSTRATION OF
Spurgeon's New Tabernacle.
One Vol. 12mo, Uniform. Price $1 00.
Sent by Mail, prepaid, for $1 00.

Farrel, Herring & Co.'s
(Herring's Patent)
Champion Fire and Burglar Proof Safes,
629 CHESTNUT STREET (Jayne's Hall)
PHILADELPHIA.
Sideboard and Parlor Safes for Dwelling Houses, &c.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 149.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A NEW SERIAL.

We shall commence in an early number of HARPER'S WEEKLY a new Serial Tale by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., of which we have purchased the advance proof-sheets from the author. This Tale will be continued through the WEEKLY till it is completed.

In reply to several inquiries, we beg to say that Mr. DICKENS'S new Serial, "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY on May 7, and Mr. CURTIS'S delicious Story of American Society, entitled "TRUMPS," on April 9. We can send the back numbers from those dates, or from the beginning of the year, to any person who remits the money.

For several months past we have printed from EIGHTY TO NINETY-THREE THOUSAND COPIES per week of HARPER'S WEEKLY, more than DOUBLE that of any other Illustrated Newspaper in the country.

For terms, etc., see Advertisement.

LA FILLE BIEN GARDEE.

(AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.)

WITH AN ILLUSTRATION BY MILLAIS.

No, Edith, I have got no briefs—I want no briefs at all,
I went to know that you're come back, and safe at Shirley Hall:
And till I get a note from you, announcing that return,
I've neither head nor heart for Chitty, Baglan, Hayes, or Fearne.

Your letter speaks about "hard work," and "rising at the bar;"
I read it, Edith, at my window, smoking a cigar;

And I'm to work while you're away?—a likely thing, indeed!
Yes, I'm in one Ancient case—the one in Acton Zule.

You can believe, or disbelieve me, Edith, as you please,
A fellow's week's all bosh unless a fellow's mind's at ease;
And studying Cross Remainders Over is no use, I fear,
While you're in France, and I'm a cross remainder over here.

Don't, Edith, write about myself, I want to hear of you,
And what you're doing day by day, and also how you do:
And whether Mrs. Armington (whom I don't like and don't)
Is still acting like a friend, or only like an aunt;

And takes you, Edith, every where, and shows you what's to see,
And in society performs what's due to you—until me:
Nor, while her own long girls are such you'd wherever she can get,
Permits you to be talk'd to by the billiard-playing set.

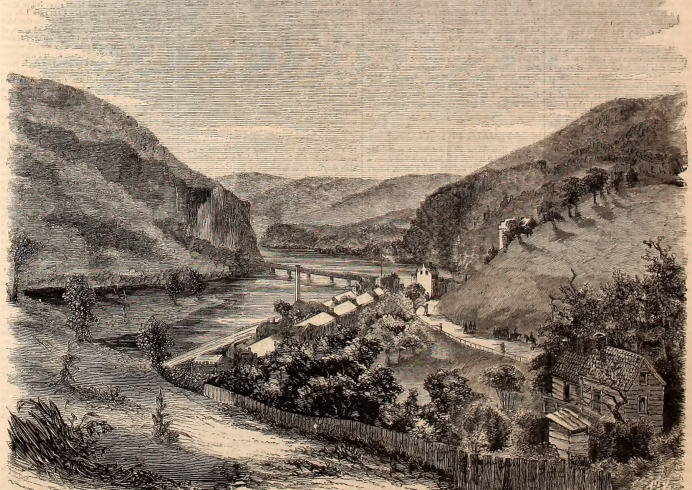
And, Edith, as she's full of spite (she is, from wig to toes,
And hates me for that harmless sketch that show'd her Roman nose),
Informs me if those vicious innuendos she contrives,
And talks at briefless barristers, and pities poor men's wives.

Or if she ever gives you, Edith darling, half a hint
(There's nothing that a woman wouldn't do with such a squint)
That I've been fast, and people say, "who really ought to know,"
That at getting briefs and paying bills alone they think I'm slow;

Or talks of our engagement in a way that isn't kind,
Makes it, at picnics, an excuse for lowing you behind:
And dawns, that cold old fig of hers maliciously upcurl'd,
"Of course, engaged Miss Edithn do not care about the world."

You'll call me such a worry, Edith, but it is not fun
To be stuck in Temple chambers when October has begun;
So pity for a lover who's condemned in town to stay,
When She—and every body else—are off and far away.

I wander in our Gardens when the dusk makes all things dim,
The gardener tells me not to smoke, but much I care for him:



GENERAL VIEW OF HARPER'S FERRY, SHOWING THE BRIDGE, ARMORY, ADJACENT HILLS, ETC.—[SEE PAGE 712.]

And Paper Bulletins, EDIBLE, a sketch by fancy drawn,
Drawn on old Harroid mansion, with the grass-plot for its lawn:

The Thames, its lake; myself, its Lord (his looness, lucky chicken);
Exactly fifty thousand pounds, paid yearly in advance;
Then at the eastern turret a sweet form is caught up,
And Edith waves a kerchief white, and calls me in to sup.

Well, bless you, Edith. When you sail'd, I put aboard your ship
Vanity Fair, by Thackeray, and my dear old Hound, by Grip;
And to no girl her destiny more sure protection sends
Than such a dog to bite her foes, such book to bite her friends.

S. S.

QUEEN'S BAR, SIDE, TEMPLE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1859.

THE TRADE IN FOOD.

OCTOBER is ended, and all over the world farmers are summing up the results of the crops. The whole truth will hardly be ascertained for a fortnight to come. In many districts the wheat-grower refuses to tell—perhaps do not know themselves—how Providence has dealt with them; while the annual yield of corn can seldom be computed before a few sharp frosts. But enough is known to enable persons of experience to form a pretty shrewd guess as to the cereal product of the year 1859.

Enough is known to enable us to correct the estimates which were formed a month since. It is now pretty generally admitted that the wheat crop, though large, is not so universally abundant as was at one time believed. Virginia is said to have harvested the largest crop on record. The great Genesee Valley has done well. Tennessee and Kentucky, Southern Illinois, Southern Ohio, Southern Indiana, Southern Iowa, most of Michigan, and nearly all Missouri, have gathered a more wheat than usual. But in Northern Illinois, many parts of Ohio and Indiana, Northern Iowa, and large sections in the Southern States, the wheat crop is below an average. Allowing for this deficiency, we imagine that, instead of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, which was the prevailing yield crop in September, the total crop will not probably exceed 175,000,000 bushels. Nearly all this, however, is excellent in quality. The famous white Tennessee and the Chicago grain are said to be as heavy as was ever known. Judging from the mass of millers' letters which have come to market, this year's work will retrieve the reputation of American flour which was grievously damaged last year's product.

The corn crop is known to be large—how large it is at this moment impossible to say. Estimates vary from 600,000,000 to 800,000,000 bushels. We must at present be content with the knowledge that the crop is abundant.

In Europe, as a rule, the crops have not done well. In Great Britain, the drought and storms of July generated unfavorable rot in wheat. It thrashes out very light; and, as farmers know, this is a defect which is always rather understated than exaggerated. Farmers who have harvested large quantities of good looking wheat are always slow to admit that the straw is unduly weighty and the grain light. Thus far, wherever threshing has begun, this has proved to be the case; and the British press admits that the crop will undoubtedly below an average. In France, the agricultural authorities have ascertained that there is a marked deficiency in the yield of wheat; they estimate it at 20 per cent. as compared with last year. In Spain, the crop is known to be short. In Austria, owing to the war and other causes, there is a large deficiency. The same is true of Belgium and Italy. With regard to those countries which have been famous as to the amount of the deficit. From Southern Russia and the Principalities our advices are meagre; it is stated, however, at Odessa, that the yield of wheat has been greatly reduced by the droughts of July and August. Nothing is known with regard to the crop in Egypt. In Prussia and the Baltic countries wheat is believed to have done well.

To appreciate the importance of these waifs and estrays of intelligence it must be borne in mind that Spain, Italy, and Egypt are usually produce, on the average, about enough wheat for home consumption, and no more; while the Baltic countries, France, and Southern Russia have among them an average surplus of forty to fifty million bushels. In England, the consumption of wheat exceeds the production by 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 bushels annually.

The reader is now in a position to estimate the consequence of the reported deficiency in this year's crop in Europe. If the current reports are true, France and Belgium, which were large exporters of flour last year, have not enough this year for their own consumption, for they did not export last year 60 per cent. of their crop, and the deficiency this year is set down at 20 per cent.: Southern Russia, which exports from 12,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels annually, has much less to spare; grain will be needed by Spain, Italy, and Austria; England will need at least 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 bushels; and to supply all these deficiencies the only European countries which can be relied upon are Prussia and its Baltic neighbors, which would be sadly embarrassed to furnish 20,000,000 bushels over and above their home consumption.

Turning to the United States, and assuming, as above, that our wheat crop this year is 175,000,000 bushels, we find that of this at least 150,000,000 must be required for home consumption. We may be said to have commenced the current agricultural year, on 1st September, with a stock of flour sufficient for the consumption of 1858, short as it was, yield of grain so poor in quality that most of the flour was unfit for human food. During the past year the people of the United States have been consuming the remains of the crops of 1857 and 1858; these, with what could be eaten of the crop of 1858, have so barely sufficed for our home consumption that the consumption of breads of wheat so bare of flour as it was on 1st September last. This is proved by the eagerness with which the new crop has been sought by the country millers. Chicago and Milwaukie have been for some time shipping 800,000 bushels of wheat weekly, hardly any of which gets as far as the sea-board. It is fair to presume, therefore, that the whole home consumption of the present year will exceed that of the crop of 1859. Assuming this to be the case, to the 150,000,000 bushels required for home consumption must be added at least 50,000,000 bushels reserved for seed and held back for high prices; and about 10,000,000 bushels sent to the West Indies, Brazil, Pacific colonies, South America, and other countries which we feed. This would leave only 5,000,000 bushels for export to Europe.

If the European nations always consumed the same quantity of wheaten flour in good and bad times, and never used any substitute, it would be safe to predict a very active movement in food this winter and next spring, and famine prices for wheat and flour. But the consumers, the premises fail; the European consumption of wheaten flour varies with the price of the article. When wheaten flour is cheap, poor men in England, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain feed their families on wheaten bread. When it rises, they fall back on rye, barley, Indian corn, and other substitutes. In many localities they reduce the quantity of their bread consumption; they eat less, in short. To discover the extent to which reduced consumption, home consumption, and exports for warehousing, caused by the diminished product of this year, is the great problem of the trade in food.

There is no doubt that we have heard of higher prices; wheat has not been so cheap for ten years as it is at present in England. The last quotation of wheat in the Mark Lane List is a quarter of eight bushels, or less than 5*s.* 2*d.* a bushel. In New York the same quality of wheat is selling at about 1 25, or four shillings and a shilling higher, and our prices here 10*c.* @ 20*c.* lower. Thus far the pressing necessities of our home consumers have not compelled us to pay above their natural level; while large accumulations of grain at the commercial centres abroad have kept prices below their proper range.

FEMALE PHYSICIANS.

MISS ELIZABETH BLACKWELL, a practicing physician of Paris, has just returned from a tour through Great Britain and France, where she has been warmly received by Miss Florence Nightingale and other great and good women living in Europe. Miss Blackwell's observations abroad have confirmed her in the good opinion of continuing the fight she has so nobly waged against stupid prejudice and ignorance; she has determined to persevere in the practice of her profession, but so to labor as, if possible, to draw into the ranks other ladies of good education and natural ability. Miss Blackwell has become a recognized and an honored class in this country. Every person of right feeling and sound judgment respects her deeply.

Whatever objections may be urged against the theories known by the name of "Women's Rights," Miss Blackwell's life and character are a study of medicine by women. Every woman, to be a wife or a mother, requires some knowledge of medicine. Not only the possession such knowledge, her existence is miserable, and, in many cases, the life of her children is in peril daily. No mother can safely trust her babies to her elbow, to tell her when, how, and in what proportions to administer medicine, promote perspiration, secure ventilation, apply always a direct exercise, or superintend the general hygience of her family. These matters are usually learned by our women by experience—often at the cost of the lives of one or more of their children. It is not likely that so stupid a system will long prevail in so enlightened an age as the one in which we live. The day can not be distant when young women will all be taught the elementary principles of domestic medicine as finishing schools; we will venture to say that the first great school which introduces the novelty in the place of some of the rubbish now taught to girls at fashionable academies will achieve a very remarkable success.

The moment we begin to introduce common sense into our system of female education, female physicians will follow as a necessary consequence. Once let plain reason have its way, and the rest can not be hindered. If women of thirty, mothers of three or four children, require such knowledge of medicine to do their duty by their knowledge in their homes, there is no excuse for not teaching such women such knowledge when it can be taught without risk of harm to them; and once admit that girls ought to learn something of the medical science, who shall set a limit to their studies, and where?

Every man and woman of extended experience and ordinary intelligence must have noticed the extraordinary aptitude which sensible females display for the medical science. Very few doctors are so safe guides in the illnesses of infants as experienced mothers and nurses. In diseases of women the advantage possessed by a female doctor over a bearded professor are at once obvious. We can think to say the same, while male patients will probably continue to be treated by male doctors to the end of time, and surgical operations will probably likewise remain the monopoly of the masculine hand, if the medical colleges were thrown open to girls to-morrow, twenty years hence women would never think of consulting a man for their own little infirmities or the diseases of their babies.

The fact that this is so is probably the secret of the obstinate resistance made in many colleges to the admission of female students. An ingenuous French youth, studying law at Paris a couple of centuries since, inquired of Chancellor D'Aguesseau what the object of the complicated and unmeaning involutions of language used in legal documents. "My son," said the Chancellor, "if we let down our mystery and jargon, men could draw them for themselves; and then, where would our noble profession be?" Just so with the doctors: we can not admit the door next to the profession, at least half of the sentient ignorammuses now living dishonestly practicing and killing babies will find themselves superseded; and so, for the sake of their fees, they make a stout and obstinate efficiency and manidely reserve—and deluge us with arguments which, if they were candid, would only prove the ignorammuses—in bring dishonest, they illustrate the meanness—of the minds which urge them.

Miss Blackwell, we are glad to hear, is going to deliver a course of three lectures on the necessity of the study of physiology by women. We shall probably in announcing them at the proper time when and where they can be heard; and as all sensible young women will go to hear them, the audience of the occasion will afford a fair test of the intelligence of our female population.

AN ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

OUR latest English files intimate that a new Arctic expedition will probably be shortly organized to search for the mouth of Back's Fish River and Montreal Island. It will be borne in mind by the reader of our brief history of the Franklin Search, and its successors, published in the last number of the Weekly, that no actual evidence has ever been obtained of the death of the brave survivor of the 129 men who departed from King William's Land, under Captain Crozier, to make their way to the continent. It is now intimated that certain Esquimaux men may be alive among the Esquimaux at or near Montreal Island; and it is argued that it is due to humanity to make one more voyage expressly for the purpose of ascertaining whether or no this be the case.

Recent experience proves that an Arctic expedition need not involve any actual expenditure. The Arctic Seas abound in whales, even among the "cigarettes" of islands lying north of the American continent, it is necessary to have a steam vessel. Any of the numerous ships adapted for Arctic voyages, amply provided with every appliance and supply requisite for life in the Arctic regions, and manned by thirty or forty men—not more. Such a craft, it is believed, could, in two seasons, effect such an exploration as is contemplated, and the search after Back River as would forever set at rest the possibility of there being any survivors of the Franklin Expedition. Any of the hardened and free still live, such an expedition would rescue them from an ignoble death among the Esquimaux. If they are all dead, it would bring back the drowning doubts which still distress their families.

These are the arguments upon the strength of which influential gentlemen are urging upon the Government to fit out one more last expedition; we should not be surprised to hear of their success. There are always numbers of adventurous spirits who would be glad to engage in another Arctic voyage merely for the sake of the peril and éclat of the affair. The cost would not be great. And, after all, though common sense is opposed to more sacrifice of life and energy in the Arctic cul-de-sac, the spirit of the age will not permit any one to fence off a part of the globe and close it to the daring trend of the audacious sons of Japheth.

THE LOUNGER.

AN AMERICAN'S VIEW OF PEKIN.

AN American merchant, who has resided for fifteen years in China, has written a pamphlet which sets up the Chinese question in a very sensible and satisfactory manner. The work is only printed, not published, and is designed to have some practical effect in London, where it is issued. The writer warns Englishmen against suffering themselves to be led by the Times, and gives the following simple statement of the whole matter:

The English Government, as it has always ignored the dignity and importance of the Chinese Government—always treating the latter as the chief of savages with whom no treaty was to be honestly made or decently enforced. The consequence has been the lessening of its influence, which has long raged in China, and of whose history and progress we have given the full details. The men of the English have succeeded in humiliating the mandarins, in destroying the prestige of all internal government, and in annihilating the only authority with which a treaty was possible. When, therefore, the English seek an embassy to enforce negotiations they have only themselves to thank if the rebels, not respecting or fearing the Government with which the English seek to treat, but whose prestige they have destroyed, suddenly turn upon the English themselves, and bring them out of existence. To make it the pretext of another war is only to aggravate the old difficulty.

In this connection the writer strongly urges an alliance between England and Russia; insisting that, if it be not effected, the Chinese will not only obtain in a few years a long and extensive and unmanageable war will ensue. If England, however, succeeds in a Russian alliance, she can gain a hearing at Pekin and settle the consequences of her own mistake by negotiation, permanent and peaceful, on the basis of treaties between the nations.

This is the substance of a very lucid and intelligent view taken by a gentleman who probably knows as much of the state of opinion and of affairs in China as any one. He resided for several years of his residence he was the head of the chief American house in the country. He is a clear, calm common-sense of his considerations heartily commend them to the sober attention of John Bull, and to the statesmen of Downshaw who are interested in a very grave question.

NO TOBACCO-CHEWING HERE!

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I hasten to inform you that a new law stepped into force on the 1st inst. in my Central Railroad—one of the pleasantest roads in the neighborhood of New York—I saw the bulletin on the cars—which prohibits, I had the happiness of traveling, pointed to a notice at the end of the car. My eye caught the direction of her finger (which is all rough at the end with needle-pricks), and I saw the words conspicuously printed, "No tobacco-chewing allowed in this car."

I had suffered so much from this nuisance, and had seen others suffer so much, that I determined to let you and those other ladies know where they might be secure. I am sure I do not see why certain men should be allowed to make half of filth as well as from any other kind—I mean, of course, not the chewing, but the spitting. If men will be so selfish as to indulge in it, why should women suffer all the nasty consequences? If I were President of a Railroad—and I believe you are fewer of women's having their rights—I know what I would do. I would tell the conductors to turn every man who spits on the floor down into the another car; and if he wouldn't go, I'd tell him he ought to be bottom of her clothes!

They have a smoking-car on most railroads; but I'd a great deal rather have a man smoke a dozen pipes than one mouthful of tobacco or cigarettes with me than squirt the detestable liquid all over the floor. Why, Mr. Lounger, it was not three weeks since I was sitting on one of the Staten Island ferry-boats, and saw a woman in a nice silk dress, and evidently well off in the world (none but not nasty silk dresses) quietly seat herself opposite to a man with a bottom of her clothes! A puddle of spit, seeking it all up! I know it's horrible to say such things, and to write them for young and pure minds to read; but I ask you, what else to do then? Pooh! Mr. Lounger, I suppose there's always a man who will take up for him; but it's a very disagreeable thing to talk about a lady's dress dragging in such a mess, who wouldn't hesitate to touch the thing itself! I am obliged to him—I appeal to every honest man and decent man to say whether we are well treated in this matter?

If a man chews, and will only chose to keep it to himself, it is bad enough for him, but other people do get hurt by it. Besides, it is a disagreeable to spectorals all about him, then he becomes a most disagreeable neighbor. Some men on the cars last fever were sitting together upon a steamboat excursion, as so often happens, and when she got under way they had her dress all spotted to him—I suppose to juice, don't you think it might strike in?—they chose to yourself, as I am sure you make up?

I write this letter to you, Mr. Lounger, hoping that you will print it in your paper, and that it will be sold in the cars, and perhaps read by some of the sinners I have been speaking of. Won't they please to think about this matter?

Aunt Jerusha says Amen.

YOURS respectfully, PEGGY.

THE VIRGINIANS.

THACKERAY has finished his novel; which is another chapter in the history of the Warringtons, the Esmonds, and the families of whom the novelist is the historian. The work has its ardent admirers who prefer it to any thing he has written; not pretending to find in it the peculiar strength of "Vanity Fair," but enjoying the cheerful, exquisitely elaborated detail of description. As a picture of the times it is masterly. If there be less fulfillment of what may have been his original intention in describing and in weaving their swords upon opposite sides in our Revolution, yet there is as much the fuller filling in of the lights and shades of a society with which his sympathies and studies have made him familiar. Every thing is in harmony. The plot never overlays or obscures the story. It is purely domestic, but of that quaint, remote, picturesque quaintness, which belongs to the last century. It is, in fact, the story of a generation some old English country house, and history a week away, but found in an old closet the musical script memoirs of the family, over which you pore through the still, warm days. You have time to learn each one of them, to form a judgment, to criticise, to sympathize, to wonder, and to find yourself, at last, laughing at a passage interrupting upon the progress of events, while the figures bloom, develop, and decay before your eyes, while young men become old men, and under the varied aspect of events you hear the low, slow, sure beat of Time's unerring pendulum.

* Hear, hear!—Lounger.

The charm of the "Virginians" is in the delineation of character and the fidelity of the still-life painting. The story is elaborated with the most faithfulness—you see the very rouge on Lady Maria's face—the very cut of Mr. Solomon Isaacstein's hair. There is the same mingling of motives, the same inconsistencies of character, which are the characteristics of human nature, and which no author so heroically dares to depict as Thackeray does. Lord Castlewood, for instance, is a figure executed with consummate skill. His utter selfishness, his cold-heartedness readily rising into cruelty, the perfect ease with which he passes and serene self-possession; his entire unscrupulousness and polite confidence in the success of the most natural thing in the world, reproduce to the most lineament a kind of Englishman which every reader of this history will know at once he will readily recall.

Hetty's quiet little tragedy; Sir George Warrington's secret sadness, as time pushes him forward; Madam Warrington's unbending pride—are touched and limned with the delicacy, the power, and total want of melodrama or sermonizing, which reveal the perfect artist. The life, the manners, all living novelists Thackeray is unapproached as a master of literary art. It is in that that he is Shakespearian. And as it is founded upon natural and immutable laws, whoever has artistic power has already one element of immortality.

So febrile is this story that, after following the fortunes of the characters, month by month, for two years, the reader finds himself at the end, and turns away. He sits, still holding it, and thinking of the men and women whose actions and characters have been unveiled to him. He sits, still holding it, and thanking the kind, wise, humane genius which, in a delightful manner, and if it holds the mirror up to nature does not hold it with a steer, but a sigh.

PARTIES.

Nor tea-parties, nor dinner-parties, nor parties in downrest weinstocts, but political parties. Are they not inevitable in the representative government? If you meddle with politics at all, must you not, of course, vote with one or the other party? Is not the effort to be what is called "independent" simply an effort to sit on the fence? Does not experience prove it to be a failure?

In every intelligent constitutional country there must necessarily be two great divisions upon the whole, conservative or stationary; the other, upon the whole, progressive. Each of these is represented by a party. How many men will admit that every measure of the first is really a conservative measure, nor those of the last to be wholly progressive; but must not his influence, upon the whole, go with one or the other, or be lost?

"There's a great deal to be said upon both sides," says somebody; and somebody has always said so upon all questions; and somebody has, therefore, always fallen between two stools. Let us see if there be.

Is there any thing to be said in favor of squandering the public money?

"No," replies somebody; "but then there is the very question, what is squandering the public money?"

Well, but there is such a thing?

"Undoubtedly."

And you think you see when it is squandered?

"Yes."

And you wish to help it?

"Yes."

Well, it is squandered either by one party or by the other?

"Yes."

Then you act with the party that seems to you not to squander—do you not?

"Yes, unless both do it."

Very well; if both do it, then they are so far equal; and you turn to other points—do you not? —and act according to your approval?

"Yes."

And those points are determined by some central idea?

"Yes."

Well?

"Well, that is what I call independence—to act against any measure of any party that seems to me unjust or impolitic."

True; but if, upon the whole, the course and action of one party command your sympathy, although you may differ about certain details, do you not see that, if you are an honest man and act politically as you believe, you must necessarily be allied with that party? Nobody but a crazy demagogue talks or thinks of "going the party up to the hub," or of "voting for the D—l if he be the candidate of the party;" and the only possible honest "independence" of a citizen in this country is his independent choice of the party which, upon the whole, seems to him to be most sagaciously fulfilling the great intentions of the government, and of all government.

Edmund Burke was as wise as usual when he spoke of the necessity of parties, and the indispensability of parties, in constitutional governments. To skilly-skally is not to walk along the golden mean. To cry "Good Lord! good Devil!" is not to be heroic. To sit upon the fence is not necessarily to be impartial. A man, therefore, is a man tossed in a blanket, or hung upon a gallows, is higher than other people, if that is all you want. Wherever parties really exist, and flourish, besides, a man's real position is determined, beyond any will, by the principles which seem to him right. If he says he is "independent," meaning indifferent, he is either a man who can not see—in which case he is unfortunately blind; or a man who does not choose to say what he sees—in which case he is—making a great mistake.

A WORD IN TIME.

If any body wishes to know where to go next summer, let him bear a word in time, and go to the Valley of Wyoming. There is no place in the country of more poetic associations, and yet it is approached with more of the feeling with which we approach Saratoga or Newport—a watering-place not only for their intrinsic loveliness, but for a personal, human history. Campbell wrote a poem, "The Gertrude of Wyoming;" and Hubbard sleeps of our own poets have sung its charms. Mr. Spurr resigns snug a parish in Long Island to become rural dean, and yet, when it burst—or rather oozed and glided—upon the Lounger's eye, he did not feel that Spurr-power was wasted upon it. Indeed, Wyoming is a good place to go to.

It is a valley of the Susquehanna—a stretch of intervale land three miles wide and twenty one or two long, shut in by hill ranges which are a mingling of the Blue Ridge and the Alleghanies. The Lackawanna and the Susquehanna unite at the upper end of the valley, and the Lackawanna flows down nearly on, parallel with it, a busy little village, undermined by galleries of coal—past bread, green, luxuriant meadows—past the hills that breed hills full of game—past the mouths of mountain streams full of trout—past the sober, ancient borough of Wilkesbarre, with its stately Court-house, into the Shades-boys of a Flanders town—past other little villages resting upon the Arcadian bosom of the broad, rich valley behind, and flows broad and grand through great Pennsylvania to the sea, but never loving lovelier fields or entertaining expansive hills, except than in the Valley of Wyoming.

At that it is of the Lounger's choice. All that you expect of it will be fulfilled. If you go to Easton, and on to Bethlehem, and then to Wilkesbarre through the Valley of Wyoming, still up and through the Lackawanna Valley to Scranton, and down by the unrivaled mountain scenery of the road to the mountains to the Delaware Valley, and through the Delaware Water Gap, you will have taken one of the most picturesque of the trips that any man in need of a little journey could possibly perform. If you take a carriage at Wilkesbarre and drive down, you overlook a magnificent stretch of country, walled by the Blue Ridge, perpendicularly cleft by the river, in one of the most inspiring passages of railway travel in the land.

If you are in a hurry, you will stop at Scranton, where you will find an admirable hotel; and in that impromptu little town, dedicated by Yankee industry and genius to the use of iron wealth, you will see the largest steam-engine in the country, and the largest iron railroad arch which could have suggested a new bell to Dante, and which no one who has seen it by night will ever forget. Scranton is the centre of a region rich with Wilkesbarre, and there is the same kind of rivalry between them that there is between the Lehigh and Wyoming Valleys on the Chicago—pert, bustling, successful, roaring and puffing by night and day; Wilkesbarre is the St. Louis—sedate old thing, enough, the respected county town, a little vexed by the superior activity of its younger sister, but with a shade of its traditional position in the county, which the audacious little neighbor openly disputes.

They are in the wild, romantic region of Pennsylvania. The Valley of Wyoming is one of the most picturesque, historic, and legendary in the Commonwealth, of America "localities." You will not be sorry if you choose to bestow a few fine days upon them next summer.

CHANGED.

I never her office as the village walk;
She passes proudly with a formal bow,
And never turns her head to look at me,
And never carries for a moment's talk.

And in the church on sunny Sabbath days
I hear her voice from out the distant gloom;
And surely Heaven will forgive the wrong—
I worship only the things this priest.

I glow and tremble like an autumn leaf;
And sometimes, when my timorous heart permits,
I cast my glances where she quietly sits—
Only to cast them down again in deepest grief.

For never now as in the sweet past time
In my devotion met with a reward—
Those eyes that once met mine in true accord
Look through me as through empty space.

Yet when I think of the great happiness
With aging and my life in loving then,
Although that love is taken back again
I can not blame her—I can only grieve.

Then may our dear God her good guardian be!
May coming days to tearful memories stir!
But may all days alike bring peace to her
Who, in this change, hath left no peace for me!

PARTY SPIRIT.

We have recently had some rather forcible exhibitions of the fury of party spirit.

We did not say in California—although the performance of the two United States Senators there is something which leaves most of all parties will agree to condemn, as the rats we are now going in New York, we shall soon reach a political condition in which Parts would be preferable. It is not that there are bruisers and bullies in New York, there are such everywhere where; nor that they assault peaceful citizens—they do so every where. It is not that some men cheat, and perjure themselves, and fight away other men from the polls—corresponding things are done every where.

These are not the characteristic signs. But the danger lies in the fact that these things are approved by those who are not bullies.

That is the fact. Intelligent, amiable, well-behaved gentlemen are perfectly aware that such things are done, and are going to be done, in the interest of their party, whatever that may be, and they allow it. These gentlemen subscribe money to all the party machinery, and do not even respect themselves, and their fellow-citizens, who implicitly differ from them, respect the honor of their country, nor the character of popular institutions, enough to insist that they will not pay without the direct assurance that these shall be at an end of these drunken, brawling, bloody scenes.

There are, therefore, the gentlemen who are directly responsible for the disgraces of our political annals; for the brute, not the fist, is the dangerous weapon. The direction of any party which is diminished for every conceivable corruption of morals and manners can not be more truly held responsible by the mind and conscience of the country. There is scarcely ever a political row which is not contemplated, foreseen, and provided for in the impromptu.

If the political corruption which prevails in the city of New York were universal our system would be already a ridiculous failure. Any man who proposes to devote his time and talents to political tendencies, for instance, the rights of a minority—who does not try to secure the votes of people really want, but who foists upon them what he chooses, as is the meanest of despots.

The American people splits its sides with crowing its Yankee doddle does over kings and potentates. When Louis-nah's king is driven away, and Francis the Fifth, late Duke of Modena, who would not be ashamed of doing what New York politicians do all the time, is left in a state of perfect surprise that you shouldn't think all fair in politics.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

THE Lounger again begs his many correspondents to remember how limited the space is in which he can reply to them, and especially to refer them again upon some MS. or work. "Bonnybel," of St. Louis, must have patience. Her manuscript has not been entirely despaired of the Lounger's keeping his word. There are many others to whom it should be the pleasure of any Lounger to write, but when the word to which this one is necessarily restricted, and which he reverently keeps in mind in full. But we must all remember that the demand upon the columns of a paper which means to be the illustrated history of the times is constant and ravenous, that to get half a column for the Lounger's Letter-Box is a victory. There are really clever poems which find their way into that box, but not one again; and whose non-appearance is one of the reasons of their value in the room in the paper. Sooner or later every body who writes to the Lounger will have some kind of word from him.

—A Mormon, who was "brought up" near St. James's Park in London, thought that one of the most delightful of children in such a place is the song of fresh, foaming birds from over the railings. Is it not true, and which are we ashamed of "the beautiful gladeo" the hopes the Central Park will encourage and which a bird —A YOUNG FARMER. Miss Warner is still living and has a new work in press. Since the "Hills of the Shatemuc" she has published a religious book of some kind.

—It is certainly very difficult to say why, if a woman may be the Governor of a country, she may not vote for a Governor.

—ONE OF YOUR ARDENT READERS. It is hard to answer a question of that kind. We should suppose the necessary toil of studying at the Female Medical School, you will find what a great many noble women have done. What do you think Florence Nightingale's position would be?

—HOWARD YOU. It is certainly awkward to say that "rule declination" was accepted, and it is not strictly grammatical. But we have justified it because it does not make it elegant; as in the case of the word "indorse" applied to promissory notes. Indorse is more vulgar than the phrase, "I'll indorse him;" but it is more common, and is the usage of the best authors against hypercritical grammarians.

—INVENTUS protests against the fate of little Ella in a story called "Little Women's Ward," published in the Weekly some time since, upon the ground that when she was turned out of doors she was electrified to "run to Berlin." Will the author take notice?

—ARLIE. "Castles in the Air" is a very sweet little poem. But don't take it hardly if you hear that several people sent you the same thing upon the same theme. The lines are nonsical, the idea is good; but it is not quite pretty. You asked, you know.

—S. O. The policy of the late Derby Cabinet was neutrality with Austrian proclivities.

—Q. Z. The back numbers of the Weekly are to be had for ten cents each at the office.

—P. T. H. The verse is not simply enough.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BASE-BALL.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—In your paper of October 15 you say that you "doubt very much whether base-ball be a popular game at all in the interior, or in any part of the country except in a few great cities."

Now, Sir, even you are mistaken. For twenty years (which is as long as I can remember about it) base-ball has been a "popular game" wherever I have lived; and from careful inquiry, and knowledge obtained by personal observation, I can assure you the game is a popular one in nearly all the villages and among the rural districts of Western New York. Also that has attended country "raisings" does not know this, and dwell with a pleasant remembrance on the game of ball that was sure to follow after the husking or harvest supper.

But not only in the region named is base-ball popular as a game, but in parts of Ohio, in Northern Indiana, and in Michigan, I am assured it is played a great deal.

Though among us we have not regularly organized clubs, yet it is by no means difficult to find enough who are desirous of engaging in as healthful and agreeable an exercise of a pleasant summer evening.

If you were here you could see playing earnest and well enjoyed, if not as scientific as that of your city clubs. I refer to one of our district schools during intermission hours, and often engaged in by youths of both sexes. "I know whereof I affirm."

Yours, &c. H. G. GRWSTE.

AVOCA, STEUBEN COUNTY, N.Y., Oct., 1859.

Sketches of the People who oppose our Sunday Laws.

No. IV.

SUNDAY IN JONES'S WOOD.

JONES'S WOODS are not Elysian fields. Romance and poetry dwell not therein. Tranquil sights have no abiding place there. The whirling shades, and balmy breezes, and lounging lawns, and other rural comforts which woodland and grove are so peculiarly adapted to afford, there are limited supplies. Of lambs and tussle, and loud and lively country, there are profusion and variety. You would perhaps expect nothing else in a place with such a name. Jones does not weaken by superficial suggestions. There is nothing about Jones to appeal to your tender imaginations any more than there is about Jones. Jones's Woods is simply a business-like title, meretorious in brevity, and exceeding apt in application: for Jones's Woods, according to their styles, is about the most business-like place you have visited.

It is the business of pleasure that prevails—the labor of entertainment, the hard work of enjoyment. Of a truth they have need of it that there hundreds upon hundreds of struggling wanderers, toiling travellers and pilgrims generally, who find themselves out with unflinching determination to acquire gratification at all hazards; often perplexed with bewildering efforts to find their purpose in its course of accomplishment, and that only a few more minutes are needed to bring them upon a tolerably lofty elevation of bliss. To help them to this end practical philanthropists, who have discovered that every place of the kind in the community no luxury can equal that of wild and animal taste of unrestrained and boisterous pleasure. Not an avenue but is flanked with booths and stalls, in which equity to any amount may be sucked in one so minded. Not a tree but is busily planted with traps for the absorption of unwary coin. Barns are manufactories of "drinkables," not unlike those of the beer gardens, in which men give their minds with grave intensity to the discharge of pretty much the same functions herein, beyond all exclamation, in which pictorial shows of astonishing and thrilling figures pass through courses of mechanism. There are gymnastic appliances, upon which sportive young men and women are invited to swing and leap, to perform on one-saw, to wriggle on parallel bars, and to skim in the air on edges of big wheels, to the great amusements and otherwise. There are wooden horses for timid children to ride upon, and there are swings for the indulgence of more courageous youth. There are bowling alleys and billiard halls over resembling what they are in the city. At least recorded, there are countless and inexhaustible quantities of pugs refreshments provided for the fat and a ready market. As you pass, you are exhorted to pause and partake. "Sandwiches, Sir, sandwiches—you'll enjoy 'em." "Give a stranger, sandwiches for your welfare; but sandwiches do not recommend themselves to the unsophisticated palate," cried. "Cakes, Sir, cakes—pies, pies, Sir—confectionery!" cries, inquiringly, another disinterested appearance of unsolicited kind. "Cakes" are also announced to test the quality of his stock. Others there are who would not so much as invite you as to the public at large. "Lobsters here," says a purple-faced woman, behind a fish-stand; "lobsters here, Sir, all ready for any person with fine big rat claws!" but no such extraordinarily gifted gentleman appears, and no claws are required. Oysters, however, appear to find greater public favor, and the sizzle of fries and roasts salutes the ear, and the steaming stews perfume the atmosphere.

It is possible that, somewhere in these sketches, allusion may have been made to the more flexible hints of the fascination exercised by that fluid over the German soul may have been ventured upon—but the Lounger, which otherwise, with tender abandonment of all other considerations in favor of this of beer, from which otherwise, with tender spirit, may have been put forth. Even if so, reserved allusions, hints, and intimations become necessary when Jones's Woods are the subject of discourse. Here beer reigns with supreme power. It depose all other thought. Its flow is constant and unrestrained. Ever-gurgling pipets quaff their steady streams. Tankards are tossed aloft with ceaseless energy. Beside the river which sweeps by the "Woods" staid German stroll, with mugs in hand, and gaze with calm contempt upon the inferior element that rolls below. They turn away, and with rapt countenances, and eyes half closed with quiet ecstasy, still sip and sip with smiles of saturated joy, as if in meditative dreams reflecting on a Paradise where cheese-and-sausage-bearing trees spring up in graceful clusters from the prolific soil of genial islands reposing tranquilly upon the bosom of a sea of beer.

The scenes at Jones's Woods are not monotonous. The eye meets always rambling groups of men and women, dancing children, lads and maidens illustrating young love influenced by beer, brisk operations of athletic tendency in swings and on ropes, and busy effervescence of trade in shops and stalls. Sounds of tumbling ten-pins, bullets tapping upon targets, hum of talk and laughing outpeals never diminish. Look closely, and you will find, too, abundance of incident. See that family party. A young mother, in small apparel, draws after her a wicker wagon, in which two infants, free to face, recline. The father, a fresh-looking German, walks carelessly at a little distance. His shaky cap and wandering eye tell you he has been putting too much enemy in his mouth. The young woman is troubled more for him than for the children. People look into the little wagon and laugh, and turn jocosely to the mother, who half smiles, but languidly, not brightly. What can the joke be? You approach nearer, and then you find there is but one child, and a fat, dull stuck opposite, with very flabby kid face, and countenance denoting many survey struggles. Spite of its injured nose and absent eye, the baby loves fondly upon it, and makes passes at it through the air—surest sign of infantile affection. You think it a droll idea, this conjunction of stuffed image and young flesh, and take opportunity to inquire what it means. You learn, and then you do not laugh, like the rest, that the wagon once bore a pair of little Knaben, and that when the oldest languished and drooped to death the other sickened too, missing his crib-fellow, and could only be appeased by this kid and cotton-wool substitute, from which he never would be separated, least of all in his out-door rides.

While this is told you, the father has joined the merry sportsmen who find satisfaction in pop-guns. He has tried a shot. Some one claps him on the back and cries "Brav!" He dilates a little, and essays another. He is incited to shoot for wagers. His wife murmurs dissuasions; but he tips her a grimace of deep import, as to say, "See, now, how I will deceive these fellows!" The fellows—dark-looking men, with very oily hair, and booked noses, and cloaks-all brown, and glaring costume—urge him on. Money is put up. The hook-nosed men miss shabbily, and tipsy Germany wins. He throws the coins into his outer pocket, and drawing forth his handkerchief a minute later, unconsciously scatters them over the ground. Another match, and he wins again. Exultant, he boisterously counsels that the stakes shall be greatly augmented. He collects all his possessions and deposits them. This time he loses every thing.

He withdraws, dejected, and rejoins his wife. She does not reproach him, but tells him that he was deceived—that his first winnings were permitted only for the purpose of leading him on to larger risks. He doubts, but will have positive assurance. He stumbles up to make investigations, and is repulsed. He persists, and is hustled off, a little bruised and much torn. He suddenly becomes repentant, and rejoining his wife, hovers round the wagon as she draws it away.

A little after noon the visitors evince a disposition to settle near the centre of the Woods. You learn that a tight-rope performance is to be provided. This must be seen. At an elevation so great that you have not before noticed it stretches the line—an airy nothing. People say, with evident complacency, that the last night's rain has made it so slippery that the danger is extreme. Presently the fonambulist appears. He is clad in white shirt and trowsers, without coat or hat, and with slippers on his feet. You ask who he is, and are told his name is Chiarini, and that he appears thus simply dressed "out of respect to the day." You are convinced that the day will feel honored by this mark of Mr. Chiarini's respect.

He begins his evolutions, and the crowd applauds noisily. He skips about, and lies down flat, and elevates his feet, and in many other ways forsakes safety and invites danger. Now he daringly spins round, tentorium-like. But step—he swerves, his foot slips, his balance-pole rushes through the air; will he fall? The crowd gasps and shudders, then rushes off a little to give him a good clear space to drop upon, if he must come down. But no; he clings closely, and by a convulsive writhe restores his equilibrium. New and louder shouts encourage him, and he persists in more audacious efforts. At length, exhausted, he retires, and the throng dissolves to seek again fresh pleasures and fresh beer.

Thus pass the Sundays in the Woods of Jones.

"THEIR MOTHER TWIXT THE SHAFTS DID FARE."

THE PLAGUE OF ELLIANT.

(FROM THE BRETON.)

[A large proportion of the ballads still rung in the gatherings of the Breton peasantry—at the "pardon" of the patron saint, the festivities of the wedding, or the consecration of the new threshing-floor—relate to historical events of remote antiquity. One of these time-worn, but deeply-stamped pieces of old bardic coinage, now come down to exclusive circulation among hard peasant-hands, but still precious for the quality of its true poetic metal, and venerable for its ancient mint-mark, is the ballad of "The Plague of Elliant," of which the following is as literal a version, I think, as can be made from the Breton into the English. I have preserved the metre of the original, so that my version may be sung to the Breton air of the "Buron Elliant." The plague which the ballad commemorates ravaged Brittany in the sixth century. The Book of Lizerdeff (in Jesus College, Oxford) contains an account of the plague in an abridgment of the life of Saint Gwenole, made in the ninth century by Corbinian, abbot of the convent. In this account special mention is made of the ravages of the plague in the parish of Elliant, though the country immediately round about it is said to have been preserved from the scourge by the prayers of a saintly hermit named Ronian. He is mentioned in the ballad, which, like all other ballads in M. de Villemarqué's "Barzaz Breiz" (from which my translation was made), was taken down from oral recitation of the Breton peasantry:]

'Twixt Faouet and Llongelan
There lives a bard, a holy man—
His name is Father Ronian.

On Faouet his best he laid:
"Let every month a mass be said,
And bells be rung, and prayers be read."

In Elliant the plague is o'er,
But not till it had raged full sore:
It slew seven thousand and five score.

Death unto Elliant hath gone down,
No living soul is in the town—
No living soul but two alone.

A crone of sixty years is one,
The other is her only son.

"The Plague," quoth she, "is on our door-sill;
'Twill enter if it be God's will;
But till it enter bide we still."

Through Elliant's streets who wills to go,
Every where will find grass to mow—

Every where, save in two wheel-ruts bare,
Where the wheels of the dead-cart went to fare.

His heart were flint that had not wept,
Through Elliant's grass-grown streets who stept,

To see eighteen carts, each with its load—
Eighteen at the grave-yard, eighteen on the road.

Nine children of one house there were
Whom one dead-cart to the grave did bear:
Their mother 'twixt the shafts did fare.

The father, whistling, walked behind,
With a careless step and a mizy mind.

The mother shriek'd and call'd on God,
Crush'd, soul and body, beneath her load.

"God, help me bury my children nine,
And I vow thee a cord of the wax so fine:

A cord of the wax so long and fine, [shrine.
To go thrice round the church and thrice round the Nine sons I had; I bare them all;

New Death has ta'en them, great and small.

Hath ta'en them all from my own door-stone:
None left, e'en to give me to drink—not one!"

The church-yard to the walls brims o'er,
The church is full to the steps of the door:
They must bless faith, if they'd bury more.

There grows an oak by the church-yard wall,
From the top-heigh hangs a white grave pall—
The Plague hath taken one and all.

SUNDAY AT JONES'S WOODS, IN NEW YORK.

ABEL IN GENERAL BELCH'S OFFICE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1859, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXIX.

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE.

GENERAL BELCH'S office was in the lower part of Nassau Street. At the outer door there was a modest slip of a tin sign, "Arcularius Belch, Attorney and Counselor." The room itself was dingy and forlorn. There was no carpet on the floor, the windows were very dirty, and slats were broken out of the blinds—the chairs did not match—there was a wooden book-case, with a few fat law-books lounging upon the shelves, the table was a chaos of pamphlets, printed forms, newspapers, and files of letters, with a huge inkstand, inky pens, and a great wooden sand-box. Upon each side of the chimney, the grate in which was piled with crushed pieces of waste paper, and the bars of which were discolored with tobacco juice, stood two large spittoons, the only unsoiled articles in the office.

This was the place in which General Belch did business. It had the atmosphere of Law. But, above all, it was the spot where, with one leg swinging over the edge of the table and one hand waving in earnest gesticulation, General Belch could say to every body who came, and especially to his power fellow-citizens, "I ask no office, I am content with my moderate practice. It is enough for me in this glorious country to be a friend of the people."

As he said this—not only implied it in saying something else—the broken slats, the dirty windows, the unscraped floor, the universal untidiness, whispered in the mind of the hearer, "Amen!"

His residence, however, somewhat stoned for the discomfort of his office. Not unfrequently he entertained his friends sumptuously; and whenever any of the representatives of his party, who acted in Congress as his private agents, had succeeded—at one occasion, already commemorated, the Hon. Mr. Ele had done—in putting a finer edge upon a favorite axe, General Belch entertained a select circle which agreed with him in his political philosophy, and were particular friends of the people and of the popular institutions of their country.

Abel Nest had already called at the General's office, and had received overtures from that gentleman, who offered him Mr. Bodley's seat in Congress, upon condition that he was able to see things from particular points of view.

"Mr. Watkins Bodley, it seems," said General Belch, "and I regret to say it, is in straitened pecuniary circumstances. I understand he will feel that he owes it to his family to resign before the next session. There will be a vacancy; and I am glad to say that you will be just now in a happy state of harmony, and that my influence will secure your nomination. But come up to-night and talk it over. I have asked Ele and Stagby, and a few others—friends, of course—and I hope Mr. Bat will drop in. You know Aquila Bat?"

"By reputation," replied Abel.

"He is a very quiet man, but very shrewd. He gives great dignity and weight to the party. A tremendous lawyer Bat is. I suppose he is at the very head of the profession in this country. You'll come?"

Abel was most happy to accept, for the rooms in Grand Street had become inconceivably gloomy. There were no more little parties there: the last one was given in honor of Mrs. Sligo Moultrie—before her marriage. The elegant youth of the town gradually fell off from frequenting Abel's rooms, for he always proposed cards, and the stakes were enormous; which was a dispensation circumstance to young gentlemen who mainly depended upon the paternal purse. Such young gentlemen as Zephyr Wetherley, who was the only attentive devoted to young Mrs. Mellish Whitlee, and sent her the loveliest fans, and bottles, and little trifles, which he selected at Marquand's. But when the year came round the fall was indicted to Mr. Wetherley, senior, who, after a short and warm interview with his son, Zephyr, inclined it in term to Whitlee himself; who smiled, and paid it, and advised his wife to buy her own jewelry in future.

It was not pleasant for young Wetherley, and his friends in a similar situation, to sit down to a night at cards with such a desperate player as Abel Nest. Besides, his rooms had the dingy air of voluptuous elegance which was formerly so unique. The furniture was worn out and not replaced. The decanters and bottles were no longer in the pretty sideboard, but stood boldly out, ready for instant service; and whenever one of the old set of men happened in, he was very likely to find a gentleman—whose toilet was suspicious by him, whose gold looked like gilt—busy about himself entirely at home with Abel and his rooms, and whose conversation indicated familiar familiar haunts were race-courses, bar-rooms, and gambling-houses.

It was unanimously decreed that Abel Nest had lost tone. His dress was gradually becoming flashy. Younger men than himself, and their elders, who were married now, spoke of the fascinating Mr. Nest, perceived that the fascinating Mr. Nest was a little passé, and began to be flirted, and that his breath was offensive with spirituous fumes. He was no longer the young men's dressing-room. The stories he told there were of such a character, and he told them so loudly, that more than one gentleman, whose wife was in the neighboring room, had remonstrated with him. Mrs. Mellish Whitlee was one of the winters that he passed in the city after his marriage, had a fierce quarrel with Abel for that very reason. That was among the last blows, but that their friends parted them. Mr. Moultrie and a few old cronies still visited him of morning, and Mr. Nest acknowledged that he had been rude.

But when Louis Wilkottle said one evening at Mrs. Winslow Orry's that Abel Nest had grown vulgar, all the people who heard him, and had long thought so, were immensely surprised. Their next emotion was that, as Lou Wilkottle never originated any opinion, he must have heard somebody say it. Then, again, as he was always the staff of Mrs. Brewster Van Kraut, it was not a very complicated process by which the mind of Society reached the conclusion that that lady had said so. Society, indeed, was known to express only the opinions of a set—as it was the set—of Mrs. Brewster The Van Kraut property had stamped Abel Nest as vulgar. Then came the failure. Mr. Abel Nest was no longer engaged for balls two months in advance. He no longer received remembrances of flowers for future dinners.

In the evening, at General Belch's, Abel was presented to all the guests. Mr. Ele was happy to remember a previous conversation which he had had the honor, etc. Mr. Enos Stogby (Chairman of our Ward Committee, General Belch, audibly, as he introduced him) was very glad to know a gentleman who bore so distinguished a name. Every body was in the most magnificent, to which Abel bowed and smiled politely, while he observed that the residence was much more comfortable than the office of General Belch.

They went into the dining-room and sat down to what Mr. Stagby called "a Champagne supper." They ate birds and drank Burgundy and wine. Then they ate jellies, blanc-mange, and ice-cream. Then they ate nuts and fruit, and drank coffee. Then they drank Madeira wine, and fresh decanters, fresh glasses, and a box of cigars were placed upon the table, and the servants were told that they need not come until summoned.

At this point a dry, grave, thin, little old man opened the door. General Belch rose and rushed forward.

"My dear Mr. Bat, I am very happy. Sit here, Sir. Gentlemen, you all know Mr. Bat."

The company was silent for a moment, and bowed. Abel looked up and saw a man who seemed to be made of parchment, and his complexion, of the hue of dried sappin, suggested that he was usually kept in a warm green satchel.

After a little more murmuring of talk around the table, General Belch said, in a louder voice,

"Gentlemen, we have a new friend among us, and a little business to settle to-night. Suppose we talk it over."

There was a general filling of glasses and a hum of assent.

"I learn," said the General, whiffing the smoke from his mouth, "that our worthy friend and able representative, Watkins Bodley, is about resigning, in consequence of private embarrassments, and he must have a successor."

Every body poured out smoke and looked at the speaker, except Mr. Bat, who seemed to be undergoing a little more drying up, and was pulverizing at a picture of General Jackson, which hung upon the wall.

"That successor, I need not say, of course," continued General Belch, "must be a good man and a faithful adherent of the party. He must be the consistent enemy of a purse-proud aristocracy."

"He must, indeed," said Mr. Enos Stogby, whisking a little of the ash from his cigar off an unoccupied shirt-bosom, and doing which the flash from a diamond ring upon his finger dazzled Abel, who had turned as he spoke.

"He must espouse the immortal cause of popular rights, and be willing to spend and be spent for the people."

"That's it," said Mr. William Condor, whose sinecure under government was not worth less than twenty thousand a year.

"He must always uphold the honor of the people dear of our country."

"Excuse me, General Belch, but I must propose three cheers," interposed Mr. Alexander MacDennis O'Rourke; and the three cheers were heartily given.

"And the candidate must be equally the foe of class legislation and the friend of state rights."

Here Mr. Bat moved his head, as if he were assenting to a remark of his friend General Belch's.

"And I rarely need not add that it would be the first and most sacred point of honor with this candidate to serve his party in every thing, to be the unswerving advocate of all its measures, and implicitly obedient to all its behests," said General Belch.

"When these duties are to be learned by him from the authorized leaders of the party," said Mr. Enos Stogby.

"Certainly," said half of the gentlemen.

"Of course," said the other half.

During the few remarks that General Belch had been making his eyes were fixed upon Abel Nest, who understood that this was a political examination, in which the question asked decided the answers that were to be given. When the General had ended there was a pause, sat intently smoking for some time, and filling and emptying their glasses.

"Mr. Bat," said General Belch, "what is your view?"

Mr. Bat removed his eyes from General Jackson's portrait, and cleared his throat.

"I think," he said, closing his eyes, and rubbing his fingers on the arm-rests, "that the party holding to the only constitutional national policy is to be supported at all hazards, and I think the great party to which we belong is that party. Our principles are all true, and our measures are all just. Speculative theorists and dreamers talk about independent political action. But parties are always bogey parties. Governments are always managed by parties, and parties are always managed by—"

The dried-looking complexion at this point assumed an ashy hue, as if something very indecent had been uttered unheard. Mr. Bat's eyes opened and saw Abel's fixed upon him with a peculiar intelligence. The whole party looked at him alternately at Mr. Bat, and apprehensively at the new-comer. Mr. Ele frowned at General Belch.

"What does he mean?"

But Abel relieved the embarrassment by quietly continuing Mr. Bat's sentence—

"—by the managers."

His black eyes glittered around the table, and Mr. Ele remembered a remark of General Belch's about Mr. Nest's ruling upon the manners of his fellow-lawyers.

"Exactly, by the managers," said every body.

"And now," said General Belch, cheerfully, "whom had we better propose to our fellow-citizens as a proper candidate for senior suffrage and to succeed the Hon. Mr. Bodley?"

He leaned back and beffed. Mr. Ele, who had had a little previous conversation with the host, here rose and said, that, if he might venture, he would say, although it was an entirely unpremeditated thing, which had, in fact, only struck him while he had been sitting at that hospitable board, but had impressed him so forcibly that he could not resist speaking—if he might venture, he would say that he knew a most able and highly accomplished gentleman—in fact, it had occurred to him that there was then present a gentleman who would be precisely the man whom they might present to the people as a candidate suitable in every way.

General Belch looked at Abel, and said, "Mr. Ele, whom do you mean?"

I refer to Mr. Abel Nest," responded the Hon. Mr. Ele.

The company looked as companies which have been requested to name a surprise always look when the surprise comes.

"Is Mr. Nest sound in the faith?" asked Mr. William Condor, smiling.

"I answer for him," replied Mr. Ele.

"Your instance, Mr. Nest," said Mr. Enos Slugby, who was interested in General Belch's little plans, "you have no doubt that Congress ought to do its part to purchase the land for Fort Arnold, which has been offered to it by the company out of which our friend General Belch is counsel?"

"None at all," replied Abel. "I should work for it as hard as I could."

This was not unnatural, because General Belch had promised him an interest in the sale.

"Really, then," said Mr. William Condor, who was also a proprietor, "I do not see that a better candidate could possibly be offered to our fellow-citizens. The General Committee meet to-morrow night. They will call the primaries, and the convention will meet next week. I think we all understand each other. We have the best men in our districts to go to the convention. The thing seems to me to be very plain."

"Very," said the others, smoking.

"Shall it be Abel Newt?" said Mr. Condor.

"Ay!" answered the chorus.

"I propose the health of the Honorable Abel Newt, whom I am cordially welcome as a colleague," said Mr. Ele.

Bumpers were drained. It was past midnight, and the gentlemen rose. They came to Abel, and shook his hand; then they swarmed into the hall and put on their hats and coats.

"Stay, Newt," whispered Belch, and Abel stopped.

The Honorable B. J. Ele also lingered, as if he would like to be the last out of the house; for although all the distinguished statesmen did not care to do otherwise than as General Belch commanded, he was anxious to be the General's chief butler, while the remark about riding on his companions' shoulders and the personal impression Abel had made upon him had seriously alarmed him.

While he was busily looking at the portrait of General Jackson, General Belch stepped up to him and put out his hand.

"Good-night, my dear Ele! Thank you! Thank you! These things will not be forgotten. Good-night! good-night!" And he locked the Honorable Barabbas out of the room into the hall.

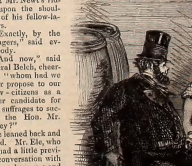
"This is your coat, I think," said he, taking up a garment and helping Mr. Ele to get it on. "Ah, you luxurious dog! you're a pretty friend of the people, with such a splendid coat as this. Good-night! good-night!" he added, helping his guest toward the door.

"Hallo, Condor!" he shouted up the street. "Come back, will you? I leave Mrs. Belch—worst for him!"

He put him out of the door. "There, my dear fellow, Condor's waiting for you! Good-night! Ten thousand thanks! A pretty friend of the people, hey? Good-night!"

General Belch closed the door and returned to the drawing-room. Abel Nest was sitting with one leg over the back of the chair, and a tumbler of brandy before him, smoking.

"Got!" said Abel, looking as the General returned, "I wouldn't treat a nigger as you do that man."



JIM AND MR. SLUGBY.

"My dear Mr. Representative," returned Belch, "you, as a legislator and public man, ought to know that Cider is Heaven's first law."

CHAPTER LXX.

MENTOR AND TELEMACHUS.

DRAWING his chair near to Abel's, General Belch lighted a cigar, and said—

"You see it's not so very hard."

Abel looked intensely.

"To go to Congress," answered Belch.

"Yes, but I'm not elected yet, thank you."

General Arcadius Belch blew a long, slow cloud, and gazed at Abel with a kind of fond superiority. Abel felt it, and chafed.

"What do you mean by looking so?" asked Abel.

"My dear Newt, I was not aware that you had such a soft spot. No, positively, I did not know that you had so much to learn. It is inconceivable."

The General smiled, and smoked, and looked blandly at his companion. Abel resolved that, at least, he would not show the softness of caoutchouc, and held his tongue.

"You're not elected yet, hey?" asked the General, with an amused laugh.

"Not that I am aware of," said Abel, smiling.

"Why, my dear fellow, who on earth do you suppose does the electing?"

"I thought the people were the source of power," replied Abel, in an acrid, sour tone, and nettled, but concealing it so well that Belch exclaimed,

"Bravo! I see you're gamming. However, there's one thing. You know you'll have to speak after the election. Did you ever speak?"

"Not since school," replied Abel.

"Well, you know the con. I gave it to you to-night. You must bring in, how strong can you come down?"

"You know, I've failed."

"Of course you have. That's the reason the boys will expect you to be very liberal."

"How much?" inquired Abel.

"Let me see. There'll be the printing, bills, lights, initial advertising, etc. Well, I should say a hundred dollars, and about four hundred for extras. Five hundred dollars for the election, and much more for the committee."

"Devil! that's rather strong!" replied Abel.

"Not at all," said General Belch. "You're going to Washington secure the grant, and the grant sets you at least three thousand dollars upon every share. It's a good thing, and very liberal at that price. Why, my dear boy, don't forget that you're a party man of another sort. You do the dancing business, and flirting—"

"Pish!" cried Abel, "I'm not a boy!"

Exactly. And you're going to a place that swarms with them. So you'll have to work the men through their wives, and mistresses, and daughters. It isn't much underhand stuff—but it's a great lever."

"Why don't you go to Congress?" asked Abel, suddenly.

"It isn't for my interest," answered the General. "I make more by staying out."

"How many members are there for Belch?" continued Abel.

The General did not quite like the question, nor the tone in which it was asked. His fat nose glistened for a moment, while his mouth twitched into a smile, and he answered—

"They're only for Belch as far as Belch is for them—"

"Or as far as Belch makes them think he is," answered Abel, smiling.

The General smiled too, for he found the game going against him.

"We were speaking of your speech," said he. "Now, Newt, the thing's in your own hands. You've a future before you. You're the drill of the party, and with your talents, you ought to do any thing."

"Too many rivals," said Abel, curtly.

"My dear fellow, what are the odds? They can't do any thing outside the party, or without the drill. Make it understood you're to be volunteer, and they're quiet enough. Here's William Cudder—there's Jerry Wilkins. He loves the people so dearly that he does nothing for them at twenty thousand dollars a year. Tell him that you will secure him his place, by your humble servant. Of course he is. Now I am more than willing to do all of these things, and I'm always at your service. Before you go there will be a course of the friends of the grant, which you must attend, and make a speech."

"Another speech?" said Abel.

"My dear fellow, you are now a speechmaker by profession. Now that you are in Congress, you will never be free from the oratorical liability. Wherever two or three are gathered together, and you are one of them, you'll have to return thanks, and wave the glorious flag of our country. And you'll have to begin very soon."

CHAPTER LXXI.

THE CONVENTION.

GENERAL BELCH was right. Abel had to begin very soon. The committee met and called the meetings. Delegates of the committee, each in his own district, called to consult with various people, whom they found generally at corner groceries. They were large, coarse-faced, rollicking men, and were all named Jim, or Tom, or Ned.

"What'll you have, Jim?"

"Well, Sir. It's so early in the day that I can't go any thing stronger than brandy."

"Two cocktails—still," was the word of the gentleman to the bar-keeper.

The companions took their glasses, and sat down behind a heavy screen.

"Well, Sir, what's the word? I see there's going to be more meetin's."

"Jim, Bolley has resigned."

"Who's the man, Mr. Slugby?" asked Jim, as if to bring matters to a point.

"Mr. Abel Newt has been mentioned," replied the gentleman with the diamond ring, which he had slipped into his waistcoat pocket before the interview.

Jim cocked his eye at his glass, which was nearly empty.

"Here! another cocktail," cried Mr. Slugby to the bar-keeper.

"Son of old Newt that bust t'other day?"

"The same."

"Well, I 'spose it's all right," said Jim, as he began his second tumbler.

"Oh, yes, it's all right. He understands things, and he's coming down rather strong, Mr. Slugby. He has paid you that twice already."

And Mr. Slugby pulled out a bill of that amount and handed it to Jim, who received it as if he were accustomed to generosity, and did not recall any such amount as owing to him.

"I suppose you will be thirsty," said Mr. Enos Slugby.

"There never 's nothin' to make a man thirsty else to a 'lection," answered Jim, in his huge features grinning.

"Well, Jim, times work well, and deserve it. Here, you needn't go out of your district you know, and this will be enough." He handed Jim another bill. "Have an up in town, and don't let them get high until after the election is delegates. You know, though that Mr. Musher and I had better go to the Convention. It's just possible, Jim, that some of Bolley's friends may object to that."

"No fear, Mr. Slugby, we'll take care of that. Who do you want for chairman of the meeting?" answered Jim.

"Edward Gassery is the best chairman. He understands the ropes."

"Very well, Sir, all right," said Jim.

"Remember, Jim, the meeting's eight, seven o'clock. You'll want thirty men to make every thing short and sure. Gassery, chairman, Nathaniel Slugby, delegate. Jim, you'll not say any thing about Abel Newt, because that will all be settled in the Convention, and the delegates of the people will express their will there as they choose. I'll write the names on this."

Mr. Slugby tore off a piece of paper from a letter in his pocket, and, with his names, he handed the bill, and taking out his watch, said,

"Bless my soul, I'm engaged at eleven, and his quarter past! Good-by, Jim, and if any thing goes wrong let me know."

"Martin, Sir," replied Jim, and Mr. Slugby departed.

Mr. William Cudder had a similar interview with Tom, and Mr. Jerry Wilkins spoke with Ned. And other Mr. Slugbys, and Cudders, and Wilkinses, in their respective wards, red-faced, trip-hammer-lifted Jims, Toms, and Neds. These healths being duly drunk, the liquids were left to work their way through the inspiring words, "Liberty and Equality," until summoned from their haunts to assemble in Primary meetings and elect delegates to a convention to nominate a representative. The Hon. Mr. Bolley's resignation was announced.

"FELLOW-CITIZENS,—Deeply grateful for the honorable trust you have so long confided to me, feeling that the interests of our country, and of my private affairs, seriously injured by my public occupations, would induce me to resign it into your hands. But while thus relieving a humand much of every patriot, there is a point, which every citizen must hold in the most sacred reverence. I should be deeply grieved to take this step did I not know how many older representatives you can find in the ranks of the democracy, ocr of which any man may be proud. I leave the halls of legislation, but my attachment to our party is consolidated, when its promise for the future was never more brilliant, when peace and prosperity were never more in the ascendant, when a union in our happy country, on whose soil every man feels himself a part of the sovereign

IS JOHN BROWN INSANE?

On Thursday 27th, Brown was brought in walking, and lay down on his cot at full length within the bar. He looked considerably better, the swelling having left his eyes.

Governor Wise was present.

Messrs. Harding and Hunter again appeared for the Commonwealth, and Messrs. Botts and Green for the prisoner.

Mr. Botts read the following dispatch, which was received this morning:

"ABBOT, Ohio, October 26, 1859.

"To C. J. Faulkner and Lawson Botts:

"John Brown, leader of the insurrection at Harper's Ferry, and several of his family, have resided in this county many years. Insanity is hereditary in the family. His mother's sister died with it, and a daughter of that sister has been insane for years. One female servant, a son and daughter of his mother's brother have also been confined in the Insane Asylum, and another son of that brother is now insane and under close restraint. These facts can be conclusively proved by any number residing here, who will doubtless attend the trial if desired.

"G. W. JAYNES."

Mr. Botts added that Brown disdained to avail himself of the plea of insanity.

Brown then raised himself up in bed and said: "I will add, if the Court will allow me to do so, that I am not as a miserable artifice and pretext of insanity or lunacy, or a plea of any kind, put in for me by my friends, or any act, and I view it with shame and mortification. As I remarked to Mr. Green, insane prisoners, so far as my experience goes, have but little ability to aid in the line of their own sanity: and if I am insane, of course I should think I have some title to be treated as such, which I do not think so. I am perfectly unconscious of insanity, and I regret, so far as I am capable, any attempt to interfere in my behalf on that score."

COMMENCEMENT OF THE TRIAL.

A fresh attempt is made to have the trial postponed in order to obtain counsel from the North having failed, the case was proceeded with.

The jury having been sworn, Mr. Botts addressed the Court, and requested that directed that the prisoner might be brought into the Court-house without irons on his person.

Mr. Botts put the inquiry to the prisoner, and he confessed to its greatness on his not while the long indictment, which seven jurors had sworn read.

First, For conspiring with negroes to produce insurrection;

Second, For treason to the Commonwealth; and,

Third, For murder.

THE SPEECHES AND THE EVIDENCE.

The case was then opened at length by Messrs. Harding and Hunter for the Commonwealth, and by Messrs. Botts and Green for the prisoner. The following witnesses were examined:—Colonel Lewis Washington, and Colonel Washington. Their testimony was already published in full in the papers which we already published.

A BOSTON CONSUL ARRIVES.

On Friday 28th, George H. Hoyt, of Boston, counsel for Brown, arrived. He spoke a few words to the prisoner at eleven o'clock. Brown was led over from the jail, walking very feebly. The Court was full. Mr. Senator Mason entered the court with Mr. Hoyt, the Boston counsel of Brown. They were both warmly received by their friends.

Mr. Hoyt announced the arrival of Mr. Hoyt, who had often been to the court-house, and to the prisoner: at present, however, he did not feel disposed to take part in the case. Mr. Hunter said he had dispatched, and he would do so.

Mr. Hunter suggested that he had better be qualified as a member of the bar of the Commonwealth of Virginia, too bar.

Mr. Hoyt had not brought his credentials of admission.

The Court said that that was not required in order to be strictly legal: to that fact any citizen's evidence would answer.

Mr. Green said his partner had read a letter from the law-student Hoyt, addressed to him as a member of the bar.

Mr. Hoyt then took the customary oath.

FURTHER EVIDENCE FOR THE PROSECUTION.

The following witnesses were called on the part, and testified to the facts already before the public: Colonel Washington, Captaine Ashby, Alexander, Judge, Field, Alexander, Kennedy, Allstadt, Albert Griest, Henry Huntsberry, Colonel Gibson, Rockwell, and Mr. Beckham.

EVIDENCE FOR THE DEFENCE.

For the defence, Messrs. A. Brown, H. Kitzmiller, and James Hunter, and others were called, but no new facts were elicited. One witness was asked whether he knew the Rev. Selling of the outlaw Thompson in cold blood.

Several witnesses for the defence were called, but did not answer.

BROWN REPUDIATES HIS COUNSEL.

Brown arose from his recumbent, evidently excited, and standing on his feet, addressed the court as follows:

"May it please the Court,—I have listened attentively standing all the assurances I have received of a fair trial, and although I have been in the habit of saying but little, I must say that I have not been so treated as I expected the full benefit of the provisions of the law would be afforded me, and was assured that I should be. I have had to meet, from time to time, evidence which I had no knowledge of, and which I supposed they had not the power to get. I have been convicted by hearsay evidence, and am sure that but little of what is termed testimony has been given that is entitled to the name; I suppose that is the best course I can pursue, so far as I can learn: and now I ask, if I am to have my ruling at all deserving the name of justice, that I be told that this proceeding be deferred until to-morrow morning, for I have no counsel. I have before intimated to the Court that I can rely: but I am in hopes counsel may arrive who will manage the business for me, and relieve me of necessary for my defence: I am myself unable to attend to it. I have given all the attention to it I could, and I feel I am unable to do so from debility to decay of strength, for my memory was also affected. I am not the man I was when I was arrested, and I have not a dime: I had two hundred and fifty or sixty dollars in gold and silver when I left my pocket, and now I have no possible means of getting any help to go my errands. I feel myself in the hands of the witnesses subpœnaed. They are not within reach and are not here. I ask at least until to-morrow morning to have something done, if any thing is designed; if not, I can only feel it is a mockery of justice."

Brown then lay down again, drew his blanket over him, and closed his eyes and appeared to be in a very quiet slumber.

THE BOSTON COUNSEL SPEAKS.

Mr. Hoyt, of Boston, who had been sitting quietly all day at the side of Mr. Green, arose and addressed himself and addressed the Court as follows:

"May it please the Court,—I would add my voice to the appeal of Mr. Brown, although I have had no consultation with him. But the further hearing of the case be postponed until morning. I would state the reason of the application as not to be misunderstood. I am not prepared to believe, that Judge Tidball, who has been selected by the Court to preside at the trial, will arrive at Harper's Ferry in seven o'clock. I have no reason whatever to impute that gentleman's arrival in this place to slight or disrespect to the Court. I have known Judge Tidball at the Boston, traveling night and day, to volunteer my services in defence of Brown. I would not undertake the responsibility of the defence as I am now situated. The gentlemen who have defended Brown have acted to an honorable and dignified manner in all respects so far as I know; but I can not assume the responsibility of defending him myself for many reasons. First, it would be ridiculous in me to suppose that I could do justice to the case in the short time now left, except so far as I have listened, and seen and heard counsel this morning, got my idea of the law and evidence principally from a knowledge of the criminal code of Virginia, and had no time to read it. I had no time to read the evidence, considering in this defense, some of which are of considerable importance, especially that relative to the patriotic and true character of my client. For all these reasons I ask the continuation of the case till to-morrow morning."

THE SOUTHERN COUNSEL RESIGN.

Mr. Green arose to state that Mr. Botts and himself would now both withdraw from the case, and could no longer act in behalf of the prisoner. He then got up now and declared here that he has no confidence in the counsel who have been assigned him. Yesterday confided that I have done my whole duty so far as I have been able, and to-morrow morning I should feel myself an intruder upon the case were I to act for him from that time. I have no confidence in the counsel who have been assigned, and I ought to have been informed of the fact that, under these circumstances, when I feel compelled to withdraw from the case, that I should have intimated that I should remain in such an unwelcome position.

THE EVIDENCE FOR THE DEFENSE CLOSED.

On Saturday, 5th, Samuel Chilton, of Washington, and Henry Kagi, of Washington, were called as the prisoner's counsel with Mr. Hoyt, and were duly qualified. After consultation in private with the prisoner, the Court refused to grant the following witnesses were examined for the prisoner: Messrs. Hill, Hoffman, Hunter, Hunter, Jr., Beckham, Hunter, Jr., Hoffman, Seibert, Major Mills, Samuel Snyder, Captain Sims, Brown Russell, and Terry Hughes.

THE ARGUMENT FOR THE COMMONWEALTH.

After some further argument in reference to delay, and the prisoner's objection raised by Mr. Hoyt, on the multitudinousness of the indictment, the Court directed the proceedings to be resumed.

Mr. Harding then commenced the opening argument for the Commonwealth, and continued it for upwards of two minutes. He reviewed the testimony as elicited during the examination, and read for some time from the statutory of the claim or expectation of the prisoner that the Court would be disposed to grant him a new trial, and that he was in command of a band of murderers and traitors, sent here by a power hostile to the peace of the kind.

The Court then adjourned at five o'clock, to meet again at ten o'clock on Monday morning, when Mr. Chilton will deliver his argument for the prisoner.

JOHN BROWN'S APPEAL FOR COUNSEL.

As every thing now relative to that misguided, doomed man has an interest for the public, we copy from the Times. The body of the letter is in the handwriting of Sheriff Campbell, by whom it was dictated:

"CHARLESTOWN, JEFFERSON COUNTY, Oct. 19, 1859.

"To the Hon. Judge Tidlow:

"Sir,—I am a prisoner, a prisoner, with several associates to my head, and buyonet-stabs in my body. My object in attempting what I did was to free a number of slaves, and I intended to do it without the shedding of blood myself and fellow-prisoners, for it was not anger that prompted me, but a sense of duty. I do not wish to be executed, nor imprisoned; but I charge you, as an officer of our sacred institutions, and as an officer of our sacred institutions, and as an officer of our sacred institutions, and

THE LATE INVASION AT HARPER'S FERRY.—[FROM OUR OWN ARTIST CORRESPONDENT.]

As the writer of the anonymous letter which warned the Secretary of War of the intended attack on the United States arsenals, etc., did not seem to have any clear idea of its geographical position, we think it quite probable that many of our readers may be equally uninformed.

Harper's Ferry is situated in Jefferson County, Virginia, at the confluence of the Potomac and Shenandoah rivers, on a point just opposite the gap through which the united streams pass the Blue Ridge on their way toward the ocean. The Ridge here is about twelve hundred feet in height, showing bare, precipitous cliffs on either side on the river, and exhibiting some of the most beautiful and imposing natural scenery to be found in the country. The town was originally built on two streets stretching along a narrow shelf between the base of the bluff and the rivers, meeting at the point at nearly a right angle, and named respectively Potomac and Shenandoah streets. To accommodate its increasing population the town has straggled up the steep bluff, and, in detached villages and scattered residences, occupies the level ground above—about four hundred feet above the streams.

It has altogether a population of five thousand; is distant from Richmond 170 miles; from Washington City, 67 miles by turnpike road; and from Baltimore, 80 miles by rail. Here the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad crosses the Potomac by a magnificent covered bridge, 960 feet long, and passes along Potomac Street westward, its track lying 40 feet above the river. The Winchester and Harper's Ferry Railroad, lying along Shenandoah Street, connects with the Baltimore and Ohio at the bridge. Potomac Street is entirely occupied by the workshops and offices of the National Armory, and its entrance is inclosed by a handsome gate and iron railing. Nearly at the angle of junction are the old arsenal buildings, where usually from 100,000 to 200,000 stand of arms are stored. The other buildings on the point, and near the bridge, are railroad offices, hotels, eating-houses, stores, shops, etc. Shenandoah Street contains stores and dwelling-houses for half a mile or more, when we come to Hall's rifle-works, situated on a small island in the Shenandoah River.

A simple plat of the town would enlighten more than twenty pages of description, but I have none at hand.

Of the antecedents, motives, and character of the men who made the attempt to possess themselves of the United States Works, and arms therein contained, we shall not speak, except incidentally, in the course of our narrative, as the public have doubtless been sufficiently and fully informed on that subject. Indeed, the last accounts of the whole affair by the Baltimore reporters have been sufficiently full and accurate. Some errors there are of minor importance, which have doubtless occurred through haste and inadvertence. Some names have been gazetted who were not in the light—some overlooked whose conduct merits commendation. There are also some important views connected with the moral of the affair that have not been made sufficiently prominent. Indeed, the very name of insurgents, with which the writers have seen fit to characterize the actors in the tragedy, and the term insurrection, as applied to the movement, are entirely inappropriate, and calculated of themselves to produce a false impression abroad.

We shall dub them outlaws and invaders.

The first overt act of hostility committed by them was the seizure of the watchman on the Potomac Bridge, who was carried prisoner to the Armory buildings, of which they had already quietly taken possession. This was on Sunday night, 16th October, about half past ten o'clock.

PORTRAIT OF OSSAWATTOMIE BROWN, WOUNDED AND A PRISONER.—[SKETCHED BY FORTE CRAYON DURING HIS EXAMINATION BY GOVERNOR WISE.]

At an hour after midnight Colonel Lewis Washington, living four miles from the town, was aroused from his sleep by a loud knocking at his door, and a voice calling him by name. Supposing it to be some friend come to claim hospitality, he lighted a lamp and went to the door, where, to his amazement, he found himself in the presence of six men armed with Sharpe's rifles, knives, and revolvers. The leader, J. E. Cooke, told him he was a prisoner, but that he need feel no alarm, as no harm was intended to his person. The Colonel took the matter as coolly as could have been desired, assuring them that he not only was not frightened, but appreciated the honor they had done him in supposing it required six men, armed to the teeth, to capture a single man in his nightshirt.

While he dressed himself the outlaws arrested all the negro men on the premises, attached horses to the Colonel's carriage and two wagons, and thus drove off toward Harper's Ferry. On their way they captured a Mr. John Alstadt, his son, and men-servants, in like manner. Cooke, who had previously visited Colonel Washington's house, and had been courteously entertained by him, took advantage of the knowledge thereby gained of the premises to steal a number of treasured family relics, among which was the sword presented by Frederick the Great to General George Washington. Some of these articles have been since recovered.

It was not until four o'clock on Monday morning that the citizens of Harper's Ferry began to suspect that some mischief was afoot. The regular watchman at the bridge was missing, and an armed sinister stood guard in his place. As this fact was reported to Heywood, the well-known ferry-master at the dépôt, he went down to see about it. When he got there he was approached by several armed men, one of whom handed him a ride, and ordered him to stand guard in the cause of freedom. Heywood expostulated with them, and resolutely refused to take the rifle. Their motives were hastily explained, and he was threatened with instant death if he did not join them. With heroic firmness the negro answered that they might kill him, but he would never join in their murderous schemes. Seeing an opportunity, he attempted to escape, and was shot dead. Thus the first life sacrificed by these philanthropic liberators was that of a faithful negro.

Shortly after the workmen began to go to their work-shops, among the first, a Mr. Kelly, on seeing an armed guard at the gate, asked by what authority they had taken possession of the public premises. The guard replied, "By the authority of God Almighty!" He was ordered to enter as prisoner; but, instead of obeying, turned and made his escape, receiving a bullet through his hat as he ran. Mr. Beerly, a grocer, witnessed this scene as he was about opening his shop, and running out with his gun, fired at the guard. The next moment he was shot dead.

In the mean time the rumor of these murders began to spread; and as the town was aroused from sleep, it was ascertained that the telegraph wires had been cut above and below the town; the morning train stopped and detained for a time, and then permitted to proceed; and also that several leading citizens had been taken from their beds, and were held prisoners by a band of unknown persons in the Armory grounds.

The number of these prisoners was increased to twenty-five or thirty by the capture of officers and employés, who went to the works to attend to their duties or from curiosity.

As the sun rose upon the scene, the reported outrages and the bodies of the murdered men showed that from whatever source the movement came it was of a serious character. Sentinels armed with rifles and pistols, were seen guarding all the public buildings, threatening death or firing at all who questioned or interfered with them; and the savage audacity with which they issued their orders gave assurance that the buildings were occupied by large bodies of men. Messengers were dispatched to all the neighboring towns for military assistance, while panic-stricken citizens seized such arms as they could find, and gathered in small bodies on the outskirts of the town, and at points remote from the works. All was confusion and mystery. Even the sight of several armed negroes among the strangers did not at once excite suspicion that it was an Anti-Slavery movement, and the report of one of the captured slaves confirmatory of that fact was received with doubt and incredibility. Indeed so severe was the public mind to the acceptance of this belief, that the suggestion was every where met with derision, and every and any other explanation adopted in preference. Some supposed it was a strike among the discontented armorers, or the laborers on a Government dam, who had taken this means to obtain redress for real or imaginary grievances. Others argued that it was a band of robbers organized in some of the cities for the purpose of robbing the paymaster's strong box, known to contain some thousands of public money; that the armed negroes were whites in disguise; that the idea of inciting a servile insurrection was a ruse, put forth to distract the public mind and enable them to escape with their booty.

THE STORMING OF THE ENGINE-HOUSE BY THE UNITED STATES MARINES.—[SKETCHED BY FORTE CRAYON.]

BROWN, HIS SON, AND ANOTHER OF THE OUTLAWS AWAITING EXAMINATION.—[SKETCHED BY PORTE CRAYON.]

Still aroused, as much by curiosity and love of excitement as by the idea of real danger, the people of the neighboring towns and farm-houses armed themselves with such weapons as they could find, and trooped toward the scene of action by tens and by hundreds. In a few hours Harper's Ferry was surrounded completely with a bristling cordon of men with every variety of arms, costume, accoutrement, and of all ages and conditions. Here was the gray-haired farmer quietly pushing a greased bullet down the muzzle of his trusty squirrel piece; there a boy of fourteen, escaped from school, armed with a rusty horse-pistol loaded to the muzzle with slugs and gravel. On foot and on horseback, laborer and landed proprietor, the tradesman from his shop, the merchant from his counter, the lawyer from his office, still they gathered in, armed and unarmed. The hunt was up—woe to the game inclosed within that fiery circle. In the mean time a guerrilla fight had been commenced by the citizens of Harper's Ferry. A man named George Chambers, a citizen whom command the public grounds, shot the negro sentinel that guarded the arsenal, and a drooping fire was heard in different quarters. Hall's rifle-works on the Shenandoah were assailed by the Jefferson Volunteers, supposing it to be strongly occupied. It was taken without great difficulty, and to the astonishment of all, its garrison was ascertained to have consisted of but five men. These attempted to escape by wading and swimming the Shenandoah, but four of them were shot while in the water, and one was taken unhurt. A wretch, mortally wounded, was dragged from the river by a citizen, and laid upon the bank shivering with cold and loss of blood. He begged to be taken to a fire, promising to confess every thing. The bystanders carried him to an old cooper's shop hard by, where a hasty blaze was kindled. He told that his name was Lewis Leary; that he had been enlisted in Oberlin, Ohio, to serve in the great war of liberation to commence at Harper's Ferry. He left a wife and three children, and entreated none one to write to them to inform them of the manner of his death. He says he was enlisted by a man named Willet, and was awfully deceived. He was a good-looking mulatto, quite young, and nearly white. After lingering in great agony for twelve hours he died.

About this time Captain George Turner, who had come down with the Jefferson military, went to reconnoitre the position of the outlaws in the Armory inclosure, and while so doing was shot dead. Captain Turner was a graduate of West Point, and for some years an officer in the United States Army. He was a gentleman of fortune, and one of the most esteemed citizens of the county. When the shell was cracked at the rifle-works, and found to contain so small a kernel, people began to perceive that had greatly overestimated the numbers of the enemy, and no time was lost in taking possession of the town and closing all the passages of escape. The outlaw chief, too, had by this time perceived that, instead of hundreds of allies, he was hemmed in by thousands of infuriated enemies; and gathering together the remnant of his desperate band, with a few frightened negroes and the élite of his prisoners, he retired into the fire-engine house, within the public grounds. A short time after two of his party came out, each leading a citizen prisoner—whether to parley or to escape was not under-tood. When they appeared in the street one of the outlaws was immediately shot down, and the other captured; the citizen prisoners thus rejoining their friends. The outlaw who was thus shot was AARON C. Stephens, who still lives a prisoner, although supposed to be mortally wounded.

After this incident Mr. Fontaine Beckham, Mayor of Harper's Ferry, and one of its most beloved citizens, exposed himself on the railroad track within range of the fire from the engine-house, and was shot dead. As the spot where he fell was commanded completely by the fire of the outlaws, his body lay there for several hours before it was removed. The spot is still marked by stains of blood mingled with gray hairs. At this sight the outlaw prisoner Thomson, who had just been taken, was told to prepare for death. He begged hard, but he was immediately shot, and thrown into the river. Although two balls had been fired into his body, and he fell forty feet into the water, he had vitality enough left to swim to the base of the next pier and crawl up upon its edge, where twenty rifle bullets soon ended his miserable existence. At three o'clock a party of a hundred men from Martinsburg arrived in the passenger train which had been turned back in the morning. This party was only partially armed, and without organization, many having come as much from curiosity as other motives. When they arrived at the upper end of the Armory buildings on the Potomac, some twenty or more of having spirits, headed by George Wollet, one of the railroad men, made a rash but gallant assault upon the strong-hold of the outlaws. Wollet broke open the door, and nearly succeeded in forcing himself in, but was shot through the left arm by a rifle-ball. The attack was repulsed, with a loss of seven wounded, three of them dangerously. The fruit of this assault was the liberation of eighteen of the Harper's Ferry prisoners and the death of two of the outlaws. The wounded of the Martinsburg men deserve honorable mention:

George Wollet,	severely wounded.
Evan Dorsey,	dangerously wounded.
Kirk Hammond,	dangerously wounded.
—— Richardson,	severely wounded.
George H. Murphy,	slightly wounded.
N. Hooper,	severely wounded.
——	Another, not reported.

One of the outlaws escaped from the Armory inclosure by creeping through a culvert which led to the Potomac River. He threw away his rifle and attempted to swim, but was hindered by the weight of his accoutrements. Under the fire of twenty rifles he crept behind a rock, and drawing a knife, attempted to cut away his belts. George Schoppart, of Martinsburg, waded out until within ten paces of him, and shot him dead. In his pocket was found a captain's commission, which reads as follows:

HEAD-QUARTERS, WAR DEPARTMENT,
NEAR HARPER'S FERRY, Maryland.

Whereas W. H. Leeman has been nominated a captain in the army established under the Provisional Constitution; now therefore, in pursuance of the authority vested in me by said resolution, we do hereby appoint and commission the said W. H. Lottman captain.

THE GUARD-ROOM, WITH THE WOUNDED PRISONERS.—[SKETCHED BY PORTE CRAYON.]

Given at the office of the Secretary of War this day, 15th of October, 1859.

JOHN BOWERS, Commander-in-Chief.

H. KEYS, Secretary of War.

From this time there was no more active work. The town was occupied by a thousand or fifteen hundred men, including volunteer companies from Shepherdstown, Charlestown, Winchester, and elsewhere, but the dread and excitement and uniformity largely predominated, giving the affair more the character of a grand hunting scene than that of a battle. The savage game was holed beyond all possibility of escape. To storm the building, and annihilate the remnant of the bloody band, would not have been the work of twenty minutes; but the dread of its blowing up during the act by the ten prisoners restrained the wish for immediate action. It was determined to guard the premises narrowly, and wait during the day for Colonel Robert Lee, of the United States Army, arrived with about a hundred marines and a section of artillery. Major Russell was in immediate command of the troops, and Lieutenant Stuart, of the cavalry, acted as volunteer aid to Colonel Lee.

There troops took possession of the Armory yard, in immediate proximity to the engine-house, and the night was passed in comparative quiet.

One of the prisoners reported during the night Brown acknowledged that all was lost, he knew that he had forfeited his life, and determined to sell it as dearly as possible. The contrary was ascertained, too, began to give way, and they wished to surrender; but he urged them to continued desperation. One whom the rebs seemed to attach the most importance to was Osborn Perkins, a citizen, and accompanied by Lieutenant Stuart, Colonel Lee said. They were received on the door by Brown, who asked for an unconditional surrender was peremptorily refused. This terse proposal by Brown was all that he and his party should be escorted by the marines to the Maryland shore and pursuit by the citizens restrained until the escape; in a case like this he would leave the country and give up his prisoner hostages unhurt. Colonel Lee's answer was inadmissible, and the parley lasted some time without result. In the mean time the storming party of twelve marines, led by Lieutenant Green, took position on either side of the centre door. As the parley ended, the marines rushed back several paces and waved his hat. Two stalwart soldiers sprang forward, and with heavy sledges tried to force the door. One of the sledges broke had been pushed against it, and it resisted all their efforts. Thirty men were ordered out, and taking a heavy forty-foot ladder, used it as a battering-ram, dropping upon their knees at each blow to avoid the shots volley of the rebs from the door.

At the third or fourth blow it gave way, and the stormers rushed in gallantly, headed by Lieutenant Green. The pent-up excitement of the multitude now burst forth in a shout that shook the air, and nearly drowned the sharp crash of fire-arms that received the stormers on entering.

Private Quinn, one of the first who entered, received a mortal wound. Turning back, he dropped his musket and, assisted by a friend, walked out to fall, prostrating to the last his quiet, soldierly bearing. The next person received an ugly wound in the cheek. Colonel Washington, who through all these trying scenes had borne himself with an intrepid coolness that elicited the admiration of the brigand chief himself, now did important service. Two moments the marines entered the armory before one of the engines, told his fellow-prisoners to hold up their hands that they might be recognized as non-combatants, and was rapidly pushed out the outlaws to the vengeance of the soldiers. Having discharged their pieces in the fierce rush, some used several of these threw down their arms and begged for quarter. Unmovable to the last, old Brown sat in a corner inside his rifle, a Sharp's revolver, and in this position received a sabre-stroke from Lieutenant Green which cut through his hat, his hands and knees. Two or three bayonet stabs followed him, it was then supposed. Ottawa Brown, his son, was not then seen to be wounded.

A soldier seeing Colonel Washington in an active and prominent position, mistook him for one of the outlaws, leveled his piece and put his finger on the trigger; but fortunately remembering the caution in regard to the prisoners, he dropped it, saying, Green, elder Emperor, a negro M.C. under the faths provisional government, mustered among the slave prisoners, hoping thus to escape notice and detection; but perceived by Colonel Washington, he was hauled forth to his doom. Doubtless, at that moment he would have swapped himself and his honors to-day for the ignorant field-nigger on a Georgia plantation.

The citizen captives, released from their long and trying confinement, hurried out to their friends with every demonstration of joy; while the bloody carcasses of the dead and dying outlaws were dragged into the lawn amidst the howls and execrations of the people. It was a hideous and ghastly spectacle. Some stark and stiff, with staring eyes and fallen jaws, were the dead of yesterday; while others, struck with death wounds, writhed and wallowed in their blood. Two only were brought out unhurt—Coppick, and Green the negro—and they only escaped immediate death by accident, the soldiers not at once distinguishing them from the captive citizens and slaves.

The quiet and thorough manner in which this delicate business was conducted reflects much credit on the officers and men engaged, and is a beautiful exemplification of the immense superiority of trained soldiers over all others.

Thus ended the first battle of the Provisional Government forces led by Lieut.-General Brown.

"Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat."

The outlaw force consisted of only twenty-two men, who were disposed of as follows:

LIST OF THE INVADING PARTY.

1. John Brown, of ESSEX Co., New York, wounded and a prisoner.
2. Ottawa Brown, his son, of New York, killed.
3. Watson Brown, " " " killed.
4. Aaron C. Stephens, of Conn., mortally wounded.
5. Edwin Coppick, of Ill., prisoner.
6. Albert Hazlett, of Pennsylvania, killed.
7. William H. Leeman, of Canada, killed.
8. Stewart Taylor, of Canada, killed.
9. Charles P. Tidd, of Maine, killed.
10. William Thompson, of New York, killed.
11. Dolph Thompson, of New York, killed.
12. John Kagi, of Ohio, killed.
13. Jerry Anderson, of Indiana, killed.
14. Daugerfield Newby, negro, of Ohio, killed.
15. O. P. Anderson, negro, of Pennsylvania, killed.
16. Lewis Leary, " " Ohio, killed.
17. Shields Green, alias Emperor, negro, of Pa., prisoner.
18. —— Cook, white man, of Connecticut, killed.
19. J. E. Cooke, white man, of Connecticut, prisoner.

There are three unaccounted for, who have probably escaped into the mountains, or to be sincerely hoped, for the credit of humanity, that their escape is not fatal.

The mid-day train of Tuesday brought Governor Wise, accompanied by several hundred men from Richmond, Alexandria, Petersburg, and elsewhere. There was real disappointment to find that the battle was over. His staff, however, speedily reformed of the mere handful of men who had created all this bother by bolted over. In his wrath he said some pretty hard things about it was universally seen and felt that Governor Wise was just the man for such a contingency.

Accompanied by Andrew Hunter, Esq., a distinguished lawyer of Jefferson County, the Governor rejoined his staff, which was augmented by the two wounded prisoners lay, and there had a spectacle and a scene of excitement which for the chief of the outlaws. It had more the character of a conversation than a legal examination, for the Governor treated the prisoner with a kindness that evidently rather than a hostile manner. He was evidently surprised and affected by the appearance of the old man, who raised his feet to the fire and his head propped upon pillows on the back of a chair. During the examination of Brown by Governor Wise his countenance assumed a look of the deepest anguish, and the likeness of him as he then appeared. His hair was the same as of mixed grey, so that it could not distinguish the original color. His eye is also of mixed grey, rose Roman, and beard, originally sandy, now white and bushy. His appearance is that of a seventy interrupted by deep groans, not awakening the sympathy like those of the young soldier dying in the next room, but rather that of anguish at the agonized grief of a ferocious beast.

A few feet from Brown lay Stephens, a fine-looking fellow, quiet, not in pain apparently, and conversing in a voice as full and natural as if he were making a speech. He had received a wound in his breast in a childlike, helpless way—a position that would indicate that he was shot while in flight or died or were dying of their wounds. Only those who were shot stone-dead lay as they fell.

The examination and consequences, answering all questions without reserve, except such as tend to implicate others, was conducted calmly and collied or taken. I append some extracts from notes taken during the conversation by Mr. Hunter:

"Brown says that he has a number of printed copies of which were found on the persons of the rebs, and entitled 'The Provisional Constitution and Ordinances for the People of the United States,' was prepared principally by himself, and adopted at a convention of delegates which has been over 2 years ago at Chatham, Canada West, where it was written. Brown, Kagi, and Hazlett were the ones who pointed 'Commander-in-Chief.' His two sons and Stephens were each captains, and Coppick a lieutenant. Kagi was Secretary of War, appointed so by himself.

"He avers that the whole number operating under this organization was but twenty-two, each of whom had taken the oath required by Article 48; that he had enough supplies and ammunition stored from Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and several other States, besides the Free States—taking it for granted that he was only necessary to seize the public arms and place them in the hands of the slaves and other slaveholders to recruit his forces indefinitely. In this calculation he was alone, of whom he fully admitted that he had been entirely disappointed."

Not most of the particulars of this conversation have already appeared, and will be of more interest on present than a second time.

Concluding that the prisoner must be seriously weakened by his vigils and his wounds, the Governor ordered some refreshment to be given him, and, appointing Lieutenant Stuart his guard, took his leave. As some of us lingered, the old man exclaimed in a loud tone, "Where is my old-time hospitality when I was a slaveholder?" Upon which Governor Wise was just the man for such a question.

Accompanied by Andrew Hunter, Esq., a distinguished lawyer of Jefferson County, the Governor resumed his visit to the prisoner, and spent the two wounded prisoners lay, and there had a spectacle and a scene of excitement which for the chief of the outlaws. It had more the character of a conversation than a legal examination, for the Governor treated the prisoner with a kindness that evidently rather than a hostile manner. He was evidently surprised and affected by the appearance of the old man, who raised his feet to the fire and his head propped upon pillows on the back of a chair. During the examination of Brown by Governor Wise his countenance assumed a look of the deepest anguish, and the likeness of him as he then appeared. His hair was the same as of mixed grey, so that it could not distinguish the original color. His eye is also of mixed grey, rose Roman, and beard, originally sandy, now white and bushy. His appearance is that of a seventy interrupted by deep groans, not awakening the sympathy like those of the young soldier dying in the next room, but rather that of anguish at the agonized grief of a ferocious beast.

A few feet from Brown lay Stephens, a fine-looking fellow, quiet, not in pain apparently, and conversing in a voice as full and natural as if he were making a speech. He had received a wound in his breast in a childlike, helpless way—a position that would indicate that he was shot while in flight or died or were dying of their wounds. Only those who were shot stone-dead lay as they fell.

The examination and consequences, answering all questions without reserve, except such as tend to implicate others, was conducted calmly and collied or taken. I append some extracts from notes taken during the conversation by Mr. Hunter:

"Brown says that he has a number of printed copies of which were found on the persons of the rebs, and entitled 'The Provisional Constitution and Ordinances for the People of the United States,' was prepared principally by himself, and adopted at a convention of delegates which has been over 2 years ago at Chatham, Canada West, where it was written. Brown, Kagi, and Hazlett were the ones who pointed 'Commander-in-Chief.' His two sons and Stephens were each captains, and Coppick a lieutenant. Kagi was Secretary of War, appointed so by himself.

"He avers that the whole number operating under this organization was but twenty-two, each of whom had taken the oath required by Article 48; that he had enough supplies and ammunition stored from Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and several other States, besides the Free States—taking it for granted that he was only necessary to seize the public arms and place them in the hands of the slaves and other slaveholders to recruit his forces indefinitely. In this calculation he was alone, of whom he fully admitted that he had been entirely disappointed."

Not most of the particulars of this conversation have already appeared, and will be of more interest on present than a second time.

Concluding that the prisoner must be seriously weakened by his vigils and his wounds, the Governor ordered some refreshment to be given him, and, appointing Lieutenant Stuart his guard, took his leave. As some of us lingered, the old man exclaimed in a loud tone, "Where is my old-time hospitality when I was a slaveholder?" Upon which Governor Wise was just the man for such a question.

"Then," said he, quickly, "they are not both dead; there were three dead bodies there last night. Gentlemen, my son is doubtless living and in your power. I will ask for him what I would not ask for myself; let him have kind treatment, for he is as pure and noble-hearted a youth as ever breathed the breath of life."

There was some show of human feeling in the old felon at last, but his prayer was vain. Both his boys lay stark and bloody by the Armory wall.

I had observed Stephens holding a small packet in his folded hands, and feeling some curiosity in regard to it, it was handed to me. It contained miniatures of his sisters; one, a sweet girlish face of about fourteen, the other more mature, but pretty. What strange reflections these incidents awakened! This old man crazes a boon for his noble boys, which neither pain nor death can bring him to ask for himself. The other clasps to his dying breast a remembrance of his gentle sisters and his father's dis-inherited cottage far away in peaceful Connecticut. Is this pity that thus dims my eyes? a rising sympathy that struggles in my heart? Away with these weak feelings for this bloody villain, that prates about his sons, been for months a deliberate plotter against the liven and happiness of thousands! And he, in this time sees boys to aid him in his attempt to waste, with fire and sword, the fairest land under the sun of heaven! And this bloody dupe—his follower—how many men's sister did he propose to murder; how many social hearths did he intend to lay in ashes? how were those hundreds of deadly rifles, those loads of pikes, those bundles of sabres designed for Satan's death Almighty Providence! is man indeed so weak that he can inflict no more?

And all about this ragged-haired, grey-bearded, half-mother nay—the negroes. Let us walk through the streets of Harper's Ferry and see what part they have played in the drama. It seems that there is not the remotest suspicion that a single individual among them knew of the foreknowledge of Brown's movement. It is still asserted that they were ignorant of it, nor persuasion could induce one of them to join the movement when it was proposed to them. Heyward was shot dead when he heroically attempting his rescue of their nefarious designs. Brown discovered early that the negroes were of no such as he had captured, and on Monday morning sent Cook and two other white men, with eleven negro prisoners to raise the Maryland side, where they were met by the citizens, and the munitions of war found in the engine-house. The log cabin-house in the mountain opposite the town. This we assume that they might be more convenient for those impromptu recruits that Brown's genius vaguely seemed confidently to expect.

As Cooke and the negroes went at times to the river to fire across at the Virginians these negroes escaped, dodging through the woods, swimming the river, and running up the canal, were turned to their respective homes. I conversed with several of them who narrated their adventures, while in the power of the outlaws, with keen eyes, with great humor and vivacity. One fellow in a boat, when he got across, threw up his eyes and his hands by Brown, who told him to take it and strive for himself.

"Good lord, Massa," cried Cuffee, in a tremor, "I don't know nuffin 'bout handlin' dem tings."

"Take it instantly," cried the old revolutionist, and strike home. This is a day that will long be remembered in the history of your race—a day of emancipation."

"Please God, Massa, I's got a sore finger," and Cuffee exhibited it, and it was true that the finger he had lost in a wheel-machine some years before.

Finding that he had no mind to be a hero, Brown took him to the engine-house and left him to keep him out for water. As soon as he got out of range of their guns he stole the pitcher and ran off for his life. I narrate the story faithfully as it was told to me. Many similar anecdotes I gleaned from the negroes themselves, but have not room for all I lists them. In the town they were passing to and fro with entire confidence, and the moment their escapes and jeering at the dead carcasses of the Liberators. Several told me that Brown, in urging them to join, repeatedly said, "I came to free you and" Did you never hear of John Brown of Kansas? Osawatomie Brown?" To which they answered the negroes more. They dropped the pikes, like the devil's gifts, and took to their beds, hiding their heads under straw ricks, barns, and corners. On the other hand, there is sufficient and full evidence to show that the slaveholders were present in any instance, the slaves would not be in the least have very cheerfully thrust the pikes into the bodies of their masters, and many of the slaveholders were not so ignorant of the pitch-fork exercise as to be unprotected.

As for the non-slaveholding inhabitants, on whom Brown calculated so confidently for assistance, it is stated that at least four out of five of the whites are volunteered so promptly were non-slaveholders and non-slaveholders' sons. Not were they the working men of the occasion, the stormers, who went to work with a remorseless ferocity equaling that of the outlaws themselves.

Any man who has heretofore imagined that he had sounded the depths of human folly and human wickedness will yet be amazed when he considers this affair at Harper's Ferry. It is generally regarded as the work of a madman, a monomaniac, an act which, as it is without precedent, and is likely to remain without imitation, is of little importance. Less is only equaled by its atrocity, would be ludicrous but not the blood of some of our best citizens made it serious.

As for Brown's beast, "that, if at liberty, he would bring forth," and the idiocy of his plan, the us us, and to do good to them that persecute us. But poor Nattee is not a christened woman. I would that Mr. Nolan would baptise her; it would, may-be, take her out of the power of Satan's temptations."

"Ah! you never tempted *?" asked Faith, half scornfully; "and yet I doubt not you were well baptised."

"True," said Lois, sadly. "I often do very wrong; but perhaps I might have done worse if the holy form had been omitted by me."

They were again silent for a time.

"Lois," said Faith, "I did not mean any offence. But do you not fear lest by so much evil piling up all that future life, of which the parsons talk, and which seems to me as vague and as distant as a few years of real vivid blessedness to begin to-morrow—this hour, this minute? Oh, I could think of happiness for ever! I would willingly give up all those misty chances of heaven—"

"Faith, Faith!" said Lois, in terror, holding her hand before her cousin's mouth, and looking around in fright. "Hush! you know not who may be listening; you are putting yourself in his power."

But Faith pushed her hand away, and said, "Lois, I believe in him no more than I believe in heaven. Both may exist, but they are so far away that I defy them. Why, all this ado about Mr. Tappan's house—promise me never to tell living creature, and I will tell you all—"

"No!" said Lois, terrified. "I dread all secrets. I will hear none. I will to all that I can for you, Cousin Faith, in any way; but I dread sometimes I strive to keep my life and thoughts within the strictest bounds of godly simplicity, lest I be dread pledging myself to aught that is hidden and secret."

"As you will, cowardly girl, full of terrors, which, if you had listened to me, might have been lessened, if not entirely done away with. But Faith would not utter another word, though Lois tried meekly to entice her into conversation on some other subject.

The rumor of witchcraft was like the echo of thunder among the hills. It had first sprung up in Mr. Tappan's house, and his two little daughters were the first supposed to be bewitched; but rumor, always, from every quarter of the town, sent in accounts of sufferers by witchcraft. There was hardly a family without some grave complaint of its sufferers. Thus arose a growl and menace of vengeance from many a household—menaces deepened, not daunted, by the solemn and mysterious air of the fearing that gave rise to them.

At length a day was appointed when, after solemn fasting and prayer, Mr. Tappan invited the neighboring ministers and all godly people to assemble at his house, and unite with him in spending a day to solemn religious services, and to supplication for the deliverance of his children, and these similarly afflicted, from the malice of the Evil One. All Salem poured out toward the house of the minister. It was a day of deep and solemn awe on all their faces; eagerness and horror was depicted on many a face, while stern resolution, amounting to determined cruelty, in the accused, arose, was seen on others.

In the midst of the prayer, Hester Tappan, the younger girl, fell into convulsions; fit after fit came on, and her screams mingled with the shrieks and cries of the assembled congregation. In the first pause, when the child was partially recovered, when the people were again composing and breathless, her father, the Pastor Tappan, lifted his right hand, and adjured her, in the name of the Trinity, to say who tormented her. There was a dead silence; not a creature stirred of all those hundreds. Hester turned wearily and uneasily, and moaned out the name of Hota, her father's Indian servant. Hota was present, apparently as much interested as any one. Hota had been busying herself much in bringing remedies to the sufferers. Hota, as she stood, stalwart, tranquil, while her name was caught up and shouted out in tones of reprobation and hatred by all the crowd around her, deemed nominal and they would have fallen upon the trembling creature and torn her to pieces from impulse, thanks, shivering Hota, half guilty-looking from her very bewilderment. But Pastor Tappan, that gaunt, gray man, lifting himself to his utmost height, signed to them to go back, to keep still while he addressed them; and, in the few words that constant vengeance was not just, deliberate punishment; that there would be need of conviction, perchance of confession, before hope for mercy arrives for his suffering children from her revelations, if she were brought to confession. They must look on the culprit in his hands, and in those of his brother ministers, that they might wrestle with Satan before delivering her up to the civil power. His spoke well, for he spoke from the heart of a father seeing his children, whom he loved best and most serious suffering, and firmly believing that he now held the clew in his hand which should ultimately release them and their fellow-sufferers. And the congregation moaned themselves into unsatisfied satisfaction, and listened to the ministers' solemn prayer, which he uplifted even while the hapless Hota stood there, guarded and bound by two men, who glared at her like blood-hounds ready to slay even while the prayer ended in the words of the merciful Saviour. Lois shuddered and trembled at the whole scene; and this was no intellectual shuddering at the folly and superstition of the people, but with moral indignation at the sight of guilt which she believed in, and at the evidence of man's harsh and unforgiving spirit, which when given to the guilty, troubled and distressed her merciful heart. She followed her aunt and cousin out into the open air with downcast eyes and pale face. Grace Hickson was going home with a feeling of triumphant relief at the detection of the guilty one. Faith alone seemed uneasy and disturbed beyond her wont, for Manassen received the whole business as the fulfillment of a prophesy, and Prudence was excited by the whole scene into a state of discordant high spirits.

"I am quite as old as Hester Tappan," said she; "her birthday is in September and mine in October."

"What has that to do with it?" said Faith, sharply.

Nothing, only she seemed such a little thing for all those grave ministers to be praying for, and so many folk come from a distance—some from Boston, I reckon—all for her sake and Mr. Why, didst thou see it was godly Mr. Hewick that held her forward? I'll be bound to, and old Madam Holbrook had herself helped upon a chair to see the better. I wonder how long I might engage before a young godly man like that take so much notice of me. But I suppose that comes of being a pastor's daughter. Shall be so set by there'll be no speaking to her now. Faith! thinkest thou that Hota really had bewitched her? She gave me corn-cakes the last day we were at Mr. Tappan's, just like any other woman, only, perchance, a little more downcast; and to think of her being a witch after all!"

But Faith seemed in a hurry to reach home, and to get away from Prudence's talking. Lois hastened on with Faith, for Manassen was walking alongside of all the rest, and seemed ready to her plan of avoiding him, even though she pressed her company upon Faith, who had seemed of late desirous of avoiding her.

That evening the news spread through Salem that Hota had confessed to her own, had acknowledged that she was a witch. Natter was brought to confess the intelligence. She broke into the room where the girls were sitting, and, full of her own importance by doing nothing, because of the great prayer meeting in the morning, cried out, "Mercy, mercy, mistress, every body! take care of your feet! Nattee, who never do wrong, but for mistress and Miss Faith, she be witch now, and she say so to herself; oh, me! oh, me!" and stooping over the girls, she stirred the fire with the shovel, in spite of voice, of which Lois only heard the word "torture." But Faith heard all, and turning very pale, hastily descended to the kitchen, and to the kitchen. Presently, Grace Hickson came in. She had come to see Faith, and to ask her, as she had to say that so godly a woman had been gossiping; and, indeed, the subject of the conversation she had to say that so godly a woman had been gossiping; and, indeed, the subject of the conversation she had to have shed a no serious consequence, was asked for me to employ a light word to designate it. Prudence, however, with a loud repeating small detailed tails and rumors, in which the speakers had no concern, that constitutes gossiping; but in this instance, all civil, and even all godly terms were considered to bear such dreadful significance, and which have so grown up on ending, that such witnesses were occasionally wanted to give them importance. Every fragment of intelligence that related to the Evil One, whether in connection with witchcraft, or how big dog howled all one long night through, or how the cock crowed, or how his cow suddenly failed in her milk only two mornings, was had calved; how his memory had forsaken him one Sabbath day when he was preaching from Hosea on Prayer, and he had even omitted a clause thereof in his Sunday afternoon; and how all these forerunners of the children's coming illness might now be interpreted and understood—this had formed the staple of the conversation between Grace Hickson and her friends. There had arisen a dispute among them as to how far those subjections to the power of the Evil One, which were considered as a judgment upon Pastor Tappan for some sin on his part, might be held to affect the general religious discussion, although there was a good deal of difference of opinion; for as none of the speakers but had been present at some one of the days when a prayer that they had none of them committed any sin. In the midst of this, Faith came down stairs into the street, brought the news that Hota had confessed all, had owned to signing a certain little red book with Satan that he presented to her at a communion at impious sacraments, had ridden through the air on a broomstick to the Devil's Hoof, and had been at the questions which the elders and magistrates, carefully reading over the confessions of the witch, had drawn from her, were all true. Natter, in order that they might not omit a single iniquity, had asked of Hota if she had ever been to, but typical of inferior importance, and partaking more of the nature of earthly sticks than of spiritual power. Hota had answered, carefully and thoroughly, by which all the crockery in Pastor Tappan's house could be gathered together, and which was one of the intelligible malpractices the gossips of Salem took little heed. One of these had that such an action showed Satan's prompting, but they preferred to listen to the grander guilt of the blasphemous communion and supernatural power. The interview ended with saying that she was to be hung the next morning, in spite of her confession, even although her life had been preserved on account of her acknowledged her sin; for it was well to make an example of such a dangerous witch as she, and it was also well that she was an Indian, a heathen, who life would be no great loss to the community. Natter seemed disposed to go on to relate how all witches should perish of the face of the earth, Indian or Christian, but Faith, who had never known a Christian who had betrayed the Lord, even as Judas did, and had gone over to Satan. For her part, she wished that the first-discovered witch had been a member of a godly English household, that it might be seen how the godly and righteous folk were willing to cut off the right hand, and pluck out the right eye, if needful, that this devilish sin. She spoke sternly and well. The latter comer said that her words might be brought to the proof, for that Hota was already tried, found guilty, and condemned, and some among the most religious families of Salem, whom she had seen among the unholy communicants at the sacrament of the Evil One. And Grace replied that she would answer for it, all godly folk would stand the proof, and quench all natural affection rather than that such a sin should grow and spread unchecked. Faith turned herself and a weak bodily dread of witnessing the violent death even of an animal; but she would not let that deter her from standing among those who cast the accursed creature out from among them on the morrow morning.

Contrary to her wont, Grace Hickson told her family much of this conversation. It was a sign of her excitement on the subject that she thus spoke, and the excitement spread in different forms through her family. Faith was flushed and restless, wandering between the keeping-room and the kitchen, and questioning her mother particularly as to the more extraordinary parts of Hota's confession, as if she wished to satisfy herself that the children with whom she usually done had not some mysterious deeds.

Lois listened and trembled with affright at the narration, and the idea that such things were possible. Occasionally she found herself wandering off into sympathy with Hota, though the terrors that was to die, abhorred of all men, and surprised that Hota, who had been a friend to the children, and who was now, at this very time—when Lois sat among her kindred by the warm and cheerful fireside, unhampered by many peaceful—gentlemen happy—nervous—solitary, shivering, panic-stricken in the cells, with the fear of death in the near future, shut up in darkness between the cold walls of the town prison. But Lois almost shrank from Faith's eyes, with the loathsome accusation of Satan, and prayed for forgiveness for her charitable thought; and yet, again, she remembered the tender spirit of the Saviour, and allowed herself to fall into piety, till at last all her sense of right and duty became so bewildered that she was afraid to leave all in God's hands, and just ask that He would take all creatures and all events into His hands.

Prudence was as anxious as if she were listening to some merry story—curious as to more than her mother would tell her—seeming to have no particular terror of witches or witchcraft, and not to be especially desirous to accompany her mother the next morning to the hanging. Lois shrank from the cruel, cruel sight of the young, and begged that her mother to allow her to go. Even Grace was astonished and perplexed by her daughter's peculiarity.

"Lois!" said she, "I do not like you. Thou shalt not go. Such sights are not for young girls. I go, and I sicken at the thoughts of it. But I go because that I am a member of the church, and it is against the devil's. Thou shalt not go, I tell thee. I could whip thee for thinking of it."

"Manassen Nolan is to be left whipped by Pastor Tappan as she was brought to confession," said Prudence, all anxious to change the subject of discussion.

Manassen lifted up his head from the great folio Bible, he brought by his father from England, which he was studying. He had not heard what Prudence had said, but looked up at the mention of his name. All present were startled at his wild eyes, his bloodless face. But he was evidently annoyed at the expression of their countenances.

"Why look ye at me in that manner?" asked he, in a tone of mingled displeasure and agitation. His mother made haste to speak:

"It was but that Prudence said something that then have left Pastor Tappan child, that laid his hands by whipping the witch Hota. What evil thought has put into thy head, Lois? I fear me if the nature of this sin of witchcraft, and whether it be indeed, be more dangerous than we deem of. Shoot. At times I feel a creeping influence coming over me, prompting all evil thoughts and unbecoming words. Is it Satan within me, or is it but the power of witchcraft?" and I sicken and loathe myself for my words, and yet cannot for my heart hath the mastery over me, and I must needs do and say what I loathe and dread. Why wouldst thou whipped, Lois? all and, more than from the exact nature of witchcraft, and for that end study the Bible, for I fear me I am not wise when I was, as it were, possessed with a devil?"

He spoke calmly, sadly, but as under deep conviction. Lois answered him with a question:

"My son," she said, "no one ever who the devil, or heard him utter words like these, or who could say were prompted by devils. We have seen them, poor lad, with thy wits gone astray for a time, but such thoughts never entered thy head will in forbidden places, than lest the clew to these dreadful mysteries be found in the powers of darkness. Those days are long past; a future lies before us. The root of witches or of being subject to the power of witchcraft, I am ready to speak of it before thee."

"Let Lois come and sit by thee, and talk to her."

Lois went to her cousin, grieved at heart for his depressed state of mind, anxious to soothe and comfort him, and to lead him away from any fear even the idea of ultimately becoming his wife—an idea to which she had never given a thought—and was consciously day by day, as she perceived the English girl's power of soothing and comforting her self-torturing and very tones of her sweet cousin voice.

He took Lois's hand.

"Lois, I am by you. I forget all my troubles—all the day never come when I am with thee—even to the voice that speaks to me continually?"

"Hush, Manassen!" said Lois, low and soft; "but do not think of the voices. Tell me of the land you hope to inclose from the forest—how much trees grow on it?"

Thus, by simple questions on practical affairs, she led him back, in her unconscious wisdom, to the subjects on which he had always shown strong practical sense. He talked on them with all due discretion till the hour for family prayer came round, which was early in these days. It was Manassen's place to conduct it, as head of the family; a post which his mother had always been anxious to assign to him since Grace Hickson's death. He prayed extempore; and to-night his supplications wandered off into wild, unconnected fragments of prayer, which all those kneeling around began, each according to her anxiety for the speaker, to think would never end. Minutes elapsed, and grew to quarters of the hour, and his words grew only more emphatic and wilder, praying for himself alone, and laying bare the recesses of his heart. At length his mother rose, and taking Lois by the hand, for she had fallen in Lois's prayer over her son, as being akin to that which the shepherd David playing on his harp had over the king Saul sitting on his throne. She drew her toward him, where he knelt facing into the circle, and with her disengaged hand she covered up his face depicting the struggle of the troubled soul within.

"Here is Lois," said Grace, almost tenderly; "she would fain go to her chamber." (Down the back of the chair she went screaming.) "Rise, and finish thy prayer in thy closet."

But as Lois's approach he sprang to his feet, sprang aside.

"Take her away, mother. Lead me not into temptation. Take her away, bring not evil into my thoughts. She overshadows me, even in the presence of my God. She is no angel of light, or she would not do this. She troubles me, and the sound of a voice bidding me marry her, even when I think of her, stuns me. Take her away!"

He would have struck at Lois if she had not shrunk back, paralyzed and affrighted. His mother, although equally dismayed, was not affrighted. She had seen him thus before; and under-stood the temporary displacement of his reason.

"Go, Lois! the sight of thee irritates him, as does that of Faith. Go! leave him to me."

And Lois rushed away to her room, and threw herself on her bed like a panting, hunted creature. Faith came to her, asked her, shook her.

"Lois," said she, "will thou do me a favor? It is but enough to ask. I will do thine before day-light, and bear this letter from my mother to Goody Nolan's lodgings? I would have done it myself, but Prudence has locked the door, and I will not be detained until the time when Hota is to be hung: and the letter tells of matters pertaining to life and death. Seek out Pastor Nolan's dwelling, he may be, and have speech of him after he has read the letter."

"Can not Nattee take it?" asked Lois.

"No!" Faith answered, fiercely. "Why should she?"

But Lois did not reply. A quick suspicion darted through her Faith's mind which rightly judged. It had never entered there before.

"Speak, Lois! I read thy thoughts. Thou couldst faint not to the bearer of this letter?"

"I will take it," said Lois, meekly. "It concerns thee, I think, you say."

"Yes" said Faith, in quite a different tone of voice. But, after a pause, she continued, sadly, "Then as soon as the house is still I will write what I have to say, and leave it here, on this table, that you with greed may not be kept from it by a night's rest, while there is yet time for action."

"Yes! I promise," said Lois. And Faith knew enough of her to feel sure that the deed would be done, and done faithfully.

The letter was written—laid on the chest; and, ere day dawned, Lois rose, took it, and, creeping out her from between her half-closed eyelids—eyelids that had never been fully closed in sleep the livelong night. Faith heard the footsteps of Lois locked, left the room, Faith sprang up, and prepared to go to the window, to watch the departure of her sprang. Nearly every one in Salem was awake and up on this awful morning, though few were out of doors, for the rain was falling in torrents, and the sky was hastily-erected gallows, the black shadow of which fell across the ground with ghastly distinctness; now she had to pass the iron-barred jail, through the unglazed windows of which she heard the forlorn cry of a woman, and the sound of many footsteps. On she sped, sick almost to faintness, to the widow woman's where the Nolans were living. On was already up and abroad, gone, his hostess believed, to the jail. Thither Lois, repeating the words "Jail" and "Nolan" to herself, tried to go. Retracing her steps, she was thankful to see him coming out of the jail, looking still more haggard and dismal for being in heavy shadow, just as she approached. What his errand had been she knew not; but he looked grave and stern, as she put Faith's letter into his hands, and stood before him quietly waiting until he should have read and deliver the expected answer. But, instead of opening it, he held it in his hand, apparently absorbed in thought. At last he spoke as though he were to himself than to her:

"My God! and is she then to die in this fearful manner? Oh! that he—can be—only delirium that prompts such wild and horrible confessions! Mistress Barclay, I come from the prisoner of the Indian woman appointed to die. It seems she confessed herself betrayed her own soul by her sentence not being respited, even after she had made confession of sin enough to bring down fire from heaven; and now it seems to me that nothing, impotent anger of this helpless creature has turned to murderous, fiery rage, and that in her diseased revelations she has made to the keepers during the night—to the morning. I could almost fancy that she thinks, by deepening the guilt she confesses, to escape this last dread punishment of all, as if by some kind of order of which I know not, one could suffer such a sinner to live. Yet to send her to death in such a state of and terror! What is to be done?"

"Let Scripture says that we are not to suffer witches to live on the land," said Lois.

"True; I would but ask for a respite till the prayers of God's people had gone up for His mercy. Some would pray for her, poor wretch as she is. You would, Mistress Barclay, I am sure?" But he said it in a questioning tone.

"I have been praying for her in the night many a time," said Lois, in a low voice. "I pray for her in my heart at this moment; I suppose they are bidden to put her out of the land, but I would not have her entirely God-forsaken. But, sir, you have not read my cousin's letter. And she had me bring him an envelope with much pomposity.

Still he delayed. He was thinking of the dreadful confession he came from hearing. If it was true, the beautiful earth was a polluted place, and he almost wished to die to escape from such pollution into the white innocence of those who stood in the presence of God.

Suddenly his eyes fell on Lois's pure, grave face, upturned and watching his. Faith is earthly goodness come over his soul in that instant, "and he blessed her unawares."

He put his hand on her shoulder with an action half paternal—although the difference in their ages was not above a dozen years—and, bending a little toward her, whispered half to himself, "Mistress Barclay, I thank you; you have done me good."

"I," said Lois, half affrighted, "I done you good! How?"

"By being what you are. But perhaps I should rather thank God, who sent you at the very moment when my need was so disquieted."

At this instant they were aware of Faith standing in front of them, with a countenance of wonder. Her angry look made Lois feel guilty. She had not enough regard the pastor to read his letter, she thought; and it was indignation at his delay in what she had been commissioned to do with the urgency of life or death, that had overcome her, or at her so from beneath her straight black brows. Lois explained how she had not found Mr. Nolan at his lodgings, and had had to follow him to the door of the jail. But Faith replied, with obdurate contempt,

"Spare thy breath, Cousin Lois. It is easy seeing on what pleasant matters thine and the Pastor Nolan were talking. I marvel not at thy forgetfulness." My mind is changed. Give me back my letter, Sir! it was under a poor maiden's care, not a man's life. And what is that compared to a young lady's love?"

Lois heard but for an instant; did not understand that her cousin, in her jealous anger, could suspect the existence of such a feeling as love between her and Mr. Nolan. No imagination as to its possibility had entered into her mind; and the respected him, almost revered him—nay, had liked him as the probable husband of Faith. At the thought that her cousin could believe herself on such treachery her grave eyes dilated and fixed themselves on the angry countenance before them. That serious, unprotesting manner of perfect innocence must have told on her accuser, had it not been that at the same instant the unexpected sight of the crimsoned and disturbed countenance of the pastor, with the letter in his hand, met the unconscious scrut of his heart. Faith matched the letter out of his hands, and said,

"Let the wicked flee. What care I? She has done harm enough with her charms and her sorceries on Peter Lyon's pride. Let her look to it, and all other witches look to themselves; for there be many kinds of witchcraft abroad. Cousin Lois, then will like to keep company with Peter Lyon. I would pray thee to come back with me to breakfast."

Lois was not to be daunted by jealous sarcasm. She held out her hand to Pastor Nolan, determined he take to heart all her cousin's rude words. But he did lion herself in her accustomed manner. He hesitated before taking it, and when he did so it was with a convulsive squeeze that almost made her start. Faith waited and watched all with set lips and vengeful eyes. She bade no farewell when she spoke no word; but grasping Lois tightly by the back of the arm, she led her away with her before her down the street till they reached their house.

The arrangement for the morning was this. Grace Hickson and two Massachusetts girls to be present at the hanging of the first witch executed in Salem, in pious and godly hatred of a family. All the other members were strictly forbidden to stir out until such time as the low-lolling bell announced that all was over in that corner of Gallows the Indian witch. When the execution was ended, there was to be a solemn meeting of all the inhabitants of Salem; ministers had come from a distance to aid by the efficacy of their prayers in thess efforts to purge the land of the evil of witch servants. There was reason to think that the great old meeting-house would be crowded, and what Faith and Lois reached home, Grace Hickson was giving her directions to Prudence, urging her to be ready for an early start to that place. The splendid woman was troubled in her mind at the anticipation of the vulgar crowd that were many minutes were over, and spoke in a more hurried and incoherent manner than was her wont. She was dressed in her Sunday best; but her mind was in the gray and colorless, and she seemed afraid to cause speculation about household affairs for fear she should have time to think. Manasseh stood by her, perfectly, rigidly still; he also was in his Sunday clothes. His face, too, was paler than its wont, but it wore a kind of absent, rapt expression almost like that of a dreamer. Neither he nor Faith entered, still holding Lois in her fierce grasp, Manasseh started and smiled; but still dreamily. His manner was so peculiar, that no one mother stayed her talking to observe him more closely; he was in that state of excitement which usually ended in what his mother and certain of her friends esteemed a prophetic revelation. He began to speak, at first very low, and then his voice increased in power:

"How beautiful is the land of Beulah, for ever the sea, beyond the mountains! Thither the angels carry her, lying back in their arms like one fainting. They shall kiss away the black circle of death, and lay her down at the feet of the Lamb. I hear her pleading there for those on earth who consented to her death. Oh, Lois, pray also for me, pray for me, mine sick!"

When he uttered his cousin's name all their eyes turned toward her. It was to her that his vision related! She stood among them, amazed, awe-stricken, but not like one affrighted or dismayed. She was the first to speak.

"Dear friends, do not think of me; his words may or may not be true. I am in God's hands all the same, whether I have the gift of prophecy or not. Besides, hear you not that I cod where all would fain end. Think of him and of his needs. Such times as these always leave him exhausted and weary when he comes out of them."

And she busied herself in cares for his refreshment, aiding her aunt's trembling hands to set before him the requisite food, as he now sat tired and bewildered, gathering together with difficulty his scattered senses.

Breakfast and all she could to assist and speed their departure. But Faith stood apart, watching in silence with her passionate eyes.

As soon as they had gone on their solemn, fatal errand, Faith left the room. She had not tasted food or touched drink. Indeed, they all felt sick at heart. As soon as her sister had gone up stairs Prudence passed to the settle on which Lois had thrown down her cloak and hood.

"Lend me your muffles and mantle, Cousin Lois. I never yet saw a hanging, and I see not why I should not go. I will stand on the edge of the crowd; no one will know me, and I will be home long before my mother."

"No!" said Lois, "that may not be. My aunt would be much displeased. Remember, as you, Prudence, seeking to witness such a sight." And as she spoke she held her cloak back, which Prudence vehemently struggled for.

Faith returned, brought back possibly by the sound of the struggle. She smiled—a deadly smile.

"Give it up, Prudence. Strive no more with her. She has bought success in this world, and we are not her mates."

"Oh, Faith!" said Lois, relinquishing her hold of the cloak, and turning round with passionate reproach in her look and voice, "what have I done that you should speak so of me—you that I have loved as I think one loves a sister?"

Prudence saw her opportunity, but hastily arrayed herself in the mantle, which was too large for her, and which she, therefore, would probas well adapted for concealment; but as she went toward the door her foot became entangled in the unused length, and she fell, bringing her arm pretty sharply.

"Take care another time how you meddle with a witch's things," said Faith, as one scarcely believing her own words, but at enmity with all the world in her bitter heart. Prudence rubbed her arm and looked stealthily at Lois.

Which shall it be?" said Faith, and at last, softly, pulling a childish face of spite at her.

"Oh bush, Prudence!. Do not hastily such terrible words. Lois, dear Lois, forgive me. I am sorry for thy hurt, only glad that it has kept thee from witnessing such a sight."

"Away, away!" said Prudence, springing from her. "I am afraid of her in very truth, Faith. Keep between us and her, or I will leave a blood at her."

Faith smiled—it was a bad and wicked smile—but she did not stir to calm the fears she had called up in her young sister. Just at this moment the bell began to toll. Hets, the witch, was dead. Lois covered her face with her hands. Even Faith was a shade paler than she had been, and said, sighing, "Poor Hets! But death is best."

Prudence alone seemed unmoved by any thoughts connected with the solemn, monotonous sound. Her self-assumed courage had not given way, and she rose to the street and see the sight, and hear the news, and escape from the terror which she felt at the presence of her cousin. She flew up stairs to find her own mantle, ran down again, and past Lois, before the English girl had realized her pray-er, and was speedily mingled among the crowd going to the wresting-house. There, also, Faith and Lois came in due course of time, but separately, yet together. Faith to evidently avoided Lois that she, instinctively, could not force her company upon her cousin, but loitered a little behind, the quiet tears stealing down her face, shed for the unexpected sorrow that overtook her morning.

TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.

FRANKLIN.

The Polar cloud uplift—
A meteor shoots, no more—
And through the snowy drift,
We see them on the shore—

A band of gallant hearts,
Well-ordered, calm, and brave;
Braced for their closing parts—
Their long march to the grave.

Through the snow's dazzling blink,
Into the dark they're gone;
No pause: the weaker sink,
The strong can but strive on.

Till all the dreary way
In dotted with their dead;
And the sky fixes play
About each sleeping head.

Unharmed the wild deer run,
To graze along the strand;
Nor dread the loaded gun
Beside each sleeping hand.

The remnant that survive
Onward like drunkards reel;
Scarce writing if alive,
But for the pangs they feel.

The river of their hope
At length is flowing nigh—
Their snow-blind way they grope,
And reach its banks to die!

Thank God! brave FRANKLIN's place
Was empty in that band.
He closed his well-run race
Not on the iron strand.

Not under snow-clouds white,
By cutting frost-wind driven,
Did his true spirit flight
Its shuddering way to Heaven.

But warm, aboard his ship,
With comfort at his side,
And hope upon his lip,
The gallant FRANKLIN died.

His heart ne'er ached to see
His much-loved sailors ta'en;
His sailors' pangs were free
From their loved Captain's pain.

But though of death apart,
They are together now;
Calm, each enduring heart—
Bright, each devoted brow!

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER X.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE SHADOW.

"I, ALEXANDRE MANETTE, unfortunate physician, native of Beauvais and afterward resident in Paris, write this melancholy paper in my doleful cell in the Bastile, during the last month of the year 1767. Write it at solen intervals, under difficulty. I design to secrete it in the wall of the chimney, where I have newly and secretly made a place of concealment for it. Some pitying hand may find it there when I and my sorrows are dust.

"These words are formed in the rusty iron point with which I write with difficulty in scraps of such paper as I can procure. Overnight was mixed with blood, in the last month of the tenth year of my captivity. Hope has quite departed from my breast. I know from terrible warnings I have noted in myself that my reason will not long remain unimpaired; but I solemnly declare that I am at this time in the possession of my right mind—that my memory is exact and circumstantial—and that I write the truth as I shall answer for these, my last recorded words, whether they are read by men or not, at the Eternal Judgment-seat.

"One cloudy moonlight night, in the third week of December (I think the twenty-second of the month), in the year 1757, I was walking on a retired part of the quay by the Seine for the refreshment of the frosty air, at an hour's distance from my place of residence in the Street of the Cross Roads. Formerly, when a carriage came along behind me, driven very fast. As I stood aside to let that carriage pass, apprehensive that it might otherwise run me down, a head was put out at the window, and a voice called to the driver to stop.

"The carriage stopped as soon as the driver could rein in his horses, and the same voice called to me by my name. I answered. The carriage was then so far in advance of me that two gentlemen had time to open the door and alight before I came up with it. I observed that they were both wrapped in cloaks, and appeared to conceal themselves. As they stood side by side near the carriage-door, I also observed that they both looked at me with keen eyes, or rather younger, and that they were greatly alike, in stature, manner, voice, and (as far as I could see) free too.

"'You are Doctor Manette?' said one.

"'I am.'

"'Doctor Manette, formerly of Beauvais,' said the other; 'the young physician, originally an expert surgeon, who, within the last year or two has made a rising reputation in Paris?'

"'Gentlemen,' I returned, 'I am Doctor Manette of whom you speak so graciously.'

"'We have been to your residence,' said the first, 'and not being so fortunate as to find you there, and being informed that you were probably walking in this direction, we followed, in the hope of overtaking you. Will you please to enter the carriage?'

"The manner of both was imperious, and they both moved, as these words were spoken, so as to place themselves between me and the carriage-door. They were armed. I was not.

"'Gentlemen,' said I, 'pardon me; but I usually inquire who does me the honor to seek my assistance, and what is the nature of the case to which I am summoned.'

"The reply to this was made by him who had spoken second. 'Doctor, your clients are people of condition. As to the nature of the case, our confidence in your skill assures us that you will ascertain it for yourself better than we can describe it. Enough. Will you please to enter the carriage?'

"I could do nothing but comply, and I entered it readily. They both entered after me—the last springing in after putting up the steps. The carriage turned about and drove on at its former speed.

"I repeat this conversation exactly as it occurred. I have no doubt that it is, word for word, the same. I describe every thing exactly as it took place, constraining my mind not to wander from the task. Where I make the broken marks that follow here, I leave off for the time, and put my paper in its hiding-place.

"The carriage left the streets behind, passed the North Barrier, and emerged upon the country road. At two hundred yards from the North Barrier—I did not estimate the distance at that time, but afterward carefully—the carriage stopped at the outer of the main avenue, and presently stopped at a solitary house. We three alighted, and walked, by a dump soft foot-path in a garden where a neglected fountain had overflowed, to the door of the house. It was not opened immediately, in answer to the ringing of the bell, and one of my two conductors struck the man who opened it with his heavy riding-glove across the face.

"There was nothing in this action to attract my particular attention, for I had seen common people strike more commonly than dogs. But the other of the two, exclaiming in French, struck the man in like manner with his arm, the look and bearing of the brother were then so exactly alike that I then first perceived them to be twin brothers.

"From the time of our alighting at the outer gate (which we found locked, and which one of the brothers had opened to admit us, and had relocked) I had heard cries proceeding from an upper chamber. I was conducted to this chamber straight, by the nearer cries growing louder as we ended the stairs, and I found a patient in a high fever of the brain, lying on a bed.

"The patient was a woman of great beauty, and young; assuredly not much past twenty. Her hair was torn and dishevelled, and her arms were bound to her sides with sashes and handkerchiefs. A mantle was bound round her upper portions of a gentleman's dress. On one of them, which was a fringed scarf for a dress of ceremony, I saw the arms embroidered in the back, and the letter E.

"I saw all this within the first minute of my contemplation of the patient; for in her restless strivings she had turned over on her face on the edge of the bed, had drawn the end of the scarf into her mouth, and was in danger of suffocation. I put out my hand to stay her, and with her head to relieve her breathing, and in moving the scarf aside the embroidery in the corner caught my sight.

"I turned her gently over, placed my hand upon her forehead to calm her, and looked over, and looked into her face. Her eyes were dilated and wild, and she constantly uttered piercing shrieks, and repeatedly cried out, 'My husband, my father, and my brother!' and then counted up to twelve, and said, 'Hush!' For an instant, and no more, she would pause to listen, and then the piercing shrieks would begin again, and she would count up to twelve, and say, 'Hush! my father, and my brother!' and would count up to twelve, and say, 'Hush!' There was no variation in the order or the manner. There was no cessation, but the regular moment's pause, in the utterances of these words.

"'How long,' I asked, 'has this lasted?'

"To distinguish the brothers, I will call them the elder and the younger; by the elder, I mean him who exercised the most authority. It was the elder who answered: 'Since early last night.'

"'She has a husband, a father, and a brother?'

"'A brother.'

"'I do not address her brother?'

"He answered with great contempt, 'No.'

"'She has some recent association with the number twelve?'

"The younger brother impatiently rejoined, 'With twelve o'clock.'

"'See, gentlemen,' said I, still keeping my hands upon her breast, 'how useless I am, as you have brought me! If I had known what I was coming to see, I could have come provided. As it is, time must be lost. There are no medicines to be obtained in this lonely place.'

"The elder brother looked to the younger, who said haughtily, 'There is a case of medicines here;' and brought it from a closet, and put it on the table.

"I opened some of the bottles, smelled them, and put the stoppers to my lips. If I had wanted to use my thing save narcotic medicines that were poisons in themselves, I would not have administered any of them.

"'Do you doubt them?' asked the younger brother.

"'You see, monsieur, I am going to use them,' I replied, and said no more.

"I made the patient swallow, with great difficulty, and after many efforts, the dose that I desired to give. As I intended to repeat it after a while, and as it was necessary to watch its influence, I then sat down by the side of the bed. There was a timid and delicate woman in attendance (wife of the man down stairs), who had retreated into a corner. The house was damp and decayed, indifferently furnished—evidently recently occupied and temporarily used. Some thick old hangings had been nailed up before the windows to deaden the sound of the shrieks. They continued to be uttered in their regular succession, with the cry, 'My husband, my father, and my brother!' the counting up to twelve, and 'Hush!' The frenzy was so violent that I had not unfastened the bandages restraining the arms; but I had looked to them to see that they were not painful. The only spark of encouragement in the case was that my hand upon the left-hand side of her breast did more soothing influence that for minutes at a time it tranquilized the figure. It had no effect upon the cries; no pendulum could be more regular.

"For the reason that my hand had this effect I assume, I had sat by the side of the bed for half an hour, with the two brothers looking on, before the elder said:

"'There is another patient.'

"I was startled, and asked, 'Is it a pressing case?'

"'You had better see,' he carelessly answered; and took up a light. . . .

"The other patient lay in a back room across a second staircase which was a species of loft over a stable. There was a low garret-like passing to a part of it; the rest was open, to the ridge of the tiled roof, and there were beams across. Hay and straw were stored in that portion of the place, fagots for firing, and a heap of apples in mid. I had to pass through that part to get at the other. My memory is circumstantial and unshaken. I try it with these details, and I see them all, in this my cell in the Bastile, near the close of the tenth year of my captivity, as I saw them all that night.

"On some hay on the ground, with a cushion thrown under his head, lay a handsome peasant boy—a boy of not more than seventeen at the most. He lay on his back, with his teeth set, his right hand clenched on his breast, and his fingers grim looking straight upward. I could not see where his wound was as I kneeled on one knee over him; but I knew that he was dying of,a wound from a sharp point.

"'I am a doctor, my poor fellow,' said I. 'Let me examine it.'

"'I do not want it examined,' he answered; 'let it be.'

"It was under his hand, and I soothed him to let me move his hand away. It was a sword-thrust, received from twenty to twenty-four hours before, but no skill could have saved him if it had been looked to without delay. He was then dying fast. As I turned my eyes to the elder brother, I saw him looking down at this handsome boy whom I was ebbing out, as if he were a wounded bird, or hare, or rabbit; not at all as if he were a fellow-creature.

"'How has this been done, monsieur?' said I.

"'A cruel young coumon dog!' he said. Forced my brother to draw upon him, and has fallen by my brother's sword—like a gentleman.'

"There was no touch of pity, sorrow, or kindred humanity in this answer. The speaker seemed to acknowledge that it was barely possible to have had different feelier of creature dying there, and that it would have been better if he had died in the usual obscure manner of his fellowmin kind. He was quite incapable of any compassionate feeling about the boy, or about his fate.

"The boy's eyes had slowly moved to him as he had spoken, and slowly moved to me.

"'Doctor, they are very proud, these Nobles; but we common dogs are proud too, sometimes. They plunder us, outrage us, beat us, kill us; but we have a little pride left, sometimes. She— Have you seen her?

"The shrieks and the cries were audible there, though subdued by the distance. He referred to them, as if she were lying in our presence

"I said, 'I have seen her.'

"'She is my sister, Doctor. They have had their shameful rights, these Nobles, in the modesty and virtue of our sisters, many years, but we have had good girls also. I say, I know it, and have heard my father say so. She was a good girl. She was betrothed to a good young man, too—a tenant of his. We were all tenants of his—that man's who stands there. The other is his brother, the worst of a bad race.

"It was with the greatest difficulty that the boy gathered bodily force to speak; but his spirit spoke with a dreadful emphasis.

"'We were so robbed by that man who stands there, as all we common dogs are by those superior Beings—taxed by him without mercy, obliged to work for him without pay, obliged to grind our corn at his mill, obliged to feed scores of his tame birds on our wretched crops, and forbidden for our lives to keep a single tame bird of our own, pillaged and plundered to that degree that when we chanced to have a bit of meat we ate it in fear, with the door barred and the shutters closed, that his people should not see it and take it from us—I say, we were so robbed and hunted, and were made so poor, that our father told us that it was a dreadful thing to bring a child into the world, and that what we should most pray for was, that our women might be barren and our miserable race die out!'

"I had never before seen the sense of being oppressed bursting forth like a fire. I had supposed that it must burn in the people somewhere; but I had never seen it break out until I saw it in the dying boy.

"'Nevertheless, Doctor, my sister married. He was ailing at that time, poor fellow, and she married him, because she might tend and care for him in our cottage—our dog-hut, as that man would call it. She had not been married many weeks when this man's brother saw her and admired her, and asked that man to lend her to him—as if my husband among us!—as if He was willing enough, but my sister was good and virtuous and knew her duty to her husband as strong as mine. What did the two then, to persuade her husband to use his influence with her to make her willing?'

"The boy's eyes, which had been fixed on mine, shot with a fearful look under-on, and I put in the two faces that all he said was true. The two opposing kinds of pride confronting one another I can see even in this Bastile; the proud tleman's, all neglectful indifference; the peasant's, pride—shown sentiment and passionate revenge.

"'You know, Doctor, that it is among the Rights of Nobility that these superior beings shall dogs to carts, and drive us. They so harnessed my brother, and forced him to drag them, because their Rights to keep us in their grounds all night, quieting the frogs, in order that their noble sleep might not be disturbed. He was down out in the unwholesome mists at night, and ordered back sharply to his work—and he died. But he was not persuaded. No! Taken out of harness one day at noon to feed—if he could find food—and wandering home with his sick head, he fell at my stroke of the bell, and died on her bosom.'

"Nothing could be added to this in the way but his determination to tell all his wrong. He forced back the gathering shadows of death, that he might tell it strongly. His breath came heavily, and to cover his wound.

"Then, with a last supreme effort, and even with his sid, his brother took her away; in spite of what I know she must have told his brother and what must have wished to do herself before she was, Doctor, if it is now—his brother took her away. I saw her pass me on the road. While the elder brother was busy opening the door, I saw her pass me on the road. When I took the tidings home our father's heart burst; he never prayed to be forgiven that filled it. I took my young sister (for I have another) to my heart, and on my knees in this man, and where, at least, she will never be his vassal. Then I tracked the brother here, and last night I came and asked assistance. My sword in Hind—Where is the loft window? It was somewhere here.'

"The room was darkening to his sight; the world was narrowing around him. I glanced about me, and saw that the hay and straw were trampled over the floor, as if there had been a struggle.

"She heard me and ran in. I told her not to come near us till he was dead. He came in and first made a mocking salute with his sword, and struck at me with a whip. But I, though a contemplative man, was forced at last to make him draw. Let him break into as many pieces as he will the sword that he stained with my common blood; he drew to defend his brother. Identify me with all his skill for his life.'

"My glance had fallen but a few moments before on the fragments of a broken sword, lying among the hay. That weapon was a gentleman's. Its another place lay as it had fallen that seemed to have been a soldier's.

"'Now lift me up, Doctor; lift me up. Where is he?'

"'He is not here,' I said, supporting the boy, and thinking that he referred to the brother.

"'He! Proud as these nobles are, he is afraid to see me. Where is the man who was here? Turn nay face to him.

"I did so, raising the boy's head against my knee. But invested for the moment with extraordinary power, he raised himself completely: obliging me to rise too, or I could not have still supported him.

"'Marquis,' said the boy, turned to him with his eyes opened wide and his right hand raised, 'in the days when all these things are to be answered for, I summon you, and yours to the last of your bad race, to answer for them. I mark this cross of blood upon you, as a sign that I do it. In the days when all these things are to be answered for, I summon your brother, the worst of the bad race, to answer for them separately. I mark this cross of blood upon him, as a sign that I do it!'

"I drew he put his hand to the wound in his breast, and with his forefinger drew a cross in the air. He rose for an instant with the fingers yet raised, and, as it dropped, he dropped with it, and I laid him down dead.

"When I returned to the bedside of the young woman I found her raving in precisely the same order and continuity. I knew that this might last for many hours, and that it would probably end in the silence of the grave.

"I repeated the medicines I had given her, and I sat at the side of the bed until the night was far advanced. She never abated the piercing quality of her shrieks, never stumbled in the distinctness or the order of her words. They were always, 'My husband, my father, and my brother!' One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve. Hush!

"This lasted twenty-six hours from the time when I first saw her. I had come and gone twice, and was again sitting by her, when she began to falter. I did what little could be done to assist that opportunity, and lay-and-by she sank into a lethargy, and lay like the dead.

"It was as if the wind and rain had lulled at last, after a long and fearful storm. I released her arms, and called the women to assist me to compose her figure and the dress as had torn. It was then that I know her condition to be that of one in whom the first expectations of being a mother have arisen; and it was then that I lost the little hope I had had of her.

"'Is she dead?' asked the Marquis, whom I will still describe as the elder brother, coming hastier into the room from his horse.

"'Not dead,' said I; 'but like to die.'

"'What complaint, there is in these common bodies!' he said, looking down at her with some curiosity.

"'There is prodigious strength,' I answered him, 'in sorrow and despair.'

"He had ridden out at my words, and then frowned at them. He moved a chair with his foot near to mine, ordered the woman away, and said, in a subdued voice:

"'Doctor, finding my brother in this difficulty with these hinds, I recommended that your aid should be invited. Your reputation is high, and, as a young man with your fortune to make, you can probably mindful of your interest. The things that you see here are things to be seen and not spoken of.'

"I listened to the patient's breathing, and avoided answering.

"'You do honor me with your attention, Doctor?'

"'Monsieur,' said I, 'in my profession the communications of patients are always received in confidence.' I was guarded in my answer, for I was troubled in my mind by what I had heard and seen.

"Her fainting was so difficult to trace that I carefully tried the pulse and the heart. There was life, and no more. Looking round as I reported my state, I could both the gentlemen upon me. . . . .

"I write with so much difficulty, the cold is so severe, I am so fearful of being detected and consigned to an under-ground cell and total darkness, that I must leave much untold. There is no confusion or holes in my memory: it can recall, and could detail, every word that was ever spoken between me and those brothers.

"She lingered for a week. Toward the last I could understand some few syllables that she said to me by placing my ear close to her lips. Her mind was where she was, and I told her; who I was, and I told her. It was in vain that I asked her for her family name. She died on the seventh night, the patient, and kept her secret, as the boy had done.

"I had no opportunity of asking her any question until I had told the brothers she was sinking fast, and could not live another day. Until then, though no one was ever presented to her consciousness save the woman and myself, one or other of them had always jealously sat behind the curtain at the head of the bed when I was there. But when it came to that, they seemed careless what communication I might hold with her; as if—the thought passed through my mind—I were dying too.

"I always observed that their pride bitterly resented the younger brother's (as I call him) having considered me with a peasant, and that peasant a boy. The only consideration that appeared really to affect the mind of either of them was the consideration that this was highly degrading to the family, and was ridiculous

As often as I caught the younger brother's eyes their expression reminded me that he disliked me deeply for knowing what I knew from the boy. He was smoother and more polite to me than the elder; but I saw this. I also saw that I was an encumbrance in the mind of the elder too.

"My patient died two hours before midnight—at a time, by my watch, answering almost to the minute when I had first seen her. I was alone with her when her forlorn young head drooped gently on one side, and all her earthly troubles were forever ended.

"The brothers were waiting in a room down stairs, impatient to ride away. I had heard them, alone at the bedside, striking their boots with their riding-whips, and loitering up and down.

"'At last she is dead?' said the elder, when I went in.

"'She is dead,' said I.

"'I congratulate you, my brother,' were his words as he turned round.

"He had before offered me money, which I had postponed taking. He now gave me a rouleau of gold. I took it from his hand, but laid it on the table. I had considered the question, and had resolved to accept nothing.

"'Pray excuse me,' said I. 'Under the circumstances, no.'

"They exchanged looks, but bent their heads to me as I bent mine to them, and we parted without another word on either side. . . . .

"I am weary, weary, weary—worn down by misery. I can not read what I have written with this grand hand.

"Early in the morning the rouleau of gold was left at my door in a little box, with a name on the outside. From the first I had anxiously considered what I ought to do. I decided that I ought to write privately to the Minister, stating the nature of the two cases to which I had been summoned, and the place to which I had gone: in effect, stating all the circumstances. I knew what Court influence was, and what the immunities of the Nobles were, and I expected that the matter would never be heard of; but I wished to relieve my own mind. I had kept the matter a profound secret even from my wife; and this, too, I resolved to state in my letter. I had no apprehension whatever of my real danger; but I was conscious that there might be danger for others, if others were compromised by possessing the knowledge that I possessed.

"I was much engaged that day, and could not complete my letter that night. I rose long before my usual time next morning to finish it. It was the last day of the year. The letter was lying before me just completed when I was told that a lady waited, who wished to see me. . . . .

"I am growing more and more unequal to the task I have set myself. It is so cold, so dark, my senses are so benumbed, and the gloom upon me is so dreadful.

"The lady was young, engaging, and handsome, but not marked for long life. She was in great agitation. She presented herself to me as the wife of the Marquis St. Evremonde. I connected the title by which she had her address of the elder brother, with the initial letter embroidered on the scarf, and had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that I had seen that noblemen very lately.

"My memory is still accurate, but I can not recite the words of our conversation. I suspect that I am watched more closely than I was, and am more on my guard than I may be watched. She had in part suspected, and in part discovered, the main facts of the cruel story of her husband's share in it, and my being resorted to. She did not know that the girl was dead. Her hope had been, she said, in great distress, to show her, in secret, a woman's sympathy. Her hope had been to avert the wrath of Heaven from a House that had long been hateful to the suffering many.

"'I MARK THIS CROSS OF BLOOD UPON HIM, AS A SIGN THAT I DO IT.'"

"She had reasons for believing that there was a young sister living, and her greatest desire was to help that sister. I could tell her nothing but that there was such a sister; beyond that, I knew nothing. Her inducement to come to me, relying on my confidence, had been the hope that I could tell her the name and place of abode. Whereas to this wretched hour I am ignorant of both. . . . .

"These scraps of paper full me. One was taken from me, with a warning, yesterday. I must finish my record to-day.

"She was a good, compassionate lady, and not happy in her marriage. How could she be! The brother inherited and disliked her, and his influence was all opposed to her; she stood in dread of him, and in dread of her husband too. When I handed her down to the door, there was a child, a pretty boy from two to three years old, in her carriage.

"'For his sake, Doctor,' she said, pointing to him in tears, 'I will do all I can to make what poor amends I can. He will never prosper in his inheritance otherwise. I have a presentiment that if my other innocent children are to made for this, it will one day be required of him. What I have left or call my own—it is little beyond the worth of a few jewels—I will make it the first charge of his life to restore, with the compassion and lamenting of his dead mother, on this injured family, if the sister can be discovered.'

"She kissed the boy, and said, caressing him, 'It is for thine own dear sake. Thou will be faithful, little Charles!' The child answered her bravely, 'Yes!' I kissed her hand, and she took him in her arms, and went away caressing him. I never saw her more.

"As she had mentioned her husband's name in the faith that I knew it, I added no mention of it to my letter. I sealed my letter, and, not trusting it out of my own hands, delivered it myself that day.

"That night, the last night of the year, to avoid new clients, I went in a sedan chair, hired at my gate, demanded to see me, and softly followed my servant, Ernest Defarge, a youth, up stairs. When my servant came into the room where I sat with my wife—oh my wife, beloved of my heart! My young husband looked over me saw the man, who was supposed to be at the gate, standing silent behind him.

"An urgent case for the Baron St. Honoré, he said. It would not detain me; he had a coach in waiting.

"It brought me here, it brought me to my grave. When I was clear of the house a black muffler was drawn tightly over my mouth from behind, and my arms were pinioned. The two brothers crossed the road from the hiding-place, and identified me with a single gesture. The Marquis took from his pocket the letter I had written, showed it to them, burned it in the light of a lantern that was held, and extinguished the ashes with his foot. Not a word was spoken. I was brought here, I was brought to my living grave.

"If it had pleased Gon to put it in the hard heart of either of the brothers, in all these frightful years, to grant me some token of my dearest wife—so much as to let me know by a word whether alive or dead—I might have thought that He had not quite abandoned them. But now I believe that the mark of the red cross is fatal to them, and that they are reserved for His mercies. And them and their descendants, to the last of their race, I, Alexandre Manette, unhappy prisoner, do this last night of the year 1767, in my unbearable agony, denounce to the times when all these things shall be changed, for. I denounce them to Heaven and to earth."

A terrible sound arose when the reading of this document was done. A sound of craving and eagerness that had nothing articulate in it but blood. The narrative called up the most revengeful passions of the time, and there was not a head in the market but must have perished before it.

Little recd, in presence of that tribunal and that auditory, to show how the Defarges had not made the paper public, with the other captured Bastile memorials, long ago and treasured and had kept it, hiding their time. Little need to show that this detested family name had long been anathematized by Saint Antoine, and was wrought into the fatal register. The man never trod ground whose visible surface was moved have sustained him in that place that day, against such denunciation.

And all the worse for the doomed man that the denouncer was a well-known citizen, his own attached friend, the father of his love. One of the frenzied agitations of the populace was for instantly tearing him to pieces and making mince of mutilation, and for sacrifices and self-immolations on the people's altar. Therefore, when the President and (less) and his own head quivered on his shoulders), that the good physician of the Republic would deserve better still of the Republic by rooting out an obnoxious family of Aristocrats, and would doubtless feel a sacred glow and joy in making his daughter a widow and her child an orphan, there was wild excitement, patriotic fervor, not a touch of human sympathy.

"Medo influence around him has that doc-?" murmured Madame Defarge, smiling to The Vengeance. "Save him now, my doctor, save him!"

At every juryman's vote there was a roar. Another and another. Roar and roar.

Unanimously voted. At heart and by descent an Aristocrat, an enemy of the Republic, a notorious oppressor of the People. Back to the Conciergerie, and Death within four-and-twenty hours!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.

FROM REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER, N. Y.—"Brown's Bronchial Troches."—"It is five years since that I accidentally entered your store for some sort of a preparation for Bronchial affections. Whether I got just what I desired, I cannot now remember; but I got something, and since then I have used it on all my lecturing tours; I find it prompt-ing as regularly as I do lectures or linen, and I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, except to think yet better of that which I began in thinking well of."

To Housekeepers.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which are used in the manufacture of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

We take pleasure in directing the attention of our numerous friends to the advertisement in our columns, of Rands' Sarsaparilla, which may be used as occasion requires, with benefit to every one. A remedy which claims to have performed so many well authenticated cures, deserves a fair trial.—N. Y. Mercury.

The Vital Principle is restored to decayed hair, and it grows luxuriantly prior to the sesip, by the use of JULIA HAYES'S LAY ASCENDANT HAIR RESTORER, thus preventing baldness. It exists therefore in age or sickness. It renews its growth, restoring gray hairs and whiskers to their original color, and leaves the hair in not a dye. Sold by all Druggists. JULIA HAYES, No. 50 CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia.

Swiss Corn-plaster and Bunion Balm effect a certain cure. Wholesale and Retail at E. DUPUY RUNNEWELL & CO., Commercial Wharf, Boston. GEO. HUNNEWELL, 16 Water Street, New York. Also for sale by the trade throughout the country, in every city.

J. L. HUNNEWELL, Pharmaceutist, Superintendent.

SANDFORD'S HOT-AIR FURNACES.

PORTABLE OR SET IN BRICK.
THOUSANDS NOW IN USE. GIVE SATISFACTION.
SANDFORD'S RANGES FOR FAMILY USE.
SANDFORD'S MAMMOTH OR GLOBE HEATER,
A favorite with Churches and Public Halls.
SEND FOR A BOOK.
SANDFORD, NICHOLS, WHEELOW & CO.,
No. 239 Water Street.

The Virginians.
A Tale of the last Century.
By W. M. THACKERAY,
AUTHOR OF
"The Newcomes," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis,"
"Henry Esmond," "The Great Hoggarty Diamond," "Lectures on the English Humorists," &c. &c.

With Illustrations by the Author.
8vo, Paper, $1 00. Cloth, $1 50.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, so pay expenses till received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. SIX LECTURES on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin Diseases: Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the merits of Preserving Health to 100 years. 415 pages, 26 Engravings. Price, in paper cover, in advance of 25 shillings.

2nd. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Liver, Kidneys, Bowels, and Nervous System. Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what to do to prevent it. 300 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county town and post office.

361 BROADWAY 539
BRIDAL SETTIN,
Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items,
Are all reliable.

Deafness Cured, however caused, by a new method. Address DR. MARSH, Jersey, personally or by letter, at No. 974 Broadway, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
FOR THE CURE OF ALL DISEASES
ARISING FROM
AN IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD.

In this purely vegetable preparation, the properties of an Antiseptic, a mild Cathartic, and a Tonic Medicine are combined. It effectually removes from the blood the impurities of unhealthy secretions, which engender and develop disease, and is striking at the root of disease.

Prepared and sold by A. E & G. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES. Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 300 edition, over 400 pages, Illus. cloth, and above 100 Electrotype Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York City. Containing interesting facts should be in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have need for, in order to a happy future. Sold by R. D. LAWRENCE, No. 3 Vesey Street, Astor House.

Willcox & Gibbs SEWING MACHINE.

"We have in this a practical demonstration that a Machine in every respect superior and pre-eminently adapted to FAMILY USE, may be had at a reasonable cost."

PRICE $30.

Manufactured and sold, Wholesale and Retail, by
JAMES WILLCOX,
No. 886 Broadway,
Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

Old Sachem Bitters & Wigwam Tonic.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 145 Water Street.
For Sale Storekeepers.

READ!!!

Premium
OF THE
New York State Fair
AWARDED TO
Hostetter's Celebrated Stomach Bitters.

Another Proof of its Excellence!!!
Another Prize for its Goodness!!!
Another Assurance of its Fame!!!

It has taken the Premium at

Every State Fair ever held in the

United States

Where it has been exhibited.

All we ask is a fair and impartial trial, and we guarantee satisfaction!

Sold by all Druggists throughout the World.

Principal Depot 13 and 15 Park Row, New York.

Sole Manufacturers and Proprietors

HOSTETTER & SMITH,
Pittsburg, Pa.

See that the name of the Manufacturers is on every bottle!!!

Lester's Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines
AND
Woodworth's Planing Machines.
Office 453 Broadway. J. M. LESTER.

PIANO FORTES.
RAVEN, BACON & CO.,
Piano Fortes Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 135 Grand Street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments may be found, exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

MUSICAL BOXES.
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 15, 24, and 36 tunes.
PALILLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical boxes repaired. 91 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND ADAPTABILITY TO WEARING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.

600 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
920 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
80 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

Singer's Sewing Machines.
SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUZES REDUCED TO $4.
Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $70 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.
Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, FARKER & MOWER,
Wine and Spirit Merchants,
15 Beckman Street, New York.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our late importation of Coral and Garnet Jewelry, consisting of bracelets, brooches, ear-rings, necklaces, charms, bab-pins, combs, buckles, clasps, &c.
OSBORNE, BOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
No. 807 Broadway, corner of Spring Street.

☞ THE HEROISM AND THE LOVE OF THE PIONEER.

JUST OUT.
A New Work,
By
EMERSON BENNETT,
The Matchless Describer of Life in the Backwoods.

Wild Scenes on the Frontiers;
OR,
Heroes of the West.
THE CAUSE! THE EFFECT! THE FIGHT! THE CHASE! THE WATCH! THE WILD ATTACK! THE FEARFUL REVENGE!!!
This work will be found to compare with any that has yet emanated from the pen of its distinguished and popular author.
Splendidly illustrated by the best Artists, and handsomely bound. 12mo, cloth, $1 25. Single copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.
N.B.—AGENTS WANTED IN ALL THE STATES AND THE CANADAS, TO WHOM A LIBERAL PERCENTAGE WILL BE ALLOWED.
HAMELIN & CO., Publishers,
No. 606 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

32. HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN. 32.
Previous notices and testimonials have established the fact that THE GRAEFENBERG COMPANY'S MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON is the only reliable cure for those distressing and painful forms of weakness, from the age of 15 upward, miserable to an extent which few but the victims can realize. Explicit directions and simple and safe remedies for self-treatment, during, or condition in life, affords any guaranty against them. Besides the above symptoms, they are often attended with
Deranged Monthly Periods—
Irregularities—Weakness—Fairness—
Dumbness—Appetite—Indigestion—
Pain in the Back and Kidneys—Chills—
Cold Hands and Feet—Blushings—Tremblings—
Neuralgia—Palpitation of the Heart—
Dizziness—Numbness and Pain in the Limbs—
Disturbed Sleep—Flushes of Heat—General Pulse—
Crawling and Pain in the Spine and bones of the Head—
Shooting Pains—Nervousness—Indigestion—
Difficult passing of Water—Frequent Desire—
Unnatural Discharges—Prolapsus of the Uterus Organs—Nightmare—
Despair—Hysterics—Weeping—Bad Face—Nervous Twitchings—
Startling—Constipation—
Irritable Temper—Sadness—Depraved Appetite—
Flashes—Blotches—Heated Irregular Breathing—
Unpleasant Dreams—Pains in the Uterine Organs—
Sensations as if Insects Crawled in the Limbs—
Loss of Memory—Bewilderment—Soreness in the Feet—
Pain in the Back.
THE GRAEFENBERG MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON is prepared by an experienced physician, and may be fully depended upon. All other preparations are base counterfeits.
Letters and testimonials from the most distinguished ministers of distinction can be seen at the rooms of the Graefenberg Co., No. 25 Park Row, New York. Advice gratis. Any reference to persons in the City will also be given at the same place.
Price, $1 50 per bottle; for bottles for $6. It can be safely sent by mail. Address AGENTS GRAEFENBERG COMPANY, No. 25 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.
☞ If an extended opinion is required by letter, $1 must be inclosed to ensure reply.
☞ The principles and practice of medicine adopted by the Medical Staff of the Graefenberg Company, are fully explained in the Graefenberg Manual of Health, a Book of 100 pages, sent free by mail. Family Use, and elegantly embellished with colored engravings of the human system. Price 25 CENTS—to be exempt of which it is mailed in any part of the country.

THE SUPERIOR
Brought boldest delicate Mountain
COFFEE.
For sale by
CORTHELL & CO
5 Dover
Street.

Café de Costa Rica
C&C

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS.
HARNDEN'S EXPRESS
LEAVES DAILY
TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,
AT 4 P. M.
FOR SAVANNAH,
Thence, by Georgia Central Railroad, to
MACON, MEMPHIS, ATLANTA,
AUGUSTA, APALACHICOLA, MONTGOMERY,
NASHVILLE, COLUMBUS, MONTGOMERY,
NEW ORLEANS,
And all Towns in the interior of
Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.
Every description of valuable freight at Low rates, and delivered with promptness and despatch.
For further particulars apply at the office of HARDEN'S EXPRESS, 74 Broadway.

oilet Vinegar
is for superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. Rimmel,
Perfumer, London and Paris.

EVERETT HOUSE,
HAWLEY D. CLAFF, PROPRIETOR,
NORTH SIDE UNION SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

Rosaline's Parting Conjectures.

BY NAPOLEON B. QUIGGS.

True, we may meet again; but, oh!
Must net as once we parted?
From one sad hour will I know
Life's first bloom hath departed;
Perchance thou, too, will change: Old Time
Is ruthless in courage;
And still, through all love's summer's prime,
From flower to flower he ranges!

My halir, which now is silkiest brown,
May then with gray be sprinkled;
My lips no more smile laugh
Which once as silver tinkled;
And then—oh, agony to think,
The thought my bosom smothers!
May not be dressed as now you are,
In a Fall Suit of Satin Dorcmis!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

5000 Agents Wanted. For particulars, send stamp to Box 65, Saratoga, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Have just Ready:

A GOOD FIGHT, and Other Tales. By Charles Reade, Author of "Love me Little, Love me Long," and "Never too Late." A Good Fight.—II. "Jack of all Trades."—III. "A Hero and a Martyr."—IV. A Terrible Temptation. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; or Paper, 50 cents.

SWORD AND GOWN. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WOMEN ARTISTS IN ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES. By Mrs. Ellet, Author of "Women of the American Revolution," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HARRY LEE; or, Hops for the Poor. With Illustrations. 18mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE. By the Author of "John Halifax," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," &c., &c. Cheap Edition, 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. The Library Edition uniform with the Library Edition of "John Halifax"), 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S HUME. A History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Revolution in 1688. By David Hume. Abridged. Incorporating the Researches of recent Historians, and continued down to the Year 1858. Illustrated by numerous Engravings on Wood. Uniform with Smith's "History of Greece," "Liddell's "History of Rome," and "The Student's Gibbon." Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HENRY ST. JOHN, Gentleman, of Flower of Hundreds, in the County of Prince George, in Virginia. A Tale of 1774, '75. By Jane Entee Cooper, Author of "Leather Stocking and Silk," "The Virginia Comedians," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MY THIRD BOOK. A Collection of Tales. By Lucy Gaeland Charlotte Maria. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

GERALD FITZGERALD, "The Chevalier." A Novel. By Charles Lever, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," "The Daltons," "Sir Jasper Carew," "Maurice Tiernay," &c. Complete in One Vol., Paper, 50 cents.

LIFE AND LIBERTY IN AMERICA; or, Sketches of a Tour in the United States and Canada in 1857-58. By Charles Macnay, L.L.B., F.S.A. With Ten Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE LIFE OF JABEZ BUNTING, D.D., with Notices of Contemporary Persons and Events, By his Son, Thomas Percival Bunting. Vol. I., with a Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

AMERICAN WIT AND HUMOR. Illustrated by J. Mcknight. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WALTER THORNLEY; or, a Peep at the Past. By the Author of "Allen Prescott" and "Adela" (Mrs. Sherwood). 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE COMPLETION OF
MISS STRICKLAND'S QUEENS OF SCOTLAND.
Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses connected with the Royal Succession of Great Britain. By Agnes Strickland. Vol. VII, completing the Work. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Sets in Muslin, $8 00; Half Calf, $14 60.

ABBOTT'S FRENCH REVOLUTION. The French Revolution of 1789, as viewed in the light of Republican Institutions. By John S. C. Abbott, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "Napoleon at St. Helena," &c. With numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE exciting FRAGRANCE OF THE WOOD VIOLET, as the leading Perfumes in Paris and London.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER has imparted a delicious rosy hue to the skin, and rendered it soft and beautiful
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

FOOTSTEPS OF
SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.
Just Published,
The
SEA OF ICE;
OR,
THE ARCTIC REGIONS.
Beautifully Illustrated. 1 Vol, 16mo. Price 75 cents.
"A thrilling narrative of the adventures of a young Englishman in the Frozen Regions, where his countryman, Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, Lost His Life."
MAYHEW & BAKER, Publishers,
Corner of Beekman and Nassau Sts.,
H. DEXTER & CO., Washington St., Boston,
113 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.
Certain Cure.
HEGEMAN & CO.'S Camphor Ice with Glycerine.

Cheap, safe, and agreeable. Only 25 cents.

HEGEMAN & CO., Druggists and Chemists, 104 and 106 Broadway.
N.B.—Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.

New Volume—New Story.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED is an ELEGANT quarto of sixteen pages—a little larger than the Illustrated London News—a perfect model of excellence in literature, amusement, and art, in struggling with the second and sensible of five papers. Men like it, women love it, children dote on it. Only $2 a year. Specimen copies sent free. Now is the time to subscribe, and the rest of the fokks can't keep house without LIFE ILLUSTRATED.

The new volume of LIFE ILLUSTRATED, commencing October 29, will contain a story from the pen of one of the best American writers, entitled

THE SPIRITUALIST'S WOOING:
A Tale of New England,
which we have no hesitation in persuading our readers will be one of the best stories ever written for newspaper columns; and it will undoubtedly be at least the widest-circulated and far-famed History of the Minister's Wooing, that of the Schoolmistress of Litchfield, and of Public and Private Education. FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and curing the most distressing, painful, and long-standing cases of Cough, Colds, Influenza, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Croup, Asthma, Inflammation of the Lungs, and other diseases of the chest, and has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.

To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several worthless ones, be sure each bottle has the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed name of the Proprietor, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP and FAMILY BAR SOAP are confidently recommended to the public as unrivalled for their purity and excellence.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a liberal salary will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should apply immediately, personally or by letter. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE MUSICAL MIRROR.

A New Volume of Instructions in Vocal Music for Schools and Classes. Agents Wanted. Price, 50 cts.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER PAINT OF NEW JERSEY, Established 1826,

Is for Sale at Wholesale and Retail, by the Manufacturer, Paper dec. Agents Wanted, forming a notable coal, spark and cinder proof Durable and Economical. Depot 72 Maiden Lane, New York.

HICKS & BETTS, Agents.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my eruption (unbottled), which, when used according to directions, will force them out in a few weeks, and without injury or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, prepaid, for $1. Address or call on Dr. GRAHAM, 102 Nassau Street, New York.

New Books.

Verne's Great Works. A College Story. Price $1 00.
Michael's Lives of Algebra. $1 00.
Life of Alexander von Humboldt. $1 25.
Book of the Chair Conference. $1 00.
☞ Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of the price, by Jetter & Scribner, Publishers, 119 Grand St., N. Y.

Special Announcement
FROM THE
Quaker City Publishing House!

100,000 Catalogues,
NEW, ENLARGED AND REVISED—NOW READY FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Superior Inducements to the Public!

Also, a new and sure plan for obtaining GOLD and GIFTS NEAR WATCHES, and other valuable Prizes. Full particulars given in Catalogues, which will be sent free to all upon application.

Valuable Gifts, worth from 50 cents to $100, GUARANTEED to each purchaser. $100,000 in Gifts have been distributed in my patrons within the past six months—$100,000 to be distributed during the next six months.

The inducements offered Agents are more liberal than them of any other house in the business.

Having had no Publishing and Bookselling business for the last eight years, my experience enables me to supply Agents with Books upon the greatest satisfaction to all.

☞ AGENTS WANTED in every Town and County. For full particulars address DUANE RULISON,
Quaker City Publishing House,
68 South Third Street,
Philadelphia, Pa.

WALKER'S PIANO-FORTE WARE-ROOMS, Circles Hall, Astor Place and 9th Street, above.—A large stock of new and second hand PIANOS of every description FOR SALE and HIRE at moderate rates.
N.B.—The hire allowed in case of purchase.

EIGHT YEARS
AMONG THE Indians of North America.
A GREAT NATIONAL WORK!

CATLIN'S NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.

We have just published this great work, in one large super royal octave volume, of nearly

EIGHT HUNDRED PAGES,

With over TWO HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS, including TEN OF THE FINEST STEEL PLATES of the kind ever engraved, and THIRTY-TWO HANDSOME COLORED PLATES. Most of these Illustrations are from drawings made by Mr. Catlin, during his eight years' residences among the most noted tribes of Indians, which pictures have never before since by any white man, and altogether forming the

MOST INTENSELY INTERESTING BOOK PUBLISHED.

Mr. Catlin personally visited every noted tribe of Indians, taking up his residence among them as familiarly as possible, and his work is MINUTELY MAN," and was thus initiated into many of their SECRETS AND MYSTERIES, and has given us, in graphic sketches on the spot, in colors, he indelibly stamped on his memory, and fixed on canvas, the scenes that were enacted around him.

This work is sold EXCLUSIVELY BY SUBSCRIPTION, and we want agents who can devote their time in every part of the United States, to whom the most liberal commissions will be paid.

☞ Specimen copies sent by mail, (post-paid), on receipt of the price, $4 50.

J. W. BARLEY, Publisher,
46 NORTH FOURTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

BOOKS WITH GIFTS.
DON'T BUY A PIG IN THE POKE!
But send for a Catalogue!
WE have a new plan of selling Books, and will send our new Catalogue, postage paid, to any address.
Call or address
No. 29 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

DISTINGUISH
THE LADIES' EVERY-DAY-MADE LINEN STORE,
381 Broadway, near 20th Street, for Reasonable Linens.

LADIES' UNDER-GARMENTS EXCLUSIVELY.
FINEST WORK OR PLAIN MATERIAL.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly,
The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs. It is taken without nausea.
ALSO,
Quern's Patent Purified Caster-Oil.—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any nausea after use. It is highly purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 125 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable Druggists. ROLFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 81 Maiden Lane.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED. — To sell a new Invention. Agents have cleared $20,000 on one,—better than all other singlar agencies. Send stamp, and a 32 page particulars. Address
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

READER—If you want Employment that will pay, take no Agency. Address, with stamp, for particulars, S. M. NYRICK & Co., Lynn, Mass.

American Guano.
TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian, by the consignees, ALEXANDER H. RHODES, The American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
R. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

"Biggs' Trunk," Waterproof and imperishable, can not injure the cord nor enlarge the rupture. 483 Broome Street, N. Y.

Patent Extension Tables.
At Herter's Manufactory, 145, 150 Wooster Street.

Stellwag & King, 3 William Street, offer for sale Leather Board,—a new superior article; likewise for export to Mexico, Central and South America.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
At Reduced Prices.

READ WHAT A DISTINGUISHED MAN SAYS.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has been in constant family use since its introduction. After trying and returning others, I have three of them in operation in my different places, and after four years' trial, have no fault to find."—Hon. J. H. Hammond, Senator of South Carolina.

405 Broadway, New York, 18 Summer Street, Boston, 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore, 88 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati, 14 Camp Street, New Orleans, and 349 King Street, Charleston, S. C.

☞ Every Number of Harper's Magazine contains from 99 to 98 pages—and from one third to one half—illustrated. It is in many other ways unrivalled.

Close of the Nineteenth Volume.
HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR NOVEMBER.

The present Number closes the Nineteenth Volume of Harper's New Monthly Magazine. In the Introductory Notice prefixed to the first Number, the Publishers announced their purpose to present a periodical "which no one who had the slightest relish for miscellaneous reading, or the slightest wish to keep himself informed of the progress and results of the literary genius of his own age, would willingly be without." And they intend to publish it at so low a rate, and to give it a value so great in proportion to its price, that it shall make its way into hands or the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design, the Publishers leave to the judgment of the public. The unbroken sale of these volumes is much easier as an ordinary criterion of success than the opinions of the press, however favorable. The Publishers believe that the ten Volumes of the Magazine are then equivalent to a Library of Books from a Hundred Different Authors, the best productions of the foremost Novelists, Historians, Essayists, and Poets of the day.

Without entering into a comparison with other American periodicals, the Publishers may be permitted to say that Harper's Magazine contains 75 per cent more matter than any other monthly publication. It is the only Monthly Magazine. While giving place to many of the best articles from the pens of writers for the London Monthlies, it is also the only monthly furnishing to the American original matter than is contained in any other similar publication. Its success is proved by the fact that the published articles from more than Two Hundred American Authors, and that in every section of the country the State of the Union. By thus welcoming contributions from every part of the country, Harper's Magazine has essentially prevented the Magazine from assuming a sectional character, or becoming the organ of any literary association" clique or party.

In its Illustrations especially, Harper's is wholly without a rival. Its Illustrations during the past year have cost more than Six Thousand Engravings, executed in the highest style of the Art, by the most celebrated Drawings by Darley, Parsons, Hitchcock, Fredericks, Walcutt, Townsend, Hoppin, Church, Lossing, Vogt, Bellew, McLenan, Shattuck, Hoppin, Dallas, and other Artists. For these Illustrations paid not less than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars. The cost of the Illustrations alone has considerably exceeded this amount. Harper's Magazine has therefore, for the last two years, cost more than a Quarter of a Million of Dollars to American Authors and Artists.

The Publishers gratefully acknowledge that this large outlay has been remunerative beyond their most sanguine expectations. They have felt sure that Harper's Magazine would "make its way into the hands or the affections of the intelligent community of the United States," but the number of those readers has proved far greater than they had anticipated. The present large circulation of the Magazine will continue to increase with the growth of population, and the Publishers will spare no pains and manner in which it will hereafter be conducted, to render it more deserving than the contents of the Volumes already issued.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year . . . . . $ 3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

The postage upon Harper and Harper's Magazine, together, one year, $1 60.

☞ The postage upon "Harper's Magazine" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-one Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Five Years a Newspaper. Five Years a Success.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," illustrated by Fredericks and McLenan, was commenced in "Harper's Weekly" for July 9, and will be continued through the year, and completed.

THE CELEBRATED CURTIS Illustrated Serial Tale of American Life, entitled "LOTOS-EATING," commenced in Harper's Weekly" for April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $1 00
One Copy for Two Years 1 50
One Copy for Four Years 4 00
Two Copies for One Year 1 50
Twelve Copies for One Year 10 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 20 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

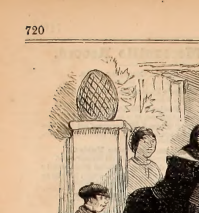
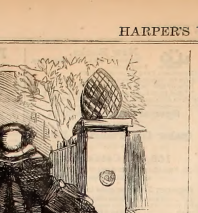
* Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names at the Office of Publication, or by postal card, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.



NOT A BAD JUDGE.

ALIMENTIVE BOY. "My eye, Tommy, wouldn't I like to Board in that 'ouse, just!"



A WET DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

BADGE. "Think rain'll die a deal o' good, CHARLEY?"
BLODGE. "Oh, shirtinly!—make water so very plentiful."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GEORGE G. EVANS,
PUBLISHER,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

Now Ready,

The Best Book of the Season.
TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.
MEMOIRS
OF
ROBERT-HOUDIN,
AMBASSADOR,
AUTHOR,
CONJUROR,
WIZARD,
MAGICIAN,
NECROMANCER,
DOUCHEUR,
ENCHANTER, AND
PROFESSOR OF SLEIGHT OF HAND,
Written by Himself.
EDITED BY
DR. R. SHELTON MACKENZIE.

With a copious Index.

This Book is full of interesting and entertaining anecdotes of the interview of the Great Wizard with the most distinguished personages of the present day, and gives descriptions of the manner of performing many of his most curious tricks and transformations.

From the Editor's Preface.

A man may not only "take his own life," by writing his Autobiography, without committing felo de se, but may carry himself into future time, by producing a book which the world will not willingly let die. This is what Mr. Robert-Houdin, the greatest artist in what is called Conjuring, has lately done in the remarkable book Confidences d'un Prestidigiteur, a faithful translation of which is here presented to the American reading public. The work has had the greatest success in Europe, from its lively style, the variety of information it contains, its curious historical and philosophical bits on the practice and principles of sleight-of-hand, and the effort it makes to tell as well as enchanting, which suits to make perfect the exhibition of White Magic, the antipodes of what our forefathers knew, persecuted, and punished as the Black Art.

Handsomely bound in one volume 12mo, cloth, 445 pages. Price $1 00.

And upon receipt of 21 cents additional for postage, a copy of the Book and a handsome present worth from 10 cents to $100 00, will be sent to any person in the country.

IF YOU WANT A BOOK,
Send to George G. Evans' Establishment for it.

YOU CAN GET GOOD BOOKS.
YOU CAN GET CHOICE BOOKS.
YOU CAN GET BOOKS WORTH READING.
YOU CAN GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

And excellent that's Handsome Present, worth from 10 CENTS TO $100
IS GIVEN WITH EACH BOOK.

Address all your orders to
GEORGE G. EVANS,
ORIGINATOR OF THE GIFT BOOK BUSINESS, AND PROPRIETOR
of the
LARGEST GIFT BOOK ESTABLISHMENT IN THE WORLD.
No. 439 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA.

FROM CLAPP'S
Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

— In our advertising columns will be found the notice of Helmstreit's Hair Restorative, an article advertised by the very responsible firm of W. E. Higgs & Co., of Troy, N. Y. The certificates of its excellency and efficacy are numerous, and it is every way worthy of the attention of those who are in need.

Price 50 cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.

Perfectly Pure
CREAM TARTAR
AND
BI-CARBONATE SODA.

We have the finest brands and best qualities in this line, for the purpose of supplying the most particular CHEMISTS, DRUGGISTS, CONFECTIONERS, and GROCER FAMILY STORES with an article perfectly pure and unadulterated, (let our name on the papers and boxes) The CREAM TARTAR is prepared under our own supervision! We sell these goods in any desired package suitable for any trade.

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
128 and 125 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years!

DELANO
Life-
Preserving
Coat and Vest
Company.

Office
and Salesroom
No. 256
Broadway,
opposite
the City Hall
Park.

Vest not Inflated.

Vest Inflated.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Shirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Waists and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

We would draw attention to the annexed unsolicited letter.

NEW ORLEANS, October 9, 1853.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Gentlemen:

Having been saved by one of your "PATENT LIFE-PRESERVING VESTS." I deem it my duty to make it known to the public. I was on the Steamboat "Princess" when she was burned, and had it not been for one of your Vests I must have perished (unavoidable), which I have been deemed. I therefore cordially recommend it to the public.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your well wisher,
Captain I. D. THOMSEIN.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN,
200 MULBERRY STREET, NEW YORK.

Prior to creation of Society of Members from our body, composing Sacting Machines, with requests to procure Sewing Machines, we have, in conjunction with some leading Houses, carefully and thoroughly examined the various machines, practical value for family sewing, and find those made by the WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 505 Broadway, New York, to fully combine the essentials of a good instrument, and such as we can confidently recommend.

Having seen so favorable results from their use, in our own and the households of our friends, we are desirous that their benefits should be shared by all our brethren, and hence have interested ourselves in their behalf.

With best wishes, your Brethren,

Abel Stevens,	Thos. Carlton,
Daniel Wise,	J. Porter,
David Terry,	J. M. DAGGETT & COLS.,
	Chas. Edwards,
	Wm. A. Gee.

THE NEW NOVELS BY CHARLES READE
AND
The Author of "GUY LIVINGSTONE."

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York,
Have just Ready:

A GOOD FIGHT AND OTHER TALES.
By CHARLES READE,
Author of "Love me Little, Love me Long," &c. Embracing "A Good Fight."—"Jack of All Trades."—"Autobiography of a Thief." Illustrations.
12mo, Muslin, 75 Cents.

SWORD AND GOWN.
By the Author of "GUY LIVINGSTONE."
8vo, Paper, Twenty-five Cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS and all BRONCHIAL IRRITATION, SORENESS, or any affection of the THROAT CURED, by the HEALING LOZENGE in CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, ASTHMA, CATARRH, RELIEVED by BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, or COUGH LOZENGES.

"A simple and elegant combination for Cough."—Dr. DR. G. F. BIGELOW, Boston.

"Have proved extremely serviceable for HOARSENESS."—Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I recommend their use to PUBLIC SPEAKERS."—Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, New York.

"Most salutary relief in BRONCHITIS."—Rev. S. SHEPHERD, Murderlown, Ohio.

"Beneficial when compelled to speak, suffering from COLD."—Rev. S. J. P. ANDERSON, St. Louis.

"Efficient in removing HOARSENESS and Irritation of the Throat, so common with SPEAKERS and SINGERS."—Prof. M. STAN JOHNSON, Lexington, Ky.

Teacher of Music, Southern Female College.

"Great benefit when taken before and after preaching, as they prevent HOARSENESS. From their good effect, I think they will be of great general advantage to me."—Rev. E. HOWELL, A.M., President Athens College, Tenn.

Sold by all Retail Druggists in the United States and Canada, at 25 cents per box.

Also, BROWN'S LAXATIVE TROCHES, or Cathartic Lozenges, for Dyspepsia, Costiveness, Constipation, Headache, Bilious Affections, &c.

The following Wholesale Dealers in New York buy "TROCHES" largely, and can supply the trade in quantities less than $ grow at our prices.

HEGEMAN & CO.
A. B. ROSEN & CO.
MCKESSON & ROBBINS.
LAZELL, MARSH & BYRNE
B. A. FAHNESTOCK, HULL & CO.
J. H. HAZARD.
FENTON, PARKER & MOWER.
J. T. ROBERTS.
P. D. ORTH
PARRISH & PARK.
F. C. WELLS & CO.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our own styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
MADENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DREADNAUGHT BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERES and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS
in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.
WM. H. HAVILAND & CO.,
Nos. 823, 825, and 827 Broadway.

Forty Dollars per Month.

500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Finest Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machine. Salary $40 per month, with all expenses paid. For sample machine, and full particulars, address, with stamp enclosed, for return postage,
J. M. DAGGERT & COLS.,
Boston, Mass.

Farrel, Herring & Co.'s
(Herring's Patent)
Champion Fire and Burglar Proof Safes,
629 CHESTNUT STREET (Jaynes' Hall)
PHILADELPHIA.
Sideboard and Parlor Safes for Dwelling Houses, &c.

DR. J. D. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON,
FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as subdues the female life, a really efficient medicine must be their best friend. Where the most eminent physicians have failed, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—New York Commercial. "Its wonderful curative powers in our own family."—Farmer's Advocate. "We can testify ever answered the recommendations in the circulars it in my practice with astonishing results."—R. B. FENTON, M. D., Marietta, O. "I have tested it in cases of Irregularities, Uterations, Leucorrhœa, Flooding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteris, &c., with great success. It is worthy of the notice of the Faculty."—Jos. C. CRESSEE, M.D., Baltimore, Md. "Prevent upon medical men to use it."—JAMES LOVE, M.D., Lawrenceville, Ga. Such letters pour in from a thousand sources, showing it to

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the Female Sex. Daughters, Wives, and Mothers, Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, on application. Sold by all Druggists. Ask for Marchisi with any other name. It is sold at $1 per bottle, or three bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every town. When sent by mail, sealed money, and order by Express. Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
12 and 18 PARK ROW, N. Y.
Or J. D. PARK, Cincinnati; Weeks & Potter, Boston; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans. J. D. MARCHISI, M.D.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar,
513 Broadway,
Under the St. Nicholas Hotel.

HUDSON BAY SABLE,
RUSSIAN SABLE,
MINK, MARTEN,
ROYAL ERMINE,
FRENCH SQUIRREL,
CHILDREN'S FURS,
IN ELEGANT VARIETY,
STOCK LACES,
ASSORTMENT COMPLETE,
PRICES MODERATE.
GENIN'S BAZAAR,
513 Broadway.

WILL SHORTLY CLOSE,
CHURCH'S
"HEART OF THE ANDES."

Now on Exhibition at the STUDIO BUILDINGS, No. 15 Tenth Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. Open from 9 A.M. to 9 P.M., and from 7 to 10 Evenings. Admission 25 cents. J. McCLURE.

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR
Family use, Manufacturing purposes, 484 Broadway, as chairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.
H. C. LEE, Agt.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 150.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A NEW SERIAL.

WE shall commence in an early number of Harper's Weekly a new Serial Tale by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., of which we have purchased the advance proof-sheets from the author. This Tale will be continued through the Weekly till it is completed.

In reply to several inquiries, we beg to say that Mr. DICKENS's new Serial, "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," was commenced in Harper's Weekly on May 7, and Mr. CURTIS's delicious Story of American Society, entitled "TRUMPS," on April 9. We can send back numbers from those dates, or from the beginning of the year, to any person who remits the money.

We print from 80,000 to 93,000 copies per week.

THE PRISONER BROWN AND HIS BOSTON COUNSEL, MR. HOYT.—DRAWN BY PORTE CRAYON.—[SEE PAGE 729.]

Our Illustrations.

We continue in this number our Illustrations of the Harper's Ferry outbreak, drawn by our special artist, Porte Crayon. We have now published the following Illustrations of this memorable event:

1. Harper's Ferry.
2. Another view of the same, showing the Armory, etc., etc.
3. The attack on the Engine-house by the U. S. Marines.
4. The Guard-room, with the wounded prisoners.
5. Brown, wounded and a prisoner, during his examination by Governor Wise.
6. Body of Brown's son.
7. The trial of Brown at Charlestown.
8. The arraignment.
9. Brown and his counsel, Mr. Hoyt.
10. Portrait of Colonel Washington.
11. Brown's arms—swivel gun and pike.
12. The school-house in the mountain, used by Brown as an arsenal.

THE ARRAIGNMENT.—DRAWN BY PORTE CRAYON.—[SEE PAGE 729.]

THE OLD CHURCH.

BY J. WALTER SCOTT.

The old church standeth
In a lonely nook,
Where the day gleameth
Through the tulip-trees,
Which forever look
On its mysteries.

The fang'd bug buzzeth
In the chancel-way;
The blue-fly crawleth
On the dusty pane;
And each sunny day
Brings an insect rain.

The gray rat roisteth
Over the loose floor;
The black snake hisseth
From the crumbling wall;
While shakes the half-door
In the windy hall.

When the night falleth,
For its absent mate
The night-bird calleth—
And a mournful pall,
Like an accurs'd fate,
Wrappeth all—all—all.

The dim ghost stealeth
Through the grass-grown aisle
The organ pealeth,
As in days of yore,
Through the ruined pile,
"Forevermore."

When the Old Year dieth,
At the watch-night noon,
The New Year cometh;
And a spectral throng
Fill the darkend room
With prayer and song.

And again prencheth
The white-haired priest;
And again kneeleth
A repentant crowd
At the holy feast—
Some weeping aloud.

Oh! the wind telleth
The old, old tale;
And each stroke soundeth
Like a dying groan,
Or a cry from hell,
In dolorous tone.

Mystery palleth
Without and within;
Deep darkness falleth
On all things below—
Mixing what hath been—
Mixing now—now—now.

EDGEWOOD, on the Hudson, 1859.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1859.

WILL JOHN BROWN BE HANGED?

JOHN BROWN has been sentenced to be hanged on 2d December. The question is, Will Governor Wise interpose to prevent the accomplishment of the sentence?

On the face of it, John Brown should be hanged. He has found guilty of crimes for which the fixed penalty is hanging. He has had a fair trial. It has been proved that he was in full possession of his reason at the time the crimes proved against him were committed. No extenuating circumstances can be urged in his case. He did the deed with premeditation, and there seems to be no good reason why he should not suffer the penalty. If he be reprieved or pardoned under such circumstances, the cause to be capital offenses in the Old Dominion.

At the same time there is a decided impression abroad that John Brown will not be hanged. Authoritative newspapers and Democratic leaders have repeatedly opinioned that he will be the commutation of his sentence. Appeals for mercy to Governor Wise have been forwarded from highly respectable quarters. Most of these take the ground that Old Brown was a fanatic and a madman, and that it would reflect honor on the South to pardon him his fanatic and a madman, and that it would reflect honor on the South to pardon him his act of charity. It is urged that, after all, John Brown only carried into practical effect the teachings of the New York Tribune, and other Abolitionist organs; and that while the teachers escape unscathed, it is not worth while to execute the poor ignorant disciples.

We have no advice to offer Governor Wise on the point; if he be the man we take him for, he needs none. Certain it is that the hanging of Brown would strengthen, as the pardon of Brown would discredit, the Northern Abolitionist party. Whether the relaxation of justice in his case would tempt other fanatics to repeat his treasonable attempts, is a question which Governor Wise must decide for himself. If the pardoning of Brown is going to encourage other fanatics to repeat his treasonable attempts, it is quite clear that he ought not to be pardoned. But if the pardoning of Brown is going to encourage other fanatics to repeat his treasonable attempts, it is quite clear that he ought not to be pardoned. But if the South can afford to be merciful to this deluded old man, it will stand much better in Northern eyes for the contest of next year.

DEMOCRACY IN CITIES.

WELL-ORDERED newspapers keep among their usual "standing matter" the heads, "RIOT AT BALTIMORE!—"MOBS BLOODSHED AND BURNING." Ever since the brutal treatment of General Lingan, the city of Baltimore, one of the most beautiful and pleasantest cities in the Union—a place famous for the charming tone of its society, the wit and good-breeding of its men, and the beauty of its women—has been chiefly famous for periodical riots and ever-recurring scenes of turbulence, blackguardism, and bloodshed. During the last thirty years every three months, at least, some disgraceful affray at Baltimore has attracted the scorn and aroused the horror of civilized people. We need hardly add—as we are in the month of elections—that the usual scrimmage is not long in coming off, and that the list of killed and wounded is respectable.

The inference drawn by most of our contemporaries is unfavorable to the moral character of the Baltimore people. One journal says that Baltimoreans are naturally rowdies. Another asserts that the Baltimore police are always bees very inefficient. A third founds an argument on the proximity of Baltimore to Philadelphia and Washington, and declares that the roughs of these two cities, when they want excitement, go to Baltimore to get it. We do not pose to institute an inquiry into the moral character of the people of Baltimore, or the efficiency of their police force; nor is it worth while to examine whether the neighboring cities use it as a neutral ground whereon they may enjoy a fight with impunity. These are questions which concern Baltimore more than us.

But we think it is well to remember, in reviewing the Baltimore scandal, that it is merely an extreme development of a feature which is common to all great cities. Within two years there has been a Vigilance Committee in New Orleans; New York has been almost in a state of siege, the military have paraded the streets in martial order, and the Police Force has been the scene of a desperate conflict. A very few years since periodical battles between firemen rendered Philadelphia almost uninhabitable. At Boston the burning of convents, and the riots retendant upon the surrender of a fugitive slave, have not been forgotten. In fact, there is no great city in the Union in which, at some time or other, the turbulent passions of the mob have not resisted the law supremacy with the established authorities, and proved their earnestness by some sanguine effort or blow. The same thing is true of great cities in Europe. In London the Parliament has been frequently surrounded by mobs; there was when the Duke of Wellington dared not be seen entering his house; and Lord George Gordon's riots are well remembered. In Paris the mob rises every few years, and generally overthrows the Government altogether. Experience proves, in a word, that mobs and hideous crimes are natural phenomena of all great cities; that they are the usual fruit of heterogeneous assemblages of men, and the accumulated surplus of active animal energy.

The question for the legislator is, therefore —how shall

The patrons of the Opera in this country are people who are familiar with the institution in other countries. They know who are famous and who are unknown. If an unknown singer appears and does well, the fact is at once recognized, and there is no impediment to success. A man or woman has as good a chance in Irving Place as in any opera-house in the world. But you can not suppose a success upon a first appearance. The first night Parodi sang at the old house in Astor Place her dress was torn and the wires had been pulled. She sang for charity in the ship coming over. She was received with a kind of supercilious enthusiasm. In the next week she succeeded at her hotel. She was announced as the pupil of Pasta. The audience knew that opera-pupils are all ready. A dew has left its fresh impress to the stage, bearing an ode of welcome in Italian. Nothing was wanting but to shut the door, justify all this tumult, which we all know was manufactured. She sang, and the result was sure. She had come unheralded, she would have seemed a very fair singer. But when you bring out with beauty eyes and exceeding care a bottle labeled "Imperial Tokay," and then pour from it minutes and minutes—a way in a very tolerable palace for many people, had your guests been long all faith in Tokay lacks, and hope nothing, and say nothing, a future visit to your house is sure.

How would it answer to apply a little common sense to the management of the Opera? The managers are very correct believe in music, in the way, but why should they so plainly show that they think so?

PERSONS.

THAT a man has written a good book, or painted a fine picture, or developed a new motive power, or done any other brilliant or useful work, hardly seems to be a sufficient reason for claiming him of the privilege of privacy. A famous man is properly an open property. He has made himself. He chooses to be. The results of his thought, the creations of his imagination, the record of his experience he gives to the world in the way that seems to him best, and which the world welcomes. The world has a right, for the world pays the price to his window and see whether he wears a white or colored shirt in the morning; and writes to the newspapers to announce the fact that he has a breakfast-table.

Of course there is a very natural personal curiosity about every famous person. But it does not at all follow that such a curiosity is to be gratified in every way which he may please. The minute details which Walton gives of George Herbert, or Boswell of Johnson, or Lockhart of Scott, are characteristic and interesting, like those Plutarch relates of his heroes; but it is an immense impertinence to suppose that we care to know what Mr. Dickens had for dinner yesterday, or who made Mr. de Lamartine's boots. A man's private life is not exposed in every life which are only to be related when a man's whole history is worth telling; and then, with perfect propriety, it should be given.

Gossip may very easily be confounded with information, but it is a profoundly different thing. The public is very fond of gossip; but it is as poor a taste in the street as in the parlor, and a dealer in gossip is already almost a scandal monger. An incessant use of a name in this kind of tendon gives a person the air of a candidate or candidate enjury during a canvass. Somebody, for instance, writes a book, and every few people ever hear of, fewer still read, and nobody especially likes. The person is a pleasant man, or, more dangerous still, woman, he is "universally liked." The "Personal" of the newspapers incessantly mentions him, merely for the sake of steadily bolstering for gossip. She is pretty as well as pleasant, rich, perhaps, as well as pretty. She is very far away weeks in the fashionable watering-places in New York hotel. Forthwith the letters of city correspondents to sated editors are filled with her praises. A purely factitious reputation is created and the victim of public gossip finds all sensible people laughing at her. Then the newspapers both creates and gratifies a personal vanity, perhaps, but it prejudices that vanity and silent public which confers fame. The number of distinguished people in this country of whom nobody ever hears is becoming overwhelming. Do you ever happen to think with what delight they read the fulsomest biographies in the papers, how they cut out the article it only an annual, and that there will be another fresh crop next year, in which they will have no share. Soon the longest purse will not avail, and only the stars shine forever. But when a lion's even a candle, but a straw—!

SOME NEW BOOKS.

OF course no reader and no critic can ever get to the bottom of the pile of new books. Perhaps Mr. Clapp, in his pungent Saturday Press, does most quick by superficial skimming in attractive print. The title of a new book printed in county type in a very valuable volume.

Mr. John Esten Cooke, of Henry St. John, Gentleman," is a novel of revolutionary days in Virginia. It is full of the old-fashioned stately style of which his other writings are examples: a kind of genteel, loitering, clinging tone of writing. Yet vague and reverent, envelops all he writes in an atmosphere of poetry. Mr. Cooke is a hearty, loyal Virginian, and his volume must print in the Old Dominion that a noble of the blue blood but in Spain. He is affectionately familiar with her history and her men, and he glories in her great days. "Henry St. John" is interesting as an illustration of that spirit and a memorial of those days; as a picture of Virginia in scene, incident, character, and in the levity of the age, that high lights every page. Many of Mr. Cooke's sketches and shorter stories, both in Putnam's and Harper, are remarkable for their tranquillity and tenderness.

Mr. Stoddard's "Book of Gold" is a very fascinating book. There is really little to tell about him but the story of his travels, which he has himself told at length. From these records, with great skill, Mr. Stoddard has compiled a sketch embracing mainly what is interesting and picturesque to every body, and interwoven with it glimpses of his childhood at Tapel, his maturity in Paris, and his old age in Berlin, as vivid and as characteristic that the reader closes the book with real regret—parting as with a friend, but with his calm, strong lineaments impressed upon memory forever.

There is a novel called "Out of the Depths," which has been highly commended by several intelligent newspapers, and which describes the life of a woman who sinks to the depths of social shame, and then rises by means of religious influences. It is an immense and solemn theme inadequately treated. And the author does with a very dull hand. There is nothing in the least degree pungent in the whole book. And it is clear that, although the author has seen a little of metropolitan life, the work is one of profound sympathy. But to do what such a subject demands requires much more space, a much bolder detail of description, a more unshrinking acuteness and moral nerve than this author displays. To do the work as it should be done would be to raise an outcry of horror, which the well-bred novelist and reader will not dream of admiration. To do it properly would be to put Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" into a great, quivering, passionate, triumphant history. But as yet nobody in our literature seems to have been equal to it, and therefore nobody has yet even approached from the attempt until now. The fault to find with "Out of the Depths" is not that it is disgusting, or exciting—for it is neither—but that it is less than a great theme.

The "Good News of God" is a volume of sermons by Charles Kingsley, published by Michael Doolady—a name not unknown to the old friend of Arthur. The collection of these fifteen sermons, vigorous, direct, and intelligible, also shows the English clergyman at his best. They are addressed to plain people, and all people may read them with profit and pleasure. It is curious to compare these sermons with a bold clergyman of the Church of England, now, with those of eldest contemporaries, Robertson of Brighton, Whately, Chillingworth. Instead of glittering with splendid rhetoric, and charging the enemy with tough controversial logic, they are unpretending and declamations and earnest exhortations to a Christian life. Mr. Kingsley's own account of his method might have preached at Bemerton, although they have more exuberant energy than he, and less pious fervor.

AIR TRAVEL.

IT is pleasant to see how unwavering is the confidence of men in their inventions and efforts. It is no less pleasant to see the generosity of Mr. Lowe, who proposes to cross the ocean in Excelsior, and who, before he starts, sends a cheerful letter to the public, informing us that the science of air navigation has made much more progress than we are aware of, and that it is "no reason to doubt" that his ship will "accomplish the grand end."

Probably he is the only man in the country who thinks so; and it by no means follows that he is therefore wrong. For if the universal public opinion be unwavering, the skepticism of the world is not always. It was universally believed in Europe in the theory that there are certain permanent currents of the air which may be turned to practical account, that there was a vast atmosphere of Columbus that lay sailing westward he would reach land, that the inhabitant of the moon was a keg, washed the steam puffing from the kettle, that the vapor might be made a motive power.

Probably the fields for adventurers and discoverers who have not yet succeeded, in this multanebuchy inquiry, are the most brilliant and hopeful ones in his American travels. "Your Highness may believe me, the globe of the earth is far from being known as it will be two or three hundred years at your royal court, and during seven years was told the way, and where to find it. But I will not leave opened the way, tailors and shoemakers are the privilege of going to discover new lands. Forgive me, Highness, and I beg, in the name of Ferdinando and Paria without my eyes being filled with tears when I remember all the many services of your Highness. I have not a hair that is not white, and my body is enfeebled. Heaven and earth now mourn for me. All who have died, live in pain, and die, mourn for me."

Mr. Lowe says that during the last fifty years at least three thousand ascensions have been made in this country, and eight thousand persons have made several voyages; and that it looks little out an eighth of the whole have been in any sense scientific voyages, yet enough have been established, and the proportionate danger of aerial travel has been shown to be less than that of other methods. Mr. Lowe has also shown that they are all seeking are the air currents—or rather one entirely convenient current—and that there is a certain ocean which flows constantly, and upon which, when once fully ascertained, subsequent experiments may be based.

Mr. Charles Green, the Englishman, was the original experimenter in ballooning; and Mr. Wise and Mr. Lamountain have been "prospecting" for it here. The journals of their excursions during the summer have been very interesting. Mr. Lamountain's account of his great journey from Watertown has an interest and excitement like Parry's and Franklin's arctic journals. A volume of such accounts, with proper pictures, would make one of the most welcome and fascinating holiday books for boys. And the effort of the aeronauts seems no more hopeless than the arctic search.

Mr. Lowe very truly says that the only way to develop the aeronautic science is to experiment continually. "I am not that he is about to give up," he says, "but I do propose to ascertain why, and to provide greater security for the future." And he should succeed, and land upon the other side of the Atlantic in two days—why, the new capsule of the City Hall will be about finished at the same time, and our honest Dogberrys will undoubtedly order it to be consumed in his honor. They can hardly do less for a man who transports himself over the ocean in two days than for him who sends a word through it in two hours. And it is doubtless with reference to Mr. Lowe's probable triumph that the civic edifice is being repaired.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"A WIFE'S TRAGEDY" is a poem of a good deal of power, but of uneven execution. It is too long for the Lounger's space; but he will like to see something else by the same hand.

M. C. S. "Ipsissa" is a story by Le Marie Lounge, the author of "Undine." It was published some years since in this country in Putnam's "Library of Choice Reading." The author's name is not "Herr or Heidelfe," as an English woman.

"THISTLEDOWN." Has appeared with a low C. It is from the Greek ekthlibo—to squeeze.

—THISTLEAR. No: it is not pretty. It is the kind of verse that we write by the dozen.

NEW MAN-MONKEYS.

MONSIEUR PAUL DU CHAILLU, born a French man, but a citizen of the United States, has, for the last two years, been a scientific traveler in Central Africa. He has hunted and shot as perseveringly as Gordon Cummings, and with the noble end of increasing the knowledge of natural history. He has brought back with him from Africa many specimens of animals, birds, and fishes unknown, among others, by far the finest collection of Troglodytes in existence. Of these we engrave four of the finest.

Most of our readers will remember the engraving of a chimpanzee which we gave some months ago. The animal had been killed in Africa, carried to England in a run-pounces, and there "restored and stuffed in the most clever and skillful way." It was considered so valuable a specimen that the Prince Consort bought it and had it placed in the museum their task though decomposition had made such out work of the gorilla's corpse that they were forced to put the specimen out and perform the task in a more, two miles from any human dwelling.

Mr. Du Chaillu's gorilla is, therefore, that each of his great troglodytes is a more valuable specimen than this one. His are adult specimens; the one in London was not full grown when killed. His skins, skulls, and extremities are in good preservation; in fact, the whole collection of specimens had made such havoc that the taxidermists were driven to rebuild the creature, partly from various descriptions, and partly from intimate knowledge. He asserts, and we are inclined to agree with him, that the skeleton and skin of the great troglodyte are of animals exists in any museum in the world at that which he is about to exhibit in this city.

We must begin our description, then, as we said when we published the English gorilla. Troglodytes are the highest order of the Quadrumana, being extremely wild and ferocious; so much so that no traveler has ever been taken a live specimen. They are as much larger and more terrible than the great baboon of menageries as that animal is greater and more formidable than little monkey. He picks up pennies for the organ-grinder, his master, and is comparatively harmless. He is the animal on the authority of Professor Owen, that these powerful animals tore great branches from trees, and used them as clubs to beat lions, tigers, and other wild animals with which they fought. M. Du Chaillu's skulls for all ages prove that what the gorilla uses no weapon; when he fights he uses his teeth and hands alone. His muscular strength is almost very few creatures that can withstand his grasp. M. Du Chaillu states that, being in the interior of the African forest, at a distance of about four miles from one of his attendants, he heard the peculiar roar of an enraged gorilla, and rushed to his aid. He found a man, white and alone, when incensed, produces by battering its immense breast with its hands. Listening to the spot, he found his unfortunate attendant dying. His forefills had rushed upon him, seized him by the left leg-grips, dragged him a mile or so, then killed him upon the ground with such force that he lived but a few minutes. The engraving on page 724 is a true representations of the male gorilla in our engraving will show how vast his muscular power is. Between the male and female there is a difference in life, his bulk was probably much greater. His arms—the length of which is enormous—are much greater than that of his legs—are as thick as a stout man's thighs. It is fortunate that these terrible creatures are confined to the interior, and that progress does not correspond to their strength.

M. Du Chaillu has kindly furnished us the following extract from his journal, relating the chase of a male gorilla:

"Gaston and I one early this morning, rather discouraged, as we had spent the two preceding days looking for the gorilla. We had come to the forest tracks, but nothing of them.

"We followed over encampment, which was simply made with a few branches scattered on the ground, so as to form a bed. Gaston, the eagle, we resolved to spend the day in the ravines of the mountains, where we knew that we should find the tracks of the animal's progression. He cut his hands in many places, in order to get the blood on the spears; after which we followed in some charmed powder, which was to make his hands sure if called to shoot; he painted his body, and covered himself with his war clothes. As for me, I was dressed in my usual hunting costume, made of dark-blue cloth. I blackened my face and hands, in order not to be easily seen; and was, as usual, very careful in loading my gun, and in putting on the percussion caps.

"We spent the greatest part of the day in the midst of the mountains, and had but a short time seeing a spring, tracks of a gorilla which had just left. His footprints were very large, and we foresaw that we would have soon to encounter a most formidable animal. We were not mistaken, for after a while we were startled by the tremendous roar of the monster. At our approach he raised himself erect, beat with his powerful hands his tremendous chest, and advanced boldly toward us, looking with his fiery eyes straight into our faces as if full us defiance. He showed us, at the same time, his powerful teeth. There was no time to be lost. We brought our guns at the monster together and fired. He fell to the ground, uttering a tremendous groan, and was soon a lifeless corpse."

The other two varieties of the troglodyte family M. Du Chaillu considers to have been the first authentic specimens ever exhibited.

The first of these is the Troglodytes Nschego. Then is a skeleton of this troglodyte at Paris; but no skin nor where save in its native woods and in M. Du Chaillu's collection. The nschego's tail is to be the most intelligent of the apes. When taken young it is extremely docile. It has been taught to eat almost any thing. M. Du Chaillu caught a young one in Africa, which became so tame that he followed him about very much like a dog. When first taken its face and hands were as white as those of a newborn baby; but as it grew older its skin assumed a yellowish tinge, and gradually grew quite black. Some of its habits were curious. When it ate in manner and his stomach appeared dinner, it would retire to a commanding eminence, and there sit for hours with an indifferently inspected each dish; when the dinner was ready down came the nschego, crying, and whining, and shouting. Then his hosts were soon understood, and it was offered food; but it had not its least attention to the cooked fish, and would eat nothing if it was helped to that. It was a notorious thief; and in the mornings would hide near a cottage till the women had gone to the spring for water; it would then enter with the cunning of a monkey, and steal, and make off with what it could find—cooking, as our traveler states, to relish such stolen food much more than that which was freely given to it.

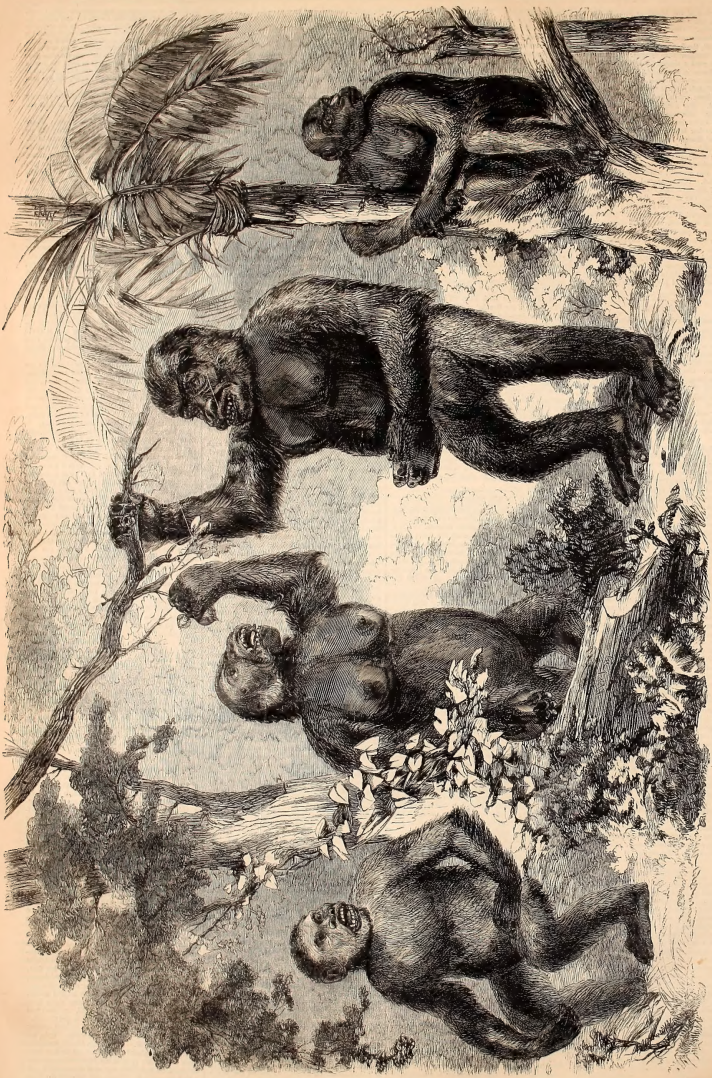
In a state of nature the nschego vindicates his supremacy over the intellect over other troglodytes. He lives with his wife in a retired manner, and builds himself a house like any Christian. The house is built on the ground, and on the under of a tree or rock; the nschego objects to the night air. The house is made of a frame and a stout, middle-sized tree standing alone in the forest. It must have a stout branch, projecting horizontally from the trunk at about six a diameter of twenty feet from the ground. When a tree has been selected the nschego and his mate go in search of branches, with which they construct a canopy so thick and so tightly fastened with vines round the branch that no rain can get in from any portion it. While one works in building the canopy, or roof, the other gathers leaves and moss, and carries them to the foot of the tree. Husband and wife never help each other, but work in separate establishments close by each other. It must not be supposed, however, that this arises from incompatibility of temper. On the contrary, they are never happy when separate. The first one who finishes his house, descends the tree and goes to aloud for the other, and does not cease to make the woods resound with his groans for Amaryllis till the absent one appears. Then the nschego-chirping creatures. After living a fortnight or so in a house they leave it and build another.

The most striking peculiarity of the nschego consists in the baldness of the head. No hair grows on the head or face, save the black cloth and gloomy. All other apes have hair on the head. The nschego's head is round, the peculiar crest like a helmet on the top of his head—an adjunct which renders it impossible for any thing short of a rifle-ball to break his skull by a straight blow. The nschego's head has no seam in the skull. The skin the nschego's head resembles a few gray hairs, like remains of a straggling beard. Its breast, like that of the gorilla, is bare, but the skin on the posterior extremities of the loins is destitute of hair. In the gorilla the fingers are much longer than those of the nschego's fingers, on the contrary, are long and very active. Its mouth is large; when it cries it extends literally from ear to ear.

The Troglodyte Koolo-Kamba, which is the fourth in our engraving, is surprising, in proportion the most fierce-looking of the quadrumana. We have never seen any thing more terrible than the expression of this creature's face. It is described by M. Du Chaillu to be an entirely new species. It inhabits the same localities as the two preceding Africa, and is called Koolo by the natives, its cry resembling the sound of that word. It is not so formidable as the male gorilla, but is stronger and stronger than the female. The hair is black and long, like the gorilla, resembling those of human beings; the head round, and surrounded by a growth of hair very like human whiskers and beard. So far as the head is concerned, M. Du Chaillu considers this troglodyte a nearer approach to human nature than any other species of the quadrumana family. It lives mostly in trees; and in order to catch branches it uses very long and powerful arms. Its fingers are general appearance not unlike those of a very large negro hand.

M. Du Chaillu can only state what he knows of the Koolo-Kamba tribe. He had it once owning on his return from the chase; and unfortunately, before he had it, proceeded to the spot with a trusty African attendant. He had blackened his face, and was crawling quietly on hands and knees, as noiselessly as possible, in order not to give any alarm. As soon as he began to look for the game, the animal he heard its cry in a tree above him. Raising his gun cautiously he fired, and the great beats fell with a thundering crash to the ground.

Those who take an interest in natural history should see M. Du Chaillu's collection. It is, we believe, unrivaled. The gorilla tribe is comparatively an unexplored page in natural history—the most interesting as it is the race which approximates most closely to our own species, and yet which comprises in strength and ferocity the most terrible denizens of the forest.



THE NEWLY-DISCOVERED MAN-MONKEYS.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

THE ENGULGO.

MALE GORILLA.

FEMALE GORILLA.

KOOLOO-KAMBA.

"A BEAUTIFUL POLITICAL INSTITUTION!"

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

IN AND OUT.

"And Boniface Newt has failed," said Mr. Bennet to his wife, in a low voice.

He was shading his eyes with his hand, and his wife was pencefully sewing beside him.

She made no reply, but her face became serious, then changed to an expression in which, from under his hands—for her husband's eyes were not weak, and he was only hiding them from her—her husband saw the faintest glimmering of triumph. But Mrs. Bennet did not raise her eyes from her work.

"Lucie?" He spoke so earnestly that his wife involuntarily started.

"My dear," she replied, looking at him with a tear in her eye, "it is only natural."

Her husband said nothing, but shook his slippered foot, and his wife saw a little lover in his limp, white cravat, as if he were hearing that soft music he seemed so often to hear, or tasting a luscious dish. His shoulders were considered about the room with that instinct of imparting and receiving sympathy which belongs to happiness. They were alone in the little parlor, with only the portrait on the wall for company, and only the roses in the glass upon the table, that were never wanting, and always showed a certain elegance of taste in arrangement and care which made the daughter of the house seem to be present though she might be away.

"What a beautiful night!" said Mr. Bennet at last, as his eyes lingered upon the window through which he saw the soft illumination of the full moonlight.

His wife looked for a moment with him, and answered, "Beautiful!"

"How lovely these roses are, and how sweet they smell!" he said, after another interval of silence, and as if there were a change in the pleasant dreams he was dreaming.

"Yes," she replied, and looked at him and smiled, and, smiling, sewed on.

"Where is Ellen to-night?" he asked, after a little pause.

"She is walking in this beautiful moonlight."

"All alone?" he inquired, with a smile.

"No! with Edward."

"Ah! with Edward." And there was evidently another turn in the pleasant dream.

"And Gabriel—where is Gabriel?" asked he, still shaking the slippered foot.

His wife smoothed her work, and said, with an air of tranquil happiness,

"I suppose he is walking, too."

"All alone?"

"No, with May."

Involuntarily, as she said it, she laid her work in her lap, as if her mind would follow undisturbed the happy figures of her children. She looked abstractedly at the window, as if she saw them both, the manly candor of her Gabriel folding the calm sweetness of May Dewitt; the loyal heart of her blue-eyed Ellen clinging to Edward Wynne. Down the windings of her reverie they went, roses in their cheeks, and faith in their hearts. Down and down, farther and farther, closer and closer, while the springing step grew staid, and the rose bloom slowly faded. Farther and farther down her dream, and gray glistened in the brown hair and the black and gold, but the roses bloomed around them in younger cheeks, and the brown hair and the black and gold were as glossy and abundant upon those younger heads; and still the arms of those couples were twined and their eyes were linked, as if their hearts had grown together, each pair into one. Farther and farther—still with clustering younger faces —still with ever softer light in the air falling upon the older forms, grown reverenced, until—until—had they melted in the moonlight, or was she only blinded by her tears?

For there was more than in her eyes—eyes that glistened with tenderness—and there was a hand in hers, and as she looked at her own hand she knew that their hands were clasped, and each other because they saw the same sweet vision.

"My dear," asked Gerald Bennet, still holding his wife's hand, "was Columbus married?"

Gerald! what an absurd question! What do you mean?"

"Well, I suppose he was. But in all those old accounts of navigators and explorers longing for the Indies and distant diamonds, there is something very sad—very sad."

His eyes were musing, and his voice a little abstracted.

"Were their homes so unhappy that their whole life was a plan to leave them? Could they hope to find any thing so precious as they left? Poor Columbus!"

He moved his foot dreamily, and sat silent for a little while.

"For what shall it profit a man if he discover a continent, and lose his own home?"

He looked at his wife, and said,

"Could I have been the rich man I one day hoped to be—the great merchant I hoped to be, when I asked you to marry me—I could have owned nothing—you dismissed me—to be me as that very tear in your eye. I wanted to be rich—I felt as if I had cheated you, in being so poor and unconnected that you were bred so differently. For your sake I wanted to be rich." He spoke with a stronger, fuller voice. "Yes, and when Laura Magot broke my engagement with her because of my first failure, I resolved that she should see me one of the merchant princes she idolized, and that my wife should be every bit as happy, as large the wife of a richer man than Boniface Newt. Darling, you know how I struggled for it—but you did not know how I struggled when I failed. And I know who it was that made my heart my success, and who taught a man who wanted to be rich how to be happy."

While he spoke his wife's arm had stolen tenderly around him. As he finished she said, gently,

"I am not such a saint, Gerald."

"If you are not, I don't believe in saints," replied her husband.

"No, I will prove it to you."

"I defy you," said Gerald, as he kissed her forehead.

"Listen! Why did you say Lucia in such a tone, a little while ago?" asked his wife.

Gerald Bennet mused with arch kindness.

"Shall I answer truly?"

"Under pain of displeasure."

"Well," he began, slowly, "when I heard that Laura Magot's husband had failed, as I knew that Lucia Boniface Newt had once been jilted by Laura Magot because he failed, I could not help wondering—now, Lucia, don't you—could I help wondering if wondered how Lucia Darro would feel. Because—because—"

He made a full stop and smiled.

"Because what?" said his wife.

He lingered, and smiled.

"Because what?" persisted his wife, with mock gravity.

"Because Lucia Darro was a woman, and—I mean I'll make a clean breast of the whole cause, although a man and woman love each other as long and dearly as Lucia Darro and her husband have and do, there is still something in the woman that the man can not quite understand, and upon which he is forever experimenting. So I was curious to hear, or rather to see and feel, what your thoughts were; and, at the moment I spoke, I was sorry I set them, and I was surprised."

"Exactly, Sir; and that surprise ought to have shown you that I was no saint. Listen again, Sir. Lucia Darro's husband was never jilted by Laura Magot. He was a treacherous and ambitious young man who was engaged to that lady in an entirely different person from my husband. Do you hear, Sir?"

"Precisely; and who made him so entirely different?"

"Hush, Sir! I've no time to hear such folly. I, too, am going to make a clean breast of it, and confess that there was the least little sense of—of—of—well, justice, in my mind, when I thought that Laura Magot who jilted you, who were so unfortunate, and with whom she might have been so happy—"

Gerald Bennet dissented, with smiles and shaking head.

"Hush, Sir! Any woman might have been. Then she should have led such a life with Boniface Newt, and have seen him ruined after all. Poor soul! poor soul!"

"Which?" asked her husband.

"Both—both, Sir. I pity them both from my heart."

"Thou womanest of women!" retorted her husband. "Art thou no saint because thou jiltest thing?"

"No, no; but because it was not an unmixed pity."

"At any rate it is an unmixed goodness," said her husband.

The mother's glance, the glimmering uncertainty, had faded from his eyes. He sat quietly by on the sofa, swinging his foot, and with his head bent a little to one side over the long cravat.

"Gerald," said his wife, "let us go out, and walk in the moonlight, too."

In a few moments they were sauntering along the street. It was full and murmurous. The lights were bright in the shop-windows, and the throng of shoppers, more sensible than during the day, when it is drowned by the roar of carriage-wheels upon the pavement, had a friendly, social sound.

Broadway is never so pleasant as in the early evening," said Mr. Bennet; "for then the rush of the day is over, and people move with a leisurely air, as if they were enjoying themselves. What is that?"

They were going down the street, and saw lights and heard music and a crowd approaching. They came nearer; and Mr. Bennet and his wife turned aside, and stood upon the steps of a dwelling-house. A band of music came first, playing "Hail Columbia." It was surrounded by a swarm of men and boys, in the street and on the sidewalk, who shouted and sang and cried, and were followed by a file of gentlemen marching in couples. Several of them carried torches, and occasionally, as they passed under a house, they all looked up at the windows and gave three cheers. Sometimes, also, an individual in the throng shouted something which was received with loud hi-hi's and laughter.

"What is it?" asked Mrs. Bennet.

"This is a political procession, my dear. Look! they are coming by us at all; they are turning into Grand Street close by. I suppose they are going to call upon some candidate. Come, let us say something to it all; they will probably look up at this house and see us without thinking how simple and beautiful our institutions are. Do you not think of it, Lucia? What a majestic thing the popular will is!"

"Let's hurry, and we may see something," said his wife.

The throng had left Broadway and had stopped in Grand Street under a balcony in a handsome house. The music had stopped also, and all the torches were grouped in front. Gerald Bennet and his wife stood at the corner of Broadway. A gentlemanly-looking man took off his hat and waved it violently in the air, and a superb diamond-ring flashed in the torchlight as he did so. There was a shout.

"Three cheers for Newt!"

There was a burst of hoarse from the crowd —the drums rolled—the boys shrieked and emptied in the tone of various animals—the torches waved—and the gentleman cried, "One more!"—there was another stentorian yell and still another, and then the band played a short air. The windows did not open.

"Newt! Newt! Newt!" shouted the crowd. The young gentleman with the diamond-ring disappeared into the house with several others.

"Why, Sally, where the devil is he?" said one of them to another, in a whisper, as they ran up the stairs.

"I'm sure I don't know. Musher promised to have him ready."

"And I can't. Tie up to get here before we did," replied his friend, in the same hurried whisper, for the noise drowning in the hall-light.

When they reached Mr. Newt's room they found him lying upon a sofa, with Dr. Mosher and the Hon. Mr. Ele. Ellis were trying to get him up.

"I—I—I must," said he, with a pun," can't you?" cried Mr. Ele.

"No, I can't," replied Abel, with a half-unconscious smile.

At the same moment the impetuous roar of the crowd in the street stole in through the closed windows.

"Newt! Newt! Newt!"

"What in ——— shall we do?" cried Mr. Ezra Sheffield, walking rapidly up and down the room.

"Win let him get drunk?" demanded General Belch, angrily.

Nobody answered.

"Newt! Newt! Newt!" surged in from the street.

Thunder and devils, there's nothing for it but to prop him up on the balcony!" said General Belch. "Come now, heave to, every body, and stick him on his pins."

Abel looked sleepily round, with his eyes half closed and his under lip hanging.

"I can't no see," said he, thickly. "Dye know How Wem—Wam—ley? Darned sm — sm — smart feller. Said, 'Tain't no use."

And he leered and laughed.

The perspiring and indignant politicians grappled him—Sleepy and William Conder under the arms, Belch on one side, and Ele rendy to help any where. They raised their friend to his feet, while his head rolled slowly round from one side to the other, with a maudlin grin.

"Tain't no use," he said.

Indeed, when they had him fairly on his feet nothing further seemed to be possible. They were all holding him and looking very angry, while they heard the loud and imperative—

"Newt! Newt! Newt!" accompanied with unequivocal signs of impatience in an occasional tone or chip that rattled against the blinds.

In the midst of it all the form of the drunken man slipped down upon the sofa, and sitting down leaning on his hands, which rested on his knees, and with his head heavily hanging forward, he lifted his forehead, and seeing the utterly discomfited group standing perplexed before him, he said, with a foolish smile,

"Let's all sit down."

There was a moment of hopeless and helpless inaction. Then suddenly General Belch laid his hands upon the sofa on which Abel was lying, and moved it toward the window.

"Here, Sleepy, you open him behind—and Ele, and Conder, one on each side. There! that's it! Now we have him. I'll speak to the people."

So saying, the General removed his hat and bowed very low to the crowd in the street. There was a great shout, "Three cheers for Belch!" and the three cheers rang loudly out.

"Tain't Newt," cried a sharp voice; "it's Belch."

"Three cheers for Belch!" roared an enthusiastic somebody.

"D—n Belch," cried the sharp voice.

"Hi! hi!" cried the chorus; while the torches were waved and the drums rolled once more.

During all this time General Arcularius Belch had been bowing profoundly and gesticulating in dumb show to the crowd, pointing at Abel Newt, who stood, half supported, his real state concealed by the friendly night.

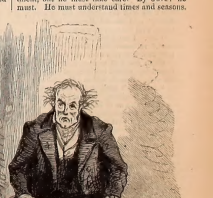
"Gentlemen!" cried Belch, in a piercing voice.

"Hist! hist! Down, down! Silence," in the crowd.

"Gentlemen, I am very sorry to have to inform you that our distinguished fellow-citizen, Mr. Newt, on the compliment which was assembled this evening, is so severely unwell ('Oh! gem!' from the sharp-voiced sleepy below) that he is entirely unable to address you. But so profoundly touched is he by your kindness in coming that he could not refuse to appear, though but for a moment, to look the thanks he can not speak. At the earliest possible moment he promises himself the pleasure of addressing you. Let me, in conclusion, propose three cheers for our representative in the next Congress, the Honorable Abel Newt. And now—" he whispered to his friends as the shouts began, "now log him in again."

The crowd cheered, the Honorable Mr. Newt was logged in, the windows were closed, and General Belch and his friends withdrew.

"I tell you what it is," said he, as they passed up the street, at a convenient distance behind the crowd, "Abel Newt is a man of very great talent, but he must take care. He drinks! he must. He must understand times and seasons.



"RICHES HAVE WINGS."

One thing can not be too often repeated," said he, earnestly: "if a man expects to succeed in political life he must understand when not to be drunk."

The merry company laughed, and went home with Mr. William Conder to crack a bottle of Champagne.

Mr. and Mrs. Bennet had stood at the street corner during the few minutes occupied by these events. When they heard the shouts for Newt they had looked inquiringly at each other. But when the scene was closed, and the cheers for the Honorable Abel Newt, "our representative in Congress,' had died away, they stood for a few moments quite stupefied.

"What does it mean, Gerald?" asked his wife. "Is Abel Newt in Congress?"

"I don't know it. I suppose he is only a candidate."

He moved on rapidly, as if he wished to walk away from any remarks, and his wife, who was not used to speed in his walking, smiled quietly, and, could he have seen her eyes, a little mischievously. She said, presently,

"Yes, our institutions are very simple and beautiful."

Mr. Bennet said nothing, and thinking the worse case, he walked more slowly. But his wife relentlessly continued,

"What a majestic thing the election of Abel Newt by the popular will will be!"

"My dear," he answered, "don't laugh until you know that it is the popular will; and when you do know it, cry."

They walked on silently for some little distance further, and then Gerald Bennet turned toward St. John's Square. His wife asked:

"Where are you going?"

"Can't you guess?"

"Yes, but we have never been there before."

"Has it any thing to do with it?"

"No, you dear soul! and I know very well you are going."

CHAPTER LXXIV.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.

THEY rang at the door of Penfield Newt. It was quite late in the evening, and when they entered the parlor there were several persons gathered about.

"Why! father and mother!" exclaimed Gabriel, who was sitting in a remote corner, reading and who instantly came forward, with May Newt following him.

Mrs. Newt rose and looked quietly at them, said, in an excited voice, that really she had no jobs, but she was very happy indeed, and that was sure, and so was Newt. When she had tied her sentence in an inextricable knot, she stopped and seated herself.

Boniface Newt rose slowly and gravely. He was hout like a very old man. His eye was hazy and dull, and his face pale.

"How do you do? I am happy to see you."

Then he sat down. The three Newtonians went up and shook hands with the new-comers. Boniface drummed slowly upon his knees with the long hairy white fingers, and rocked to and fro, mechanically, as he sat.

When Gabriel had ended his greetings there was a pause. Mrs. Newt seemed to be painfully conscious of it. So did Mr. Bennet, whose eyes wandered about the room apparently for a few instants upon Boniface, then sliding toward his wife, finally concentrated quietly as he entirely unconscious of any pause, or of any person, or of any thing, except some mysterious ornate ornament that he was beating with the bony fingers.

"It is a great while since we have met, Mrs. Newt," said Mr. Bennet.

"Yes," returned Mrs. Nancy Newt, rapidly; "and now I am sorry to be so very nearly violated, it is really high time that we became intimate."

She looked, however, very far off from intimacy with the person she addressed.

"I am glad that Gabriel are so happy, Mrs. Newt," said Gerald Bennet, in a tremulous voice, with a quivering mouth.

"Yes. I am glad Gabriel's prospects are so good," returned Mrs. Newt. "I've no doubt he'll be a very happy boy."

When she had spoken, Boniface Newt, still drumming, turned his head, and looked quietly at his wife. Nobody spoke. Gabriel only winced at what May's mother had said; and they all looked at Boniface. The old man gazed fixedly at his wife as if he saw nobody else, and as if he were repeating the words to which the bony fingers beat time, he said, in a cold, dry voice, still beating time:

"Riches have wings! Riches have wings!"

"I'm sure, Boniface, I know that, if any body else," said his wife, pettishly, and in a rather whimpering voice. "I think we've all learned that."

"Riches have wings! Riches have wings!" he said, beating with the bony fingers.

"Really, Boniface," said his wife, with an air of offended propriety, "I see no occasion for such pointed allusions to our misfortunes. It is certainly in very bad taste."

"Riches have wings! Riches have wings!" persisted her husband, still calling gently on him, and still beating time with the white bony fingers.

Mrs. Newt's whimpering broadened into crying. She sat weeping weakly, and wiping her eyes, in the way which used to draw down a storm from her husband. There was no storm now. Only the same placid stare. Only the same measured refrain.

"Riches have wings! Riches have wings!"

Lawrence Newt laid his hand gently on his brother's arm.

"Boniface, you did your best. We all did what we thought best and right."

The old man turned his eyes from his wife and went on silently drumming, looking at the wall.

"Nancy," said Lawrence, "as Mr. and Mrs. Bennet are about to be a part of the family, I see no reason for not saying to them that my vision is made for your husband's support. His affairs are as bad as they can be; but you and he shall not suffer. Of course you will leave this house, and—"

"I don't!" What will people say? Nobody'll come to see us in a small house. What will Mr. Conder say? No, Lawrence, I don't."

"Let her say what she chooses, Nancy. What will honest people say to whom your husband owes every dollar? If you don't try to pay them?"

"They are not my debts, and I don't see why I should be humiliated," said Mrs. Newt, vehemently, and crying. "When I married him he said I should ride in my carriage; and it has been a long time since I'd be a beggar."

There was profound silence in the room.

"I think we'll say," said Mrs. Bennet, quietly.

It was useless for Lawrence to argue. He saw it, and merely remarked,

"Do as you think best, and you'll give up the carriage and live as plainly as you can."

"To think of coming to this!" cried Mrs. Newt afresh.

But a noise was heard in the hall, and the door opened to admit Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Dinks.

It was the first time they had entered her father's house since her marriage. May, who had been the last person Fanny had seen in her old home, ran forward in great her, and said, cheerfully,

"Welcome home, Fanny."

Mrs. Dinks looked defiantly about the room. Her keen black eyes saw every body, and involuntarily every body looked at the corner of her father. He seemed quite unconscious of any new comers. Fanny's heavy figure plunged into a chair, whence his small eyes, green sullen, stared stupidly about. Mr. Newt merely said, hurriedly, "Fanny, Fanny," and relapsed, from the old habit of abrupt and apprehension, at her husband, into the same silence as her daughter. The silence gradually became oppressive, until Fanny broke it by saying, in a sneering tone,

"Oh! Boniface here."

He simply bowed his head, as if it had been pressing. Then he looked at his daughter rather than wagged, and his wife turned toward him, from time to time, with a tender smile. Mrs. Dinks, like Mrs. Newt, began to cry. Began to weep afresh.

"Plummit family party!" broke in the voice of Fanny, clear and hard as her eyes.

"Riches have wings! Riches have wings!" repeated the old man, drumming away with lean white fingers upon his knees.

"Will nobody stop my tiresome father?" said Fanny, looking sharply round. "What's going to be done? Are we all beggars?"

"Riches have wings! Riches have wings!" answered the stern voice of the old man, whose eyes were fixed as he turned to look.

Fanny turned toward him half angrily, but her black eyes quailed before the changed figure of her father. He was turned to her in stern, inexorable, dogmatic man, insisting, morning and night, that as soon as he was rich enough he would be all the more moved to Christian self-important, patronizing, cold, and unsympathetic friend of the family. Fanny felt that. She was this that sat in the parlor, in his chair, no longer pompous and fierce, but bowed, gray, drumming on his knees with the bony fingers?

"Father!" exclaimed Fanny, involuntarily, and frightened.

The old man turned his head toward her. The calm, hard eyes looked into hers. There was no sympathy, no pity, no tenderness, no forgiveness—nothing but a placid abstraction and ungovernable fear of his wife.

"Father!" Fanny repeated, rising, and half moving toward him.

His head turned back again—his eyes looked at the wall—and they heard the words, "Riches have wings!" in the same voice.

As Fanny sank back into her chair, pale and appalled, May took her hand and began to talk to her in a low voice. Lawrence Newt, Mr. Bennet, and Mrs. Dinks fell into a fragmentary conversation, constantly recurring to the words of the old man. The talk went on in broken whispers, and it was quite late in the evening when a stumbling step was heard in the hall, and Gabriel, and then stood Abel Newt, with his hat crushed, his clothes soiled, his shirt hanging, and his eyes lifted in a drunken leer.

"How do?" he said, leaning against the door-frame and steadying his head.

His mother, who had never before seen him in such a condition, started up, and uttered a frightened cry. Lawrence Newt and Gabriel rose, and, going toward him, took his arms and led him to a chair, where he sat down heavily, facing for either of them. His brow lowered and the sullen blackness shot into his eyes.

"Hands off!" he cried, in a threatening tone.

They still urged him out of the room.

"Hands off!" he said again, looking at Lawrence Newt, and then in a sneering tone:

"Oh! uncle, how very much Bennet! Come. I licked you like—like—like hell once, and I'll do it—I'll—I'll do it again. Stand back!" he shouted, with drunken energy, and struggled to free his arms.

But Gabriel and Lawrence Newt held fast. The others rose and stood looking on. Mrs. Newt hysterically weeping, and May pale with terror. Alfred Dinks laughed, foolishly, and gazed about for sympathy. Gerald Bennet drew his wife's arm within his own.

The old man sat quietly, only turning his head toward the noise, and looking at the struggle without appearing to see it.

Finding himself mastered, Abel swore fearfully, and struggled with drunken frenzy. After a little while he sank back exhausted and panting upon the floor. Lawrence Newt and Gabriel stood panting over him; the rest crowded into the hall. Abel looked about, stupidly, then crawled toward the staircase, laid his head upon the lower step, and almost immediately fell into a deep, drunken slumber.

"Come, come," whispered Gerald Bennet to his wife.

They took Mrs. Newt's hand and said good-by.

"Oh, dear me! isn't dreadful?" she sobbed. "Please don't say any thing about it. Good-night."

They shook her hand, but as they opened the door they saw a pale and moonlight midnight: they heard the clear, hard voice in the parlor, and in their minds they saw the beating of the bony fingers.

"Riches have wings! riches have wings!"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE TRIAL OF JOHN BROWN.

ON Monday, Oct. 31, Mr. Griswold resumed up for the defense, and Mr. Harding for the Commonwealth in reply.

During most of the arguments Brown lay on his back, with his eyes closed.

Mr. Clinton asked the Court to instruct the jury, if they believed that Brown was not a citizen of Virginia, but of another State, they can not convict on a count of treason.

The Court declined, saying the Constitution did not limit the punishment of treason to citizens of Virginia or the citizens of any other State.

Mr. Clinton asked another instruction, to the effect that if the jury believed that the place where the treason was committed was within the boundaries of Jefferson County, Brown could not be convicted.

A recess was taken up for half an hour, when the jury came in with a verdict.

There was intense excitement.

Brown sat up in his chair while the verdict was rendered.

The jury found him guilty of treason, advising and conspiring with slaves and others, and murder, for murder in the first degree.

Brown bowed quickly, and said nothing.

There was no denunciation of any kind.

SENTENCE OF JUDGMENT.

Mr. Clinton moved an arrest of judgment, both on account of errors in the indictment and because the jury had rendered a verdict not based upon evidence as to the speaking on Brown's part of treason against Virginia, which was not on each count separately, but was a general verdict on the whole indictment.

On the following day Mr. Griswold stated the points on which an arrest of judgment was moved by the counsel for the prisoner.

Brown had been a citizen of the United States, and argued that treason could not be committed against a State of which the prisoner was not a citizen, citing the authority of Judge Story; also stating the jury had not found the guilty of treason against Virginia, and that the indictment—they had not responded to the offense. They had found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree, when the law made it murder in the first degree when committed in the night-time.

Mr. Hunter replied, quoting the Virginia code to the effect that treason against the State was to be under the jurisdiction of justice. As to the jurisdiction over treason, it was sufficient that Virginia had power to try the case, assuming that jurisdiction, and defining what constituted that crime.

On the day following the Court gave its decision, overruling the motion in arrest. In the opinion that treason can not be committed against a State, he ruled that a prisoner should be tried in the county he committed it. Most of the States have passed laws against treason. Brown had been tried in the county where treason in the Court also regarded as insufficient.

The Court, however, left Brown whether he had any thing to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him.

BROWN'S SPEECH.

Mr. Brown immediately rose, and, in a clear, distinct voice, said: "I have, may it please the Court, a few words to say. In the first place, I deny every thing but what I have all along admitted, of a design on my part to free slaves. I intended to have done it in a much clean thing of that matter, as I did last winter, when I went into Missouri and took thence eleven slaves, and trapping of a gun on other side, moving them through Kansas and Iowa, without losing one of them, or killing any person, and brought them safe into Canada. That was all I intended. I never did intend murder or treason or the destruction of property, or to excite or incite slaves to rebellion, or to make insurrection. I have said enough on that point. It is not just that I should suffer such a penalty. Had I interfered in the manner which I admit, and which I admit has been fairly proved—for I admire the truthfulness and candor of the prisoner's witnesses who have testified in this case—had I so interfered as they have described in favor of the negroes, there would be no just cause of punishment. I should have deserved to suffer death for the crime of which I have been convicted. But the jury have found otherwise, and I must say that, considering all the circumstances, they have been very fair with me. I have also to say, that, upon the testimony of my own counsel, and upon the testimony of the prisoner's witnesses, that I had no design to kill any person, except in self-defense. That was my purpose distinctly from the first. I never had any design against the life of any person, nor any disposition to commit treason or to excite slaves to rebel or make any general insurrection. I never encouraged any man to do so, but always discouraged any idea of that kind. Let me say, also, in regard to the statements made by some of those who were connected with me: I fear it has been stated by some of them that I have induced them to join me, but the contrary is true. I do not say this to injure them, but as regarding their weakness. Not one joined me but of his own accord, and the greater part at their own expense. A number of them I never saw and never had a word of conversation with, till the day they reported for duty. That was for the purpose I have stated. Now I have done."

HIS TONE AND MANNER.

Brown's speech was delivered in a calm, slow, unfaltering tone, and with a dignified air. A correspondent of the Herald says:

"His composure, and his quiet and truthful manner while barring testimony to his great indulgence that had been given to every body by the Court throughout the whole of the proceedings, was the theme of every one's unbounded praise. When he concluded he quietly sat down, and for the next five minutes the silence in the room, for the first time followed by the sympathy of the people, who appeared to be in tears with sympathy.

"His counsel have put in a bill of exceptions, which will be referred to the Court of Appeals at Richmond."

HIS SENTENCE.

While Mr. Brown was speaking perfect quiet prevailed, and when he concluded the Court immediately announced the sentence upon him. After a few preliminary remarks, he said that the prisoner had been convicted of the crimes charged, and the sentence of the law was, that he be hung in public on Friday the 2d of December next.

The prisoner received the announcement without emotion. The only demonstration made was the clapping of the hands of a few persons in the room. It is not a wonder in Jefferson County. This was promptly suppressed, and much regret was expressed by the officers at its occurrence.

THE TRIAL OF COPPIC.

After Brown's trial was ended, Mr. Harding announced that he was ready to call the case of Coppic, who was brought in. The ceremony of passing him between files of soldiers was again performed.

Coppic took his seat between Messrs. Griswold and Botts, who appeared as counsel. The arraignment was postponed.

On the following day the jury was sworn in Coppic's case. The testimony was the same as already published, with the exception of the following: Upon the cross-examination was not conducted at the adjournment.

Mr. Griswold's speech for the defense resumed. No witnesses were introduced for the defense.

Mr. Harding opened for the Commonwealth; Messrs. Hunter and Faulkner followed, and Mr. Botts was to have closed for the prosecution. The speeches were of marked ability.

Mr. Griswold asked for several instructions to the jury, which the Court will grant if they see fit, but which were declined.

After being out an hour the jury came in with a verdict that Coppic was guilty on all the counts in the indictment.

His counsel gave notice of a motion for arrest of judgment, as in Brown's case.

The Court then adjourned.

CONVICTIONS.

A dispatch, dated Charlestown, Virginia, November 2, says: "Captain Cook, of Company H, Jefferson Guards, was found guilty this morning. The first count (for treason) was not found by the grand jury, but by Jefferson that it was not proven that the prisoner was a citizen of Virginia. The second count was found by the jury, which reads 'any free person,' etc. Sentence was deferred.

"Copeland, the mulatto, is now upon trial, Mr. Benjamin Botts is counsel.

"Mr. Griswold, who came especially in Brown's case, left this morning for Richmond.

"Tranquility is being restored."

A NEW TRIAL FOR OLD BROWN.

The Evening Post says that Mrs. L. Maria Child is the author of the following letter, which appeared unexpectedly in the following passage, dated October 29:

"I have just left Old Brown. He has received the Governor's permission to go to Charlestown to nurse Old Brown. I have seen him, and he is not at all the wild Abolitionist, that the world take to improper advantage of his generosity. The letter which he wrote to Governor Wise, to Brown himself, which she requested the Governor to show to Brown himself, which she requested the Governor to show to Brown himself, is not at all the wild Abolitionist, the best productions I have ever seen from the pen of a man of real, well-trained, well-balanced mind. The sentiments of sympathy, kindness, and affection that marvelous letter are those of a man of the highest culture. It avowed herself frankly a thorough Abolitionist, while disclaiming all sympathy with violence. Governor Wise read the note aloud to Brown. One letter was written to Governor Wise, and that was, that she was truly sincere in her offer to nurse Brown, and that she was truly sincere in her regret that so accomplished a person should suffer under the law, and that she intended to make every effort to do it; will grant her permission, and guarantee her perfect immunity from molestation. Governor Wise has left it as to the privilege of acting nurse to Brown, that is a matter in the discretion of the jailer and Governor Wise, and he may admit or exclude her at will. The presumption is that Governor Wise will admit her, as there is no excuse her because others in behalf of 'brave terrorists' as she has described Old Brown."

FRED DOUGLASS ON THE AFFAIR.

Fred Douglass has published a statement in which he says:

"Whatever, rightly, and most unanimously wrong in Mr. Cooke, when he asserts that I promised to be present at the time of the Harper's Ferry insurrection. Of whatever other imprudence and indiscretion I may have been guilty, I am not aware that I ever made any such rash and wild as this. The taking of Harper's Ferry was a measure as peculiar in conception as it was bold in point of time or place; my wisdom or my cowardice has not only been called in question, but I have been charged with even making my promise to go there.

"I say, emphatically, that I never published, organized, or assisted, or even to conspire against slavery, when I had the slightest hope for success. I could see nothing in nothing their fellow-men of their labor and liberty have been crowned with success, but only wild and desperate feelings, or purposes of those whom they rob and plunder.

"Entertaining this sentiment, I say he asked, why I did not join John Brown—the noble old hero whose son I had seen bleeding his life away beside him in Kansas Union, and whose ghost will haunt the bedchambers of all the slaveholders who participated in the bloody deeds of their generations, filling them with alarm and confusion? I answer, because I had no faith in the success of his enterprise. I could express, I did express, my sympathy with them.' Let every man work for the abolition of slavery in his own way.'

"I have no apology for keeping out of the way of those gentlemanly United States marshals who are said to have been watching my movements, and who were ready, on a wire to an interview with me. A government recognizing the existence of the glorious institution of slavery as time as this, is not likely to have any very charitable feelings toward me, and if I am to stand on trial for my treason, I prefer to do so at least upon equal terms.

"Some reflections may be made upon my leaving on a visit to England, just at this time. I have only to say that my going to that country has been rather delayed than hastened by the insurrection movement. I have All know that I had intended to leave here in the first week of November."

SENATOR HALE KNOWS NOTHING ABOUT IT.

Senator Hale published a letter in which he says: "I have been charged, in an equivocal language, that Seward, himself, myself, and others knew all about Brown's projected outbreak at Harper's Ferry, encouraged it, or participated in it: that this is proved by documentary testimony, and that we deserve a felon's fate on the gallows.

"I shall not undertake the task of vindicating either of the gentlemen named in connection with myself from any charges which may be brought against them, either directly or indirectly, by newspaper, or in any other mode, but leave that to their own honor, not doubting his entire ability to do it far more ably and effectually fortunately thus I would. So far as relates to myself, I can only repeat my sincere regret and my sincere apology. I recognize the whole matter as belonging to another, and, I trust, a past, time, and, challenging the world for a particle of testimony, written or verbal, sustaining one of the charges thus recklessly brought against me, or for a single circumstance calculated to cast a suspicion upon me in an unprejudiced mind.

"I stand and say upon honor or intimation from any one that an insurrection or outbreak, or any thing of the sort, was contemplated by John Brown or any one else, in Virginia or elsewhere, nor had I the remotest suspicion of it; and was under the impression that the people of Kansas in Virginia were first made aware through the newspapers of the movement. I am sorry that the unhappy affair has given more anxiety to my friends than to myself, or hazard by any one with more regret. Yet I do know how to make this denial more broadly than I have."

CORNELL'S CONFESSION.

The following is the confession made by Cornelel, to the fund by telegraph from Cleveland on Tuesday:

Q. Are you John Cornelel, of Cleveland, and the same person that was indicted last year at Cleveland for receiving the stolen Jones & Quincy bonds?

A. Do your business with me in Oberlin if you have any. I request you to enter into the Harper's Ferry movement? A. I do. Q. Have you ever had any letters to Leary, at Oberlin, which I saw, and then refused to get them? A. I have.

Q. Who furnished you the means to come to Virginia? A. Ralph and Sewell Plumb gave me to understand I was to bear my expenses.

Q. Who elder Oberlin persons were at Harper's Ferry? A. None but Leary and myself.

Q. Where is Leary? A. He was killed in the river, near the little works.

Q. Did you come through Cleveland? A. Yes.

Q. On what day did you leave there? A. The day of the week before.

A. Where did you stop in Cleveland? A. I stopped at Isaac Sturtevant's, on Walnut Street: was there from Monday noon until Tuesday evening of the week before.

Q. Did Mr. and Mrs. Sturtevant know what you were going to Virginia for? A. No; they supposed I was to be the person who talked to me about it: I suppose Mr. J. Lane?

Q. Where did Plumb give you the money, and who was present? A. Ralph Plumb gave it to me privately. He and Leary were present; it was in Plumb's office, at Oberlin.

Q. Did the Plumbs know where you were going? A. Yes, and visited my room and my trunk, and saw its nicety just before leaving. Monday morning.

SIX LETTERS ABOUT BROWN.

Q. Did Charles H. Langston see you in Cleveland? A. He did, and knew of my business, as did a large company.

Q. Who directed you to go to Sturtevant's at Cleveland? A. Leary; he was directed by John Brown, Jun., to go there.

Q. Did you hear Ralph Plumb, on the day the slave [illegible] was rescued, pronounce it a good thing, or not, and if so, where? A. I did; it was in the parsonage in front of Watson's grocery.

Q. Have you any knowledge of an attempt to destroy a steamboat in the river at Cincinnati a year or two since? A. I understood that there was an intention to destroy a steamboat of the Louisville line, speaking about the same time.

Q. Did you know from Brown or any other person that body was carried from the slaves in the neighborhood? A. I did from Brown, that help would come from the slaves; that did not happen to be the case. On Sunday morning, after the fight had commenced, that my being shot through the arm was occasioned by my being at the Rifle-works, half a mile from the engine house.

Q. Did you learn from Brown or any of the company that persons at Harper's Ferry sympathized with you, or were in any way connected with the movement? A. From Brown I understood that there were persons there at Harper's Ferry who wished to get rid of the slaves, but would aid in no other way.

HOW TO GUARD AGAINST MORE JOHN BROWNS.

Major-General Scott, in his report to the War Department in Richmond, Virginia, in which he commends upon the Harper's Ferry affair, and showing the duty devolved upon the superintendence of military officers. They are military establishments, and not to be converted into places of military use, with a guard to protect and defend them. This ought to be made known to the people at all the State establishments in the South. Governor Wise, in his report to the Legislature, against attempts like Brown's, but they should happen, is not sufficient. Something might be much more illustrious than at Harper's Ferry. The use of the arsenal and armories, the public arms and other munitions of war stored in them, amounts to many millions."

RIOTING IN BALTIMORE.

In Baltimore election day was universally devoted to riot and bloodshed. The so-called Plug-Uglies, who determine the rollers who rule the city, surrounded the several ballot-boxes, and by the exercise of brute violence prevented the friends of the anti-rowdy party from voting. They even seized the impossibility of participating in the election by the friends of the Administration, and they shortly after abandoned the field to their successful foes, in fighting each northward and eastward in the city. In all but one the most flagrant acts of violence and brutality were perpetrated. Several persons were shot, others stabbed, and others so seriously beaten that their lives are despaired of. Mr. CHARLES H. RIDGELY, a peaceable merchant, was killed, receiving a pistol-shot in the brain; and Mr. JOHN H. HOFFMAN was severely injured with a bludgeon that he lies in a critical condition.

MORE MASSACRES.

We have received dates from Utah to October 8, with full particulars of the massacre of emigrants by a band of the Indians, previously reported. The savages attacked an emigrant train on the night of the 24th September, at a point twenty-five miles distant from Fort Hall, and killed five persons, five others were severely wounded, and they burned thirteen, from Buchanan County, Iowa. Three others are missing. The emigrants were from Captain Camp Floyd in safety. Developments had been made before the Federal Grand Jury, but no indictments found. In the Parrish murder. Robberies and outrages continue to be frequent and numerous in the Territory.

SERIOUS RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

An express train from Boston to Albany passed from Old Lee for Chicago, run off the track of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad at Wolf Creek bridge, in Jackson Creek, eight miles south of Whitestown, Wisconsin. Eight persons reported killed, and a number of others wounded. So far as ascertained, all of the wounded were residents of Fond du Lac.

THE NIGHTS OF JEWS.

A case exciting great interest has engaged the attention of the courts in Rome. A Jew named Levy, a Jew, has been summoned as a juror in the Criminal Court. He refused to serve, and was fined to be at his duties in the Tribunal. He refused to obey the order, on the ground that he was observed by them of his faith as the Festival of Atonement, and that it would be impossible for him to serve. The Judge instantly imposed a fine of $500, subsequently reduced to $250, upon the delinquent, who, with the pecuniary aid of his co-religionists, proposes to contest the case, and enlists vexatious religious difficulty.

CONGRESSMEN SHOOTING BUFFALO.

Mr. Buffington, the Boston Congressman, belonging to the Kansas, and Mr. Pendleton, of the Federal of political labors, by chiefly buffalo hunting. Mr. Kansas is the latest of the Boston Journal says:

"At three o'clock we espied buffalo, six or eight miles

did fellows. They looked as large as elephants. They were standing on the brow of a hill, with a ravine at the foot. Our teamsters proposed to drive down into the ravine, under cover of the hill. We had been cautioned about shooting them—not to succeed—to wait, and if one was wounded, to hide in the grass and so still. We crept within one hundred and fifty yards of the animals, and took a good look at them. They looked any thing but mild and peaceable, with their shaggy manes, ugly eyes, shaggy heads, and humps. They were moving slowly, and we could see them plainly. We fired a few wagon drops on the other side, the drivers turned, and we fired a volley. Down went three of them, and up went the wagons, and we were off in a cloud of dust, and the hill trembling with their hoofs.

"We fired at them from both sentinentally—hundreds and thousands of them in all directions. We selected three fine, stout bulls, and pursued them, and brought for them. About one mile distant, they crept up within fifty yards. They were grass, and I was ready to fire. We knew their shots had struck. The buffalo did not fall immediately, but turned and looked around at us, and by leaving the wounded one. Burlingame and Barry rushed in and fired their rifles, and the bull fell dead. We started, and were soon alongside of the wounded one. He was standing, and we soon dispatched him with a rifle ball.

"It took the whole party to turn him over. Our men cut him up, and we loaded the wagons with meat. Darkened night (they said we weighed eighteen hundred-weight) overtook us before we left him. We had no time for supper. After that we killed nine buffalo in all, and might have killed one hundred if we had wished."

PERSONAL.

The Montreal Pilot has it on good authority that his Royal Highness Prince Alfred will receive an honorary degree in the Colonial Secretary, and other distinguished personages will be present on the occasion. The date is the beginning of June next. The formal opening of the Victoria Bridge will then take place.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, who has been in England for the last year, has left for the Continent with her husband. Her husband, Professor Stowe, will return home immediately.

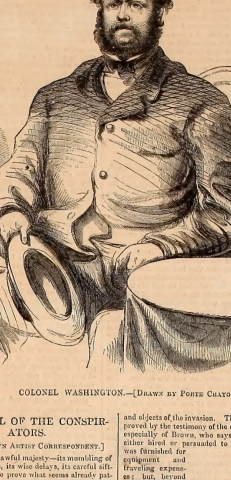
Among the passengers who arrived on the steamer Nile, for New York, on Saturday, were Dr. Van Der Hoss, Mr. C. Ritch (secretary of legation at Copenhagen), and Professor Agassiz, of Cambridge, Massachusetts.

The Rev. Edward Everett Hale, who has been pastor in St. Louis, awoke in her usual good health and cheerfulness. Suddenly she was seized with a fainting fit, and was scarcely to fall on the floor in a half-reclining position. She gasped for breath, and before a physician could arrive, in great-mortem examination, by Dr. Charles Spring revealed a little piece of bone, about the size of a pea, which affected the blood contained in that organ to arrest the action of the heart. Mrs. Hale was 42 years old. She also was ruptured. She had, in a physical sense of the word, died from heart disease. Her death was very delightful, for she was greatly beloved by her husband, and during the last moments of her existence she returned a verdict in accordance with the revealed testimony of science.

There is a new novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne, Esq., which will be out next to Jenny Lind.

The Albany Evening Journal on Saturday says: "This morning, at the City Hall, Judge Gould, of Troy, sentenced Mr. Thomas Hogan, of Troy, to be hung on the second forty-hour upon the bridge he slipped and fell into the river. He was in the water about a minute before the accident occurred, and as he was in the act of taking off his coat preparatory to jump in, he was observed by a boy living in another direction, and was not aware that the boat was about to start. The boy jumped in, and got hold of the water, and was finally rescued by John M'Carty, who was on the boat. Although Mr. Hogan could swim, and not a swimmer, the Judge was conscious, and knew that he was drowning, and made no effort to save himself, and kept his arms in motion, which, although apparently unconscious, rendered him, which, although apparently unconscious, rendered him, which, although apparently unconscious, rendered him

THE TRIAL OF JOHN BROWN, AT CHARLESTOWN, VIRGINIA, FOR TREASON AND MURDER.—[SKETCHED BY PORTE CRAYON.]



COLONEL WASHINGTON.—[DRAWN BY FORTE CRAYON.]

THE TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

[FROM OUR OWN ARTIST CORRESPONDENT.]

THE law, in its awful majesty—its mumbling of essential formulas, its wise delays, its careful siftings of evidence to prove what seems already patent, its high-spiriting principles, its squeamishness in terms, its spirits and quiddities—has few attractions for a fervent and impulsive spirit. A criminal trial and a crowded room is a lingering lure to one who loves action and out-of-doors.

As the minutest details of the trial of the Harper's Ferry prisoners are furnished by the reporters of the daily press, I will not crowd your pages with needless repetitions, but will endeavor to find some matter bearing upon the subject, I hope equally interesting and enlightening to the public.

Charlestown, the place where the Court now holds its sittings, is the seat of justice for Jefferson County, Virginia, situated on the Winchester and Potomac Railroad, eight miles from Harper's Ferry. It is a neat and flourishing town, containing about sixteen hundred inhabitants, and is the centre of one of the wealthiest and most prosperous agricultural regions in the United States—a region distinguished at the same time for the high social refinement and princely hospitality of its inhabitants. This region—of which the counties of Berkeley, Frederick, and Clarke form a portion—has sometimes been called the Garden of Virginia, and reckons among its native sons many eminent men both of the past and present.

At an early hour on Wednesday morning I visited the prisoners—not in their cells, as our usual phraseology has it, but in their rooms, large, well-ventilated, and comfortable. Brown and Stephens, the wounded men, occupy the same room. From general indications, I think that the wounds of the latter are mortal, and that in all probability he will not survive the trial. Brown is mending rapidly, being already in much better condition than when I saw him at Harper's Ferry on the morning of his capture. Both prisoners are very conversable; but as I had nothing to say to them by way of encouragement, I did not care to annoy them with curious questions. In the room above, Edwin Coppie and Shields Green (alias Emperor), a negro, are handcuffed together, sharing their meals and occupying the same bed. Coppie says he is twenty-four years of age; Green says he is but twenty-one: I should judge he was at least twenty-seven or eight. I think he understated his age that his youth might excite compassion. Although a Member of Congress elect, he also says he can neither read nor write, and was once a professional old-clothes cleaner. In view of these facts it is scarcely to be regretted that the scheme failed, as the Congress of the proposed Provisional Government would hardly be an improvement on the present body. The courage of these men has evidently given way: they have a cowed and haggard look that would excite pity, were such a feeling possible under the circumstances. In an adjoining room is the fifth prisoner, Copeland, taken at the Rifle-works on Monday. Copeland is what is called technically a likely mulatto, and would make a very genteel dining-room servant. He has the rudiments of education, and is believed to be a Judge of the Supreme Court under the Provisional Government. At present he is cowed and patient, and says he was entirely deceived as to the ends and objects of the invasion. This, however, is disproved by the testimony of the other prisoners, and especially of Brown, who says that no man was either hired or persuaded to join him. Money was furnished for equipment and traveling expenses; but, beyond that, all enlisted voluntarily, and with full knowledge of his intentions.

Doubtless the spoils of the conquered territory, confiscated estates, and lucrative offices, would soon make all right. What story of the Arabian Nights can equal the golden dreams that haunted their woolly noddles as they lay snoozing and snoring over at the Kennedy Farm! Green, the N.C., already sees the elegant country mansion which is to fall to his lot: his fingers stiff with diamond rings, his vest loaded with gold chains and stuffed with jeweled repeaters, he struts out upon his terrace, surveys his broad lands, and calls his coachman!—six—sir, at least, for a negro never enjoys any thing by halves. The coach appears, with driver and footman in livery, some ex-gentleman of the F. F. V.'s—the former proprietor, perhaps. The (alias) Emperor drives to the Provisional Capital, where he finds the Supreme Court in session. He gives his fellow sinuperors, that they may go drink his health. It is recommended that the fallen race should be treated leniently; and it does him good to feel princely. Entering the court-room, he finds Judge Copeland engaged in important business. A number of perverse and unreasonable Southerners have refused the merciful terms offered them, and have been taken in arms in defense of their homes and property. Death is their doom; and grim General Brown stands near, with his regiments of Sharp's riflemen and legions of stalwart pikemen, ready to lead the rebels to execution. The noble Congressman suggests some amelioration, being full of meat and drink, and in a good humor generally. He would like to have a dozen of them to work on his estate; thinks he can manage them; it is pleasant to have a number of people that one can order around. But—Emperor starts and rubs his eyes. It is the order to march. The chilly air of an October night, or the shocking proximity of long-sweetened action, sends a sharp thrill the dreamer's heart; but where old John Brown leads there is no turning back. The deed is done—Monday morning has dawned. The night was one of action, but no reinforcements have come in. With the light they rend dismay and astonishment in every face.

After terror follows anger. Then the day of desperate combat, blood, and death. Hemmed-in, trapped, deceived, it is soon over. New, manacled and imprisoned, all these dreamers of wealth and greatness—their delusions vanished—crushed under the awful realities of their situation.

This is an imaginative picture which I have drawn in a spirit of levity and scorn. In coldness and absurdity it halts behind the reality—the long-devised and coolly-meditated schemes of the fanatical conspirators. It is difficult for a sane mind to conceive of such infatuation; and yet these men are clearly not insane. Minds too narrow to contain more than one full-grown idea run easily into monomania. Cervantes has given us the type, in his famous "Don Quixote," of wind-mill memory; and the credulous Sancho, covetous of islands and asses'-colts. John Brown is not unlike the Don personally, as described, and is certainly quite as mad. His one-and-twenty followers, in their thrice-soldier folly, are no whit better than so many Sanchos.

Courtly fever of La Mancheau civility, and thou his true and faithful squire, we humbly crave your pardons for thus associating your names with these vulgar knaves and midnight assassins!

The more I see of Brown, the more I am convinced that, in addition to his abolition monomania, he is under the influence of a ferocious vanity, influenced by the infinite inferiority of persons better educated but no wiser than himself, he goes to Kansas, where he earns a reputation as a partisan leader, and at the same time gets a taste of human blood. "Ira brevis furor est." That miserable contest, fomented by unprincipled politicians for party and personal purposes, at length ceased. The belligerent parties shook hands, took a drink, and peacefully turned their energies to robbing one another and the rest of the world. Not so John Brown. The demon which those border feuds had awakened is destined never again to sleep. Old Errors—Constitutional Errors, Brown of Kansas, the Topeka Governor, the dread of Border Ruffian, the Moses of the higher law—can not descend into the vulgar stagnation of common life.

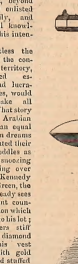
Stop tells us of a certain harper who, having pleased the rats in an ale-house with his music, was so conceited as to go upon the stage and play for the great public. Here he failed ignominiously, and was hissed.

In his grand scheme to overthrow the Government of the United States and the Anglo-Saxon race in the South, with twenty-two men, Brown has failed as signally as the poor musician, but will hardly get off so cheap. Art (to use his own expression), to give the devil his dues, he bears himself stiffly under his misfortune. Fierce as a gun-lock, cool as a sword, he makes no apologies, and yields no triumph to his enemies. In his bearing there is neither weakness nor bravado. Defiant only when stirred; otherwise civil and straightforward; communicative when questioned; and thankful for small favors.

In person, Brown is gaunt and tall—over six feet, I should think. He walks like a man accustomed to the woods. His face indicates unflinching resolution, evil passions, and narrow mind. Perhaps these interpretations may be drawn from his actions rather than his features. But consider his face as he appears in The Arrogant—as here, if there is nothing extenuated, there is naught set down in malice—and see if you do not agree with me.

The only thing Brown seems to fear is Lynch Law. He shows his dread of it, and has condescended to ask protection from it from those about him. To give him this assurance (rather than from any well-grounded fear of disturbance), an armed guard accompanies him in his daily rounds between the jail and the court-house.

When brought before the Court to answer the indictment of the Grand Jury, he made a strong effort to have his trial deferred; stating that, from his wounds, his hearing was impaired and his general condition too feeble to enable him to attend to the proceedings. This was very generally considered a sham to gain time; and, in truth I did, for the first time since his capture, suspect the old



SWIVEL GUN AND PIKE USED BY THE HARPER'S FERRY OUTLAWS.

[SKETCHED BY FORTE CRAYON.]

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IN THE MOUNTAINS, USED BY BROWN AS AN ARSENAL.

[SKETCHED BY FORTE CRAYON.]

fellow of playing 'possum. In the opinion of his physician the delay caused was unnecessary, and he was consequently refused. Since that, he has appeared in court tressed up in a cot, gesecutly—he all seeming—asleep while the proceedings are going on; but occasionally starting up from his fair, grim and sadden, like a bridled wolf, interrupting the court by such short, snappish questions and speeches. When ordered to stand up to hear the sentence of the jury, he sat up in his cot; and while thousands held their breath in solemn silence to hear the verdict that pronounced him either guilty of treason, murder, arson, insurrection, and murder, he was picking his teeth with a pin.

Of a truth this terrible scene is a mystery! A week ago I heard John Brown avow that he was a sincere Christian; in the same hour a dissolute and drunken Irishman declared that the purpose of making war on the white race, determined to kill all who opposed them. He knew not that his life was forfeited if he failed; confessed that he had failed; and said savagely that he was sorry that he had made his warning the prisoners he had in his power. He would not presume to ask for mercy—he did not expect it. He was a fiend—he guilty to deeds which he before avowed and reiterated; quibbles with his Lawyers to obtain delay; and closes about a fair trial.

Well, well; a truce to philosophy! Here, in all sobriety, is an evil old Judge who, unconsciously or sinner, martyr or murderer, famous or infamous, as the case may be, "We may yet have to be the knowledge that we own him for one good turn, with desperate hand he has blown up the whole magazine of abolition treachery—and still Andrew may not a cracker or a squib remains unburned! Brethren of the North, when heedful you see you shall attempt to preserve our ventures or your pat pits with incendiary abuse and revilings against any section of our common country, I implore you seize him on the mantle—with the word Harper's Ferry.

AN OLD LADY'S STORY.

"MONSIEUR does not care to hear an old woman's stupid story; perhaps it would not interest him."

"Indeed, Madame, I am all anxiety. I hope Madame's great interest will still dissipated me."

"Well, Sir, as you so much wish, you shall hear. I was born in this town, and have always lived in it. I was married to a respectable man, here my son Fritz was born. I hope I shall die in it, and be buried with my husband. My father was a very respectable man, and a member of the town council. He was a great linen-weaver, and was thought to be a rich man. People said he kept more than he ever had. Mr. Fritz, my son, was my father's only child, and I was the youngest of his children, so I was a great darling; the others had all died, except one son, who was years older than I. What with my own mother's and Albert's disobedience my father was a great deal broken, and was obliged to mortgage his affairs, which soon fell into disorder. He died on me, notwithstanding I was but a silly girl, with my head stuffed full of my own importance, and of my lovers—for I was very handsome, Sir. They used to say I was the prettiest maid in all Strasbourg; and when any new officer came to the garrison they always made some excuse to come to the house to see me. I did not care for any of them; but I used to like to see their fine coats come down the street, and to hear the clanking of their spurs on the pavement, because of our neighbor opposite, the notary's son, who had been my play-fellow, and who, I knew, had to be behind the blind at his desk, watching every one that came in and out. He was no very great favorite with neighbors said that we should one day be married; but as we grew up he became shy, and I used to laugh at him, so that we were not very good friends, and I liked to tease him better than any thing else in the world. I was very young and giddy, and had thoughtless and gay, and still I loved my father dearly, and tried to make him forget his trouble about Albert, who was just as bad as ever.

"I was sitting one day at the open window, singing at my work, and to vex Albert, who, my father came in, looking as if something of his own affairs, and he was very much vexed at how directly something was the matter. 'Elizabeth,' he cried, 'and he, you are ruined—your father is gone, and we shall be a by-word and disgrace in the place where we have lived so long. I know your poor mother did not live to see this day.' It is no good for me to trouble you with a long story, so I will only say that my father's anxiety had brought this new sorrow upon us. He had been going on in a desperate way of extravagance for a long time, and taking advantage of my father's age and weakness in every way, but he had never done so bad as when I was born. After he died, it was this, Sir: My father had a large sum of money belonging to the estate of his wife's father, and had, by forging his name, got it from the bank, and gone off with it, no one knew where. This money would be considered on a small scale, about a month distant, and our good, honest reputation forever forfeited if it could not be replaced. All of us could believe, and my father, from the state of his own affairs, that he did not know all about it from the first. Well, Sir, he was not to be talked, and thought of every thing; but the only hope we could see was, that a young man named Walter who was a rich widower, living in Paris, might lend It to us, for the sake of the family. We none of us knew much about him, but it was the only chance we had, so, after a great many plans, it was settled that I should set off by the diligence next morning, and go to her. It was not the fashion then to trust much to the post, for we used to get letters very seldom, and people always did their business themselves, although journeys were long and dangerous, and not taken except for very important reasons. It was a great undertaking for a young creature who had never been outside her own town; but there was no help for it, so my father arranged, or rather positively go; besides, I had plenty of spirit, and, I suppose, rather liked the idea of the adventure. In a few hours after, my place was taken, and my solitary journey was noised abroad, and all the neighbors were full of curiosity about it.

"I was going unexpectedly to see my aunt; but there was a vast deal of envy and spite among them. Poor Carl stood at his window, and walked up and down before the house all day, but I never noticed him; young girls are such silly things, Sir, and never like a young man to know the truth. I only just nodded to him as I stood at the gate, and said 'Good-by,' for I was in a hurry, indeed, and could bring home from Paris.

"Well, I won't trouble you with all my adventures. I got safe to town very well, and found out my aunt, who was very glad to see me, and who would have liked me to stay with her always; but I was but a fine time; until at last it only wanted four days to the time when the money had to be paid, and I began to consider that there was nothing to be done, except to go to my father, and tell him that I had failed. At this time there were terrible disturbances, having full of robbers. It was seldom that a diligence was not stopped on its way, and all travellers were in the habit of taking arms before they set out. I began to consider whether I should not do the same; so to secure my treasure, my aunt and I settled that it was the best plan for me to hide it between my foot and my stocking, where it would be never looked for, even in case of an attack. I was very young, you see, Sir, and had been made very merry with the good lady's fears, but did as she desired me, for all which you will see was useful in the interior. There was a priest going to Nancy, a young man and his sister going on to Strasbourg, and two merchants, who, by the way, had old-man look round with a strange, sharp look, that somehow filled me with fear. Well, Sir, I set off, stopping to dine and rest, and as friendly and merry a party we were as ever you saw, except the two old men, who kept to themselves, and seemed to all our mesonne, but never saying a word.

"We took a place at the table-d'hote at an officer going on to Strasbourg, and we went on happier than ever, until we passed through the town of Rambervillers, where we stopped at the first open country lying between that and Sarrebourg. As for me, I was so gay at the thought of my new home and making my poor father so happy, that I laughed and sang like a giddy child. It was now quite dusk, and I had just come out of a strong wind blowing across the heath from the distant mountains. Suddenly, while I was in the midst of a merry song, up, and loud shouts and oaths told us our misfortune. We had scarcely time to think before the door of the coupe in which I was was dragged out. As for the officer who had talked exceeding bravely, he never attempted resistance, but was quiet enough. The young man who was with his sister fired his pistol; but it was of no use, for he was overpowered in a moment, and the struggle began to unmask it: all our things were thrown out, and the robbers began to search the diligence. The Jew was certainly a great disappointment to them, for all they found of his was a little valise of clothes, and a small sum of money in his pocket-handkerchief. While they were threatening and swearing at him, and shaking him violently, and shaking me violently, demanded my money. 'Leave the girl alone,' said another of them; 'how much a child has to lose, and how much it has to cry.' I was in such a fright of escape, and ventured to take some advantage of this, and cried and sobbed, and were engaged in tying the traces round the old man's neck. Perhaps they were only trying to frighten him into confession of concealed money; this disappointment. But oh, Sir, it was a dreadful scene to look on, and I was so terrified that for our turns might come next. At last he screamed out: 'Stay, stay, and I will tell you, as I am a living man, where I have put my money.' Upon this little girl carries it all, a great sum, under her frock, and I was obliged to tell. The wretches while brutes about me, and my shoe and stocking off. My poor money! I do not remember anything more until I came out of a swoon, and found that we were again on our road. My heart was almost broken. I could do nothing but cry and think of my poor father. I think even the other passengers pitied me, although they had all had some loss, except the Jew, who, I suppose, never ceased to vent their indignation upon the old man. His money was gone, and the only comfort that was said, and took leave of us all at Strasbourg with a humility that was almost insulting.

"I can not tell you what a welcome I got from mine. My poor father could only cry over me, and kiss me, and call me his poor darling child, and poor Carl, that I was so unkind to, came running across, and wept like a little child, though he was a fine lad of seventeen, and used to be thought to be heard of my escape. My heart was melted, and all my pride gone, and I was so glad to be home, thankful to sit there in our little parlor, and feel his strong manly arm around my waist, and know that there was no more need to think of any thing. So, Sir, we were all in the twilight, thinking sadly enough of to-morrow, yet happy in to-day, when a step came at our gate. Our maid, Gretchen, that was afterward Fritz's nurse, went out, but presently came running in to say that a man wanted to give me a letter, but must put it into my own hands. I was still very frightened and nervous, as you may suppose; but Carl coming with me, we went to the door, where stood the cause of my misfortune. He said, 'Pardon, Mam'selle, mam'selle,' said he, giving me a letter, 'farewell.'

I was now all curiosity to find what he had to say to me, and immediately sat down to read by the light. Oh, Sir, my joy, my delight! It contained three words: 'Mademoiselle, never so lucky in judging any one.' You doubtless think me a very bad man, because you know but one side of the story. You are, however, a good girl, for you did not yourself blame the old man for saving his life at the expense of your money. I have still a great regard on jewels, one of which would have been a fortune. But for your indirection I should have lost the hard labor of a life. Therefore, here, two orders for money which awaits you at the bank—one is for the sum you have lost, the other is a marriage portion for so good and pretty a girl.'

"That is yours,' said I to Carl.

"We were married, Sir, for I was now a great heiress, and my little son Fritz inherits that very fortune made from my wedding-dowery."

LOIS THE LIBERATOR.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART III.—Concluded.

THE meeting-house was full to suffocation, and, as is sometimes happens at such occasions, the greatest crowd was close about the doors, from the fact that few saw on their first entrance where room might be obtained for them, or which they might wedge themselves. Yet they were impatient of any criticism from the outside, and pushed the hustled Faith, and after her Lois, till the two were forced on to a conspicuous place in the very centre of the building, where there was no chance of a seat, but still space to stand in. Grace Hickson and her son sat decorously in their own pew, scarcely shorter than the last they arrived only from the executive. You might almost have traced out the manner of their coming in at the back entrance of the Indian witch by the expression of the countenances. They were awe-stricken and terrified by the fear of their having passing in, still pursuing of those who had not attended the execution, and had all retired to their houses, and Grace's son need round the meeting that the stranger minister who stood along with Parson Tappan in the pulpit was no other than Captain Underhill, who became all the way from Boston to assist in purging the witch. Another Pastor Tappan began with the prayer, extempore, as was the custom. His words were wild and incoherent, as might be expected from one who had just been converted to the bloody death of one who was but a few days ago a member of his own flock, and a favorite and passionate, as was to be looked for in the father of children whom he believed to suffer so much from witchcraft, and so be specially favored of the Lord. He sat down at length from pure exhaustion. The rest of the service was uneventful, as did not utter more than a few words of prayer, calm in comparison with what had gone before, and the sermon was delivered by Captain Underhill to him in a quiet, argumentative way, but arranging the main and important of what he had to say to do with something of the same kind of child which history most in his speech to the Romans after Grace's death. Dr. Mather's book had not yet been preserved to us, as he afterward wrote them in the year 1693, under the title of "Cases of Conscience concerning Witchcraft," who doubted the existence of such a crime, he said: "Instead of their spirit wounds and bruises of the bodies of the possessed, which have such undoubted confirmation as that no man that has favorably enough to believe it, the common laws of human society will offer to doubt of them, it becomes us rather to adore the goodness of God, who found out methods of help when such things has ordained truth, and by the means of the sore-afflicted children of your very pastor who was taken out of the hands the devils here, with most horrid operations, broken in upon your neighborhood. Let not your prejudices against the method be restrained, and that they go not so far in their evil machinations as they did but four years ago in the city of Boston, where I was the humble means, under God, of loosing from the power of Satan the four children of that reputable and honest citizen, Mr. Goodwin. These four babes of grace were bewitched by an Irish witch, whose name was Glover, and were all of them tormented as they had to submit to. At one time they would bark like dogs; at another, they would act like cats; and then like swine; and be carried with an incredible swiftness, having but just their toes now and then upon the ground, sometimes one half a yeard, or twenty feet, and then several like those of a bird. Yet at other times, by the hellish deceiver of the woman who had bewitched them, they could not stir without limping, for, by means of an invisible chain, she hampered their hands, or sometimes, by means of a collar, almost choked them. One in especial was subjected by this woman at the time of her arrest to an ill-usage that I myself have seen the sweat drop from off her, while all around were moderately cold and still at rest, and not to trouble the court any more of my stories, I will go on to prove that it was Grace Hickson who was the witch that did it. It is very remarkable thing it was that she was not permitted by that evil spirit to read my godly or clergyman's book, reading the truth in it to Jesus. She could read Popish books well enough, while with godly and pious ones she was dumb, when I gave her the Assembly's Catechism. Again, she was fond of that prelatical Book of Common Prayer which is but a Popish mass-book in an English and ungodly shape. In the midst of her sufferings, if one put the Prayer-book into her hands it relieved her. Yet mark you, she could never be brought to read the Lord's Prayer, whatever book she met with it in, proving thereby distinctly that she was in league with the devil. I took her into my own house, that I, even as Dr. Martin Luther did, might wrestle with the devil and have my fling at him. But when I called my household together to pray, the devil made her to whistle, and sing, and yell in a discordant and hellish fashion.

At this very instant a shrill, clear whistle pierced all ears. Dr. Mather stopped for a moment.

"Satan is among you!" he cried. "Look to yourselves." And he prayed with fervor, as if against a present and threatening enemy; but no one heeded him. Whence came that swinsome, unearthly whistle? Every man watched his neighbor. Again the whistle, out of their very midst, and then a burst of wild and mocking laughter. Then for poor people stirring, without any cause immediately perceptible to them, the fear of the devil increased, and directly after a passage even in that dense mass of people was cleared for two men, who had been standing behind Grace Hickson, lay rigid as a log of wood, in the convulsive position of one who suffered from the falling sickness. They had her down among the ministers who were gathered round the pulpit. Her mother came to her, sending up a wailing cry of grief as she fell. Assorted child. Dr. Mather came down from the pulpit and stood over her, commanding the devil in the possession, as one accustomed to such scenes. The crowd pressed forward in mute horror. At length she had ceased to struggle, and remained still, and she was terribly convulsed—torn by the devil, as they called it.

Meanwhile Dr. Mather, Pastor Tappan, and one or two others were exhorting Prudence to reveal, if she could, the name of the witch-agent, who, by influence over Satan, had subjected the child to such cruel torture as that which she had just undergone. They took her speak in the name of the Lord. She whispered a name in the low voice of exhaustion. It was that which everybody could hear what it was. But the Pastor Tappan, when he heard it, threw back in dismay, with his face pale, leaving it not to whom the name belonged, cried out, in a clear, cold voice,

"Know ye not, Lois Barclay, for it is she who hath bewitched this poor child?"

The answer was given rather by action than by word, although a low voice was sent up from many. But all fell back, as for as falling back in such a space were possible, from Lois Barclay. There she stood, and looked on her with surprise and horror. A space of some feet, where no possibility of space had seemed to be, was made before, left lost standing alone, with every eye fixed upon her with hatred and fear. She looked from face to countenance, tongue-tied, as if in a dream. She a witch! accursed as witches were in the sight of God and man! Her mother, who had been in the centre crowded into shrivel and pallor, but she uttered not a word, only looked at Dr. Mather with her pitiful terrified eyes.

Some one said, "She is of the household of Grace Hickson, a God-fearing woman." Lois did not know if the words were in her favor or not. She did not think about them; they did not feel on her than on any person present. She a witch! and the silver glittering Avon, and the drowning woman she had seen in the water, and Herbert, at home in England, were before her, and her eyes fell before the gaze of the solemn communion —some rustling of papers; the magistrates of the town were drawing near the pulpit and consulting with the ministers. Dr. Mather was speaking.

"The Indian woman, who was hung this morning, named certain people, who, she said, were in the habit of coming to the horrible meetings for the worship of Satan; but there is no name of Lois Barclay down upon the paper which we have to strike out at the sight of the names of some—"

An interruption—a consultation. Again Dr. Mather began:

"Bring the accused with, Lois Barclay, near to this poor child whom she hath bewitched."

They rushed forward to force Lois to the place where Prudence lay. But Lois walked forward of herself.

"Prudence," she said, in such a sweet, touching voice, that it was a wonder it could be heard in that day spoke of it to their children, "have I ever said an unkind word to you, much less done an ill turn? Speak, dear child. Why did not know what you said just now, did you?"

But Prudence turned away from her approach, and screamed out, as if stricken with fresh agony,

"Take her away! take her away! WITCH! WITCH! Lois Barclay, who is there out of this meeting, and turned my arm black and blue." And she leaned her arm, as if in confirmation of her word. It was sorely bruised.

"I was not near you, Prudence!" said Lois, sadly. "Dear Lord! was only reckoned fresh evidence of her diabolic power.

Lois's heart began to get bewildered. Witch Lois! She a witch, abhorred of all men! Yet she would try to think, and make one more effort.

"Am I dreaming, Sir," she said, in a sweet, earnest—"am I a witch, Aunt Hickson?" she said, at her turn, looking at her with a face where the night be, was truth itself, and Lois thought—so near to delirium that she could—if her aunt condemned her she was justified in the belief that she was.

Grace Hickson faced her unwillingly.

"It is a matter you are family forever," was the thought in her mind.

"It is for God to judge whether thou art a witch or no," she said.

"Alas, alas!" moaned Lois; for she had lacked of Faith and learned that no good word was to be expected from her gloomy face and averted eye. The meeting-house was full of eager curiosity, expressed, as it always is, in a loud voice by the lips of earnest murmuring that seemed to fill the air with pestilence. Lois felt that she was alone, and at first fallen back from the place where Lois sent were now pressing forward and round about her, ready to seize the young friendless girl and bear her off to prison. Those who might have been who ought to have been, her friends, were either averse or indifferent to her; though only Prudence made any open outcry upon her. That evil child cried out perpetually that Lois had cast a devilish spell upon her, and bade them keep the witch away from her; and her appearance was amazing; convulsed when once or twice Lois's perplexed and wistful eyes were turned in her direction. Here and there girls, women uttering strange cries, and apparently suffering from the same kind of convulsive fit as that which had overcome Mrs. Hobbes, were centres of a group of agitated friends, who muttered much and savagely of witchcraft, and the list which had been taken down only the night before from Hoba's own lips. They demanded to have it made public, and objected to the slow forms of the law. Others, not so much or so immediately interested in the sufferers, were kneeling around, and praying aloud for themselves and their own safety, until the excitement should be so much quelled as to allow the Rev. Mr. Mather to be again heard in prayer and exhortation.

And where was Manasseh? What said he? You must remember that in the early part of the whole the accusation, the appeals of the accused—all seemed to be on a par—he smiled the scorn of many of the people who had come to worship God, but remained to judge and upbraid their fellow-creatures. Now and how late only could be seen the face of Manasseh, who was apparently trying to push forward, but whom his neighbors restrained by words and action, as Lois knew she would hold him back; for it was not for the first time that she was made aware how entirely her mother had cast away shrouded his decent reputation among his fellowcitizens from the least suspicion of his secret excitement and incipient insanity. On such days, when he himself imagined that he heard prophetic voices and saw prophetic visions, he always would do much to prevent any besides his own family from seeing him; and now Lois, by a process terrible or thin reasoning, felt herself drawn from her own side to his face, when she saw it, colorless and deformed by intensity of expression, pressing over a score of others all simply ready and angry, that he was in such a state that his mother would in vain by her counsel to prevent him making himself conspicuous. Whatever focus or argument Grace used, it was of no avail. In another moment he was by her side, stamping with excitement and giving vague testimony, which would have been of little value in a calm court of justice, and was only all the more smouldering fire of that audience.

"Away with her to the stake! Seek out the witches!" "The sin has spread into all houses, bodies!" "Satan is in the very midst of us!" "Strike and spare not!" "Fire, fire!" Cotton Mather raised his voice in loud prayer, in which he assumed the guise of the accuser, as, no one listened; all were anxious to secure Lois, as if they feared she would vanish from before their very eyes; she, white, trembling, palpitating, quite still in the tight grasp of stronger, fierce men, but dilated eye very nearly starting out of her head, and in search of some pitiful face—some pitiful face that among all these hundreds was not to be found. While some fetched and tied her hands and others, by low questions, suggested new accusations to the diseased brain of the sufferer, Manasseh obtained a hearing once more. Addressing Dr. Cotton Mather, he said, evidently anxious to make clear his argument and what he had just announced itself to him: "Sir, in this matter, be she witch or not, the end has been foretold, and I am in the spirit of prophecy. Now, reverend Sir, if the event is known to the spirit, it must have been foreknown in the counsels of God. If so, why punish her for doing that in which she had no free-will?"

"Stop man," said Dr. Mather, bending down from the pulpit, and looking very severely upon Manasseh, "take care! you are trenching on blasphemy."

"I do not care. I say it again. Either Lois Barclay is a witch, or she is not. If she is not, she has been foredoomed for her, for I have seen a vision of her death as a condemned witch for many months past—and if she is not she must have had no sin to escape for her. Lois—the voice you know—" In his excitement he began to wander a little, but he was touching to see how conscious he was that by giving way he would lose the thread of the incipient argument by which he hoped to prove that Lois ought not to be punished, and with what an effort he wrenched his imagination back to the point of his ideas, and strove to concentrate all his mind upon the plea that, if Lois was a witch, it had been shown him by prophecy; and if she was not a prophecy, there must be foreknowledge; if foreknowledge, fatalism; if fatalism, no exercise of free-will, and, therefore, that Lois was not justly amenable to punishment.

On he went, plunging into heresy, caring not, growing more and more passionate every instant, but directing his passion into keen arguments, keen personal remarks, and allowed of it to excite his imagination. Even Dr. Mather felt himself on the point of being carried away by the passion of the congregation, who, but a short half hour ago, looked upon him as all but infallible. Keep a good hurst, Cotton Mather! perspicuous eye begins to glare and flicker with a terrible yet uncertain light—hands grown less coherent, and his arguments are mixed up with wild glimpses at wilder revelations made to himself only. He had touched at the limits that he entered the borders of blasphemy, and with an awful cry of horror and reprobation the congregation rose up, as if one man, against the blasphemer. Dr. Mather smiled a grim smile, and the people were ready to scize Manasseh, who was, regardless, talking and raving.

"Say, stay!" said Grace Hickson. (All the decent family shame which prompted her to conceal the mysterious misfortune of her son Lois from public knowledge was done away with by the sense of the immediate danger to his life.) "Touch him not. He knows not what he says. He is not fit is upon him. I tell you the truth before God. My son, my only son, is mad."

They stood aghast at the intelligence. The grave young citizen who had silently taken his part in life class by them in their daily lives—had mixing much with them, it was true, but looked up to, perhaps, all the more—the student of Hebrew books on theology to fit converse with the most learned scholastics that ever came about those parts—was the same with the man saw pouring out wild words to Lois the witch, as if he and she were the only two present? A solution of it all appeared to them. He was another victim. Great was the power of Satan! Through the arts of the devil, that white statue of a girl had mastered the soul of Manasseh Hickson. So the word spread from mouth to mouth. And Grace heard it. It seemed a healing balsam for her wounds. With wilful, dishonest blindness she would not see—even in her secret heart would she acknowledge that Manasseh's mind was disordered only, and violent long before the English girl had reached Salem. She even found some specious reason for its attempt at suicide by fire. It was a distraction from a fever, and though tolerably well in health, the mind was subject to fever fits. But since Lois came how headstrong he had been at times! how unreasonable! how acute! A very strange delusion was that which he was under of being bidden by some voice to marry her! How could Manasseh, who was but a boy, be so under some compulsion of election? And over all reigned the fact that he was never indeed suffering from being bewitched, he was not mad, and might again assume the honorable position he had held in the congregation and in the town, which he spoilt for which he was held was destroyed. So Grace yielded to the wishes of the congregation and others, that Lois Barclay had bewitched both Manasseh and Prudence. And the consequence of this belief in these days was, that Lois was to be tried, with little chance in her favor, to see whether she was a witch or not; and if a witch, whether she would confess, whether she would die, or whether a fit of bitter shame, avoided by all men, and cruelly avoided by her own mother, would indeed, destroying her crime upon the gallows.

And so they dragged Lois away from the congregation of Christ-men to the jail to await her trial. I say "dragged her," because, although she was docile enough, and did not question whither they would, she was now so faint as to require extraneous force to support her. Her limbs were paralyzed and tended lovingly in her state of exhaustion, but, instead, was so detested by the multitude, that they were glad to see her removed from Salem to all his evil doings, that they cared no more how they treated her than a careless boy cares how he treats the toad that is going to be crushed by the wall.

When Lois came to her full senses she found herself lying on a short, hard bed in a dark square room, which she at once knew must be a part of the jail of Salem. It was empty, however; it had stone walls on every side, and a grated opening high above her head, which let in the light and air that could enter in about a square foot of aperture. It was so lonely, so dark to that poor child, that she could not help crying out of her long faint. She did to want human help in that strange place. But no one answered her cry for a swoon; when the effort is to clutch at life, and the effort seems too much for the will. She did not at first understand where she was, and did not understand how she came to be there, nor did she care to understand. Life was so much to be in life still, and let the hurrying palace have time to calm. So she that her eyes once more. Slowly the cell, by the evolutions of day, or by the moving house shapes itself into a kind of picture before her. She saw that it was a square, and presents century read this tale, that witchcraft was a real terror to the people of Salem in the seventeenth century ago. The look on their faces, stamped on heart and brain, excited in her a sort of strange sympathy with them. She knew that the whole belief had obtained the terrible power over her and her will, if others believed it, and that she herself also indeed be possessed by a demon and be indeed a witch, and yet till now have been unconscious of it. She remembered the circumstances of the singular visitations all she had ever heard on the subject—and the explanation of them—and the very presence and power of Satan—every angry thought against her neighbor, against the impertinences of Prudence, against the unkindness of her own aunt, the persevering, crazy suit of Manasseh, the indignation of her mother, against the cruel, cruel, cruel time—as Faith's injustice. Oh! could such evil thoughts have had devilish power given to them by the devil? Was it by the devil's suggestion to herself, have gone forth as active curses into the world? And was she the cause of—remembering by through the poor girl's brain—the girl thrown inward upon herself. At length the sting of her self-reproach was so great that she involuntarily exclaimed, "I am a witch!"

What was this? A weight of iron on her legs—a weight stand afterward, by the jailer of Salem prison, to have been "not more than eight pounds." It was well for Lois it was a tangible ill, bringing with it sensations that she could realize, and which her imagination was wandering. She took hold of the iron, and found that it was fixed to her ankle, and began to cry pitifully out of strange compassion with herself. These feared, then, that she was a witch, she would find out for herself. Why, the utter ridiculous impossibility of the supposition, coupled with the consciousness of the horrors of all supernatural power; and the heavy iron brought her strangely round from the delusion of her mind to the more ready to sense.

No! she never could fly out of that deep tunnel of a window, she was no cat—no creature supernatural, for her ankers by man's mercy. And what was man's mercy in such times of panic? Lois knew that it was none. Her own aunt's mercy had been taught her that panic almost cowardice, and cowardice cruelty. Yet she cried, cried freely, and for the first time, when she found herself ironed and chained. It seemed so cruel, so much as if her fellow-creatures had really learned to hate and dread her—her, who had had a few angry thoughts, which, God forgive, but whose thoughts had never gone into words, far less into actions. Why, now she could love all the household at home if they would but let her; yes, even yet, though she felt that it was the open accusation of Prudence and the withheld justifications of her aunt and Faith that had brought her to her present straits. Would they ever come and see her? Would kinder thoughts of her—she who had shared their daily bread for months and months—bring them to see her, and ask her whether it were really she who had brought on the illness of Prudence, the derangement of Manasseh's mind?

No one came. Bread and water were pushed in by some one, who hastily locked and unlocked the door, and cared not to see if he put them within his prisoner's reach, or perhaps thought that physical fact would contribute to a witch. It was long before Lois could reach them, and she had sometimes to go without food for hours. But since Lois came how headstrong he had been at times! how unreasonable! how acute! A very strange delusion was that which he was under of being bidden by some voice to marry her! How could Manasseh, who was but a boy, be so under some compulsion of election? And over all reigned the fact that he was never indeed suffering from being bewitched, he was not mad, and might again assume the honorable position he had held in the congregation and in the town, which he spoilt for which he was held was destroyed. So Grace yielded to the wishes of the congregation and others, that Lois Barclay had bewitched both Manasseh and Prudence. And the consequence of this belief in these days was, that Lois was to be tried, with little chance in her favor, to see whether she was a witch or not; and if a witch, whether she would confess, whether she would die, or whether a fit of bitter shame, avoided by all men, and cruelly avoided by her own mother, would indeed, destroying her crime upon the gallows.

And so they dragged Lois away from the congregation of Christ-men to the jail to await her trial. I say "dragged her," because, although she was docile enough, and did not question whither they would, she was now so faint as to require extraneous force to support her. Her limbs were paralyzed and tended lovingly in her state of exhaustion, but, instead, was so detested by the multitude, that they were glad to see her removed from Salem to all his evil doings, that they cared no more how they treated her than a careless boy cares how he treats the toad that is going to be crushed by the wall.

When Lois came to her full senses she found herself lying on a short, hard bed in a dark square room, which she at once knew must be a part of the jail of Salem. It was empty, however; it had stone walls on every side, and a grated opening high above her head, which let in the light and air that could enter in about a square foot of aperture. It was so lonely, so dark to that poor child, that she could not help crying out of her long faint. She did to want human help in that strange place. But no one answered her cry for a swoon; when the effort is to clutch at life, and the effort seems too much for the will. She did not at first understand where she was, and did not understand how she came to be there, nor did she care to understand. Life was so much to be in life still, and let the hurrying palace have time to calm. So she that her eyes once more. Slowly the cell, by the evolutions of day, or by the moving house shapes itself into a kind of picture before her. She saw that it was a square, and presents century read this tale, that witchcraft was a real terror to the people of Salem in the seventeenth century ago. The look on their faces, stamped on heart and brain, excited in her a sort of strange sympathy with them. She knew that the whole belief had obtained the terrible power over her and her will, if others believed it, and that she herself also indeed be possessed by a demon and be indeed a witch, and yet till now have been unconscious of it. She remembered the circumstances of the singular visitations all she had ever heard on the subject—and the explanation of them—and the very presence and power of Satan—every angry thought against her neighbor, against the impertinences of Prudence, against the unkindness of her own aunt, the persevering, crazy suit of Manasseh, the indignation of her mother, against the cruel, cruel, cruel time—as Faith's injustice. Oh! could such evil thoughts have had devilish power given to them by the devil? Was it by the devil's suggestion to herself, have gone forth as active curses into the world? And was she the cause of—remembering by through the poor girl's brain—the girl thrown inward upon herself. At length the sting of her self-reproach was so great that she involuntarily exclaimed, "I am a witch!"

What was this? A weight of iron on her legs—a weight stand afterward, by the jailer of Salem prison, to have been "not more than eight pounds." It was well for Lois it was a tangible ill, bringing with it sensations that she could realize, and which her imagination was wandering. She took hold of the iron, and found that it was fixed to her ankle, and began to cry pitifully out of strange compassion with herself. These feared, then, that she was a witch, she would find out for herself. Why, the utter ridiculous impossibility of the supposition, coupled with the consciousness of the horrors of all supernatural power; and the heavy iron brought her strangely round from the delusion of her mind to the more ready to sense.

No! she never could fly out of that deep tunnel of a window, she was no cat—no creature supernatural, for her ankers by man's mercy. And what was man's mercy in such times of panic? Lois knew that it was none. Her own aunt's mercy had been taught her that panic almost cowardice, and cowardice cruelty. Yet she cried, cried freely, and for the first time, when she found herself ironed and chained. It seemed so cruel, so much as if her fellow-creatures had really learned to hate and dread her—her, who had had a few angry thoughts, which, God forgive, but whose thoughts had never gone into words, far less into actions. Why, now she could love all the household at home if they would but let her; yes, even yet, though she felt that it

But rest gave her back her power of thought and suffering. Was it indeed true that she was to die? She, Lois Barclay, only eighteen, so well, so young, so full of love and hope as she had been till but these little days past. What would they think of it at home—real, dear home at Hartford, in England? There they had loved her; there she had gone about singing and rejoicing all the day long in the sunshine, and looking to the Avonside. All they did father and mother did, and leave her their blessing to come home to them in the old England always, where no one had wanted her, no one had cared for her, and where now they were going to put her to a miserable death as a witch. She remembered the one to send kindly messages by to these she should never see more. Never more. Her poor, very loving, and joyful—probably thinking of her, and of his declared intention of coming to fetch her home to his wife with his own hands. Probably he had forgotten her; no one knew. A week before she would have thought the supposition her own distrust in thinking for a minute that he could forget. Now, she doubted all men's goodness for a time; her imagination wound her round and round, and relations.

Then she tossed round, and beat herself with angry blows (to speak in images) for ever doubting of her love. Did she never love him? Oh! if she might but be with him! He would rest her life, but would hide her in his bosom from the wrongs of this people, and carry her back to the old home at Bedford. And he might even be now travelling on with her own, coming nearer every moment, and yet she to die before all!

So the thoughts chased each other through her head all that feverish night, till the clang almost distinct by a sound of bolts and bars. But she might not die; at least, not just yet, and she so young!

Some Tappan and certain elders roused her up from a heavy sleep late on the morning of the following day. All night long she had dreamed and cried, till morning light had come peering in through the square grating up above. It soothed her, and she fell to sleep, and to be awakened, as I said, by Pastor Tappan.

"Arise!" he said he, scrupling to touch her, from his superstitious idea of her evil powers. "It is monday."

"Monday am I?" said she, bewildered at this unusual wakening, and the array of severe faces all gazing upon her with consternation.

"You are in Salem jail, condemned for a witch."

"Alas! I had forgotten for an instant," said she, dropping her head upon her hands.

"She has been out on a devilish ride all night long, doubtless, and has not yet repented upon this morning," whispered one, in so low a voice that he did not think she could hear; but she lifted up her head, and looked at him, and he trembled.

"We are come," said Pastor Tappan, "to ensure you to confess your private and public sin."

"My great and manifold sin," repeated Lois to herself, shaking her head.

"Of your league of witchcraft. If you will confess, there may yet be balm in Gilead."

One of the elders, who had looked at the young girl's wan, drunken look, said, that if she confessed, and repented, and did penance, that possibly the Church might yet be spared.

A sudden flash of light came into her sunk, veiled eyes. "Spared she cried she yet be spared in her power? Why, no one knew how soon Ralph Lacy might be here to take her away forever into the love of her new home! Then, if Manasseh's hope was not over-perhaps she might yet live, and not die. And the truth came once more out of her lips, almost without any exercise of her will.

"I am not a witch," she said.

Then Pastor Tappan blindfolded her, all unrestraining, but with languid wonder in her heart as to what was the reason for it, and then proceeded to enumerate about with dangers and enemies did she accuse. Those in the congregation, in the open assembly, who had perceived that they were many—kept on eager talking in low voices. She did not try to make out each awful name—the fragments of sentences that reached her dulled brain, till all at once a word or two made her suddenly aware that they were using the desired-lessness of applying the whip or the torture to make her confess, and reveal to what extent the spell she had been under by them whom she had bewitched could be dissolved. A thrill of affright ran through her; and she cried out, unconsciously.

"I beg you, Sirs, for God's mercy sake, that you do not use such awful means. I will say anything—nay, I may accuse any one if I am subjected to such torment as I have heard talked of. Let me, I pray you, be a young girl, and not very brave, or very good, as some are."

It caused the hearts of one or two to see her standing there; the tears streaming down from below the cover that had been blindfolded over her eyes; the clanking chain fastening the heavy weight to the slight ankle; the two hands held together in the act of wring-down a supplication.

"Lois!" said one of them. "She is weeping. They say no witch can weep tears."

But another scoffed at this test, and bade the first remember how those of her own family, the Hicksons even, bore witness against her.

Once more she was bidden to confess. The charges, esteemed by all men (so they said) to have been proven against her, were read over to her, with all the testimony borne against her in proof thereof. They told her that, considering the godly family to which she belonged, it had been decided by the magistrates and ministers of Salem that she should have her life spared for she would own her guilt, make reparation, and submit to penance; but that if not, she, and others convicted of witchcraft along with her, were to be hung in Salem market-place on the next Thursday morning (Thursday being market-day). And when they had thus spoken they waited silently for her answer. It was a minute or two before she spoke. She had sat down again upon the bed meanwhile, for indeed she was very weak. She asked, "May I have this hanging over me unbound from my eyes, for indeed, Sir, it hurts me?"

The occasion for which she was blindfolded being over, the bandage was taken off, and she was allowed to see. She looked pitifully at the stern faces around her, in grim suspense as to what her answer would be. Then she spoke:

"Sir, I would have death with a quiet conscience rather than life to be gained by a lie. I am not a witch. I know not hardly what you mean when you say so. I have told you many, many things very wrong in my life; but I think God will forgive me for my heinous sins now.

"Take not His name on your wicked lips," said Pastor Taspan, enraged at her resolution of not confessing, and secretly able to keep himself from striking her. She saw the desire he had, and shrank away in horror. Then Pastor Taspan, solemnly read the legal condemnation of Lois Barclay to death by hanging, as convicted witch. She remained unmoved, with a quiet look of fearfulness, but which was not like a prayer for pity and compassion for her poor sins and miserable fate. Then they left her to all the horrors of that solitary, loathsome dungeon, and the strange terror of approaching death.

Outside the prison walls the dread of the witches, and the excitement and wonder caused by their fearful rapidity. Numbers of women, and men, too, were accused, no matter what their station of life and their former character had been. On the other side, it is alleged that upward of fifty persons were grievously cursed by the dying witches to whom he is suspected of his power for vile and wicked considerations. How much of malice, distinct, unmistakable personal malice, was mixed up with these accusations, no one can now tell. For this statistic of this time of fear and horror is wrapped deadly by confessing themselves guilty, one hundred and fifty were in prison, more than two hundred accused, and not one of them escaped death, saving whom was the minister I have called Nolan, who was additionally tormented by being robbed through hatred of his co-pastor. One old man, nursing the accusation, and refusing to plead at his trial, was pressed to death by stones piled on death for his contumacy. Nay, even dogs were accused of witchcraft, suffered the penalties of the law, and are recorded as having undergone capital punishment. One young man found means to effect his mother's escape from the prison-house, and her own brother, and arrested her in the Bloody Ferry Swamp, not far from Taylor's Brook, in the Great Pasture, but concealed her from the officers which he built for her shelter, provided her with food and clothing, and comforted her in her misery, but until after the delusion had passed away. The poor creature met, however, have suffered dreadfully, for most of them were friendless in the sad desperate effort of getting her out of prison.

But there was one who was not left in Lois. Grace Hickson would fain have ignored her altogether. Such a trial did witchcraft bring upon a whole family that generations of Hicksons after it was not at that day esteemed sufficient to wash it out. Indeed, there were moments when Grace, along with most people of her tone, believed most firmly in the reality of the crime of witchcraft. Poor, forlorn, Lois was believed in by nobody, or added to her torture, for the jailer, in an unusually communicative mood, told her that the only sure cell was now full of witches; and it was possible he might have to put one, if more came, in with her. Lois knew that she was not a witch herself, but not the less did she believe that the crime was abroad, and had been cursed in by evil-minded persons who had chosen to give up their souls to Satan; and she shuddered with terror at what the jailer said, and would have asked him to tell her what this companionship if it were possible. But somehow her senses were benumbed, and she could not remember the right words in which to form her request, until he had left the prison.

The only person who yearned after Lois—who would have befriended her if he could—was Master Jeremy Lewis, the parish priest, who was old and outrageous in his talk that it was all his mother could do to keep his state concealed from public observation. She had for this purpose provided him a sleeping potion; and while he lay heavy and most under the influence of it, she would go to her mother bound him with cords to the heavy, antique bed in which he lay. She looked broken-hearted while she did this office, and was always weeping over the degradation of her first-born—him of whom she had ever been so proud.

Late that evening Grace Hickson stood in Lois's cell, loaded and chained as to her eyes. Lois was sitting quietly, and her pale, silly face with a look of one of the magistrates had dropped out of his pocket that morning. After such a visitor as that for her an instant or two in silence before Lois seemed aware of her presence. Suddenly she looked up, and uttered a cry, for she was standing by her in dark figure. Then, as if her cry had loosened Grace's tongue, she said:

"Lois Barclay, did I ever do you any harm?" Grace did not know how often her want of loving-kindness had pierced the tender heart of the stranger under her roof; nor did Lois remember it against her now. Instead, Lois's memory was filled with grateful thoughts of how much that might have been left, undone, by a less conscientious person, her own had done for her, and she half stretched out her arms as to a friend in that desolate place, as she answered:

"Oh no, no! you were very good! very kind!"

But Grace stood immovable.

"I did you no harm, although I never rightly knew why you came under my roof."

"I was sent by my mother on her death-bed," moaned Lois, covering her face. It grew darker every instant. Her aunt stood, still and silent.

"Did any of mine ever wrong you?" she asked, after a time.

"No, no; never, till Prudence said— Oh, aunt, do you think I am a witch?" And now Lois was standing up, holding by Grace's cloak, and trying to read her face. Grace drew herself, ever so little, away from her, as she said, solemnly and, yet sought to propitiate.

"Woe unto you, rather than I, have said it. But oh, Lois, Lois! he was my first-born. Loss him from the demon, for the sake of Him whom name I dare not name in this terrible building, filled with them who have renounced the hopes of their baptism, tell me truly, truly, in this awful state, if ever I or mine did you a kindness!"

"You ask me for Christ's sake," said Lois. "I can name that holy name—I, who have indeed, and in laly truth, I am no witch; and yet I am to die—to be hanged. And you ask me with his name! I am so young, and I never did any one any harm that I know of."

"Hush! for very shame! This afternoon I have bound my first-born with strong cords to keep him from doing himself or others mischief—he is so frenzied. Lois Barclay, look here!"—and Grace knelt down at her niece's feet, and joined her hands as if in prayer—"I am a grievous woman, God forgive me! and I never thought to kneel to my own flesh. And now I am come to ask you to pray you to release my children, more especially my son Manasseh, from the spells you have put upon them. Say but the word, and I will pray to the Almighty for you, if yet there may be mercy."

"I can not do it; I never did you or yours any wrong. How can I undoit? How can I?" And she wrung her hands in the agony of conviction of the inutility of aught she could do.

Here Grace grew, slowly, stiffly, and sternly. She stood aloof from the chained girl in the remote corner of the prison-cell near the door, ready to shake her curses on her head if she refused the wish, who would not, or could not, undo the evil she had wrought. Grace lifted up her hands slowly, and held it up on high, as she doomed Lois to be accursed forever, for her deadly sin, and her want of mercy over a dying child. Then, as if Heaven summoned her to meet her at the judgment-seat, and answer for every idle injury done to both souls and bodies of those who had come to her, and received her when she came to them an orphan and a stranger.

Until this last summons Lois had stood as one who hears her sentence and can say nothing against it; for she knows at whose hands it is dealt: but she lifted her head when she heard her aunt speak of the judgment-seat of Heaven, and as if by instinct she, too, lifted up her right hand, as if solemnly pledging herself by that action, and replied:

"Aunt, I will meet you there. I am sure you will know my innocence of this deadly thing. God will've mercy on me, I trust."

Her calm voice maddened Grace, and making a gesture as if she plucked up a handful of dust off the floor and threw it in Lois's face, she cursed:

"Witch! witch! ask mercy for thyself—I need not your prayers, nor your pity, nor your mercy, nor ward. I spit at thee, and defy thee!" And so she went away.

Lois sat mourning all that night through. "God comfort me! God strengthen me!" was all she could remember to say. But in the morning, when nothing more—all other fears and wants seemed dead within her. And when the jailer brought in her breakfast she was so composed, so quiet, that he "gone silly" for, indeed, she did not seem to know him, but kept looking inward with joy, and whispering softly to herself, smiling a little from time to time.

But God did comfort her, and strengthen her too. Late on that Wednesday afternoon they learned wisdom, and the fear of God, which is love, with opprobrious words, keep company together. The new-comer fell prostrate with the pain given her by remembrance, and came to Lois, crying any thing but an old ragged woman lying helpless on the floor, and making herself less, and so! it was Nattee—dirty, filthy indeed, neglected, stone-stricken, beaten, and all astray in her mind with the treatment she had received from the mob outside. Lois held her in her arms, and softly sang into the ear of the poor old woman, who, instead crying over it as she had hardly yet cried over her own sorrows. For hours the tender the old Indian woman, gradually, as the darkness fell on the poor scattered senses of the savage creature whom lonely forlornness of age and misery, and fear of the morrow, when she, too, as well as Lois, was to be led out to die, in face of all that infuriated crowd. Lois sang on, and on, and on, the only source of comfort for the old woman, who shook in her own in the trembling palsy at the dread of death —and such a death.

When all was quiet through the prison in the deep dead stillness, the jailer's wife, who had heard Lois telling, as if to a young child, the nursery tales and sorrowful story of one who died on the cross for us and for our sakes. As long as she spoke, the Indian woman's terror seemed lulled; but that intent ear appeared to have caught the first cried out afresh, as if some wild beast were following her into her retreat, and she moaned and rocked, as she had dwelt in her youth. And then Lois went on, saying all the blessed words she could remember, and comforting the helpless Indian woman with the news of the presence of a Heavenly Friend. And in comforting her, Lois was comforted; in strengthening her, Lois was strengthened.

The morning came, and the summons to come forth and die came. They who entered the cell found Lois asleep, her face resting on the slumbering old woman, whose head she still held in her lap. She did not seem clearly to know where she was when she awakened; the "silly" look had returned to her eyes; and when she spoke, what she was that somehow or another, through some peril or another, she had to protect the poor Indian woman. She smiled faintly when she saw the bright light of the April day; and put her arm round Nattee, and tried to keep that Indian quiet with hushing, soothing words of broken meaning, and inly fragments of the Psalms. Nattee tightened her hold upon Lois as they drew near the gallows, and the outrageous crowd below began to hoot and cry. Lois comforted her efforts and sent encouragee Nattee, seemingly unconscious that any of the agonies of the hooting, the tumult, the mud, was directed toward herself. But when they took Nattee from her arms, and led her out to the cart which was to conduct all to one to recover her sense of the present terror. She gazed wildly around, strengthened by the sight of the poor one son in the distance, who was yet visible to her, and cried out once with a voice that thrilled through all who heard her lady number!"—and directed the body of Lois the Witch swung in the air, and every one was still with hushed breath, to see and even wonder, like a fear of deadly crime, fallen upon them.

The stillness and the silence were broken by one crazed nut mad, who came rushing up the steps of the ladder and caught Lois's body in his arms, and kissed her lips with wild passion. And then, as if it were true what the people believed, that he was possessed by a demon, he sprang down, and rushed through the crowd, out of the bounds of the city, and into the dark dense forest. And Manasseh Hickson was no more seen of Christian men.

The people of Salem had awakened from their frightful delusion before the magistrates Captain Holdoreness and Ralph Lucy came to find out Lois, and bring her home to peaceful Barford, in the pleasant county of England. There, they led them to the grassy grave where she lay at rest, close to those of her parents. And Lois Barclay shook the dust of his feet in quitting Salem, with its heavy, heavy curse, and lived a beacher all his life long for her sake.

Long years afterward Captain Holdereness thought him one day in the street, and since he thought might interest the grave miller of the witches. Captain Holdereness told him that in the previous year, in the autumn 1713, the sentence of excommunication against the witches of Salem was ordered to be publicly read throughout all the Church to be erased and blotted out, and that those who met together for this purpose "humbly requested the mercy of God would forgive whatever sin, error, or mistake was in the application of justice therein, and that whatever blood was shed, knoweth how to have compassion on the ignorant, and those that are out of the way." He also said that Chief Justice Sewall—who, however—had made a most touching and pungent declaration of sorrow and repentance for his share in the delusion, for the false and mistaken testimony she had given in several instances, among which she particularly mentioned that of Lois Barclay, "which I do." And to which Chief Justice Lucy only answered,

"I repentance of theirs can bring her back to life."

Then Captain Holdereness took out a paper, and read the following as the public declaration of regret on the part of them who signed it, among whom Grace Hickson's name was:

"We, whose names are undersigned, being, in the year 1692, called to serve as jurors in court at Salem, on trial of many persons that were accused of witchcraft, by the acts of witchcraft upon the bodies of sundry persons; we confess that we ourselves were not capable to understand, nor able justly to determine in the righteous balance of the powers of darkness, and prince of the air, but were, for want of knowledge in ourselves, and others to inform us from others, prevailed with to take up with such evidences against witches as now we justly bewail mistake, and better information, we justly fear was insufficient for the touching the lives of any persons; and do willingly we fear we have been instrumental, with others, through the prevailing belief we were under of the power of witches and their people of the Lord the guilt of innocent blood, which is supposed to have been shed upon the account (see 2nd Kings, xxiv. 4), that is, we suppose, in not discerning betwixt the innocent and the guilty. Do humbly desire to be humbled for the sin of our errors, and pray that we may not be reckoned unto us for blood, neither we nor others, but that God would please graciously to accept of the sorrows of such as mourn sincerely, and to give rest unto this people, from the heavy calamities which are upon the account of this sad mistake and delusion, and to remember the righteous seed of Abraham, who are fallen into our hands, and pardon that rash censuring of them, which we have been guilty of, and not visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, we humbly pray for these poor children, who were not capable to act for themselves, and that God would please graciously to remember mercy, and not cut off a posterity wherein he hath been unjustly provoked to make us a prey to the devouring enemy, who designs our destruction, and bereaving us of our children, as we have been accessory to the bereaving of many parents, and pray that God would not impute the guilt of it to us, nor to his holy people in general, but also pray that we may be considered candidly and aright by the living and dying parents whose children have been taken away by the sword, and that God would please graciously to accept our poor attempt to wipe off the reproach cast upon the whole country by the late tragedy raised among us by the accusations of the infatuated people, in the midst of a strong and general delusion, utterly unacquainted with, and unskilful in matters of that nature."

We do heartily ask forgiveness of you all, whom we have justly offended by this our error, referring to our present minds, we would none of us do such things again on the like grounds, humbly craving pardon for what is past, and praying for the continuance of the Lord, that He may be entreated for the land.

"FOREMEN, THOMAS FISK, etc."

To the reading of this paper Ralph Lucy made no reply save a sigh, even more genuinely than usual.

"All their repentance will avail nothing to my son, nor will it bring back his life."

Then Captain Holdereness spoke once more, and said that on the day of the general fast, appointed to be held all over Salem and Barford, when the meeting-houses were crowded, an old, old man of Salem Village arose, and stood up in the midst, and he was accustomed to worship, and had handed up into the pulpit a written confession, which he had once or twice essayed to read for himself, acknowledging his great and grievous error in the matter of the witches of Salem, and praying for the forgiveness of God and of his people, ending with an entreaty that all then present would join with him in prayer that his past conduct might not bring down the displeasure of the Most High upon his country, his family, or himself. And that the man who was no other than Justice Sewall, remained standing all the time that his confession was read; and at the end he said, "The good and gracious God is pleased to bring me to a sight and sense of my family." And then it came out that for years past Judge Sewall had set apart a day for humiliation and prayer to keep fresh in his mind a sense of repentance and sorrow for the part he had long in these trials, and that this solemn anniversary he was pledged to keep as long as he lived, to show his feeling of deep humiliation.

Ralph Lucy's voice trembled as he spoke. "All this will not bring my Lois to life again, or give back the years of my youth."

But—as Captain Holderness shook his head (for he knew could take no other view of the matter than we so evidently true?)—Ralph added, "What is to day, know you, that this justice has set apart?"

"The twenty-ninth of April."

"Then on that day will I, here at Barford in England, join my prayers as long as I live with the repentant judge, that his sin may be blotted out, and no more had in remembrance. She would have willed it so."

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER I.

THE wretched wife of the innocent man thus doomed to die fell under the sentence as if she had been conscious of it all. But she lived on in sound; and so strong was the voice within her, representing that it was she of all the world who must uphold him in his misery and not sap, ment it, that it quickly raised her, even from that shock.

The judges having to take part in a public demonstration out of doors, the tribunal adjourned. The quick noise and excitement of the court's emptying itself by many passages had scarcely ceased when she stood standing out her arms toward her husband, with nothing in her face but love and consolation.

"If I might touch him, if I might embrace him once! Oh, good citizens, if you would have so much compassion for me!"

But there was but a jailer left, along with two of the four men who had taken him last night, and Barsad. The people had all poured out to the show in the streets. Barsad proposed to the rest, "Let her embrace him, then; it is but a moment." It was silently acquiesced in, and they passed her over the seats in the hall to a raised place, where he, by leaning over the dock, could fold her in his arms.

"Farewell, dear darling of my soul, farewell! parting blessing is left in you. I shall see you again, where the weary are at rest!"

They were her husband's words, as he held her to his bosom.

"I can bear it, dear Charles. I am supported from above: don't suffer for me. A parting blessing for our child."

"I send it to her by you. I kiss her by you. I say farewell to her by you."

"My husband. No! A moment. He was tearing himself away from her. We shall not be separated long. I feel that this will break my heart by-and-by; but I will do my duty while I can, and when I leave her, God will raise up friends for her as He did for me."

Her father's hold upon her neck would have fallen on his knees to both of them, but that Barsad put in a strong hand to prevent him, crying:

"No, no! What have you done, what have you done, that you should kneel to us! We know your husband, we know the nature of the old. We know now what you underwent when you suspected that your husband was dear to him. We know now the natural antipathy you strove against, and conquered, for her dear sake. We thank you that you have saved him from a life and duty. Heaven be with you!"

Her father's only answer was to draw his hands through his white hair, and wring them with a shriek of anguish.

"This is not the way to escape," said the prisoner. "All things have worked together as they have taken out. Be it so. Take me to the guillotine to discharge my poor mother's trust that first brought my fatal presence near you. Good could never be her father's lesson, and good was not in nature to so unhappy a beginning. Be comforted, and forgive me. Heaven bless you!"

As he was drawn away his wife released him, and stood fixed as a statue with her arms loosed touching one another in the attitude of prayer, and with a radiant look upon her face, in which there was even a comforting smile. As he went out at the prisoners' door she turned, laid her head lightly on her father's breast, tried to speak to him, and fell at his feet.

Then, issuing from the obscure corner from which he had arisen unnoticed, Sydney Carton came and took her up. Only her father and Mr. Lorry were there besides the two who stood as if raised her, and supported her head. Yet there was an air about Carton of such mastery that all else—even the figure of the child who was there—seemed instantly to fall into the background.

"Shall I take her to a coach? I shall never feel her weight."

He carried her lightly to the door, and laid her tenderly down in a coach. Her father and their old friend got into it, and he took his seat beside the driver.

When they arrived at the gateway where he had paused in the dark not many hours before, to picture to himself on which of the many stones of the street her feet had trodden, he lifted her again, and carried her up the staircase to their rooms.

There he laid her down on a couch, where her child and Miss Pross wept over her.

"Don't recall her to herself," he said, softly, to the latter, "she is better so; don't revive her to consciousness while she only faints."

"Oh, Carton, Carton, dear Carton!" cried little Lucie, springing up and throwing her arms passionately round him, in a burst of grief. "Now that you have come, I think you will do something to help mamma, something to save papa! Oh, look at her, dear Carton! Can you, of all the people who love her, bear to see her so?"

He bent over the child and laid her blooming cheek against his face. He put her gently from him, and looked at her unconscious mother.

"Before I go," he said, and paused. "I may kiss her?"

It was remembered afterward that when he bent down and touched her face with his lips he murmured some words. The child, who was nearest to him, told them afterward, and told her grandchildren when she was a handsome old lady, that she heard him say, "A life you love."

When he had gone out into the next room he turned suddenly on Mr. Lorry and her father, who were following, and said to the latter:

"You, sir, had great influence but yesterday, Doctor Manette; let it, at least, be tried. These judges, and all the men in power, are very friendly to you, and very recognizant of your services; are they not?"

"Nothing connected with Charles was concealed from me. I had the strongest assurances that I should save him; and I did." He returned that answer in a low voice, and repeated it slowly.

"Try them again. The hours between this and to-morrow afternoon are few and short; but try."

"I intend to try. I will not rest a moment."

"That's well. I have known such energy as yours do great things before now—though never," he added, with a smile and a sigh together, "such great things as this. But try! Of little worth as life is when we misuse it, it is worth that effort. It would cost nothing to lay down (if it were set)."

"I will go," said Doctor Manette, "to the Prosecutor and the President straight, and I will go to others whom it is better not to name. I will write, too, and—But stay! There is a celebration in the streets, and no one will be accessible until dark."

"That's true. Well! It is a forlorn hope at the best, and not much the stronger for being delayed till dark. I should like to know how you speed; though, mind! I expect nothing! When are you likely to have seen these dread powers, Doctor Manette?"

"Immediately after dark, I should hope. Within an hour or two from this."

"It will be dark soon after four. Let us stretch the hour or two. If I go to Mr. Lorry's at nine, shall I hear what you have done, either from our friend or from yourself?"

"Yes."

"May you prosper!"

Mr. Lorry followed Sydney to the outer door, and touching him on the shoulder as he was going away, roused him to say:

"I have no hope," said Mr. Lorry, in a low and sorrowful whisper.

"Nor have I."

"If any of these men, or all of these men, were disposed to spare him—which is a large supposition; for what is his life, or any man's, to them?—I doubt if they dare spare him after the demonstration in the Court."

"And so do I. I heard the fall of the axe in that sound."

Mr. Lorry leaned his arm upon the door-post, and bowed his face upon it.

"Don't despond," said Carton, very gently; "don't grieve. I encouraged Doctor Manette in this idea, because I felt that it might one day be consolatory to her. Otherwise, she might think his life was wantonly thrown away or wasted, and that might trouble her."

"Yes, yes, yes," returned Mr. Lorry, drying his eyes, "you are right. But be will perish; there is no real hope."

"Yes. He will perish: there is no real hope," echoed Carton; and walked with a steady pace down stairs.

CHAPTER XII.

DARKNESS.

Sydney Carton paused in the street, not quite decided where to go. "At Tellson's banking-house at nine," he said, with a musing face. "Shall I do well, in the mean time, to show myself? I think so. It is best that these people should know there is such a man as I. Actmg on that conviction, he walked on slowly, as a necessary preparation. But care, care, care! Let me think it over.

Checking his steps, which had begun to tend toward an object, he took a turn or two in the already thickening street, and roused the faculties in his mind to its possible consequences. His first impression was confirmed. "It is best," he said, finally resolved, "that these people should know there is such a man as I here." And he turned his face toward Saint Antoine.

Defarge had described himself that day as the keeper of a wine-shop in the Saint Antoine suburb. It was not difficult for one who knew the city well to find his house without asking any question. Having ascertained its situation, Carton came out of those closer streets again, and dined at a place of refreshment and wine, in a sound sleeper fither dinner. For the first time in many years he had an strong drink. Since last night he had taken nothing but a little light thin wine, and last night he had dropped the brandy slowly down on Mr. Lorry's floor, like a man who had done with it.

It was an hot time in the city when he awoke, refreshed, and went out into the streets again. As he passed along toward Saint Antoine he stopped at a shop where he could purchase pen, ink, and paper, and wrote a letter. He sealed it carefully, and addressed it to Mr. Lorry's care. Then he went on again, and coming to the wine-shop of Defarge, went in.

There happened to be no customer in the shop but Jacques Three, of the restless fingers and the croaking voice. Carton, entering, took a seat upon the Jury, stood drinking at the little counter, in conversation with the Defarges, man and wife. He had original motives for his conversation like a regular member of the establishment.

As Carton walked in, took his seat, and asked (in very indifferent French) for a small measure of wine, Madame Defarge cast a careful glance at him, and then a keener, and then a keener, and then advanced to him herself, and asked him what it was he had ordered.

He repeated what he had already said.

"English!" said Madame Defarge, superciliously raising her dark eyebrows.

After looking at her, as if the sound of even a single French word were slow to express itself to him, he answered, in his former strong foreign accent, "Yes, madame, I am English."

Madame Defarge returned to her counter to get the wine, and as he took up a Jacobin journal and feigned to pore over it puzzling out its meaning, he was aware that this woman, like Evremonde!"

Defarge brought him the wine, and gave him change from a piece.

"How?"

"Good-evening."

"Oh! Good-evening, citizen," filling his glass. "Ah! and good wine. I drink to the Republic."

Defarge went back to the counter and said, in a low voice, "Play!" Madame sat down reluctantly, "I tell you a good deal like." Jacques Three peacefully croaked, "Yes, my dear." Then they both resumed their former occupations.

"It is true what madame says," observed Jacques Three. "Why stop? There is great room in this. Why stop?"

"Well, well," reasoned Defarge, "but one must stop somewhere. After all, the question is still, where?"

"At extermination," said madame.

"Magnificent!" croaked Jacques Three. The Vengeance also highly approved.

"Extermination is good doctrine, my wife," said Defarge, rather troubled; "in general, I say nothing against it. But this Doctor has suffered much; you have seen him to-day; you have observed his face when the paper was read."

"I have observed his face!" repeated madame, contemptuously and angrily. "Yes, I have observed his face. I have observed his face to be not the face of a true friend of the Republic. Let him take care of his face!"

"And you have observed, my dear," said Defarge, in a deprecatory manner, "the anguish of his daughter, which must be dreadful an guish to him!"

"I have observed his daughter!" repeated madame; "yes, I have observed his daughter more times than one. I have observed her today, and I have observed her other days. I have observed her in the court, and I have observed her in the street by the prison. Let me but lift my finger—!" She seemed to rise (the listener's eyes were always on his paper), and to let it fall with a rattle on the heaps before her, as if the axe had dropped.

"The citizeness is superb!" croaked the Jurynan.

"She is an Angel!" said the Vengeance, and embraced her.

"As to thee," pursued madame, implacably, addressing her husband, "if I denebted on thee—which, happily, it does not—thou wouldst rescue this man even now."

"No!" protested Defarge. "Not if to lift this glass would do it! But I would leave the matter there. I say, stop there."

"See you then, Jacques," said Madame Defarge, wrathfully; "and see you too, my little Vengeance; see you both! Listen! For other crimes as tyrants and oppressors I have this race and name on my register, doomed to destruction and extermination. Ask my husband is that so."

"It is so," assented Defarge, without being asked.

"In the beginning of the great days, when the Bastile falls, he finds this paper of to-day, and he brings it home, and in the middle of the night, when this place is dark and shut, we read it, here on this spot, by the light of this lamp. Ask him is that so."

"It is so," assented Defarge.

"That night I tell him, when the paper is read through, and the lamp is burned out, and the day is gleaming in above these shutters and beneath these iron bars, that I have seen a secret to communicate. Ask him is that so."

"It is so," assented Defarge again.

"I communicate to him that secret. I smile that he may know with these two hands as I smite it now, and I tell him, 'Defarge, I was brought up among the fishermen of the sea-shore, and that peasant family is mine. Defarge, that sister was my sister, that husband was my sister's husband, that unborn child was their child, that brother was my brother, that father was my father, those dead are my dead, and that summons to answer for those things descends to me!' Ask him is that so."

"It is so," assented Defarge once more.

"Then tell Wind and Fire where to stop," returned madame, "but don't tell me."

Both her hearers derived a horrible enjoyment from the deadly nature of her wrath—the listener could feel how white she was, without seeing her—and both highly commended it. Defarge, a weak minority, interposed a few words for the memory of the compassionate wife of the Marquis; but only elicited from his own wife a repetition of her last reply. "Tell the Wind and Fire where to stop; not me!"

Customers entered, and the group was broken up. The English customer paid for what he had had, perplexedly counted his change, and asked, as a stranger, to be directed toward the National Palace. Madame Defarge took him to the door and put her arm on his in pointing out the road. The English customer was not without his reflections then that it might be a good deed to rescue that arm, lift it up, and strike under it sharp and deep.

But he went its way and was soon swallowed up in the shadow of the prison wall. At the appointed hour he emerged from it to present himself at Mr. Lorry's room again, where he found the old gentleman walking to and fro in restless anxiety. He said he had been set free, Lucie until just now, and had only left her for a few minutes to come and keep his appointment. Her father had not been seen since he quitted the banking-house toward four o'clock. She had some faint hopes that his mediation might save Charles, but they were very slight. He had been more than five hours gone: where could he be?

Mr. Lorry waited until tea; but Doctor Manette not returning, and he being unwilling to leave Lucie any longer, it was arranged that he should go back to her and come to the banking-house again at midnight. In the mean while, Carton would wait alone by the fire for the Doctor.

He waited and waited, and the clock struck twelve; but Doctor Manette did not come back. Mr. Lorry returned and found no tidings of him, and brought none. Where could he be?

They were discussing this question, and were almost building up some weak structure of hope on his prolonged absence, when they heard him on the stairs. The instant he entered the room it was plain that all was lost.

Whether he had really been to any one, or whether he had been all that time traversing the streets, could not be traced from his face. He stood staring at them they asked him no question, for his face told them every thing.

"I can not find it," said he, "and I must have it. Where is it?"

His hands had fallen upon it, and as he spoke, with a helpless look straying all around, he took his coat off and let it drop on the floor.

"Where is my bench? I have been looking every where for my bench and I can't find it. What have they done with my work? Time presses: I must finish those shoes."

They looked at one another, and their looks died within them.

"Come, come!" said he, in a whimpering, miserable way; "let me get to work. Give me my work."

Receiving no answer, he tore his hair and beat his feet upon the ground like a distracted child.

"Don't torture a poor forlorn wretch," he implored them, with a dreadful cry; "but give me my work! What is to become of us if those shoes are not done to-night?"

Lost, utterly lost!

It was no clearly beyond hope to reason with him or try to restore him, that—as if by agreement—they each put a hand upon his shoulder and soothed him to sit down before the fire, with a promise that he should have his work presently. He sank into the chair and brooded over the embers and shed tears. As if all that had happened since the garret time were a momentary fancy or a dream, Mr. Lorry saw him shrink into the exact figure that Defarge had had in keeping.

Affected and impressed with terror as they both were by this sudden spectacle of ruin, it was not a time to yield to such emotions. His lonely daughter, bereft of her final hope and reliance, appealed to them both too strongly. Again, as if by agreement, they looked at one another with one meaning in their faces. Carton was the first to speak:

"The last chance is gone: it was not much. Yet; he had better be taken to her child before you go will you, for a moment, steadily attend to me? Don't ask me why I make the stipulations I am going to make, and exact the promise I am going to exact; I have a reason—a good one."

"I do not doubt it," answered Mr. Lorry. "Say on."

The figure in the chair between them was all the time monotonously rocking itself to and fro, and moaning. They spoke of him as one as they would have used if they had been watching by a sick bed in the night.

Carton stooped to pick up the coat which lay almost entangling his feet. As he did so a small smile, in which a Doctor was concerned as to carry the list of his day's duties, fell lightly on the floor. Carton took it up and there was a folded paper in it. "We should look at this?" he said. Mr. Lorry nodded his consent. He opened it, and exclaimed, "Thank God!"

"What is it?" asked Mr. Lorry, eagerly.

"A memorial. Let me speak of it in its place. First," he put his hand in his coat and took another paper from it, "that is the certificate which enables me to pass out of this city. Look at it. You see—Sydney Carton, an Englishman?"

"I SWEAR TO YOU, LIKE EVREMONDE!"

Mr. Lorry held it open in his hand, gazing in his earnest face.

"Keep it for me until to-morrow. I shall see him to-morrow, you remember, and I had better not take it into the prison."

"Why not?"

"I don't know: I prefer not to do so. Now take this paper that Doctor Manette has entered about him. It is a similar certificate, enabling him and his daughter and her child at any time to pass the Barrier and the frontier? You see it?"

"Yes!"

"Perhaps he obtained it as his last and utmost precaution against evil, yesterday. When is it dated? But no matter; don't stay to look; put it up carefully with mine and your own. Now, observe it. I have doubled up inside that other one, the words that are underlined, so that the two front edges only are seen. Quick, and hide it!"

Mr. Lorry thrust the papers into his breast, and buttoned his coat. "Those words to be known by, destroy the genuine one, and substitute mine without producing it or allowing it to be seen. Is that well done?"

"Perfectly well."

"You are certain? Remember that the time is drawing on, and that anything may depend on your quickness."

"I am certain."

"Drink this!" He took a draught of the liquor, and shook his head as he returned the flask. "Now, my friend, commend me to your children this day, and tell them why I would wish to be remembered by them! And now, farewell! Farewell, dear friend! Farewell!"

He was moved beyond self-control, and his hand shook as he put it out of the door. "Farewell! A parting blessing for your daughter, who is dearer to you than life! Think of her, and bless her!"

"I am collected; I shall be so, directly. Say nothing to her of what has passed between us. To-morrow, before you go, I may tell her something. Adieu!"

Mr. Lorry was standing in the street, with his hand on the open door, looking back, when he saw her face disappear from the window.

He was a methodical man, and he had been long used to subdue his face to the expression of his desk, before he could trust himself to open it. When that was closed, he stood thinking at his post for some minutes. Then he advanced towards Temple Bar, reflecting on what had passed between him and Lucie. His first act was to place the papers he had in charge in the hands of his partner, and request him to assist in the disposal of them, unless he should be able to dispose of them himself before the next day.

Then he turned his face towards Soho, whither he had been bidden to repair immediately on his arrival in London.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Coughs.

The great and sudden changes of our climate are fruitful sources of Pulmonary and Bronchial affections. Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and certainly when taken in the early stage of the disease, recourse should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Lozenges, for the Cough or Irritation of the throat for ever so slight, as by this precaution a more protracted illness may be effectually warded off.

To Housekeepers.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the Extracts now offered for sale, and for purity and strength are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

Lester's Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines
AND
Woodworth's Planing Machines
Office 483 Broadway. J. H. LESTER.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND PERFECTION OF WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.
350 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SIXTH STREET, PITTSBURGH.
620 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
200 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
70 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

The "Crowning Glory."—A flowing, soft, luxuriant head of hair is considered the crowning glory of ladies' beauty. BARRY'S CELEBRATED TRICOPHEROUS OR HAIR ANTISEPTIC HAIR DESTROYER will produce this, and restore hair to the bald. It removes dandruff, allays dryness, and also restores the hair to its original silk color, black, brown, or auburn, and prevents it falling off. Sold by all Druggists, and by JULES HARDY & CO., No. 704 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,
FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A FAMILY PHYSIC,

are so compound that disease within the range of their action rarely withstand or evade them. They overcome proper derangements, and cleanse, and invigorate the internal organs, restoring their healthy tone and full exacted action, and restoring its healthy vitalities. As a consequence of these operations, those who take it are viewed down with pain or physical debility is astonished to find his health or energy restored by a remedy at once so simple and efficient.

Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also many formidable and dangerous diseases; such as Cutaneous, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Rheumatism, Scrofula, Piles, Rheumatism, Erysipelas and Skin Diseases, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, as a Dinner Pill, and for Purifying the Blood.

Their sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best aperient in the world for all the purposes of a family physic.

Price 25 cents per Box; Five Boxes for $1.00.

PREPARED BY
J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.
Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar,
513 Broadway,
Under the St. Nicholas Hotel.
HUDSON BAY SABLE,
MINK, MARTEN, RUSSIAN SABLE,
OF THE LATEST STYLES ROYAL ERMINE, CHILDREN'S FURS, IN ELEGANT VARIETY, STOCK LARGE, ASSORTMENT COMPLETE,
PRICES MODERATE.
GENIN'S BAZAAR,
513 Broadway.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our large importation of Garnet and Coral Jewelry, consisting of bracelets, brooches, ear-rings, necklaces, chains, sleeve buttons, studs, sets, &c., &c.
OSBORNE, HOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
No. 36 Maiden Lane, Manufacturers of Spring Jewelry.

REMOVAL.
JAMES BOGARDUS,
Architect in Iron, Engineer, Constructor, and Patentee of Iron Buildings,
Patentee and Manufacturer of
ROGARDUS'S PATENT CORRUGATED METAL.
Machine Room corner of Whitehead Iron Streets,
Office No. 201 Canal Street, near Centre, New York.
Iron Building corner of Duane and Thames Sts., formerly occupied, has been removed to widening Duane Street.

$5000 AGENTS WANTED.—To sell a very low-priced Family Machine (the only one so low,—better than all other similar agencies. Send for Circular. GRIFFIN BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

ARTHRAM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

PIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP
AND FAMILY BAR SOAP are confidently recommended for their emollient properties and delightful aroma.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my original formula, dated 1865, which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application. It is entirely free from injury to the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. A. G. GALLAH, 149 Nassau Street, New York.

Full Length Steel Engravings of WASHINGTON AND EVERETT.
Including a View of Mount Vernon,
In the Engraving of Washington. These splendid engravings are from original paintings by Healy, and are executed on steel in the highest style of Art. They are the finest Steel Engravings ever issued, and are worthy of so many names, otherwise galleries have been purchased upon the public as works of art—and especially in shape, finish, and mode engravings—that it is difficult to exercise process of taste that they are safe in ordering what have been sold as such. We have not yet met with artists their own prices, amounting to MANY THOUSAND DOLLARS, to produce TWO STEEL ENGRAVINGS EQUAL TO THESE, as well as THE BEST PORTRAITS, and that shall be AFFORDED AT THE LOWEST PRICES. Each of the Engravings has also been relied on.

From the Editor of the New York Observer says:—"These engravings are genuine works of art—like likenesses—and beautiful specimens of the highest order of steel engraving."

From The New York Christian Advocate says:—"They are among the finest engravings we have ever seen. THE PUBLISHERS ARE FULLY RESPONSIBLE FOR ALL THEY PROMISE."

TERMS ALMOST GRATIS.
We will send, POST PAID, securely packed in tubes—
Either Engraving and a $3 00 Magazine, one year, for $5.
Both Engravings and a $3 00 Magazine, one year, for $8.
AGENTS who remit $20 at one time will have an extra copy of such engraving. The Magazines are Harper's,
The Knickerbocker,
Godey's Lady's Book,
The Atlantic,
Hearth and Hickwood.
By special arrangement, the entire year's subscription to Magazine is paid over to the hands of publishers, and subscribers receive their supply for the year direct from their respective publication offices. The cost of the engravings is paid only by the difference between the price at which we obtain the regular price of the Magazine.
Engravings sent at once, and subscriptions to periodicals commence with current number, unless otherwise ordered. Money at our risk if proof is retained of having been mailed. Fifteen engravings are best, therefore send early. Address
A. E. BAILEY & CO.,
(At Wm. Hall & Son's Music Store.) 543 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

THE GUARDIAN
Life Insurance Company
OF NEW YORK,
Office in
CONTINENTAL BANK BUILDING,
No. 7 Nassau Street,
Is prepared to issue policies as follows, viz:
POLICIES IN FAVOR OF AND PAYABLE TO THE WIFE,
Free from the claims of creditors.
POLICIES PAYABLE ON ATTAINING A SPECIFIED AGE,
Or payable in case of death before attaining such age.
POLICIES PAYABLE TO CHILDREN,
On the lives of their debtors.
POLICIES GRANTED FOR ANY NUMBER OF YEARS.
PREMIUMS PAYABLE IN CASH,
Quarterly, semi-annually, or annually.
Dividends Declared Every Three Years.
And the surplus belonging to the policy-holders preserved to them in Scrip.
This Scrip bears six per cent. per annum interest, payable in cash, and the redemption thereof is commenced when the dividends now shall have produced the sum of $1,000,00.
At the same time, the Company is empowered by its charter to purchase the Scrip for the benefit of the policy holders before that time.
This Scrip is not affected by the forfeiture or sale of the policy, which is a great advantage over the system adopted by some Companies, of applying the dividend to the same terms of forfeiture and sale as the policy, by reducing it thereon. This is clearly unjust, as the dividend is a surplus fund, and is rightly the property of the insured, and not of the Company.
The interest on the Scrip gradually reduces the premium.
Directors:
JAMES T. SOUTHER, GEORGE OPDYKE,
DOUGLAS ROBINSON, E. V. HAUGHWOUT,
THOMAS RAGNEY, JAMES FISHER,
JOHN T. AGNEW, ROBERT SUTTER,
WM. M. VERMILYE, JAMES W. HALSTED,
W. H. PECKHAM, FRANCIS W. TAPPAN,
JOHN A. GRISWOLD, FREDERICK H. COSSITT,
WM. H. WRIGHT, E. H. GIBSON,
JOHN B. SCHIEFFELIN, WILLIAM H. HALL, Baltimore.
WILLIAM ALLEN, Baltimore. WM. WILKENS, Baltimore.
JAMES W. HALSTED, President.
HENRY V. GARLAND, Secretary.
J. SMITH HOMANS, Jr., Actuary.
CHARLES E. ANDREWS, Attorney and Counsellor.
R. P. HALSTED, M. D., } Medical
JOHN C. PETERS, M. D., } Examiners.

THE UNIVERSAL COUGH REMEDY
For all Lung Complaints
THE CELEBRATED COUGH REMEDY
The great Norwegian Remedy.
And Dr. Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.
The celebrated New England preparations are now being distributed through the country, to which we invite the attention of the trade, as they are reliable, and everything to strengthen confidence, may be found with dealers, and we ask all to call for them.
J. W. HUNNEWELL & Co., Commercial Wharf, Boston.
GEO. HUNNEWELL, 149 Water Street, New York.
Also for sale by the usual Wholesale Agents in every city.
J. L. HUNNEWELL, Pharmaceutist, Superintendent.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES
Are unsurpassed for patent satisfaction than any other machine in this market, or money refunded.
N.B.—Price Reduced to $50.
No. 355 Broadway.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
THE GREAT AMERICAN REMEDY
FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.
Every one subject to blotches or eruptions of the skin should use this delightful remedy.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

THE MINISTER'S WOOING.
By
HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.
50th Thousand.
1 volume. $1 25.

BEULAH.
By
AUGUSTA J. EVANS.
118th Thousand.
1 volume. $1 25.

HOW TO DAYLIGHT.
By
MRS. HENRY WARD BEECHER.
40th Thousand.
1 volume. $1 00.

TEN YEARS OF PREACHER LIFE.
By
REV. WM. H. MILBURN.
13th Thousand.
1 volume. $1 00.
For sale by all Booksellers, or sent by mail, post-paid, by
DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers,
119 Nassau Street, New York.
 Single copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

Café de Costa Rica
C&C
Mountain COFFEE
For sale by
THOMAS G. SMITH,
No. 5 Beaver Street.

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS.
HARNDEN'S EXPRESS
LEAVES EVERY
TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,
BY STEAMSHIP,
FOR SAVANNAH, GA.,
Agency, by Georgia Central Railroad, to
MACON, MEMPHIS, ATLANTA,
AUGUSTA, MONTGOMERY, COLUMBUS,
NASHVILLE, COLUMBUS, MONTGOMERY,
NEW ORLEANS,
And all Towns in the interior of
Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.
Every description of merchandise forwarded at Low rates, and delivered with promptness and despatch.
For further particulars apply at the office of
HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 74 Broadway.

SAVE A DOLLAR!
Peterson's Magazine.
Subscribe for 1870.
This popular Monthly Magazine has already a circulation of nearly 100,000; but it is to be greatly improved for 1870. It will contain nearly
ONE THOUSAND PAGES OF READING,
FOURTEEN SPLENDID STEEL PLATES;
Or Illustrations of Fashions;
TWELVE COLORED FASHION PLATES;
Or Models of Costumes;
EIGHT HUNDRED WOOD-CUTS;
And the VERY BEST STORIES OF MUSIC!
All this will be given for only TWO DOLLARS a year, or a dollar less than Magazines of the class of "Peterson's."

Thrilling Tales and Novelettes
Are the best published anywhere. All the most popular writers contribute exclusively to Peterson's Magazine.
It also publishes

Fashions ahead of all Others.
Both number, in addition to the Colored plate, given Bonnets, Cloaks, and Dresses, engraved on wood. Also a Pattern, from which a Dress, Mantilla, or Cloak or Dress can be cut out, without the aid of a mantua-maker.
It is the best Lady's Magazine in the World. ☞ TRY IT FOR ONE YEAR.

TERMS—ALWAYS IN ADVANCE:
One Copy, One Year..... $2 00
Three Copies, for One Year..... 5 00
Five Copies, for One Year..... 7 50
Eight Copies, for One Year..... 12 00
Sixteen Copies, for One Year..... 20 00

Premiums getting up Clubs.
Three, five Eight, or sixteen copies make a club. To every person getting up a club, the publisher will send an illustrated LADY'S ALBUM, bound in morocco, gilt, post-paid. Address, as above,
CHARLES J. PETERSON,
Peterson's Illustrated Street, Philadelphia.
☞ Specimens sent gratis.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.
Sent by mail, no par expense, until received, read, and approved.
Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.
1st. Sent ABSOLUTELY on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases: Bronchitis, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of preserving Health to 100 years. 418 pages, 10 Engravings —Price $1 00 by the author or P. O. Money.
2nd. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Nervousness, or Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what to prevent it. 214 pages, 6 engravings. Price 75 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county, town and post office.

361 BROADWAY 539
Tucker's Flavors, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

Old Sachem Bitters & Wigwam Tonic.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Dyspepsia, and other Derangements of the Stomach.
PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 145 Water Street.
For Sale Everywhere.

Cure for Ill-Tempered Husbands.

BY NAPOLEON B. QUIGGS.

Of all great evils in the world
On woman, for Eve's folly, hurled,
The very worst—say worse, who can?—
Is that of an ill-tempered man!

A joint ill-done, a roast too cold,
What bosh left-handed men hold!
A button missing, and he raves
As short the stingers from their graves!

Or jealous, dismay without cause,
Heaven's curses on his wife he draws;
Denies his children, tears his hair,
And makes himself a "brute"—a "bear!"

But happy is the wife, whose art
Knows how to calm a husband's heart:
Disperse suspicion, still his fears,
And wash all doubts out in his tears!

The way that Mrs. Bolton pursues
When Jerry Bolton is in the blues,"
Is this: to FRANCES SPENCE she goes,
And orders Bolton's suit of clothes!

Clothes for the boy, the sensuous,
(This pulls the father's heart inwards,)
And Jerry Bolton, as well arrayed,
Laments his rage he has displayed!

And this, the moral, mark ye—wives,
Who wish in kind confidence,
Dressed by the SMITHS from head to heel,
Your locks like GENTLEMEN will FEEL!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.

THOMAS SMITH, Jun.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH BEE. } NEW YORK.

POWERFUL MICROSCOPES or Magnifying Glasses, for 25 cents. Magnifying more than five hundred times. Can be carried anywhere. Sent of different powers for $1. "Perfect little wonders."—Ballou's Pictorial.

C. H. UNDERWOOD, 114 Hanover Street, Boston.

SAKE'S NEW VOLUME.

TICKNOR & FIELDS HAVE NOW READY

The Money King, And Other Poems.

By JOHN G. SAXE.

WITH AN ADMIRABLE PORTRAIT ON STEEL.

One volume, 16mo. 75 cents.

For sale by all Booksellers, or mailed by the Publishers on receipt of price.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Engravings and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Two industrious students will find more steady hours the Countries they would prefer. For full particulars address PUBLISHERS, 82 Cliff Street, or 18 Spruce Street, NEW YORK.

BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

"MEDICAL COMMON SENSE."

YES, "Medical Common Sense," sir!

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER PAINT OF NEW JERSEY,

Established 1850,

For Roofs, Wood, Iron, Brick, Bridges, Canvass, Muslin, Paper, &c., dries readily, forming a metallic coat, spark and cinder proof. Fifty per cent cheaper than Lead or Boiled Linseed Oil. Send for Circular.

HICKS & BETTS, Agents,

DUSSELDORF GALLERY,

548 Broadway,

W. L. SONTAG'S PAINTING, "A DREAM OF ITALY."

The finest and latest work of the Artist has just been added to the above collection. OPEN DAY AND EVENING. Admission 25 cents.

PATENT MANGLES, FOR IRONING clothes without heat; suitable for hotels, laundries and private families. Send for Circular.

DUNCAN, WEST & SHARP, No. 51 Beekman St.

PECANCIMENE.

The Proprietor of this Excellent Preparation kips been to offer it to the public as a COMPLETE HAIR PRESERVER AND RESTORER. It will remove Dandruff, prevent the hair from falling off, and after using a few applications will RESTORE GRAY HAIR BLACK OR BROWN to its youthful green color, and keeps the hair moist for a long time, by using which it will grow a rich, luxuriant growth. FOR LADIES' TOILET.

None genuine unless signed thus: H. Benedict, on the Label. Sold by all Druggists.

E. HOWARD, ARNOLD & CO., GENERAL AGENTS, DAMRELL AND COMMERCIAL STREETS, BOSTON.
No. 24 Broadway, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Gallender, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

"Riggs' Truss," Waterproof and imperishable, can not injure the most raw surface in rupture. 348 Broome Street, N. Y.

Patent Extension Tables.
At Hoerde's Manufactory, 145, 150 Wooster Street.

Stellwag & Klug, 3 William Street, offer for sale Lesley's patent new superior paints, likewise for export to Mexico, Central and South America.

oilet Vinegar

is far superior to Eau de Cologne less a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. Rimmel,

Perfumer, London and Paris.

WILL SHORTLY CLOSE,
CHURCH'S
"HEART OF THE ANDES."
Now on Exhibition at the STUDIO BUILDING,
No. 15 Tenth Street, between 9th and 6th Avenues.
Open from 8 A.M. to 9 P.M., and from 7 to 10 Evenings.
Admission 25 cents. J. McCLURE.

GROVER & BAKER'S

CELEBRATED

FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.

At Reduced Prices,

READ WHAT A DISTINGUISHED MAN SAYS.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine I have long since satisfied my expectation. By carrying out my ideas in the construction of them in various forms for different classes, and after four years' trial, have settled by final."—Rev. A. H. Henshaw, Senator of South Carolina.

No. 495 Broadway, New York. 18 Summer Street, Boston. 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore. 58 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati. 13 Camp Street, New Orleans. And 249 King Street, Charleston, 115 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
331 to 338 Pearl Street (Franklin Square),

Have just Published:

WOMEN ARTISTS in all Ages and Countries. By MRS. ELLET, Author of "Women of the American Revolution," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

FISHER'S RIVER (North Carolina), Scenes and Characters. By DAVID GAUSS LITTLE, Lawyer and Author. Illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

A GOOD FIGHT, and Other Tales. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Peg Woffington" and "Christie Johnstone," &c. Embracing: I. "A Good Fight." II. "Jack of all Trades." III. "A Hero and Martyr." IV. "Autobiography of a Thief." Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

SWORD AND GOWN. A Novel. By the Author of "Cecy Dacre," "Ida Beresford," &c. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

HARRY LEE; or, Hope for the Poor. With Illustrations. 18mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE. By the Author of "John Halifax," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," &c., &c. Cheap Edition, 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. The Library Edition of Prince George, "Virginia Comedians," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Accession of England, from the Earliest Times to the Revolution in 1688. By DAVID HUME. Abridged. Incorporating the Recent Researches of recent Historians, and continued down to the Year 1858. Illustrated by numerous Engravings on Wood. Uniform with Smith's "History of Greece," "Lodge's History of Rome," and "The Student's Gibbon." Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HENRY ST. JOHN, GENTLEMAN, of Flower of Hundreds in Virginia. A Memoir of Prince George, Virginia. Tale of 1774, '75. By JOHN ESTEN COOKE, Author of "Leather Stocking and Silk," "The Virginia Comedians," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MY THIRD BOOK. A Collection of Tales. By LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON. 18mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

GERALD FITZGERALD, "THE CHEVALIER." A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles Mathey," "Tom Burke of Ours," "Arthur O'Leary," "Sir Jasper Carew," "Maurice Tierney," &c. Complete in One Volume. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LIFE AND LIBERTY IN AMERICA; or, Sketches of a Tour in the United States and Canada in 1857-8. By CHARLES ASTON, F.R.A. With 17 Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE LIFE OF JAMES BUNTING, D.D., with Notices of Contemporary Wesleyan Worthies. By his Son, THOMAS PERCIVAL BUNTING. Vol. I., with a Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

AMERICAN WIT AND HUMOR. Illustrated by J. MCLENAN. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WALPER THORNLEY; or, A Peep at the Past. By the Author of "Allen Prescott" and "Alida" (Mrs. Henry Wood). 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MISS STRICKLAND'S QUEENS OF SCOTLAND. Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses connected with the Royal Succession of Great Britain. By AGNES STRICKLAND. Vol. VIII. completing the Series. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Sets in Muslin, $8 00; Half Calf, $14 00.

ABBOTT'S FRENCH REVOLUTION. The French Revolution of 1789, as viewed in the light of Republican Institutions. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "Napoleon at St. Helena," &c. With numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by mail, postage paid (for countries in the United States over 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes in Paris and London.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER
is unsurpassed for every toilet use to the skin, and renders it soft and beautiful.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

SANFORD'S HOT-AIR FURNACES.
CONTAINING ONE SET IN EVERY
THOUSAND DWELLINGS IN THESE PARTS.
SEND FOR A BOOK—FREE.
SANFORD'S MAGNUM OR PARLOR HEATER,
A favorite and economical Stove of great power.
SEND FOR A BOOK.
SANFORD, TRUSLOW & CO.,
No. 251 Water Street.

HUNGARIAN WINES.—A parcel of superfine RED and WHITE HUNGARIAN WINES, in wood and in glass, for sale by CHARLES F. LOOSEY,
No. 2 Barclay Street, Room No. 6.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and curing the most stubborn, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLD, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION of the LUNGS, and even CONSUMPTION itself when yielded to its single influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past ten produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.

To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several worthless ones in the market, each bottle has the signature of "I. BUTTS," as well as the printed name of the Proprietor, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

New Volume—New Story.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED is an ELEGANT quarto of 16 beautiful pages, published weekly. Illustrated London News—a perfect model of excellence in style, arrangement, and in elaborate execution of the most sound and sensible of live papers. Men like it, because like The London News, it is for MEN. We all like it, young folks like it, the children like it, and the rest of the folks can't keep without LIFE ILLUSTRATED.

The volume of LIFE ILLUSTRATED, commencing October 29, will contain a story from the pen of one of the best novelists of the day entitled

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S WOOING: OR, THE TWO SISTERS.

which we have no hesitation in promising our readers will be one of the best stories ever written for newspaper columns; and entertaining as has been the widely-read and far-famed Author of the Adventures of Verdigris, that the Schoolmaster will be not less worthy of public attention. FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

EVERETT HOUSE,
HAWLEY D. CLAPP, PROPRIETOR,
NORTH SIDE UNION SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

FOOTSTEPS OF
SIR JOHN FRANKLIN
Just Published,
The SEA OF ICE;
OR,
THE ARCTIC REGIONS.
Beautifully Illustrated. 1 Vol. 12mo. Price 75 cents.
A thrilling narrative of the adventures of the young Englishman in the Arctic Regions whose name is synonymous, SIR FRANKLIN LOST HIS LIFE!
MAYHEW & BAKER, Publishers,
Boston, Mass.
H. DEXTER & CO., Western Agents,
113 Nassau Street, N. Y.

PIANO MUSIC FOR PARLOR DANCES.

A Choice Book for Winter Evenings.

THE HOME CIRCLE.—A coll. of Marches, Waltzes, Polkas, Quadrilles, Redowas, Mazurkas, Schottisches, Dances, &c. Arranged for the Piano-Forte, and containing the most popular Airs of the Day. Price only $1 50; in cloth, $2; post by mail, 25 cents extra.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

READER—If you want Employment that will pay, take an Agency. Address, with stamp, for particulars, MYRICK & CO., Lynn, Mass.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $60.
HEMMING GAUZES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machine at $50 and $75 are capable of executing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM
GEO. W. CARPENTER & BROWER,
Wholesale Druggists,
19 Platt Street, New York.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.

Certain Cure.

HEGEMAN & CO.'S Camphor Ice with Glycerine.

Cheap, safe, and agreeable. Only 25 cents.

HEGEMAN & CO., Druggists, 161, 190, 611, and 750 Broadway.

N.B.—Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

BOOKS WITH GIFTS.
BEAUTY IS NOT FOUGHT.
Don't be deceived, any longer! WE challenge the world (including Irishmen,) will send our new and beautiful Picture gratis, to any address. ALBERT COLBY,
No. 29 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

DISTINGUISH
THE LADIES' READY-MADE LINEN STORE,
No. 262 Broadway, over 500 Shirts for furnishing
LADIES' UNDER-GARMENTS EXCLUSIVELY.
FINEST WORK ON PLAIN MATERIAL.

Quera's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly.

The only unobjectionable form for Consumptives, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.

ALSO,

Quera's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil—The great sensation of the day, is a delicious, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 129 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, FARR & HOWELL, Wholesale Agents, No. 19 Bedford Street.

THE Seventy Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains over 20 Pages of Letter-press and from one hundred to one hundred and fifty new ones in the course of a year.

Close of the Nineteenth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR NOVEMBER.

The present Number closes the Nineteenth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In the introductory Notice premised to the first Number, the Publishers announced their intention to present a periodical "which no one who had the slightest relish for entertainment reading, or the slightest wish to keep himself informed of the progress and results of the literature and gains of his own age, would willingly be without. And they intend to publish it on so low a scale as to put it within the reach beyond its price, that it shall make its way into the family circle of the whole body of intelligent readers of the United States."

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design the Six Hundred and Fifty Thousand Readers published will show. Each of these contains as much matter as an ordinary octavo of 400 pages, and, in the execution of the style of the Magazine, at least three-fifths. The Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine are thus equivalent to a library of more than a hundred Volumes, comprising the most popular works of the foremost Novelists, Historians, Essayists, and Poets of the day.

Without claiming for the Magazine with other American periodicals, the Publishers may be permitted to say that they have spared no pains to render it the leading monthly of the country. Its Editorial Department, The Editor's Easy Chair, has become a household word. Each year's numbers contain a large amount of original matter, from many of the most distinguished American writers, residing in every section, and in almost every State of the Union. In the selection of matter from abroad, from every part of the country, the Publishers have refrained from making extracts from any publication to a sensational character, or betraying the signs of any "political or religious bias."

A NEW DEPARTURE will be made in the Magazine with the next Volume. The volumes already published have contained from time to time, Illustrations, from some of them executed in the highest style of the art, from Original Drawings by Darley, Church, Rossiter, Homer, Gignoux, Waldie, Thwaites, Hoppin, Crawley, Lossing, Vanderlyn, Mclenan, Hennessy, Hoppin, Dallas, and other Artists. For them the Magazine has paid not less than Ten Thousand and Twenty Thousand Dollars. The cost of its literary contributions has considerably exceeded this sum. Hereafter, in addition to these liberalities, not less than forty pages, read and taken in the course of a year, will be Original Designs of Artists and Authors of the highest reputation.

The Publishers gratefully acknowledge that the large sales they have enjoyed are attributable to the most unanimous expressions. They hoped from the first that the Magazine would make its way into the very heart of the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States, but the success has been more rapid and more far greater than they anticipated. They believe that the circulation of the Magazine is a public benefit, and that the growth and population of the country will increase, and not diminish, the demand for it. Confident of this, they can offer no better guarantee than the contents of the Volumes already issued.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for One Year	1 50
Three or more Copies, for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid by all who receive them at a distance. Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

TERMS: One Copy, a Number: $2 50 a Year.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," now especially illustrated by MCLENAN, was commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of American Life, entitled "TRIPPINGS," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty-five Cents	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Five Copies for One Year	5 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	10 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	20 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.

SPECIMEN ADVERTISEMENTS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise for a Quarter or Year.

Persons living out of the City of New York wishing to have HARPER'S WEEKLY sent to their homes, will please send their names to the Office of Publication, or to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Scene.—OFFICE OF THE —— RAILROAD COMPANY.

PRESIDENT (to envious Applicant for a situation as Brakeman). "Want a berth, eh! —(to Book-keeper)—Mr. JONES, has there been a Brakeman killed on the road within a day or two?"

Mr. JONES. "Well, no, Sir, none this week."

PRESIDENT (to Applicant). "Ah! well, my man, call next Monday, and by that time I guess there'll be a vacancy."

[Exit Applicant, not so much elated at the prospect as he might be.

THE ATHLETIC REVIVAL.

PROFESSOR HERCULES MILO. "You see, Gents, it's the Arm and Chest Exercise that gives Figger'—as for instance!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

I.

Bayard Taylor's New Work.

(Completing the Series)

AT HOME AND ABROAD. A Sketch-Book of Life, Scenery, and Men. By BAYARD TAYLOR. With two fine engravings. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

[For particulars "See Small Bills."]

Also New Editions of BAYARD TAYLOR'S TRAVELS COMPLETE. In 8 vols. 12mo, in boxes, $10; Sheep, $12; Half Calf extra, $18.

II.

A New Edition in 12mo, of Salmagundi. (By Irving, Paulding, &c.)

12mo, cloth, 75 cents.

III.

New "Sunnyside" Editions of

THE SKETCH-BOOK, } Each in five cloth, $1 75
KNICKERBOCKER, } or gilt extra, 2 25
BRACEBRIDGE HALL, } and four, $7 25; rose, ext. $9

Newly stereotyped and printed on fine tinted paper, with steel vignettes.

Also New Editions of IRVING'S WHOLE WORKS. (See Catalogue.)

G. P. PUTNAM, 155 Nassau Street.

THE CORNER CUPBOARD;

Or,

FACTS FOR EVERYBODY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "INQUIRE WITHIN," "THE REASON WHY," &c.

Large 12mo, 400 pages, Cloth, Gilt Side and Back. Price $1.

ILLUSTRATED WITH

OVER ONE THOUSAND ENGRAVINGS.

Embracing Facts about—I. Things not generally known. II. Things that ought to be known. III. Things worth knowing.

THE CORNER CUPBOARD IS

A Complete Practical Cookery Instructor.
A Complete Counsellor in Domestic Economy.
A Complete Practical Gardener.
A Complete Father's Book.
A Complete Mother's Book.
A FRIEND AT EVERYBODY'S ELBOW IN TIME OF NEED.
A Complete Lady's Book.
A Complete Gentleman's Book.
A Complete Boy's Book.
A Complete Girl's Book.
A Complete Master's Book.
A Complete Servant's Book.
A Complete Family Book.

Published by DICK & FITZGERALD, No. 18 Ann Street, N. Y.

Also for sale by all Booksellers in this place.

Copies of the above book sent by mail to any address, free of postage, on receipt of One Dollar.

Hosiery and Men's Furnishing Goods.

A great assortment of best goods at prices generally paid for inferior qualities.

Call, examine, and compare. One price, and money cheerfully refunded in case of dissatisfaction.

A. RANKIN & CO.,

No. 637 Broadway

and 279 Bowery.

Established in 1825.

Thomas Andrews' "Excelsior" Yeast Powder

Is sure to supersede all other preparations where quick yeast is required. Nothing can excel the purity or efficacy of this compound. Every good housekeeper should try our Yeast Powder; it is ready for use in one minute! Half a million of cans sold this year! Get our "EXCELSIOR" YEAST POWDER from your grocer, and take no other, if you want the best

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,

156 and 158 Cedar Street, N. Y.

Established twelve years.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, constituting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
ARGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
KENT BEAVERS,
BROADBRIMMED BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the new styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS

in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.

D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 256, 258 and 260 Broadway.

Forty Dollars per Month.

500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Patent Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machine. Salary $40 per month, with all expenses paid. For sample machine, and full particulars, address, with stamp enclosed for return postage,

I. M. DAGGETT & CO.,
Boston, Mass.

FROM THE

Springfield Republican.

W. E. HARRIS & Co., of Troy, N. Y., manufacture a hair restorative that takes precedence of all others. It renders the hair more soft and flexible, and stimulates its growth to luxuriance. In our special notice column may be found a strong testimonial to its merits which is only one of the many its manufacturers have received.

Sold everywhere.—Price 50 cents a bottle.

"BALDWIN'S" Clothing Establishment.

THE LARGEST IN THE CITY.

Built by Wm. B. Aston, Esq., expressly for the business.

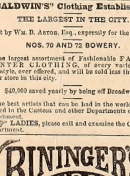
NOS. 70 AND 72 BOWERY.

The largest assortment of Fashionable FALL and WINTER CLOTHING, of every variety, taste, and style, ever offered, and will be sold less than at any other store in the city.

$40,000 saved yearly by being off Broadway.

The best articles that can be had in the world are employed in the Cutting and other Departments of this establishment.

☞ LADIES, please call and examine the Children's Department.



Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the so-called "Gins"—"Aromatic," "Cordial," "Schiedam," &c., now imported by all of the prominent physicians, chemists, and connoisseurs as possessing all of these inferior medicinal qualities (acids and diuretics) which belong to an old and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and sold by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1765.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 128 Broadway, N. Y.

Swiss Corn-plaster and Chilblain Balm effect a certain cure. Wholesale and Retail at E. DUPUY'S Drug Store, 660 BROADWAY.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square), New York,

Have just Ready:

I.

WOMEN ARTISTS

IN ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES.

By Mrs. Ellet,

AUTHOR OF

"Women of the American Revolution," &c.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

II.

FISHER'S RIVER

(NORTH CAROLINA)

Scenes and Characters.

By "SKITT,"

"Who was rais'd thar."

Illustrated by John McLenan.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

DELANO Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

Vest not inflated.

Vest inflated.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Skirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Vests and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

We would draw attention to the annexed unsolicited letter.

NEW ORLEANS, October 9, 1859.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Gentlemen:

Having been saved by one of your "PATENT LIFE-PRESERVED VESTS." I deem it my duty to make it known to the public. I was on the Steamboat "Pres-ident" when she was burned, and had it not been for one of your Vests (which I assure you are invaluable), should have been drowned. I therefore cordially recommend it to the public.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your well wisher,
Captain I. B. THOMSEN.

New Books.

VERY-VER GEDDE. A College Story. Price $1 00.

MICHELET'S LOVE (2 vols.). $1 00.

LIFE OF ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. $1 25.

ENGLISH AT THE NORTH (2 vols.). $1 75.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of the price, by RUFUS B. CANFIELD, Publisher, 120 Nassau St., N. Y.

DR. J. D. MARCHISI'S CELEBRATED UTERINE CATHOLICON,

FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as saddens the female life, a really effective medicine must be fairly tried. Where the most eminent physicians have failed, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—New Bedford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our family, and we recommend it."—Phila. Ledger. "It is now universally used for all female complaints, and we use it in our practice with astonishing results."—C. B. PERKINS, M.D., Waverly, O. "I have tested it in cases of Irregularities, Uterations, Leucorrhœa, Flooding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, &c., with great success. It is worthy of the notice of the Faculty."—Communication M.D., Baltimore, Md. "Feroll upon needed more to say it."—JESSE LOVE, M.D., Lawrenceville, Ga. Such letters pour in from a thousand sources, showing it to

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex. Druggists, Wives, and Mothers! Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, containing certificates, &c., sent free. Price $5 per bottle, sent, or delivered by Agents. ☞ Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It is sold at $5 per bottle, or three bottles for $15, by an Agent in almost every town. When sent found, enclose money, and order by Express. Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,

15 and 16 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Or J. D. PARK, Cincinnati; Weeks & Potter, Boston; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans. J. D. MARCHISI, M.D.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 148.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

H. M. S. Ships Erebus and Terror
Wintered in the Ice in
28 of May 184 } Lat 70° 5' N Long. 98° 23' W

Having wintered in 1846 - 7 at Beechey Island in Lat 74° 43' 28" N. Long 91° 39' 15" W after having ascended Wellington Channel to Lat 77° and returned by the West side of Cornwallis Island.

Commander:

Sir John Franklin commanding the Expedition

All well

WHOEVER finds this paper is requested to forward it to the Secretary of the Admiralty, London, with a note of the time and place at which it was found: or, if more convenient, to deliver it for that purpose to the British Consul at the nearest Port.

QUICONQUE trouvera ce papier est prié d'y marquer le tems et lieu où il l'aura trouvé, et de le faire parvenir au plutot au Secretaire de l'Amirauté Britannique à Londres.

CUALQUIERA que hallare este Papel, se le suplica de enviarlo al Secretario del Almirantazgo, en Londrés, con una nota del tiempo y del lugar en donde se halló.

EEN ieder die dit Papier mogt vinden, wordt hiermede verzogt, om het zelve, ten spoedigste, te willen zenden aan den Heer Minister van de Marine der Nederlanden in 's Gravenhage, of wel aan den Secretaris den Britsche Admiraliteit, te London, en daar by te voegen eene Nota, inhoudende de tyd en de plaats alwaar dit Papier is gevonden geworden.

FINDEREN af dette Papïir ombedes, naar Leilighed gives, at sende samme til Admiralitets Secretairen i London, eller nærmeste Embedsmand i Danmark, Norge, eller Sverrig. Tiden og Stedit hvor dette er fundet önskes venskabeligt paategnet.

WER diesen Zettel findet, wird hier-durch ersucht denselben an den Secretair des Admiralitets in London einzusenden, mit gefälliger angabe an welchen ort und zu welcher zeit er gefunden worden ist.

Party consisting of 2 Officers and 6 Men left the Ships on Monday 24th June 1847

G. M. Gore Lieut
Chas F. Des Voeux Mate

FAC-SIMILE OF THE LAST RECORD OF THE FRANKLIN EXPEDITION, FOUND BY LIEUTENANT HOBSON ON KING WILLIAM'S LAND.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE LAST ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

On the preceding page we present to the reader an authentic fac-simile (taken from the original in the custody of the British Admiralty) of the last memorial record of the Franklin Expedition; on pages 686 and 687 will be seen an engraving of the discovery of the boat belonging to the same expedition, and abandoned by Captain Crozier and the survivors when they attempted to walk to Montreal Island and Back River. In thus illustrating the close of a pursuit which has rendered but little return for the expenditure of valuable life which it has cost, we propose to condense into a few sentences the history of the memorable page in the modern history which must be entitled Arctic Adventure.

The first expedition which set out with a view of discovering the Northwest Passage left England in 1818 under Ross and Parry. For nearly quarter of a century previous to this period the great idea of the British Government had been to discover the North Pole, and many expeditions had been fitted out for that purpose. In the year that Ross and Parry sailed, Sir John Franklin (then lieutenant) was second in command of one of these expeditions. It was unsuccessful; but Captain Parry having succeeded in reaching Lancaster Sound, the spirit of adventure was thoroughly aroused, and Franklin, in 1819, set out from the Hudson's Bay territory to explore the northern coast of America. Three years were devoted to the work, during which the explorers endured almost every form of suffering—cold, disease, hunger, despair—which can befall mankind. They returned, however, to return safe, having traveled 5500 miles, and laid down several hundred miles of coast-line. Parry, meanwhile, had been rendering equally good service—with equal risk to his party—by sailing through Lancaster Sound.

In 1825 four expeditions were fitted out, one of which—a land party starting from the Hudson's Bay Company's service, as before—was under the command of Lieutenant Franklin. They descended the Mackenzie River to the sea, and in 1829 the Rosses (uncle and nephew) sailed into Prince Regent's Inlet, explored 200 miles of new coast, discovered the magnetic pole, and returned to within 200 miles of Sir John Franklin's easternmost stopping-place on the Mackenzie River—encountering, but, tossed by ice, and forced to abandon their ships, were given up for lost, and were only providentially rescued by a vessel sailing in search of them—attention in the ice. In 1836 Dease and Simpson, then Hudson's Bay Company's explorers, descended the Mackenzie River to the sea, and journeying eastward, traveled to within a few miles of Back mouth of the river. In that short distance they completed the survey of the north coast of this continent, with the exception of the shores of the Gulf of Boothia. In 1840 Dr. Rae surveyed this unfinished portion of the work, leaving only the Fury and Hecla Straits to be examined by future explorers. He likewise established the point that Hecla this is not an island, but part of the main land.

These various expeditions had shed so much light on Arctic discovery that the Government and the public of England were satisfied that the most ample well-appointed expedition would not at rest the question of a Northwest Passage, and put an end to further exercise of time and life. Accordingly, in 1845, two screw steamers, the Erebus and Terror, were put in commission for Arctic service. They were abundantly provided with every possible appliance and security for the voyage, and carefully victualed for three years. To insure the success of the undertaking, the most experienced Arctic voyagers were engaged for the service, and Franklin and the command of the expedition was intrusted to the most able of Arctic explorers—Sir John Franklin, then an old man, though very hale and hearty.

The two vessels sailed (with a tender, which they sent home from Davis's Strait) in May, 1845. Two months afterward they were seen by a whaler in lat. 74° 48', and long. 66° 13', about the centre of Baffin's Bay, sweiling an entrance into Lancaster Sound. This was the last time that the Erebus and Terror were ever seen. We may as well, however, complete their last record as regards their memorials which have since been discovered.

In July or August, 1845, they must have succeeded in entering Lancaster Sound, and on their way as far as Beechey Island, where they wintered. Their winter of 1845-6 was passed in Wellington Channel as far as 77° N., and returned by the west side of Cornwallis Island. That winter (1846-7) they wintered in lat. 74° 43' N. long. 91° 39' W. Long. On 11th June, 1847, probably at the winter-quarters of the expedition, Sir John Franklin died. Of the movements of the expedition that summer we have no record; they must, however, have sailed southward, for in April, 1848, one of the ships having been crushed in the ice, both were abandoned in the vicinity of Point Victory, and the crews landed on King William's Land. They were then 105 in number, under command of Captain Crozier. It appears that they started from thences to walk, drawing boats with them, to Montreal Island, which was 225 miles from the spot where the boats were abandoned. Of the main body we have traces 65 miles from the ships; then all traces disappear. It seems certain that they died off one by one in that terrible journey, until no one was left to tell the tale.

The account of the expeditions which have been sent to the Arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin is the most noble page of modern history.

In the spring of 1848, no tidings having been received of Sir John Franklin, three expeditions were sent out to search for him. 1. Captains Moore and Kellett were dispatched in the Plover and Herald, by way of Behring's Straits. The ships sailed as far as Chamisso Island, and dispatched boats which made their way to Dease's Inlet, but returned without finding any trace. 2. Sir James Ross entered the Arctic region by Baffin's Bay, explored to the south side of Lancaster Sound as far as Cape York, North Somerset, and both sides of Prince Regent's Inlet, without any result. 3. Sir John Richardson and Dr. Rae proceeded by land; the former descended the Mackenzie River to the sea, but the latter twice explored the shores of Wollaston Sound; both without the least success.

The failure of these expeditions, far from discouraging adventure, roused the English and the civilized world to still further exertion. A fund of several thousand pounds offered by the British Government to any party that should afford efficient aid in the investigation of the fate of Franklin expeditions were dispatched to the Arctic regions in search of them:

1. Dr. Rae, traveling afoot as before, explored the shores of Bank's Land, and the north coast of America. 2. The screw steamers Resolute, Intrepid, which made their way to Beechey Island, and first discovered the relics of Sir John Franklin's encampments there in the winter of 1845-6. 3. The Lady Franklin—a vessel fitted out by the lady Franklin herself, which also achieved nothing, having merely followed in the wake of the Government vessels. 4. The Prince Albert, which was sent to explored the Gulf of Boothia. 5. The Advance and Rescue—the Grinnell expedition—which visited Beechey Island, and discovered the coasts of Wellington Channel. 6. The North Star, which sailed north as far as 76° 37', the winter-quarters of the vessel sailed by my vessel except Dr. Rae's. 7. The schooner Fox, commanded by Captain M'Clure, which was sended to explore Wellington Channel. 8. The Enterprise and Investigator, Captains Collinson and M'Clure, which explored the Behring Sea by Behring's Strait; Captain M'Clure and his crew, having made their way from Behring's Strait to Melville Island, and were there rescued by Captain Belcher, having discovered the Northwest Passage.

All these expeditions were visited, in 1854-5-6 Franklin had wintered on Beechy Island; whence he had proceeded to the south, and that at the time the expeditions were looking for him, were problems on which they shed no light. The prevailing impression (which Dr. Rae's last report sets a leading advocate) was that Sir John had actually reached Montreal Island, and had perished further north than any expedition had yet penetrated.

Then more ships sailed to the north. In 1851 Lady Franklin sent the Prince Albert, Captain Forsyth, to explore Prince Regent's Inlet. She dispatched the Isabel, Captain Inglefield, to explore Westenholm Sound, where it was reported that Sir John had been seen by the natives during the Esquimaux. In the same year Sir Edward Belcher sent four ships with five tenders into Barrow's or Lancaster Sound, and succeeded in rescuing Captain M'Clure. Sledge parties made further explorations in the same year both in the Arctic regions: Mr. Grinnell, and other Americans, sent Dr. Kane in the Advance. He struck out a new path for Arctic discovery, sailed northward into Lancaster Sound, he sailed due north, as far as he could; then, abandoning his vessel, set out on foot as far as 82° 27' N. lat., by far the most northerly point ever reached. He was followed in the same direction by Captain Sea," with which Kane's name will ever be connected. His party endured hardships and privations equally great with those of Franklin's last journey was 99° below zero; but they found no traces of Franklin. In 1853 Captain Penny sailed in the Rattlesnake and Isabel by Behring's Strait; their object was mainly to rescue Captain M'Clure, about whose safety no apprehension was felt. They achieved nothing. 3. The Lady Franklin and Sussa were sent by the British Government to support Sir E. Belcher, who, when he abandoned his own vessels, returned in them. Dr. Rae also set out by land and explored the Boothia Peninsula. All of the expeditions he was the only one that brought back any tidings. He reached the northernmost of Prince Regent's Inlet, and returned by the west side of Boothia Felix, three expeditions were sent out to search for him. 1. Captains Moore and Kellett were dispatched in the Plover and Herald, by way of Behring's Straits. The ships sailed as far as Chamisso Island, and dispatched boats which made their way to Dease's Inlet, but returned without finding any trace. 2. Sir James Ross entered the Arctic region by Baffin's Bay, explored to the south side of Lancaster Sound as far as Cape York, North Somerset, and both sides of Prince Regent's Inlet, without any result. 3. Sir John Richardson and Dr. Rae proceeded by land; the former descended the Mackenzie River to the sea, but the latter twice explored the shores of Wollaston Sound; both without the least success.

The failure of these expeditions, far from discouraging adventure, roused the English and the civilized world to still further exertion. A fund of several thousand pounds offered by the British Government to any party that should afford efficient aid in the investigation of the fate of Franklin expeditions were dispatched to the Arctic regions in search of them:

1. Dr. Rae, traveling afoot as before, explored the shores of Bank's Land, and the north coast of America. 2. The screw steamers Resolute, Intrepid, which made their way to Beechy sires, but who nevertheless belong to the "respectable classes," whose interest have been necessity for an organization of property against rowdyism. As it became Mr. Watts Sherman and his friends have for years neglected a duty which should have been sacredly performed that political power has lapsed into the hands of loafers and ruffians. If, at most elections, the respectable classes, men of property, character, and education, had the manhood and the courage to insist on receiving their votes, the disgraceful scenes would be overwhelmed beyond redemption. The rowdies are to the respectable classes as one to ten, or twenty. But if the twenty have not the pluck to go to the polls, the one, who flourishes his shillelah there, must win the day.

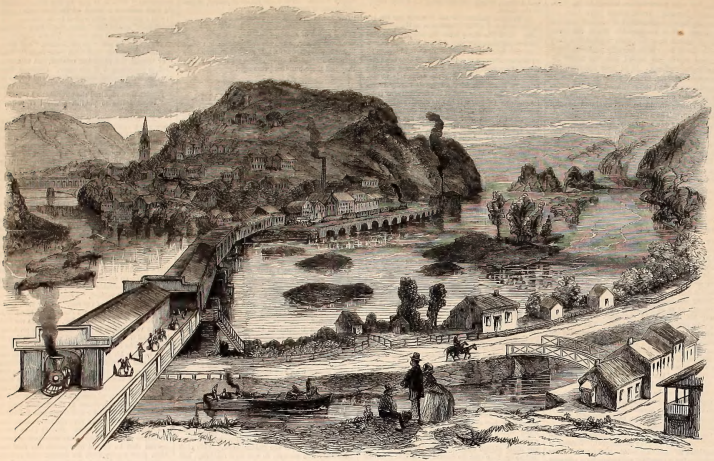
This is the true difficulty in our politics; unless the Fifth Avenue party can solve it, they are wasting their time.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NUPTIALS OF DON CESAR DE BAZAN.

IF we are an extremely ridiculous people, we certainly have the satisfaction of knowing that we are no more so than other people. If we worship Mammon with a fervor that is sometimes profane, we might be profitably extended to some other worship, we can look over our shoulders and find ourselves in a great, if not a worthy company.

Young Mr. Rothschild was married a couple of years ago or so in England. What, then, said a young Mr. Rothschild Asmer. He is the son of a very rich old Mr. Rothschild. The very rich young gentleman was, of course, of course, of famous Banking-house: and however great might have been the natural interest of the whole world, as a real, managing Rothschild is, the interest in his young son could be only derived from the fact of his great father. So far it is to be wondered at. In a world where we are all scratching to make the Rothschilds of us, we can not avoid having a peculiar regard for the man who has made the holiest pile of all, and that is reflected upon his children. Young Mr. Rothschild, is young Mr. Rothschild Asmer. He is the son of a very rich old Mr. Rothschild. The very rich young gentleman was



HARPER'S FERRY—THE SCENE OF THE LATE INSURRECTION.

HARPER'S FERRY.

THE accompanying engraving will convey to the beholder an accurate idea of the scene of the late singular and disastrous insurrection at Harper's Ferry. The spot is familiar to tourists. The town, or village, is built on the junction of the Shenandoah and Potomac, which, after uniting, rush with impetuosity through a cleft in the Blue Ridge. Numbers of writers, among others Mr. Jefferson, have exerted their utmost skill to describe the enchanting scenery of the place. The bridge over the Potomac, where the train was stopped by the rioters, is one of the finest in the country; it is curved, and nine hundred feet long. Nearly all the level river margin has been used for the National Armory, so that the town scrambles picturesquely among the various bluffs, till the hilltop, like the end of all things, is terminated by the graves and monuments of a cemetery.

MAP OF VANCOUVER ISLAND AND WASHINGTON TERRITORY, SHOWING SAN JUAN ISLAND AND THE DISPUTED TERRITORY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

The Armory usually employs 240 hands, and turns out 8850 stand of arms each year. The population, including the suburbs, is only about 3000, of whom about 500 are blacks.

THE SAN JUAN DISPUTED TERRITORY.

THE accompanying map will enable our readers to follow intelligently the progress of the pending controversy with Great Britain in relation to the Island of San Juan. A very few words will render the map complete as a geographical picture.

When the "Fifty-four forty or fight" dispute was ended by the treaty of 1846, the boundary line between the United States and Great Britain was declared to run "along 49° north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island, and thence southerly through the middle of said channel and of Fuca's Straits to the Pacific Ocean." The question which now arises is—where is the channel? The boundary line is plain until it strikes the San Juan archipelago; but there the question arises—does it pass east or west of that archipelago? The British claim that it passes east of the islands, so as to give the group to Great Britain; General Harney and other American authorities claim that the true channel is west of the islands, which consequently belong to the United States. The question should be decided by nature. Dispassionate readers should be asked whether, if they had to sail from Fuca's Strait to Frazer's River, they would steer through Haro or Rosario Strait? If they answered in favor of the former, then the islands belong to us; if they would choose the latter, then they belong to Great Britain.

We have no desire to prejudge this question, which will naturally engage the best intellects of both countries. But it is right to place on record a few of the reasons which have induced General Harney to decide the question in favor of his country.

The two essential characteristics of a "channel," as opposed to lateral streams, are superior width and depth. Now Haro Strait is throughout wider than Rosario Strait. As to depth, the Herald gives the following table of soundings, which show that Haro Strait is likewise deeper:

"SOUNDINGS IN HARO STRAIT, IN fathoms—37, 370, 60, 60, 100, 180, 170, 110, 70, 60.

"SOUNDINGS IN ROSARIO STRAIT, IN fathoms—37, 45, 50, 68, 140, 60, 48, 40, 37."

Assuming these soundings to be correct, this argument must tell against the English claim.

It is also noteworthy that, though the Admiralty Bay Company seems to have kept sheep on San Juan Island without objection from this country, the Legislature of Washington Territory have always spoken, in their acts, of the islands as forming part of the Territory; and, in 1854, expressly included them in the county of Whatcom. An American official has resided on the islands for some years as Customs-house collector, and it seems that he may have actually collected duties.

The rule is, that littoral islands, if not otherwise owned, belong to the nearest main land. This principle would secure the San Juan archipelago to the United States. The English, it seems, are willing to yield to the United States the islands of Lopez and Orcas, provided they retain San Juan, which, being 19 square miles in size, and well adapted for a place of strength, commands the Haro Strait. But from the temper of the United States officials it seems unlikely that this compromise would suit them. At any rate, we trust that the dispute will be conducted with temper and judgment on our side, and that the great interests in common between the two nations will not be jeopardized.

REP-RED-SENTIVE-OF-OF-DEAR PE-PE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXVI.

THE CRASH, UP TOWN.

THE moment Mrs. Dagon heard the dismal news of Boniface Dewint's failure she came running round to see his wife. The house was as still and dark as the tomb and effectually so. Mrs. Dagon looked in at the parlor, which was darkened by closed blinds and shades drawn over the windows, and in which all the furniture was set as for a funeral, except that the chilly chairs covers were not removed.

She found Mrs. Nancy Newt in her chamber with Mary.

"Well, well! What does this mean? It's all nothing. Don't you be alarmed. What's failing? It doesn't mean any thing—and I really hope, now that he has actually failed and done with it, Boniface will be a little more cheerful and liberal. Those parlor curtains are positively too bad! Boniface ought to have plenty of time to himself; and I hope he will give more of those little dinners, and cheer himself up! How is he?"

Mrs. Newt was dissolved in tears. She shook her head weakly, and rubbed her hands.

"Oh! dear Dagon, it's dreadful to see him. He don't seem himself. He does nothing but sit at the table and drum with his fingers, and all in the night he lies awake, thinking. And, oh dear!" she said, giving way to a sudden burst of grief, "he doesn't look at my cap!"

Mrs. Dagon listened and reflected.

"My dear," she asked, "has he settled any thing upon you?"

"Nothing," replied Mrs. Newt.

"Aunt Dagon," said Mary, who sat by, looking at the old lady, "we are now poor people. We shall sell this house, and go and live in a small way out of sight."

"Riddle, riddle! my dear," returned Mrs. Dagon, warmly. "You're not poor people. Poor people, indeed! Why, Mary, you know nothing about these things. And besides, that's why, my dear, that's nothing. A New York merchant expects to fail, just as an English nobleman expects to have the gout. It's as respectable a pleasure thing, but it's extremely respectable. Every body fails. I understood—"

"What's understood?" asked May.

"Why, that business is a kind of game, and that every body runs for luck. There's no fuss about it, my dear! It's all a string of cards—as Colonel Burr used to say; and I know a body knew the world, he did—it's all a string of cards or blocks. B trusts A, C trusts B, D trusts C, and so on. And then, you see, A can go B and C and D. That's the whole of it, my dear. Colonel Burr told me that he used to always to keep himself just out of reach of any other block. If they knock me over, my dear Miss Bunsey, he once said to me, I don't care what a voice he said it in: what an eye!—if they knock me over, I shall be sure to provide myself up that I shall be forced to be selfish, and can't help them. That was Colonel Burr's principle. He declared that the only way in which you could be sure of helping others. People talk about Colonel Burr, my dear, but Colonel Burr was a man who minded his own business."

"I have nothing to say of Colonel Burr and his principles, Aunt Dagon. I have seen the old man once, and I don't think favorably of him now. His doom is more dreadful than, I think, most people could bear. Perhaps not a solitary human being who ever loves him believes in him. I do not say guilty, or unjustly; for it seems to me nobody can deserve any thing but his fate. But, Aunt Dagon, I don't think it strange that people who admire him should think lightly of paying their debts."

"Prejudice, prejudice, my dear! People don't expect to have every thing paid that is owing to them."

May Newt held her tongue. She felt instinctively that a woman of sixty-five, who had been trusted by Colonel Burr, was not very likely to accept the opinion of a girl of her years. Mrs. Newt was feebly rousing herself during the conversation between her daughter and aunt; and when they had finished and, sighed sparingly.

"Dear me! what will people say? Oh! I can't go and live poor. I'm not used to it. I don't know how."

"Live poor!" miffed Mrs. Dagon; "of course you won't live poor. I've heard Boniface say often enough that it was too bad to be fighting so to be rich, but it was a world of good-for-nothing people: and you don't think he's going to let good-for-nothing people drive him from a becoming style of living! Fiddle! I'd like to see him undertake to live poor."

"Do you think people will come to see us?" gasped Mrs. Newt.

"Come? Of course they will. They'll all rush, the first thing, to see how you take it. Why, not a thing as this as a godsend to 'em. They'll have something to talk about for a week. And they'll be sure to discover if you mean to sell out at auction. Oh, they'll be so sorry!" said the old lady, imitating imaginary callers; "'and, my dear Mrs. Newt, what are you going to do? And to think of your being obliged to 'leave this lovely house!' Come!—did you ever see the vultures not to come to scrape?"

Mrs. Nancy Newt looked appalled; and Mary looked at Mrs. Dagon in her allusion to vultures and carcass, and then more unconsciously put to her nose the smelling-bottle she held in her hand.

"Oh, it's dreadful!" she sighed, rocking and smelling, now with the tears oozing from her eyes.

"Fiddle! I won't hear of it. 'Tain't dreadful. It's nothing at all. You must go out with me and make calls this very morning. It's none of your business. If your husband chooses to fail, let him fail. He can't expect you to take the making shame, and to give up society. I shall call at twelve in the carriage; and, mind, don't you look as if you had been crying. Remember. So, good-morning!' And, May, I want to speak to you."

They left Mrs. Newt rocking and weeping, with the smelling-bottle at her nose, and descended to the drawing-room parlor.

"What brought this about?" asked Mrs. Dagon as she closed the door. "Your mother is so serene and so silly that I dare not speak to her. Where's Abel?"

"Aunt Dagon, I have my own opinion, but I know nothing. I suppose Abel is down town."

"What's your opinion?"

May paused for a moment, and then said:

"From what I have heard drop from father during the last few years about his having left the business, I don't believe that Abel has helped him—"

"Really!" interrupted Mrs. Dagon, as if soliloquizing; "and why on earth didn't the fellow marry Hope Wayne, or that Southern girl, Grace Plumer?"

"Abel marry Hope Wayne!" asked May, with an air and tone of such utter astonishment and incredulity that Aunt Dagon immediately suspected some misapprehension, and half smiled.

"Why, why not?" said she, with equal simplicity.

May Newt knew Hope Wayne personally, and she had also heard of her from Gabriel Bennet. Indeed, Gabriel had no secrets from May. The whole school story of his love had been told to her, and she shared the young man's feeling for the woman who, when younger, had so utterly enthralled his boyish imagination. But Gabriel's story of school life also included her brother Abel, and what she heard of the boy agreed with what she knew and felt of the man.

"I presume," said May Newt, loftily, "that Hope Wayne would be as likely to marry Aaron Burr as Abel Dewint."

Mrs. Dagon looked at her kindly, and with amused admiration.

"Well, May, at any rate I congratulate Gabriel Bennett."

May's lofty look drooped.

"And if"—continued Mrs. Dagon—"if it was so wonderfully impossible that Abel should marry Hope Wayne, why might he not have married Grace Plumer, or some other rich girl? I'm sure I don't care who. It seems evidently the only thing for him, whatever it may be for other people. When you are of my age, May, you will take things differently. Well-bred men and women in society ought to be able to marry any body society isn't down on, and are silly to do have as it is were. Your romance is very pretty, dear; we all have it when we are young, so we bear the troubles and the whooping-cough. But we get robust constitutions, my dear," said the old lady, smiling kindly, "when we have got through all that business. When you and Gabriel have half a dozen children, and your girls grow up to be married, you'll understand all about it. I suppose you know about Mellish Whitlow and Laura Mogg?—don't they?"

May shook her head negatively.

"Well, they are people who were wise early. Just after they were married he said to her, 'Laura, I see that you are fond of this new dance which is coming in; you like to waltz.' 'Yes,

HOW SOUNDLY HE SLEEPS!

I do,' said she. 'Well, I don't like it, and I don't want you to waltz.' She pouted and cried, and called him a tyrant. He hummed Yankee Doodle. 'I will waltz,' said she at length.

"Very well, my dear,' he answered. 'I'll make a bargain with you. If you waltz, I'll get drunk.' You see it works perfectly. They respect each other, and each does as the other wishes. I hope you'll be as wise with Gabriel, my dear."

"Aunt, I hope I shall never be as old as you are," said May, quietly. "I'd rather die."

Mrs. Dagon laughed her laugh. "That's right, dear, stand by your colors. You're all alike. Gabriel is Lawrence's partner. You can afford to be romantic, dear."

As she spoke the door opened and Abel entered. His dress was disordered, his face was flushed, and his manner excited. He ran up to Mary and kissed her. She recoiled from the unaccustomed caress, and both she and Mrs. Dagon perceived in his appearance and manner, as well as in the liquor which presently filled the room, that Abel was intoxicated.

"May, darling," he began as a maudlin tone, "how's our dear mother?"

"She's pretty well," replied May, "but you had better not go up and see her."

"No, darling, I won't go if you say not."

His eyes then fell inquisitively upon Mrs. Dagon, and he added, thickly,

"That's only Aunt Dagon. How do, Aunt Dagon?"

He smiled at her and at May, and continued:

"I don't mind Aunt Dagon. Do you mind her, May?"

"What do you want, Abel?" asked May, with the old expression sliding into her eyes that used to be there when she set alone—a fairy princess in her tower, and thought of many things.

Abel had seated himself upon the sofa, with his hat still on his head. There was perhaps something in May's tone that alarmed him, for he began to shed tears.

"Oh! May, don't you love your poor Abel?"

She looked at him without speaking. At length she said, "Where have you been?"

"I've been to General Belch's," he sobbed in reply; "and I don't mind Aunt Dagon, if you don't."

"What do you mean by that, you silly fool?" asked Mrs. Dagon, sharply.

Abel stopped and looked half angry, for a moment, but immediately fell into the old strain.

"I mean I'd just as lief say it before her."

"Then say it," said May.

"Well, May, darling, couldn't you now just COAX Gabriel—good fellow, Gabriel—used to know him and love him at school—couldn't you coax him to get Uncle Lawrence to do something?"

May shook her head. Abel began to swivel.

"I don't mean for the house. D—it, that's gone to smash. I mean for myself, May, for your poor brother Abel. You might just coax."

He lay back and looked at her ruefully.

"Abel, darling," she said, quietly, "we had better go out of the room. Abel, don't you come in top of your gambling debts," she added, indignantly.

Abel raised himself fiercely, while the bad blackness filled his eyes.

"D—d old hunx!" he shouted.

But nobody heard. Mrs. Dagon and May Newt had closed the door, and Abel was left alone.

"It's no use," he said, moodily and aloud, but still thickly. "I can't help it. I shall have to do just as Belch wishes. But he must help me. If he expects me to serve him, he must set me free. He says he can buy off—Bodley—and then—why, then—devil take it!"

he said, vacantly, with heavy eyes, "then—then—oh yes!" He stood a moodish while. "Oh yes! I shall be a great—a great—great—man yet. I'll be—re—cog—nized—of—of—don't pe—pe."

His head fell like a lump upon the cushion of the sofa, and he breathed heavily, until the solemn, dark, formal parlor smelled like a barroom.

CHAPTER LXVII.

EDYMION.

LAWRENCE NEVER had told Aunt Martha that he preferred to hear from a young woman's own lips that she loved him. Was he suspicious of the truth of Aunt Martha's assertion?

When the Burt will was read, and Fanny Dinks had kissed her every and chagrin, she had done more than she would willingly have done: she had said that all the world knew he was in love with Hope Wayne. If all the world knew it, then surely Amy Waring did; and if she did, was it strange, he thought, that she should have said what she did not?

He thought often of these things. His view changed as never thoughts came. Before one of the days when he sat in his office, and the junior partner was engaged in writing the letters which formerly Lawrence wrote, the question slid into his mind as brightly, but as softly and benignantly, as daylight into the room.

"Does it follow that she does not love me? If she did love me, as I thought then she did Hope Wayne, would she not hide it from me in every way—not only to save her own pride, but in order not to give me pain?"

So secret and reticent was he, that as he thought this he was more conscious than his junior partner should happen to look up and read it all in his eyes.

Lawrence Never rose and stood at the window, with his back to Gabriel, for his thoughts grew more and earnest.

As he came down that morning he had stopped at Hope Wayne's, and they had talked for a long time. They had held still in pursuance of his visit to Mrs. Fanny Dinks; and for some reason Lawrence had resolved not to see Hope Wayne. The young women listened intently.

"You don't think I ought to increase the allowance?" she asked.

"Why should you?" he replied. "Alfred's father will allow him for his maintenance. Alfred has promised solemnly that he will never mention to his wife the thousand you allow him. I don't think he will, because it is probable she would stop it in some way. As it is, she knows nothing regarding it, and probably Alfred's seems to go a very great way. Your income is large; but I think a thousand dollars for the support of entirely useless people is quite as much as you are called upon to pay, although one of them is your cousin, and the other my niece."

They went on to talk of many things. And all she showed the same calm candor and tenderness. In all he showed the same humorous quaintness and quiet. The two women Never observed that these interviews were becoming longer and longer, as the affairs to arrange really became few. He could not have discovered that there was any particular reason for it; and yet he became unconscious in the degree that he was conscious of it.

When the Round Table met, it was evident from the conversation between Hope Wayne and Lawrence Never that he was very often at her house; and somehow it seemed as they all appeared to be conscious that each one was thinking of that fact, the cloud settled more heavily, but just as quickly as it came, over the little circle. It was not removed by the conviction which Amy Waring and Archer Merlin entertained, that at all such times Hope Wayne was trying not to show that she was peculiarly excited by their consciousness.

And she was excited by it. She knew that the interviews were growing more and more, and that there was less reason than ever for any interviews whatsoever. But when Lawrence Never was talking to her—and he was looking at her —when his was moving about the room—she was happy; but when he had left Hope Wayne then she had supposed she could ever be. When he went, that day was done. Nor did another dawn until it came again.

Perhaps Hope Wayne understood the meaning of Miss Fay's mysterious smile which now so often enveloped the Round Table.

As for Archer Merlin, the poor fellow did what all poor fellows do. So long as it was uncertain whether she loved him or not, he was willing to say nothing. But when he was perfectly sure that there was no hope for him, he resolved to speak.

In vain his Aunt Winnifred had tried to cheer him. Ever since the morning when he and told her in his sudden fit of despair of Latmus he could not persuade himself that he had not wantonly cast away his own love. Aunt Winnifred showered the choicest tracts about his room. She said with a sigh that she was sure he had experienced no change of heart; and Archer replied, with a melancholy smile, "Not the slightest."

The kind old lady was sorely puzzled. It did not occur to her that her Archer could be the victim of an unfortunate attachment as she described the love-lorn heroes of whom she had read in the evil days when she read novels. It did not occur to her, because she could as easily have supposed a rose-tree to resist June as any woman her splendid Archer.

If some gossip to whom she sighed could shoot her head, and wondered what—if anybody—ailed Archer, who ate his dinner heartily, and went as many orders for pottage as he cared to fall, suggested that there was a woman in the case, good Aunt Winnifred smiled bland incredulity, Mrs. Toxer, I should like to see that woman!"

Then she plied her darning-needles nimbly, sighed, scratched her head with a needle, counted stitches, and said,

"Sometimes I can't but hope that it is concern of mind, without the heart."

Mrs. Toxer also knitted, and scratched, and counted.

"No, ma'am; much more likely concern of heart with a full consciousness of it. One, two, three—that's right! I'm afraid you dropped a stitch."

Aunt Winnifred, who never dropped stitches, smiled pleasantly and answered,

"Yes, indeed, and this time you have dropped a very great one."

Meanwhile Archer's great picture advanced rapidly. Diana, who had become within a fortnight a portion of Hope Wayne going out of a cloud was now more fully completed. She was still enveloped in the cloud, and from that which all the moonlight of the picture fell.

When Lawrence Never came into the studio one morning in October, he worked in secret upon his picture and never showed it, asked him if he would like to see it. The newcomer said yes, and seated himself comfortably in a large chair, while the artist brought the canvas from its inner recess and placed it before him. As he did so, Archer stepped a little aside, and watched him intently.

Lawrence Never gazed for a long time and silently at the picture. As he did so, his face slowly assumed a tenor of inscrutability, and Archer's eyes attacked it in vain. Diana was clearly Hope Wayne. That he had seen all along. But Endymion was so clearly Lawrence Never! He looked startled at moments, and his eyes, and after many minutes he said, quietly,

"It is beautiful. It is triumphant. Endymion is a fine conception. But Diana's face is so noble and her glance so tenderly earnest that it would surely rouse him if he were not dead."

"Dead!" returned Archer, "why, you know he is only sleeping."

"No, no," said Lawrence, gently, "dead; utterly dead—he is. If he were not, it would simply impossible not to awake and love her. Who that did gentleman on the wall over there?" and he pointed to another picture.

Lawrence Never asked the same question of all the portraits so persistently that Archer could not help laughing. At last he had satisfied his curiosity—a curiosity which he had never shown before—and the merchant rose and said good-by.

"You like my picture—"

"Immensely. But if she looks forever she'll never waken him. Poor Endymion! he's dead to all that heavenly glance."

He was about closing the door.

"Hallo!" cried Archer.

Lawrence Never put his head into the room.

"What a pity that he's dead!"

"Why so?"

"Because goddesses never marry, so she'll have to wait."

Lawrence Never turned, with his hand upon the door to fall back, suffering pretty severely. Conductor Evans Dorsey, of Baltimore, was killed instantly, and Conductor George Hollingsworth received a wound from which he died during the day. Several others were wounded, among them a son of Dr. Hammond, of Martinsburg.

LATER CASUALTIES.

A gentleman who was subsequently during the rest of the day, resulting in the killing of two of the insurrectionists and the wounding of a third. One crashed out through a culvert leading into the Potomac, and attempted to cross the river, but was shot through the head in the act of escaping, or conveying information to Cook, in no doubt.

He was shot while crossing the river, and fell dead on the rocks. As observers had supposed, he was armed with Sharp's rifle. The body was afterward stripped of a fine gold watch, and a roll of bills and papers, and a captain's commission, known to be in full form, and declaring that he bears Captain's rank in the army of liberation under Brigadier-General Brown. A light watch was shot just outside the Armory gate. The ball went through the thigh, severing one of the principal arteries, and killing him instantly. His name is not known, but he is one of the leaders in the band of raiders. His body was left in the street until noon yesterday, exposed to every indignity that could be heaped upon it by the excited populace.

At this time a tall, powerful man, named Evan Shepherd, came out from the Armory, conducting some prisoners, and, seeing the dead body, spurned it with his foot, once in the head. He was also captured and taken to a tavern, after the insurrectionists' stronghold was turned over to the United States military, in a helpless condition. During the afternoon a short little affair took place on the Shenandoah side of the river. The insurrectionists had also seized the hulks of the rifle works, and a party of their number found their way to the river in a mill-race, and dislodged them.

In this movement, it was said, three insurrectionists were killed, but we found but one dead body, that of a negro, on the side of the river. He had been shot in the neck, and appeared cruised. Guards were placed around the Armory, and every precaution taken to prevent escape.

THE NIGHT SCENE.

At 11 o'clock the Monday night train, with Baltimore military and marines, arrived at Harper's Ferry, where they waited for the arrival of Colonel Lee, deputized by the War Department to receive the prisoners. The night passed without any serious alarms, but not without excitement. The marines were marched and countermarched until they arrived, when, being stationed immediately in front of the Armory, they were ordered to prepare for the engagement. Everything was done with great gallantry volunteers, but what for was not ascertained. There was only one serious fire from the insurgents.

NEGOTIATIONS NEXT MORNING.

Early next morning a door was opened in the building occupied by the insurgents, and one of the men came out with a flag of truce, and delivered what was supposed to be terms of surrender. The conditions were refused, and an assault showed they were not accepted. Shortly after the firing ceased, and the door was opened, and Cook, who was acting as aid to Colonel Lee, appeared, followed by the besieged, Samuel Strider, Esq., an old and respectable citizen, with a flag of truce. Cook was received at the door by Captain Cook. Lieutenant Stuart demanded an unconditional surrender, and threatening them protection from immediate violence and a trial by law. Captain Brown refused to surrender, but Stuart vicously demanded, which were substantially, "That they should be permitted to march out with their arms and horses, taking their prisoners with them; that they should proceed unmolested to a secure retreat; and that they would free their prisoners; the soldiers would then be drawn off to a distance, and the insurgents would do all in their power to prevent the effusion of blood." Lieutenant Stuart pressed upon Brown his desperate position, and argued that further resistance would be rough beyond rad-shot, was evidently very earnest, and the coolness of his demeanor, and his cool manner of the caged flag-bearer was warm praise. At this moment the interest of the scene became intense. The marines were arranged all around the building, cutting off an escape in every direction. The marines, divided in six squads, were ready for a dash at the door.

THE BUILDING STORMED.

Finally, Lieutenant Green, leaving exhausted all argument with the determined Captain Brown, walked slowly from the door.

Immediately the signal for attack was given, and the marines, headed by Colonel Lee, with a shout, rushed through, divested of their lives on each side. Two powerful fellows sparring between the lines did with heavy sledge-hammers battering-rams against the door.

The door swung and swayed, but appeared to be covered with a rope, the spring of which deadened the effect of the blow. At last it gave way, and the force of a ladder, sword forty feet long, and advancing at a run, brought it with tremendous force against the door. It fell in, and blow it gave way, and fell rolling inward in a startling position. The marines immediately followed the first breach, Major Russell and Lieutenant Green leading. In arms to front fire.

The firing from the interior was quick and severe, but the marines were undaunted, and for a moment the conflict was terrific. Sharp reports succeeded each other, and the spectators to something like a pitch of frenzy. The next moment the marines had driven the foe from the door, and the work was done; while cheers rang from every part, the prisoners being bring that the marines had done their part admirably.

APPEARANCE OF THE PRISONERS.

When the insurgents were brought out they looked dead and others wounded. They were guarded with cavetaines, and only the prisoners who had been taken prisoners showed fresh immediate execution. The crowd, nearly every man of which was armed, was kept back by a strong military element, and order prevailed. Colonel Lee then ordered the prisoners to be secured. The appearance of the liberated prisoners, as they came through the engine-house door, was curious, caused injury, changed the current of feeling, and produced a sensation that for a time was wild and excitable.

In the assault private Rolfort of the Marines received a ball in the stomach, and was believed to be fatally wounded. Another received a slight flesh wound.

Thus even in front of the engine-house after the assault presented a dreadful sight. Lying on the ground in front of them killed on the previous day, and found inside the house, three were dead and two mortally wounded. Near them lay the dead and others groaning in pain. Some of the wounded were shot through the head, and others through and through. Some were shot in the breast, and others presenting a gory spectacle. He had a severe bayonet wound in his side, and his head and face were coated with blood.

BROWN'S EXAMINATION.

A short time after Captain Brown was brought out he revived and looked around on those around him. He was asked if he was not wounding that he had done only what he thought right. To a question substantially as follows: "Are you Captain Brown, of Kansas?" "I am sometimes called so." "Are you Captain Brown, of Kansas?" "I think to do my duty there." "What war your present object?" "To free the slaves." "Nothing more?" "Were any other persons but those with you now connected with the movement?" "No." "Was it not expected all from the North?" "No; there was no one connected with the movement but those who came with me." "Did you expect to kill people in order to carry your plan?" "I did not wish to kill any person, but to do my duty." Various questions of this kind were put to Captain Brown, which he answered slowly and freely, with seeming anxiety to vindicate himself.

He urged that he had the town at his mercy; that he could have burned it and murdered the inhabitants, but did not; he had treated the prisoners with courtesy, and complained that he had been hunted down like a wolf. He spoke of the killing of his son, which he alleged was done while bearing a flag of truce, and seemed very anxious for the safety of his wounded son. His conversation bore the impression of the conviction that what he had done in free slavery was right, and that in the warfare in which he was engaged he was entitled to be treated with all the respect of a prisoner of war.

CAPTURE OF ARMS.

During Tuesday morning, one of Washington's negroes came in the greatest excitement, stating that Cook was in the woods with a rifle, and had shot some time during the night. Some citizens started in search of him, and found him. Another rifle was retrieved from Harper's Ferry. The Independent Grays, of Baltimore, Company, and a scouting party of marines, and they soon returned with two wagons loaded with arms and ammunition, and the prisoners in charge.

The arms consisted of boxes filled with Sharp's rifles, with the address of the Colt's Patent Fire Arms Manufacturing Company, Chicopee, Mass. There were also a number of pikes and other warlike implements, a large number of spears, sharp iron two-edged-like Bowie knives, and a number of pistols. Some of the pikes were in the form of a spear, with spikes projecting from every thing else that might be needed: the gearing of the wagons, harness, and every thing that the party of men were expected to be armed, and that absurd act needs that they were to be used in the country.

How all these supplies were got up to this farm with-out attracting attention is very strange. They are supposed to have been brought through Pennsylvania, and the wagons which bore them were hired for the use of his arms, but with his more secret purpose unknown to the owners.

TREATMENT OF BROWN'S PRISONERS.

The citizens imprisoned by the insurrectionists all testify to the kind treatment they received. Their confinement was not insulted, and beyond the outrage of restricting their liberty, nothing was done. The prisoners were severely wounded, as Brown, and all disconcerted them that they would not be long, and that they would be released in a few days. Mr. Kitzmiller, a prominent citizen, remained inside on abolition agents to them. Colonel Washington speaks of Brown as a man of great coolness. He never blanched during the assault, though he admitted that the fatal shot swept was dangerous, and that he would have to die. When the door was broken down, and the insurgents were driven inside, Brown immediately cried out, "Here's one surrender—give him quarter!" and ordered the firing ceased. He also ran rifle at the door.

Colonel Washington spoke highly with Colonel Lee, and Brown was in the room when Colonel Lee told one in Kansas and two here. He had not proved them to be men of courage. Brown said he did not regret their loss—they had died in a glorious cause.

BROWN'S PAPERS AND STORES.

On 19th a quantity of papers and some volunteers made a visit to Brown's house. They found a large number of pikes, axes, shot, ammunition, and fifteen hundred pikes, with large blades affixed. They also found a quantity of money, including counterfeits throwing much light on the affair, printed constitutions for the provisional government, and a number of commissions in various States of the Union. They also found a number of letters addressed to Mr. Forbes—one from Fred Douglass, containing ten dollars from a lady in Rochester, and one from Brown's wife, dated at North Elba, New York, in which she says that she is much pleased by the conduct of a New York banker, who not only sent her money, but also expressed sorrow for Brown's fate. The Governor has issued a proclamation offering a reward of $250 for the arrest of each person, and warns are now scouring the mountains in pursuit of him.

THE PRISONERS TO BE TRIED AT CHARLESTOWN.

The prisoners will be immediately taken to Charlestown jail to await the action of the Grand Jury. They will be arraigned for trial in a few days. The question of jurisdiction has been settled in this way: the local authorities will try the insurgents for murder, and meanwhile the United States authorities are to proceed on a charge of treason against the State. Governor Wise and Attorney-General Andrews have no objection to the General Government proceeding against the prisoners first, as, in the event of their being tried by the State, the United authorities have done with them.

THE NAMES OF THE INSURGENTS.

The names of all the insurgents are not positively alight except three white men whom he admits he sent away on Sunday night, in company with their proper titles under the provisional government:

WHITE.

OFFICERS OF ARMY.

General John Brown, Commander-in-Chief, wounded and will recover.

Captain Oliver Brown, dead.

Captain Watson Brown, dead.

Captain Aaron C. Stephens, of Connecticut, wounded.

Major Edwin Coppic, of Iowa, wounded and prisoner.

Lieutenant Edwin Coppick, of Iowa, unhurt.

Lieutenant Lewis Leary, of Virginia, dead.

Lieutenant William Lemon, of Maine, dead.

Lieutenant Jeremiah Anderson, of Connecticut, escaped.

PRIVATES.

Stewart Taylor, of Canada, dead.

Charles P. Tidd, of Maine, dead.

Thomas Thompson, of New York, dead.

Adolph Thompson, of New York, dead.

Captain John Cook, of Connecticut, in Virginia, dead.

Lieutenant Jeremiah Anderson, of Indiana, dead.

John Kagi, of Virginia, shot dead by Colonel Washington.

NEGROES.

Dangerfield, newly of Ohio, raised in Virginia, dead.

Shadrach, of Virginia, escaped, dead, and wounded, but a prisoner. He was elected a member of the provisional government by the insurgents.

Lewis Leary, of Ohio, raised in Virginia, dead.

Osborne Anderson, of Canada, escaped, not wounded, a prisoner at Charlestown jail.

BROWN'S VIEWS.

Brown has had a conversation with Senator Mason, which is reported in the New York Herald. The following is a verbatim report of the conversation:

Mr. Brown, I have asked you, or, at least, who furnished money for your expedition?

Mr. Brown. I furnished most of it myself. I own not implicate others. Tis by my own folly that I have been taken. I could easily have saved myself had I exercised my own better judgments, rather than the solicitations of others.

Mr. Mason. Did you get any assistance from Northerners?

Mr. Brown. No; I had the means to make my self secure without any escape, but I allowed myself to be overpersuaded by the folly of others.

Mr. Mason. But you killed some people passing along the streets quietly.

Mr. Brown. That is true, Sir, if there was any thing to that kind done it was without my knowledge. Your own citizens know that such was not my object. I could even possible means was taken to prevent it. I did not allow my men to fire upon unarmed persons, considering the danger of killing innocent persons. I am sorry for it, but I say they will tell you that we all used every effort possible to prevent it, and did not return it.

A BY-STANDER. That is not so. You killed an unarmed man at the corner of the house over there at the water tank) and another besides.

Mr. Brown. See here, my friend, it is useless to dispute or contradict the report of your own neighbors who were my prisoners.

Mr. Mason. If you will call on me next you here—who provided the means—that would be information of some value.

Mr. Brown. I will answer freely and faithfully about what concerns myself. I will answer any thing I can with honor, but not about others.

HE WANTED TO FREE THE SLAVES.

Mr. Mason. How many are engaged with you in this movement? I ask these questions for our own safety.

Mr. Brown. Any questions that I can honorably answer I will, not otherwise. So far as I am myself concerned. I have told every thing truthfully. I value my life but little.

Mr. Mason. What was your object in coming?

Mr. Brown. To free the slaves, and only that.

A Young Man (in the uniform of a volunteer company). How many men in all had you?

Mr. Brown. Counting all those with eighteen men and boys, I had twenty-two.

A Volunteer. What in the world did you suppose you could do here with that force—take the town?

Mr. Brown. Young man, I don't wish to dictate that question to me.

A Volunteer. You could not do any thing!

Mr. Brown. Well, perhaps your ideas and my military subjects would differ materially.

Mr. Mason. How do you expect your acts?

Mr. Brown. I think, my friend, you are guilty of a great wrong against God and humanity, I say it without wishing to be offensive, and it would be perfectly right for any one to interfere with you so far as to free those you willfully hold in bondage. I feel no hostility.

Mr. Mason. I understand that.

Mr. Brown. I think I did right, and that others will do right who interfere with you at any time and all time. I hold that the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you," applies to all who would help others to gain their liberty.

HOW HE WAS COMMANDED-IN-CHIEF.

Mr. Mason. Did you consider yourself commissioned, in this paper (the Constitution)? I have not read it.

Mr. Brown. I did in some sense. I wish you would give that your attention for a moment.

Mr. Mason. You considered yourself the Commander-in-Chief of the provisional military forces?

Mr. Brown. I was chosen, agreeably to the ordinances of the provisional government, Commander-in-Chief of the forces.

Mr. Mason. What wages did you offer?

Mr. Brown. None.

A Lieutenant-Stuart. "The wages of sin is death."

Mr. Brown. That is the wages you propose to give to you if you had been a prisoner and wounded in my hands.

A By-Standers. "I did not promise a negro to Gettysburg twenty dollars per month."

Mr. Brown. "I did not."

A By-Standers. "I heard of your doing so."

WHAT HE EXPECTED.

Mr. Vallandigham. "Did you expect a general rising of the slaves in case of your success?"

Mr. Brown. No, Sir; nor did I wish it. I expected to gain them by my own force. I told them so to their face."

Mr. Vallandigham. "Did you expect to hold possession here until then?"

Mr. Brown. "Well, probably I had quite a different idea. I do not know that I ought to reveal my plans. I had a right to expect reinforcements, and I probably allowed myself to be so. You overrate your strength in supposing I could hold possession of this armory with it. I was too badly after commencing the open attack—after the first shot was fired—my communications were cut off. I could get no word to my friends in the North. I was at one time completely hemmed in. It was at occasioned by my desire to spare the feelings of the prisoners that I allowed the train to pass unmolested. I had no knowledge of the shooting of the negro by my men."

Mr. Vallandigham. "What time did you commence your organization in Kansas?"

Mr. Brown. "I first came over about two years ago, if I remember right. I have been in Kansas since."

Mr. Vallandigham. "Who was the Secretary?"

Mr. Brown. "I had Secretaries, but I cannot tell. I have not recollect. I think the officers were elected in May, 1858. I was not present at the election. I personally was head in a little contract by women, and my memory cleaves on dates, etc."

HIS WARNING TO THE SOUTH.

Mr. Brown. "I wish to say further to the South, if there is to be any more of this kind of movement, I positively justifiable, and not to set the part of an intruding people. I think I have stated my object sufficiently. I wish to say, furthermore, that you, gentlemen, may rest assured that this affair has been a matter for a settlement with me for many years. The matter has been gone over and over then you are prepared for it. You scarce you are prepared for it. You may rest assured that it was not my early decision of now; but this question is still to be settled—this negro question, I mean. The end of that is not yet. These wounds were inflicted upon me—both sabre cuts on my head, and bayonet stabs in different parts of my body—some minutes after I had ceased firing and conveying the idea that I surrendered, for the benefit of others, not for my own. (This statement was vehemently denied by those present.) I am here a prisoner, wounded, because I have shed blood in a cause I thought just—and no more than others. I could have killed more than any one in the room during the whole melee, but I supposed the cause in only to receive our surrender. You look me now for a cowardly dog only to be hung up for—as loud as men could yell—but in the confusion and excitement I did not hear anybody say a word. I saw only the Major, or any one, meant to butcher us after we had surrendered."

An officer here stated that the orders to the marines were, that they should spare the lives of every one except Brown, who, and one of them killed, they were obliged to retain to secure their safety.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF THE INSURGENTS.

The following is a description of the insurgents, taken from the report of the personal appearance of the insurgents:

"Old Brown, the leader, is a small man, with white hair and beard, and a very pale face, and looks like a man speaking his lips are compressed, and he has the appearance of a man of determined nerve. His two sons are dead were strikingly alike in their personal appearance. They are both young men, about twenty-five years of age, sallow complexion, sunken eyes, and dark hair. One of them was shot through the body, and died soon after the assault. The other was severely cut on the head and breast, and from his cold, sullen manner, one would suppose had received his injuries while fighting. He was mortally wounded, is tall, black-haired, and of dark complexion. Another prisoner is named Stevens, about forty years of age. Stevens, who was wounded in Monday's fight, is shot through the body, and cannot live. He is a very determined looking man, and has a fierce look. Another is a young negro slave lists, all the muscles fleshy and strong. He is about five feet ten inches in height, and of undoubted resolution. When taken prisoner he did not ask or expect quarter, and lay and suffered from his wounds without complaint other than a groan.

"Cogvie, who was taken prisoner uninjured, is a small-sized man, but very compactly built. He has light-blue eyes, and the only one of the entire number who has a pleasing expression of countenance. He was in a most agreeable humor, and said it was immaterial to him now or in what manner he was disposed of; that he had no fear of death; that he had been in peril before in their prefer a trial by a public tribunal to a mere shot summary, power preferred to settle his case in some other manner.

"Green, a mulatto, is a powerful man, with a very bad countenance and expression, and a most arrant coward. He cringes and begs to every person who approaches him.

THE DEFAULTER LANE ACQUITTED.

Judge Osborne has ordered a decision of the case of Lane, the alleged Fulton Bank defaulter, dismissing the complaint. After the decision was rendered, a complaint for false pretense was preferred against Lane, and a decision on this will be given in a few days.

END OF BISHOP ONDERDONK'S CASE.

The House of Bishops on the 19th disposed of Bishop Onderdonk's case, by granting leave to withdraw his petition. This is equivalent to a full and free acquittal. After a long discussion for some days they refused to receive the testimony, and thus closed the whole matter.

THE COLCHESTER BANK CASE.

The investigation in the case of Warren Leland, Colchester, Conn., bank teller, charged with forgery, has been concluded at Colchester, Connecticut, resulting in the discharge of the prisoner. The case of Mr. Leland was immediately represented on the same or similar charges, and was held to bail in $5,000 to appear for trial on November 21, at the same place.

THE PROPOSED PEACE CONGRESS.

The following pleasant correspondence has passed between two eminent Democrats in this State:

"UTICA, Sept. 28.

"DEAR SIR,—At a meeting of the Democratic State Central Committee, held in this city on the 22d inst., the first fact, unanimous was adopted to secure a more perfect organization of the Democratic party, and to provide for the more thorough canvass of every district of the State under the act of last winter. Provision was also made for the appointment of a committee and of political documents throughout every county in the State, and this will be attended to at the earliest day which can only be covered by an appeal to the liberality of each of you (circular to be sent to you). In order that we may proceed to be willing, to contribute toward the objects intended. An early response is requested, and the sum and nature of which, which may be remitted to Dean Richmond, Esq., as Chairman, to the care of Messrs. ——, as specifically yours,

P. CAGGER, Secretary."

"THURLOW CAGGER,—I have your pleasant favor in which you inform me that the Democratic State Central met to find several of the same character as often as six election appeals to the liberality of each of you. I am sorry that I cannot respond to your request, which I can only be covered by an appeal to the liberality of each of you. I certainly think the present state of affairs—when measures and policy are to be discussed and decided—is the time for a free exchange of opinion and political views. The care of those in high places are slap to sit but the few, and the existence of influence of party is ignored until money is wanted.

"I don't propose to pay for the perpetuation of such a state of things, much as I desire the continued success of the Democratic party. Sincerely yours,

WAYTE BEEBAN.

"P. CAGGER, Esq., Albany."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE CHINESE CORRESPONDENCE.

The official correspondence between the British Government and its officials in China, relative to the massacre at Peiho, has been published in Blue Books. It is published:

The Hon. Colonel Bruce, British Embassador, states positively that if Admiral Hope had expressed any doubt as to the wisdom of attempting the passage of the Peiho, they would not have been started by the squadron, and if it be objected that the force under command was insufficient to justify so bold a line of policy, Colonel Bruce is prepared to take the responsibility of the step.

Lord John Russell very strongly approves of what Colonel Bruce has done, and expresses his confidence in the completeness of the preparations which he made. He forces to support the plenipotentiaries in their intentions.

Colonel Bruce, in one of his letters, shows the position occupied by the Russian Government in China, and expresses the opinion that the Chinese will not make difficulties about ratifying the treaty with Russia, as the conditions under which the American Minister is about entitled to visit Pekin are more objectionable than Russian pride. Colonel Bruce expresses much gratification at the fact that the Russian Government has not taken the part which was expected by the Chinese authorities as follows: "Mr. Ward's position is one of considerable difficulty, now that he is after not recognized by Prince Kung as Pe-ki-lay, but any course we can open was the one which he has adopted. He has done his duty nobly, and in the spirit of his declarations at Hong Kong; and it is a matter of congratulation that the Russian and the previous proceedings in a strong argument in favor of the conduct pursued at the Bombardment of the Peiho.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" TO SAIL ON 20TH FOR NEW YORK.

The directors of the Great Eastern have finally decided that the vessel not go to sea again until next year. She will be refitted on her trial trip October 8, arriving at Weymouth on the 20th.

If the trial is successful, it is still intended to dispatch the vessel to America on the 20th, and passengers are to be taken on the trial trip. It is said that the maximum number of passengers will be accommodated, and the arrangements before proceeding to sea with passengers. During the trip from the Thames, the Great Eastern will steam 24 and the screw 15 revolutions per minute; and to obtain the maximum speed the paddles must be 14 revolutions.

FRANCE.

MORE WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.

At latest advices the political horizon was cast between Horns and Caen were being carried on with extreme activity.

The London Herald's Paris correspondent says it is positively true that Napoleon has been negotiating, both with Austria and Sardinia, which will enable him to command the Mediterranean. Large naval and diplomatic armaments throughout every country in the State, and this will be attended to at the earliest day which can only be covered by an appeal to the liberality of each of you (circular to be sent to you). In order that we may proceed to be willing, to contribute toward the objects intended. An early response is requested, and the sum and nature of which, which may be remitted to Dean Richmond, Esq., as Chairman, to the care of Messrs. ——, as specifically yours,

P. CAGGER, Secretary."

"THURLOW CAGGER,—I have your pleasant favor in which you inform me that the Democratic State Central met to find several of the same character as often as six election appeals to the liberality of each of you. I am sorry that I cannot respond to your request, which I can only be covered by an appeal to the liberality of each of you. I certainly think the present state of affairs—when measures and policy are to be discussed and decided—is the time for a free exchange of opinion and political views. The care of those in high places are slap to sit but the few, and the existence of influence of party is ignored until money is wanted.

"I don't propose to pay for the perpetuation of such a state of things, much as I desire the continued success of the Democratic party. Sincerely yours,

WAYTE BEEBAN.

"P. CAGGER, Esq., Albany."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE CHINESE CORRESPONDENCE.

The official correspondence between the British Government and its officials in China, relative to the massacre at Peiho, has been published in Blue Books. It is published:

The Hon. Colonel Bruce, British Embassador, states positively that if Admiral Hope had expressed any doubt as to the wisdom of attempting the passage of the Peiho, they would not have been started by the squadron, and if it be objected that the force under command was insufficient to justify so bold a line of policy, Colonel Bruce is prepared to take the responsibility of the step.

Lord John Russell very strongly approves of what Colonel Bruce has done, and expresses his confidence in the completeness of the preparations which he made. He forces to support the plenipotentiaries in their intentions.

Colonel Bruce, in one of his letters, shows the position occupied by the Russian Government in China, and expresses the opinion that the Chinese will not make difficulties about ratifying the treaty with Russia, as the conditions under which the American Minister is about entitled to visit Pekin are more objectionable than Russian pride. Colonel Bruce expresses much gratification at the fact that the Russian Government has not taken the part which was expected by the Chinese authorities as follows: "Mr. Ward's position is one of considerable difficulty, now that he is after not recognized by Prince Kung as Pe-ki-lay, but any course we can open was the one which he has adopted. He has done his duty nobly, and in the spirit of his declarations at Hong Kong; and it is a matter of congratulation that the Russian and the previous proceedings in a strong argument in favor of the conduct pursued at the Bombardment of the Peiho.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" TO SAIL ON 20TH FOR NEW YORK.

The directors of the Great Eastern have finally decided that the vessel not go to sea again until next year. She will be refitted on her trial trip October 8, arriving at Weymouth on the 20th.

If the trial is successful, it is still intended to dispatch the vessel to America on the 20th, and passengers are to be taken on the trial trip. It is said that the maximum number of passengers will be accommodated, and the arrangements before proceeding to sea with passengers. During the trip from the Thames, the Great Eastern will steam 24 and the screw 15 revolutions per minute; and to obtain the maximum speed the paddles must be 14 revolutions.

FRANCE.

MORE WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.

At latest advices the political horizon was cast between Horns and Caen were being carried on with extreme activity.

The London Herald's Paris correspondent says it is positively true that Napoleon has been negotiating, both with Austria and Sardinia, which will enable him to command the Mediterranean. Large naval and diplomatic armaments are for Civita Vecchia; and another step in the Mediterranean is the purchase of the steamer Valetta by the Messageries Imperiales. She is a fine vessel, of 1,500 tons with 10,000 men for the Morocco frontier, will command the Roman coast and threaten Civita.

The London Times correspondent is assured that the number of troops which will be assembled in the camp that twenty large transports, capable of conveying 1000 men each, are being fitted out.

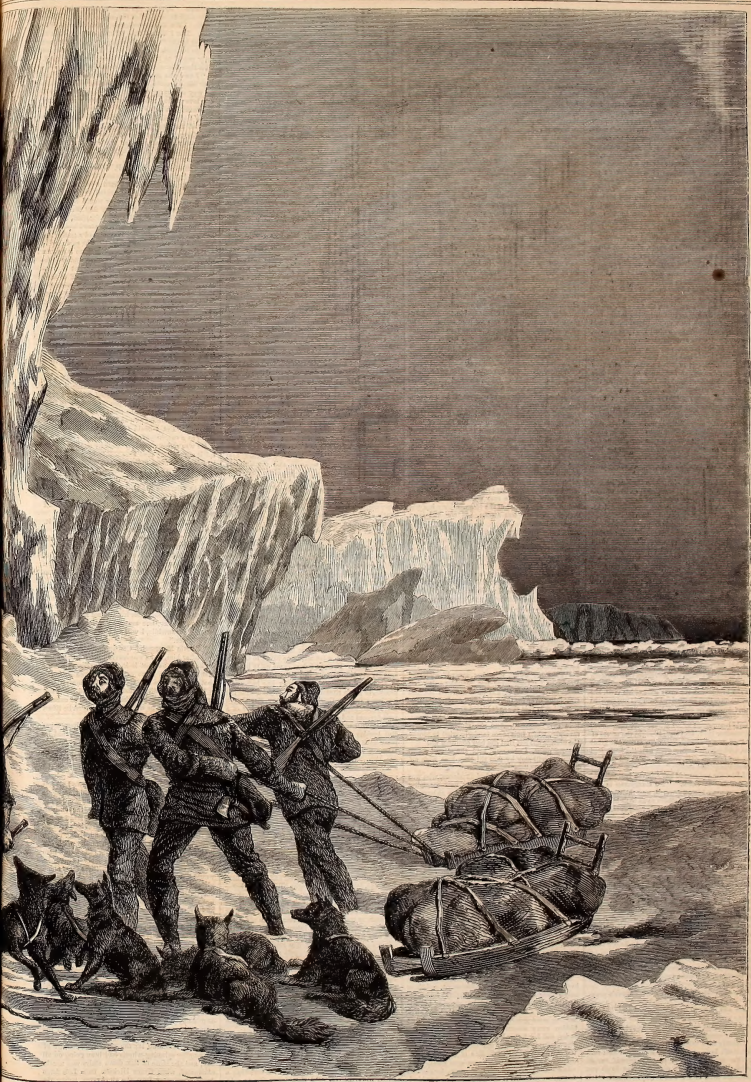
FUNERAL OF MR. MASON.

A Paris letter of the 20th says: "To-day the funeral service was performed over the remains of the late American Minister, Mr. Mason, at the Church of the Madeleine. The Archbishop of Paris were all present, and the Church was crowded with persons of every rank and position of friendship. The body of the deceased is to be immediately sent to America.

MORE SORROWS OF ROSSUTH.

The English papers publish an interesting letter from Kossuth, expressing keenest grief at the Viscidness arrangement at the moment which the deliverance of his country was expected. He says: "Twice during the last ten years, only ten years since, from his beloved spot, I was disappointed. He derives some consolation, however, from the events of the war, and is disappointed in the conviction that Hungary will yet be free. He states that he insisted on a double stipulation on behalf of the Hungarian prisoners of war who were confided under his banner; viz., that of amnesty, and that of exemption from further Austrian military service. France has obtained these conditions from Austria.

DISCOVERY OF THE FRANKLIN EXPEDITION BOAT ON



ILLIAM'S LAND BY LIEUTENANT HOBSON.—[See Page 690.]

LOIS WITCH.
IN THREE PARTS.

PART II.

It was hard, up-hill work for Lois to win herself a place in this family. Her aunt was a woman of narrow, strong affections. Her love for her husband, if ever she had had any, was burned out and dead long ago. What she did for him she did from duty. She looked askance at Lois for many reasons: her dress-making, the Salem sea inapparent, the expression of disapprobation on her face on that evening still lingered and rankled in Grace's memory: early prejudices, and feelings, and impressions of the English girl were all on the side of what would now be called Church and State, what was then esteemed in that country a superstitious observance of the directions of a Papist rubric, and a strong regard for a religious establishment.

Somehow Lois felt instinctively that Manasseh was really friendly towards her. He was little in the house; there was farming and some kind of mercantile business to be transacted by him, as real head of the house; and at the noon meal or the we went shooting and hunting in the surrounding forests until a spring which was to supply water to warm and reprove him in private, although to the neighbors she boasted largely of her son's courage.

Nature, the old Indwelling mother, was extraordinarily making a blood run cold as she and Ruth and Prudence sat round the log stove and heard them of the wizards of her race. It was often in the kitchen, in the darkening evening, while some cooking process was going on, that the stories would come, sitting on her haunches by the bright red wood embers which gave the only light in the room, and her self reversing the shadows of all the faces around, told her weird stories while they were awaiting the rising of the dough, preparatory to the baking of the household bread had to be made.

After such like evenings Lois could smell effort on Lois's part to go out at her aunt's command into the common pasture round the town and bring the cattle home at night. We know but what the double-headed snake might start up from each blackberry bush—that the most venomous of every creature in the service of the Indian wizards, that had such power over all those white maidens who met the grey plaid of their race in the lone forest, was creeping body, so that, loathe him, loathe the Indian race as they would, off they plunged into the forest to seek out some Indian man, and must beg to be taken into his wigwam, abjuring faith and race forever?

Faith was the person with whom the English girl was the most intimately associated in the whole of house. The two were about the same age, and certain household employments were shared between them.

Stern old meisters came in to pay their pastoral visits. On such occasions Faith was expected to put on clean apron and clean cap, and make them more welcome than she was ever seen to do any one else, bringing out the best provender in the store, and setting of all before them. Also the great Bible was brought down from its shelf, and to be summoned from their work to listen while the minister read a chapter, and, as he read, expounded it at considerable length. All this Lois had to be silent, and, lifted up his right hand and prayed for all present, for absent members of the family, for all possible cases of spiritual need; and finally, taking the individuals before him, he would put up a very particular petition, according to the wording to his notion of their wants. At first Lois wondered at the agitation of two of the old people's ears of this description to the outward circumstances of each case; but when she perceived that her aunt had usually a pretty long consultation beforehand with the minister in the early part of his visit, she became convinced that he received his information and his knowledge through the medium of "that godly woman, Grace Hickson;" and I am afraid she paid less regard to the prayer for the absent ones from another land, who had brought the orders of that land as a seed, with the produce of a certain ocean, and who is letting even now the little seed shoot up into an evil tree, in which all unclean creatures may find shelter.

"I like the prayers of our Church better," said Lois one day to Faith, "for they remember the England can pray his own words, and therefore it is that he can not judge of others so as to fit his prayers to what he can conceive to be their wants. How did you did this morning?"

"I hate Mr. Tappan," said Faith, shortly, a passionate flash of light coming out of her dark eyes.

"Why so, cousin? It seems to me as if he were a good man, although I like not his prayers.

Faith only repeated her words, "I hate him."

Lois was sorry for this strong feeling; intuitively sorry, for she was loving herself, delighted in being loved, and felt a jar run through her at every sign of want of love in any one. But she did not know what to say, and was silent at the time. Faith, too, was burning her words back with vehemence, but spoke never a word until her thread snapped, and then she pushed the wheel away hastily and left the room.

Then Prudence crept softly up to Lois's side. This strange child seemed to be tossed about by varying moods: to-day she was caressing and communicative, to-morrow she might be deceitful, mocking, and unconfiding in the joys and sorrows of others.

"So thou dost not like Pastor Tappan's prayers?" she whispered.

Lois was sorry to have been overheard, but she neither would nor could take back her words:

"I like them not so well as the prayers I used to hear at home."

"Mother says thy home was with the ungodly. Nay, don't look at me so—it was not I that said it. I'm none so fond of praying myself, nor of Pastor Tappan for that matter. But Faith can not abide him, and I know why. Shall I tell thee, Cousin Lois?"

"No! Faith did not tell me, and she was the right person to give her own reasons."

"Ask her where young Mr. Nolan is gone to, and thou wilt hear. I have seen Faith cry by the hour together about Mr. Nolan."

"Hush, child, hush!" said Lois, for she heard Faith's approaching step, and feared lest she should overhear what they were saying.

The truth was that a year or two before there had been a great struggle in Salem village, a great division in the congregation, the body of dissenters had been the leader of the more violent, and, ultimately, the spoke some hard, bitter sentences of this the less popular minister, Mr. Nolan, had had to leave the place. And him Faith Hickson loved with all the strength of her passionate dark, although he never was aware of the attachment he had excited, and the whole family were the recipients of manifestations of mere feeling to ever observe the signs of any emotion on Faith's part. But the will of a woman is a strong thing, and observed them all. She knew, as well as if she had been told in express words, that Faith did not care about father or mother, brother and sister, about household work and daily occupation, nay, about the observances of religion, for Mr.

Faith grew sadder and duller as the autumn drew on. She lost her bright, rosy, brown complexion became sallow and colorless, her dark eyes looked hollow and wild. The 1st of November was near at hand, and Mr. Tappan's intimate, intentioned efforts to bring some life and cheerfulness into the monotonous existence of the dying Faith of many English customs, silly enough, no doubt, and which scarcely lighted up a flicker of interest in the poor sorrowful soul. The children were lying awake in their bed in the great unplastered room. Lois had a part pallet-bed, a part bedroom. Lois began to speak, to talk about England, and the dear old ways at home, without reading anxiously whether the effect of her intentions of her simplicities, well-remembered customs and legends were listened in England, and scarcely yet died out in Scotland. As she told of tricks she had often played, of the apple-scent bags she had made for Christmas gifts, of the basins of water, of the nuts burning side by side in the grate, every three of them typical ways of divination by which laughing, trembling English maidens sought to see the form of their future husband, if husband there was to be, then Faith listened breathlessly, asking short, eager questions, as if she were afraid of losing a single her gloomy heart. Lois went on speaking, telling her of all the stories that would confirm the truth of all the secondsight traditions of the country of her accustomed methods, half believing, half incredulous herself, but willing to cheer and please Faith.

Suddenly Prudence rose up from her truckle-bed in the dim corner of the room. She had not thought that she was awake, but she was a silent listening long.

"Cousin Lois may go out and meet Satan by the brook-side, if she will, but if thou goest, Faith, I will tell mother—ay, and I will tell Pastor Tappan, too. That will be worse than all. I'll be afeard of my very life. I would rather never be let out of doors than that. And I'm sure mother would take the apple out of my hand as I hold it over my left shoulder." The excited girl gave a loud sound of terror as she saw the apple-peel had conjured up. Faith and Lois sprang out together, the latter with a cry of affright, the former white night-gowns. Summoned by the same cry, Grace Hickson came to her child.

"Lois, get up!" said Faith, authoritatively.

"What is it, my wench?" asked Grace. While Lois, feeling as if she had done all the mischief, kept silence.

"Take her away, take her away!" screamed Prudence. "Lois is a witch—she is possessed. I'll shoulder—the Evil One is there now. I see him. I'll tell mother, if you don't take away Lois."

"What is this she says?" said Grace, austerely.

"She is dreaming," said Faith; "Prudence, hold thy tongue, and go to bed." Lois said, more severely, while Lois more tenderly tried to soothe the alarms she had herself conjured up.

"Be quiet, Prudence," said she, "and go to sleep. I will stay by thee till thou hast gone off. Thou art safe."

"No, no! go away," sobbed Prudence, who was really terrified herself, but was now assuming more alarm than she felt from a natural instinct, seeing herself the centre of attention. "Faith shall stay by me, and Faith is not afraid."

So Faith sat by her sister, and Grace, displeased and perplexed, withdrew to her own bed, purposing to inquire more minutely into the affair in the morning. Lois only hoped it might all be forgotten by morning, and refused even to talk again of such things. But an event happened in the remaining hours of the night to change the current of affairs. Little Grace Hickson died. The father, mother and husband had had another paralytic stroke; whether of the apple-scent bags, or the apple-peel, I dare not say, but Grace died. Faith, too, was stricken down by nervous fever, and was delirious with vehemence, but spoke never a word until her thread snapped, and then she pushed the wheel away hastily and left the room.

Then Prudence crept softly up to Lois's side. This strange child seemed to be tossed about by varying moods: to-day she was caressing and communicative, to-morrow she might be deceitful, mocking, and unconfiding in the joys and sorrows of others.

"So thou dost not like Pastor Tappan's prayers?" she whispered.

Lois was sorry to have been overheard, but she neither would nor could take back her words:

"I like them not so well as the prayers I used to hear at home."

"Mother says thy home was with the ungodly. Nay, don't look at me so—it was not I that said it. I'm none so fond of praying myself, nor of Pastor Tappan for that matter. But Faith can not abide him, and I know why. Shall I tell thee, Cousin Lois?"

"No! Faith did not tell me, and she was the right person to give her own reasons."

"Ask her where young Mr. Nolan is gone to, and thou wilt hear. I have seen Faith cry by the hour together about Mr. Nolan."

"Hush, child, hush!" said Lois, for she heard Faith's approaching step, and feared lest she should overhear what they were saying.

The truth was that a year or two before there had been a great struggle in Salem village, a great division in the congregation, the body of dissenters had been the leader of the more violent, and, ultimately, the spoke some hard, bitter sentences of this the less popular minister, Mr. Nolan, had had to leave the place. And him Faith Hickson loved with all the strength of her passionate dark, although he never was aware of the attachment he had excited, and the whole family were the recipients of manifestations of mere feeling to ever observe the signs of any emotion on Faith's part. But the will of a woman is a strong thing, and observed them all. She knew, as well as if she had been told in express words, that Faith did not care about father or mother, brother and sister, about household work and daily occupation, nay, about the observances of religion, for Mr.

Faith grew sadder and duller as the autumn drew on. She lost her bright, rosy, brown complexion became sallow and colorless, her dark eyes looked hollow and wild. The 1st of November was near at hand, and the dissenters, with an intentioned efforts to bring some life and cheerfulness into the monotonous existence of the dying Faith of many English customs, silly enough, no doubt, and which scarcely lighted up a flicker of interest in the poor sorrowful soul. The children were lying awake in their bed in the great unplastered room. Lois had a part pallet-bed, a part bedroom. Lois began to speak, to talk about England, and the dear old ways at home, without reading anxiously whether the effect of her intentions of her simplicities, well-remembered customs and legends were listened in England, and scarcely yet died out in Scotland. As she told of tricks she had often played, of the apple-scent bags she had made for Christmas gifts, of the basins of water, of the nuts burning side by side in the grate, every three of them typical ways of divination by which laughing, trembling English maidens sought to see the form of their future husband, if husband there was to be, then Faith listened breathlessly, asking short, eager questions, as if she were afraid of losing a single her gloomy heart. Lois went on speaking, telling her of all the stories that would confirm the truth of all the secondsight traditions of the country of her accustomed methods, half believing, half incredulous herself, but willing to cheer and please Faith.

Suddenly Prudence rose up from her truckle-bed in the dim corner of the room. She had not thought that she was awake, but she was a silent listening long.

"Cousin Lois may go out and meet Satan by the brook-side, if she will, but if thou goest, Faith, I will tell mother—ay, and I will tell Pastor Tappan, too. That will be worse than all. I'll be afeard of my very life. I would rather never be let out of doors than that. And I'm sure mother would take the apple out of my hand as I hold it over my left shoulder." The excited girl gave a loud sound of terror as she saw the apple-peel had conjured up. Faith and Lois sprang out together, the latter with a cry of affright, the former white night-gowns. Summoned by the same cry, Grace Hickson came to her child.

"Lois, get up!" said Faith, authoritatively.

"What is it, my wench?" asked Grace. While Lois, feeling as if she had done all the mischief, kept silence.

"Take her away, take her away!" screamed Prudence. "Lois is a witch—she is possessed. I'll shoulder—the Evil One is there now. I see him. I'll tell mother, if you don't take away Lois."

"What is this she says?" said Grace, austerely.

"She is dreaming," said Faith; "Prudence, hold thy tongue, and go to bed." Lois said, more severely, while Lois more tenderly tried to soothe the alarms she had herself conjured up.

"Be quiet, Prudence," said she, "and go to sleep. I will stay by thee till thou hast gone off. Thou art safe."

"No, no! go away," sobbed Prudence, who was really terrified herself, but was now assuming more alarm than she felt from a natural instinct, seeing herself the centre of attention. "Faith shall stay by me, and Faith is not afraid."

So Faith sat by her sister, and Grace, displeased and perplexed, withdrew to her own bed, purposing to inquire more minutely into the affair in the morning. Lois only hoped it might all be forgotten by morning, and refused even to talk again of such things. But an event happened in the remaining hours of the night to change the current of affairs. Little Grace Hickson died. The father, mother and husband had had another paralytic stroke; whether of the apple-scent bags, or the apple-peel, I dare not say, but was silent at the time found without a candle, and a candle it would be dangerous to carry into that apartment full of combustible materials, especially at this time of hard frost, when every drop of water was locked up and bound in icy hardness. So Lois went, half-shrinking from the long passage that led to the stairs leading up into the storm-room, for it was in this passage that the strange night sounds were heard which every one had begun to notice and speak about in lowered tones. She sang, however, as she went, "to keep her courage up"—sang, however, in a subdued tone, the evening hymn she had so often sung in Barford church—

Glory to Thee, my God, this night—and so it was, I suppose, that she never heard the breathing or noticed the very cruelest use to which just as she was leading herself with fear to carry down she heard some one—it was Manasseh—say close to her ears,

"Has the voice spoken yet? Speak, Lois! Has the voice spoken yet? Is time—that speaketh to me day and night, Mary Lois!"

She started and turned a little sick, but spoke almost directly in a brave, clear manner,

"No! Cousin Manasseh. And it never will."

"Then I must wait yet longer," he replied hoarsely. "But all submission—all submission."

At last a break came upon the monotony of the long, dark winter. A ruling parishioner's case was raised the discussion of whether—the parish accounting as it did—it was not absolutely necessary for Pastor Tappan to have help. This question had been mooted once before; and then Pastor Tappan had acquiesced in the necessity, and old had gone on smoothly for some months after the appointment of his assistant, until a feeling had sprung up as the place the elder minister which might have been called jealousy of the younger, if there were a man at Barford who could have been supposed to entertain so evil a passion. However, that might be, two parties were speedily formed in the congregation on the subject of the new Mr. Nolan; the elder and more persistent—and, at the time, the more numerous party—headed by old grayhended, dogmatic Mr. Tappan, who had married them, baptized their children, and was to them literally as a "father in God;" and the younger, left to Salem, carrying away with him, possibly, more hearts than that of Lois Hickson's, but certainly she had never been the same creature since.

But now—Christmas, 1691—one or two of the older members of the congregation began to doubt, and some who were younger men having come to settle in Salem—Mr. Ingoldsby, Mr. Corwin, Mr. Hathorne, all of them, Mr. Tappan's son-in-law—a fresh effort had been made, and Mr. Nolan was returning to labor in ground apparently prepared for him. It was all in a keen interest in all the proceedings for Faith's sake, for more than a year that I have thought any spectator would have said. Faith's wheel never want faster or slower, her thread never broke, her color never varied, her eyes never were uplifted with sudden interest all the time these discussions respecting Mr. Nolan's ordination were held.

Faith and Nattee seemed more bound together by love and common interest than any other two among the unfriended individuals who composed this household. Lois sometimes felt as if her presence as a third interrupted some confidence between her cousin and the old servant. And yet she was fond of Faith, and could almost think that Faith liked her more than she did any other cousin, brother, or sister; for the first two were indifferent as to any unspoken feelings, while Faith seemed delighted in discovering them only to make an amusement to herself out of them.

One day Lois was sitting by herself at her sewing-table, while Faith and Nattee were holding one of the secret confabs over them which Lois felt ought to be tacitly excluded, when the outer door opened, and a tall, pale young man, in the strict professional habit of a clergyman, came in, drawing up with a smile and a look of welcome for Faith's sake, for this must be the Mr. Nolan whose coming had been on the tongue of every one for days, and who was, as Lois knew, expected to arrive on the day before.

He seemed half surprised at the glad alacrity with which he was received by his stranger parishioner but had not the habit of the English clergy, who was as inmate in the house where formerly he had only some grave, stately, if kind, visit to make, and had been received with a stiff form of welcome, very different from the blushing, smiling, dimpling look that immediately met him with the greeting almost of an old acquaintance. Lois having placed a chair for him, looked up, and then down, and doubting but that the feeling which her cousin entertained for the young pastor was mutual, although it might be unrecognized by herself, she said,

"Faith!" said she, bright and breathless. "Cousin—" Lois' quick eyes had caught the unconsciousness of any particular importance lie to be attixed to her words, "Mr. Nolan, the new pastor, is in the room. Shall I not call Nattee for my aunt and Manasseh. My aunt is gone to the prayer meeting at the Lecture House, and Manasseh is away." Lois went on speaking to give Faith time, for the girl had become deadly white at the intelligence, while, at the same time, her eyes met the keen, cunning eyes of the old Indian with a peculiar look of half-understanding, as if the latter's looks expressed triumphant satisfaction.

"Go," said Lois, smoothing Faith's hair, and kissing the white, cold cheek, "or he will wonder why no one comes to see him, and perhaps think he is not welcome." Faith rose without another word into the keeping-room, and shut the door of communication. Nattee and Lois were left together.

Lois felt as happy as if some piece of good fortune had befallen herself. For the time her growing dread of Manasseh's wild, ominous persistence in his suit, her aunt's coldness, her own loneliness, were all forgotten, and she could almost have danced with joy. Nattee laughed aloud, and talked and chuckled to herself: "Old Indian woman great mystery. Old Indian woman know-like-it and thinker; go where she is told, where she hears with her ears. But old Indian woman"—and here she drew herself up, and the expression of her face quite changed—" know how to call, and then white man must come; and old Indian have spoken never a word, and white man have best nothing with his ears."

All this time things were going on very differently in the keeping-room to what Lois imagined. Faith sat stiller even than usual; her eyes downcast, her words few. A quick observer might have noticed a certain tremulousness about her hands, and an occasional slight convulsive motion of her frame. But Pastor Nolan was not a keen observer upon this occasion; he was absorbed with his own little wishes and peculiarities. His wounded was that of a carnal man—who that pretty strange might be, who that pretty girl, who that young, so glad to see him, but had vanished instantly, apparently not to reappear. And, indeed, I am not sure if his grievance was not that of a carnal man rather than that of a godly minister, for this was the beginning of his life here, and nothing (as he have already seen) for the minister, on entering a household for the visit which, among other people and in other houses, he had been accustomed to demand a "morning call," to put up a prayer for the eternal welfare of the family, was more than the entrée. Now this prayer was expected to be adapted to the individual character, joys, sorrows, wants, and failings of every member present, and new to his, a young pastor alone with a young woman, and he thought—perhaps he may say at once, I will very natural—that the implied gnesses at her character involved in the minute suppositions above detailed would be more than she could bear. So evidently recalling each wandering thought, Pastor Nolan began to make use of the words for prayer. He was a good and truly religious man, whose name here is the only thing disguised, and placed in a part lower than that in which he found he was afterward subjected; and if at the time before he left England he had had any premonition that human fancies which beset all young hearts came across him, we at this day know that these fancies are no sin. But he was not a man of intuition, and so, sobbing, sobbing aloud, almost hysterically, and with many tears, Faith fell on her knees, and Nolan's arms spread out upon the settle, Lois and Pastor Nolan looked at each other for an instant. Then Nolan looked at each other

"Sir, you must go. My cousin has not been quite herself since the sad casualties she needs more quiet than she has had to-day."

Pastor Nolan bowed, and left the house; but in a moment he came back, and looked at Lois, saying, but without entering, he said,

"I am grieved for the disturbance I may call this evening to inquire how young Mistress Hickson finds herself?"

But Faith did not hear this; she was sobbing louder than ever.

"Why did you send him away, Lois? I should have been better directly, and it is so long since I have seen him."

She had let her face hidden as she uttered these words, and Lois could not hear them distinctly. She bent her head, however, as if to catch the sense, the meaning to ask her to repeat what she had said. But in the irritation of the moment, and attempted justification of her conduct to herself, she pushed Lois away so violently that the latter was hurt against the back of a chair, and stood quivering with pain, and tears came into her eyes; not so much because her cheek was bruised as because of the sudden pain and the sudden anger that had arisen toward whom she was feeling so warmly and kindly. Just for the moment Lois was as unjust to Faith as Faith had been unjust to some of the words of Pastor Nolan's prayer yet rang in her ears, and she thought it would be a relief to her if she could let them sink into her heart. But she dared not stop again to caress Faith, but stood quietly by her, and presently Faith took a step at the outer door caused Faith to rise quickly and rush into the kitchen, leaving Lois to open the door to the visitor. It was Manasseh, returned from hunting. He had been two days away in company with the Indians, leaving Faith and Lois alone. It was almost the only occupation which could draw him out of his accustomed habits. He stopped suddenly at the sight of seeing Lois, and alone, for she had avoided him of late in every possible way.

"Where is my aunt?"

"At a prayer meeting at Pastor Tappan's. She has not been [illegible] Faith. Faith is not well this minute. I will call her." And Lois was going toward the kitchen when he placed himself between her and the door.

"Lois," said he, "the time is going by, and I can not wait much longer. Will you be my wife? Quick upon me, and my sight grows clearer and clearer. Only this last night, camping out in the woods, clear, with the stars overhead, sleeping and waking, the spirit came and offer thee two lots, and the color of one was black and red, which is, being interpreted, a violent death. And when thou didst choose that one the spirit said to me, 'Come!' and I came, and did as I was bidden. I put it on thee with mine own hands, as it is prophesied if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice and be my wife. And when the black and red dress fell to the ground thou wert even as a corpse three days old. Now be advised, Lois, in time. Lois, my cousin, I have seen it in a vision, and my soul cleaveth unto thee—I would fain spare thee."

He was really in earnest—in passionate earnest. He had drawn near Lois, and now he took hold of her hand, repeating in his wild, pathetic, dreamy way,

"And the voice said unto me, 'Marry Lois!' " And Lois was more inclined to soothe and reason with him than she had ever been before since the first time of his speaking to her on the subject. When Grace Hickson and Prudence entered the room from the passage.

But Manasseh did not stir or look round; he kept his eyes fixed on Lois, as if to note the effect of his words. Grace came hastily forward, and, lifting up her cap, showed her closely-plaited locks bands in twain, in spite of the fervor of Manasseh's grasp.

"What means this?" said she, addressing herself more to Lois than to her son, anger flashing out of her eyes and voice.

Lois waited for Manasseh to speak. He seemed to have forgotten the desire to be more gentle and less threatening than he had been of late on this subject, and she did not wish to irritate him. But he did not speak, but let her aunt speak angrily waiting for an answer.

"Lois, mother, I thought Lois," it will put an end to the thought in his mind when my aunt speaks out about it."

"My cousin, mean in marriage," said Lois.

"Ha!" and Grace struck out in the direction of her son with a gesture of supreme contempt. But now Manasseh spoke forth:

"Yes it is true and broadcast. The voice has said it, and I have been brought here to me as my bride."

"Spirit! an evil spirit, then. A good spirit would have chosen out for thee a godly maiden of thine own people, and not a prattler and a strumpet of the world. Fie, fie, Manasseh! Look for a godly maiden of thine own people."

"Mother," said Hickson, I have done all I could Cousin Manasseh knows it—to show him I can be none of his. I have told him," said she, blushing deeply, "that I have to say all over again. That I am all but troth-plight to a young man of our own people and persuasion, and, even putting all that on one side, I wish not for marriage at present."

With rather for conversion and regeneration Manasseh looked steadily upon the hands and a maiden. As for Manasseh, I will take reason with him in private," said Grace, and, as she spoke, rose truly, threw not thyself in his path, as I have noticed thou hast done but too often of late.

Lois's heart rebounded within her at this unjust accusation, for she knew how much she had dreaded and avoided her cousin; and she was about indeed to him to give evidence that her aunt's last word were not true. But, instead, he recurred to his first word idea, and said,

"Mother, listen. If I wed not Lois, both she and I die within the year. I care not that I die for I love her as you know, I have sought for death (Grace shuddered, and was for a moment subdued by some recollection of past times), but if I did love my wife I should live, and she would be spared the woe that is to come. The Lord God Jehovah grows clearer to me day by day. Yet, when I try to know whether I am one of the elect, I find that the mystery of Predestination is dark. Knowledge is a mystery of Satan's devising, not of God's."

"Alas, my son, Satan is abroad among the brethren even now; but let the old vexed topics rest. Thou hast first thyself to think about. Shall have Lois to be thy wife, though my heart was set far differently for thee."

"No, mother," said Lois. "I love you well as a cousin, but wife of yours I can never be. Manasseh, I will not wed to divide him in twain. I say, if ever I marry man, I am troth-plight to one in England."

"Lois, child! I am your guardian in my dead husband's place. Thou thinkest thyself so great a prize that I cannot dutch a child's wish or no, I doubt not. I value thee not, save as a medicine for Manasseh, if his mind get disturbed again, and I will not have thee wed."

This, then, was the secret explanation of much that had puzzled Lois in her aunt's conduct—the fear if Lois had been a physician of modern times she might have traced somewhat of the same temper in which his mother showed herself. Prudence's lack of natural feeling and insight delight in mischief, in Faith's vehemence of indignation, in Lois's fear. Lois did not know, any more than Faith, that the attachment of the latter to Mr. Nolan, which was merely sentimental, yet even unperceived, by the young minister.

He came, it is true, came often to the house, sat long with the family, and watched them narrowly, but took no especial notice of Faith. Faith, who but took no especial notice of Faith. Faith, who had been for a time perfected over it; Nattee perceived it, and was indignant at it, long before Faith showed acknowledged it to herself, and went for Nattee The Indian woman, rather than to Lois her cousin, for sympathy and counsel.

"He must not have me," said Faith. "He cares more for Lois's little finger than for my whole body." The girl moaned in the bitterness of her jealousy.

"Hush thee, hush thee, prairie bird. How can he build a nest when the old bird has got all the moss and the feathers? Wait till the Indian has killed mother and Lois, and then he will come."

This was the mysterious comfort Nattee gave.

Grace Hickson took some kind of charge over Manasseh and watched Lois of much of her distresses at his strange behavior. Yet at times he exerted a power which, in a somewhat quieter, and more opportunities he would always seek Lois, entreating her, as of old, to marry him; sometimes pleading his love for her, oftener speaking wildly of his visions and the voices which he heard foretelling a terrible futurity.

The town of Salem had lost by death, within a very short time preceding the commencement of my story, nearly all its venerable men and leading citizens—one of ripe wisdom and sound counsel. The people had hardly yet recovered from the shock of their loss, the first bad effect of which was seen in the heated dissension which sprang up between Pastor Tappan and the candidate Nolan. It had been apparently healed over; but Mr. Nolan had not been many weeks in Salem, after his second coming, before the strife broke out afresh, and alienated many for life who had till now been bound together by the ties of friendship or relationship.

Such was the state of things in the township when, one day toward the end of the month of February, Grace Hickson returned from the weekly prayer meeting, which it was her custom to attend at Pastor Tappan's house, in a state of unusual excitement. On her entrance into her own house she sank down upon a chair, threw off her cloak and forward, and praying to herself; both Faith and Lois stopped their spinning in wonder at her agitation before either of them could be address her, and at length Faith rose, and spoke:

"Mother, what is it? Hath any thing happened of an evil nature?"

The brave, stern old woman's face was thenceforth to Lois one ever-present act in horror, and she prayed; the great drops running down her cheeks.

It seemed almost as if she had to make a struggle to recover her sense of the present homely accustomed life, before she could find words for answer.

"Evil nature! Daughters, Satan is abroad, in close to us. I have this very hour seen him afflict two innocent children, as of old he troubled those who were possessed by him at Judea. Goodwife and Abigail Toppan have been contorted and convulsed by him and his servants, and no tongue can I am aboard to think on; and when their father, godly Mr. Tappan, began to exhort and to pray for their deliverance, he was the well-beloved of the field. Satan is of a truth let loose among us. The girls have something upon him as if he were even then present among us. Abigail screeched out that he stood at my very back in the guise of a black man, and I felt truly, as I have said, as her words, I saw a creature like a shadow vanishing, and heard a voice as cold even as the grave where he is now? Faith, lay straws across on the doorsill."

"But if he do already entered in," asked Prudence, "may not that make it difficult for him to depart?"

Her mother, taking no notice of her question, went on reciting herself and praying till again she was interrupted by Prudence.

"Reverend Mr. Tappan says that only last night he was wrestling in prayer for the afflicted, and through the house by some strong power; once it was thrown against his bedroom door, and would, doubtless, have broken in, if he had not fervently and aloud at that very time; and a shriek went up at his prayer as if from a big stand on end; and this morning all the crockery in the house was found broken and piled up in the kitchen. Mr. Tappan believes that Satan's reign says that as soon as he began to ask blessing on the morning meal, the table was lifted almost as high as if some one was pinching them. Lord, have mercy upon us all!" Satan of a truth is loose."

Lois crossed like the old stories I used to hear in Barford," said Lois, breathless with affright.

Faith's cheeks were always of a deadly hue.

Toward evening Mr. Nolan came in. In general, a lady-like reserve, which Lois had never only tolerated his visits, finding herself often engaged at such hours, and being the only person to entertain him, to show him the ready hospitality which was one of her most prominent virtues. But to-day, dark as Satan's reign was, the presence of the new horrors sprung up in Salem, and as being one of the Church militant for what the Puritans called (as explained to the Church militant) against Satan, he was welcomed by her in an unusual manner.

He seemed oppressed with the occurrences of the day; as first it appeared to be natural that he, as the pastor of the congregation upon them, and his hosts were becoming almost impatient for him to say something more than mere generalities, but none as he began:

"Such a day as this I pray that I may never see again. It is as if the devils whom our Lord banished into the herd of swine had been permitted to come again upon the earth. And I would it were only the lost spirits who were tormenting us; but I much fear that certain of the elect are permitted as God's people have sold their souls to Satan for the sake of a little of his evil power, though, at least my office does not lie in that line to be seen; and he sought at it with his shoe and bit it, and it cried out like a human creature in pain, and strode run up the chimney, caring nothing for the hot flame and smoke."

Manasseh listened greedily to all this story, and when it was ended he rose upon his breast, and prayed aloud for deliverance from the power of evil. Then he went continually went on praying at intervals through the evening with every mark of abject terror on his face and in his manner.

THE LATE SENATOR BRODERICK LYING IN STATE.

We are enabled to engrave, through the kindness of a San Francisco correspondent, the accompanying picture of the late Senator Broderick lying in state at San Francisco. The scene was fully described in the last number of the Weekly.

"He died while the scent was in yon lime,
And the woodbine that wreathed it blew;
He died in the goodly summer-time:
May I die in the summer, too!

"I kept my last watch over his bed,
'Twas noon, and his hour drew near;
I would look on the earth once more,' he said,
'Will you show it me, Mary dear?'

"So I raised him up till he saw the skies,
The fields, and the church, and the river;
Then I laid him down and closed his eyes,
The eyes that I loved, forever.

"God grant me to live till the spring be here,
And to look on the young year's bloom;
'Twere sad to die while the earth is drear,
Amid winter - winds and gloom."

She rose, and under the wall she passed,
To her home in the village lane;
Through the yew-tree branches hurried the blast,
And the bells brake forth again;

But there seemed a tongue in their clanging chime,
And a voice in the creaking yew,
That said, "He died in the summer-time,
Thou shalt die in the summer, too."

MARY.

A BALLAD.

Her form was bent, her steps were small,
She came up the path alone;
And sat her down on the churchyard wall,
With her foot on the stepping-stone.

A look she wore of the wasted year,
Whose beauty and strength were over:
But her voice was low, as of old, and clear,
And she sang of her buried lover:

"The year is dying, its leaves are red,
Its sights and its sounds are dreary;
The year is dying above the dead,
And the living are lone and weary.

"Drearily swings the church-yard chime,
And drearily creaks the yew;
He died in the goodly summer-time:
May I die in the summer, too!

"He died while the corn was tall and green,
Ere the brood of the lark had flown;
He died while the blossom was on the bean,
He died while the fields were mown.

HERN CASTLE.

HERN CASTLE stands by its own broad lands,
West to the Inland and east to the sea;
The stoutest kite in his questing flight
Will flag ere he crosses the fee.

And the Baroness Lascelles hath gold and vassals,
And winters and springs forty-four:
Her daughter Grace is the pride of her race,
A vaxen cheek—and no more.

Sir Hugh de Brayo hath a paltry gray,
And doth morn you may see him walk;
To the weary page it seems no age,
As he yawns at the castle gate.

But which of the twain Sir Hugh would gain,
With his equal smile and his equal bow,
That widow and maid, of each other afraid,
Would give the whole world to know!

Now yet his tryst hath Sir Hugo missed:
Can the good gray steed have gone false to-day?
"Ho! Alice the maid! what was it he said
"When last he rode away?"

"Ho! Alice the maid! why whom hath she wived?
Not one in the house can tell:
But across the moon, with an answering tune,
Comes the clash of a marriage-bell.

The bower-maid Alice, who hands the chalice
Of Gascon wine to Sir Hugh the Knight,
I guess could tell, an she listed well,
Which way his choice would light.

For every day, ere he rides away,
There's a whisper'd word for her private ear,
And a touch to her lip—and her memory slip—
When there's none of the vassals near.

Some compliment to the mother sure—
Some courtly phrase to the daughter borne:
"No more, in faith!" "Save a hint," she saith,
"He may pass to-morrow morn."

And below the keep doth a fair train sweep,
With a bride and a bridegroom gay:
Hern Castle's the pride of the country-side—
But neither looks that way.

The Baroness stands with clenched hands,
In a wrath that would fain burst free;
And the pale proud face of the Lady Grace
Grows paller yet to see!

There's a riddle read, and a day-dream fled,
And a bower-maid's office undone to-day;
While "To Lady Alice!" they drain the chalice,
In the Hall of Sir Hugh de Brayo!

THE LATE SENATOR BRODERICK LYING IN STATE AT SAN FRANCISCO.—FROM A SKETCH BY P. LOOMIS, ESQ.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER IX.

THE GAME MADE.

WHILE Sydney Carton and the fellow-prisoners were in the adjoining dark room, speaking so low that not a sound was heard, Mr. Lorry looked at Jerry in consideration and doubt and mistrust. That honest tradesman's manner of receiving the look did not inspire confidence; he changed the leg on which he rested, as often as if he had fifty pairs of limbs, and were trying them all; he examined his finger-nails with a very questionable show of keenness of attention; and whenever Mr. Lorry's eye caught his, he was taken with that peculiar kind of short coughing fit which is generally of all hands before it, which is seldom, if ever, known to be an infirmity attendant on perfect openness of character.

"Jerry," said Mr. Lorry. "Come here."

Mr. Cruncher came forward sideways, with one of his shoulders in advance of him.

"What have you been doing with number five?"

After some cogitation, accompanied with an intent look at his patron, Mr. Cruncher conceived the luminous idea of replying, "Approbational character."

"My mind misgives me much," said Mr. Lorry, angrily shaking a forefinger at him, "that you have used the respectable and great house of Tellson's as a blind, and that you are not an unlawful occupation of an infamous description. If you have, expect no help from it in any way, save a subscription to the funeral when you get back to England. If you have, don't expect me to keep your secret. Tellson's shall not be implicated lightly.

"I hope, Sir," pleaded the abashed Mr. Cruncher, "that a gentleman like yourself 'ere I've had the honor of odd jobbing till I'm grey at it, would think twice about harming of me, even if it was so—I don't say it is, but even if it was. And which it is to be took into account that if it was, it wouldn't be, unless I did it on one side. There'd be two sides to it. There might be medical doctors at the present hour, a-picking up their grosses where a honest tradesman don't pick up his fardens—fardens! no, nor yet his half-fardens—half fardens! no, nor yet his quarter—a banking away like smoke at Tellson's, and a cocking their medical eyes at that tradesman on the sly, a going in and going out to their own carriages—ah! equally like smoke, if not superior. Well, that's all he has to say, and he don't say no more. Which as to saying, too, it's Tellson's. For you can not sense the goose and not the gander. And here's Mrs. Cruncher, at Hanwell, as you may find out, any blessed time, and would be to-morrow, if cause given, a floppin' upon the business from that there gross as is mine—stark ruinating! Whereas them medical doctors' wives don't flop—catch 'em at it! Or if they flop, their floppings goes in favor of more patients, and how can you rightly have one without t'other? Therefore, I says with unshaken confidence, and wot with parish clerks, and wot with sextons, and wot with private watchmen (all exercising sound skill in Hanwell), a man wouldn't get much by it, even if it was so. And wot little a man did get, would never prosper with him, Mr. Lorry. He'd never have no good of it; he'd want all along to be out of the line, if he could see his way out, being once in—even if it was so."

"Ugh!" cried Mr. Lorry, rather relenting, nevertheless. "I am shocked at the sight of you."

"Now, what I would humbly offer to you, Sir," persisted Mr. Cruncher, "even if it was so, which I don't say it is—"

"Don't prevaricate," said Mr. Lorry.

"No, I will not, Sir," returned Mr. Cruncher, as if nothing were further from his thought or practice—"which I don't say it is—not I would humbly offer to you, Sir, would be this. Upon that there stool, at that there Bar, sets that there boy of mine, brought up and growed up to be a man, wot will errand you, message you, general light-job you, till your heels is where your head is if such should be your wish. If I wot-so, which I still don't say it is (for I will not prewaricate to you, Sir), let that there boy keep his father's place, and take care of his mother (don't blow upon that boy's father—do not do it, Sir—and let that father go into the line of the reg'lar diggin', and make amends for what he would have un-dug—if it was so—by diggin' of 'em in with a will, and with conwictions reperting the future keeping of 'em safe. That, Mr. Lorry," said Mr. Cruncher, wiping his forehead with his arm, as an announcement that he had arrived at the peroration of his discourse, "is wot I would respectfully offer to you, Sir. A man may see all this here a good deal dreadful round him in the way of Subjects without heads, dear me, plentiful enough for to keep the price down to porterage, and hardly that, without havin' his serious thoughts of things. And there you have the man, if it was so, constrain't on you for to bear in mind that wot I said just now, I up and said in the good cause when I might have kep' it back."

"That at least is true," said Mr. Lorry. "Say no more now. It may be true that you yet stand your friend, if you deserve it, and repent in action—not in words. I want no more words."

Mr. Cruncher knuckled his forehead, as Sydney Carton and the spy returned from the inner room. "Adieu, Mr. Barsad," said the former; "your arrangements thus made, you have nothing to fear from me."

He sat down in a chair on the hearth, over against Mr. Lorry. When they were alone, Mr. Lorry asked him what he had done?

"Not much. If I should go all lengths with the prisoner, I have insured access to him once."

Mr. Lorry's countenance fell, and he looked disappointed.

"It is all I could do," said Carton. "To propose more might be to put this man's head under the axe, and, as he himself said, nothing worse could happen to him if he were denounced. He knows how strong I am in his behalf. He knows There is no help for it."

"But you have spoken," said Mr. Lorry, "if it should go ill before the tribunal, will not save him."

"I never said it would."

Mr. Lorry's eyes gradually sought the fire; his sympathy with his friend, and his concern for the imprisonment of this second arrest gradually weakened them; he was an old man now, overborne with anxieties of all kinds, for his life had been active.

"You are a good man and a true friend," said Carton, touching him on the knee. "I think it notice that you are affected. I could not see my father weep and sit by careless. And I could not respect your sorrow more if you were my father. You are free from that misfortune, however."

Though he said the last words with a slip into his usual manner, there was a true feeling and manliness in his voice that quite touched the old man. Mr. Lorry, who had never seen the better side of him, was wholly unprepared for it. He gave him his hand, and Carton gently pressed it.

"To return to poor Darnay," said Carton. "Don't tell him the circumstance that I have the arrangement. It would not enable Her to go to see him. She might think it was merely got up for the occasion, to convey to him the means of anticipating the sentence."

Mr. Lorry turned his thought of that, and he looked quickly at Carton to see if it were in his mind. It seemed so, as he returned the look, but evidently understood it.

"She might think a thousand things," he said, and any of them would only add to her trouble. Don't speak of me to her. As I said to you when I first came, I had better not see her. I can put my hand out to do any little helpful work for her that my hand can find to do, without her knowledge. Is she going to her, I hope? She must be very desolate to-night."

"I am going now, directly."

"I am glad of that. She has such a strong attachment to you and reliance on you. How does she look?"

"Anxious and unhappy, but very beautiful."

"Ah!"

It was a long, grieving sound, like a sigh—almost like a sob. It attracted Mr. Lorry's eyes once to Carton's face, where he turned to the fire. A light, or a shade (the old gentleman could not have said which) passed from it so swiftly as a change will sweep a landscape, on a wild bright day, and he lifted his foot to put back one of the little flaming logs which was tumbling forward. He wore the white riding-coat and top-boots then in vogue, and the light of the fire touching their light surfaces made him look very pale, with his long brown hair, all untrimmed, hanging loose about him. His indifference to fire was sufficiently remarkable to elicit a word of remonstrance from Mr. Lorry; his boot was still upon the hot embers of the flaming log when it had broken under the weight of his foot.

"I forgot it," he said.

Mr. Lorry's eyes were again attracted to his face. Taking note of the wasted air which clouded the naturally handsome features, and wondering what the opportunities of youth could have done, with such a combination, to express and develop both for a better result, his mind was busily employed.

"I have been a man of business ever since I took to be a man. Indeed, I may say that I was a man of business when a boy."

See what a place you fill at seventy-eight. How many people will miss you when you leave it empty!"

"A solitary old bachelor," answered Mr. Lorry, shaking his head. "There is nobody to weep for me."

"How can you say that? Wouldn't She weep for you? Wouldn't her child?"

"Dear Lucie. Yes, I think Lucie's quite mean what I said."

"It is a thing to thank God for; is it not?"

"Surely, surely."

"If you could say, with truth, to your own solitary heart, to-night, 'I have secured to myself the love and attachment, the gratitude or regard, of no human creature; I have won for myself a tender place in no regard; I have done nothing good or serviceable to be remembered by!' your seventy-eight years would be unhappy indeed, would they not?"

"I can say truly, Mr. Carton, I think they would be."

Sydney turned his eyes again upon the fire, and, after a silence of a few moments, said:

"I should like to ask you: Does your childhood seem far off? Do the days when you sat at your mother's knee seem days of very long ago?"

Responding to his softened manner, Mr. Lorry answered:

"Sometimes yeare back, yes; at this time of my life, no. For, as I draw closer and closer to the end, I travel in the circle, nearer and nearer to the beginning. It seems to be one of the kind mercifulness and preparings of the way. My heart is touched now by many remembrances that had long fallen asleep, of my pretty young mother (and I so old!), and by many associations of the days when what we call the World was not so real with me, and my faults were not confirmed in me."

"I understand the feeling!" exclaimed Carton, with a bright flush. "And you are the better for it?"

"I hope so."

Carton terminated the conversation here, by rising to help him on with his outer coat; "but you," said Mr. Lorry, reverting to the theme, "you are young."

"Yes," said Carton. "I am not old, but my young way of life, never was a way to age. Enough of me."

"And of me, I am sure," said Mr. Lorry. "Are you going out?"

"I'll walk with you to her gate. You know my vagabond and restless habits. If I should prowl about the streets a long time, don't be uneasy; I shall turn up in the morning. You go to the Court to-morrow?"

"Yes, unhappily."

"I shall be there, but only as one of the crowd. My spy will find a place for me. Take my arm, Sir."

Mr. Lorry did so, and they went down stairs and out in the streets. A few minutes brought them to Mr. Lorry's destination. Carton left him there; but lingered at a little distance, and turned back to the gate again when it was shut, and touched it. He had heard of her going to the prison every day. "She came out here," he said, looking about him, "turned this way, must have trod on these stones often. Let me follow in her steps."

It was ten o'clock at night when he stood before the prison of LA Force, where she had stood hundreds of times. A little wood-sawyer, having closed his shop, was smoking his pipe at his shop-door.

"Good-night, citizen," said Sydney Carton, passing in going by; for the man eyed him inquisitively.

"Good-night, citizen."

"How goes the Republic?"

"You mean the Guillotine? Not ill. Sixty-two to-day. We shall mount to a hundred soon. Samson and his men complain sometimes of being exhausted. Ha, ha, ha! He is so droll, that Samson. Such a Barber!"

"Do you go to see him—"

"Shave? Always. Every day. What a barber! You have seen him at work?"

"Never."

"Go and see him when he has a good batch. Figure this to yourself, citizen; he shaves the sixty-two to-day, in less than two pipes! Less than two pipes. Word of honor!"

As the grinning little man held out the pipe he was smoking to explain how he timed the executioner, Carton was so sensible of a rising desire to strike the life out of him that he turned away.

"But you are not English," said the woodsawyer, "though you wear English dress?"

"Yes," said Carton, passing again, and answering over his shoulder.

"You speak like a Frenchman."

"I am an old student here."

"Ahs, a perfect Frenchman! Good-night, Englishman."

"Good-night, citizen."

"But go and see that droll dog," the little man persisted, calling after him. "And take a pipe with you!"

Sydney had not gone far out of sight when he stopped in the middle of the street under a flickering lamp and wrote with his pencil on a scrap of paper. Then traversing with the decided step of one who remembered the way well several dark and dirty streets—much dirtier than usual, for the best public thoroughfares remained uncleaned in these times of terror—he stopped at a chemist's shop, which the owner was closing with his own hands. A small, dim, crooked shop, kept in a tortuous, up-hill thoroughfare, by a small, thin, crooked man.

Giving this man, who, pencil-light, as he confronted him at his counter, he laid the scrap of paper before him. "Wine" the chemist whispered softly, as he read it. "Hi! hi! hi!"

Sydney Carton took no heed, and the chemist said:

"For you, citizen?"

"For me."

"You will be careful to keep them separate, citizen? You know the consequences of mixing them?"

"Perfectly."

Certain small packets were weighed out and given to him. He put them, one by one, in the breast of his inner coat, counted out the money for them, and deliberately left the shop. "There is nothing more to do," said he, glancing upward at the moon, "until to-morrow. I can't sleep."

It was not a reckless manner, the manner in which he said these words aloud under the fastdarkening clouds, nor was it more expressive of negligence than defiance. It was the settled manner of a tried man, who had endured and struggled and got lost, but who at length struck into his road and saw its end.

Long ago, when his hair had been famous among his earliest competitors as a youth of great promise, he had followed his father to the grave. His mother had died years before. These solemn words, which had been read at his father's grave, were in his mind as he went down the dark streets, among the heavy shadows, with the moon and the clouds sailing on high above him

"I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die."

In a city dominated by the axe, alone at night, with natural sorrow rising in him for the sixty-two who had been that day put to death, and for to-morrow's victims then awaiting their doom in the prisons, and still of to-morrow's and to-mor-row's, the chain of association that brought the words home, like a rusty old ship's anchor from the deep, might have been easily found. He did not seek it, but repeated them and went on.

"THIS IS THAT WRITTEN PAPER!"

With a solemn interest in the lighted windows where the people were going to rest, forgetful through a few calm hours of the horror surrounding them; in the towers of the closed churches, where no prayers were said, for the people's exhaustion had even travelled the length of self-destruction from years of priestly impostors, plunderers, and profligates; in the distant burial-places, reserved, as they were upon the gates, for Eternal Sleep; in the abounding jails; and in the streets along which the victims rolled to a death which had become so common and material that no sorrowful story of a human Spirit ever arose among the people out of all the working of the Guillotine; with a solemn interest in the whole life and death of the city that was setting down to its short nightly pause in fury; Sydney Carton crossed the Seine again for the last time in the streets.

Few coaches were abroad, for riders in coaches were liable to be suspected, and anybody hid its head in red night-caps, and put on heavy shoes and trudged. But the destroyers were not well filled, and the people poured cheerfully out as he passed, and went chatting home. At one of the theatres a little girl was a little late at night at mother looking for a way across the street through the mud. He carried her over, and went on before the timid arm was loosed from his neck asked the child for a kiss.

"I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die."

Now that the streets were quiet, and the night were on, the words were in the echoes of his feet, and were in the air. Perfectly calm and steady, he sometimes repeated them to himself as he walked; but he heard them always.

The night wore out, and as he stood upon the bridge listening to the water as it rippled by the river-walls of the Island of Paris, where the picturesque confusion of houses and towers rose alone bright in the light of the moon, the day came coldly, looking like a dead face out of the sky. Then the night with the moon and the stars, turned pale and died, and for a little while it seemed as if Creation were delivered over to Death's dominions.

But the glorious sun, rising, seemed to strike those words, that burden of the night, straight and warm to his heart in its long bright rays; and looking along them, with reverently shaded eyes, a bridge of light appeared to span the air between him and the sun, while the river sparkled under it.

The strong tide, so swift, so deep, and certain, was like a congenial friend in the unfathomable business. He walked by the stream, far from the houses, and in the light and warmth of the sun fell asleep on the bank. When he awoke and was afoot again he lingered there yet a little longer, watching an eddy that turned and turned purposeless, until the stream absorbed it and envied it to the sea. "Like me!" A trading-boat, with a sail of the softened colour of an dead leaf, then glided into his view, floated by him, and sank away. As its silent track in the water disappeared the prayer that had broken up out of his heart for a merciful consideration of his poor blindness and error ended in the words, "I am the resurrection and the life."

Mr. Lorry was already out when he woke, and it was easy to surmise where the good old man was gone. Sydney Carton drank nothing but a little coffee, ate some bread, and when he washed and changed to refresh himself, went out to the place of meeting.

The court was all astir and a-buzz, when the block sheep—whom many fell away from in dread—pushed him into a corner among the crowd. Mr. Lorry was there, and Doctor Manette was there. She was there, sitting beside her father.

When her husband was brought in she turned to look upon him, so strong, undaunting, so strongly to foil of admiring love and pitying tenderness, yet so courageous for his sake, that the form of the healthy blood into his face, brightened his glance, and animated his heart. If there had been any eyes to see the influence of her look on Sydney Carton, it would have been seen to be the true anchor of his life.

Before that infamous Tribunal there was little or no order of procedure, insuring to any accused person any reasonable hearing. There could have been no such Revolution, if all laws, forms, and conventions had not been first monstrously abused that the suicidal vengeance of the Revolution was to scatter them all to the winds.

Every eye was turned to the jury. The same determined patriots of the sacred month were as yesterday and the day before, and to-morrow and the day after. Eager and prominent among them, one man with a craving face, and his eyes perpetually hovering about his lips, whose appearance gave great satisfaction to the spectators. A fire-thirsting, cannibal-looking, bloodwinded juryman, the Jacques Three of Saint Antoine. The whole jury as a jury of dogs impanelled to try the deer.

Every eye then turned to the five judges and the public prosecutor. No favorable leaning in that quarter to-day. A fell, unrelenting, murderous business-meaning there. Every eye then sought some other eye in the crowd, and gleamed as it approvingly; and heads nodded at one another, before bending forward with a strained attention.

Charles Evrémonde, called Darnay. Released yesterday. Rearrested and retaken yesterday. Indictment delivered to him last night as Suspected and Denounced enemy of the People. Aristocrat, one of a family of tyrants, one of a race proscribed, for that they had used their abolished privileges to the infamous oppression of the people. Charles Evrémonde, called Darnay, in right of such prescription, absolutely Dead in Law.

To this effect, in as few or fewer words, the Public Prosecutor.

The President asked, was the Accused openly denounced or secretly?

"Openly, Monsieur the President."

"By whom?"

"Three voices. Ernest Defarge, wine-vendor of Saint Antoine."

"Good."

"Therese Defarge, his wife."

"Good."

"Alexandre Manette, physician."

A great uproar took place in the court, and in the midst of it Doctor Manette was seen, pale and trembling, standing where he had been seated.

"Monsieur the President, I indignantly protest to you that this is a forgery and a fraud. You know the accused to be the husband of my daughter. My daughter, and those dear to her, are far dearer to me than my life. Who and where is the man who denounces me? Where is he? Let him confront me with my child's!"

"Citizen Manette, be tranquil. To fail in submission to the authority of the Tribunal would be to put yourself out of Law. As to what is dearest to you than life, no person can be dear to a good citizen as the Republic."

Loud acclamations hailed this rebuke. The President rang his bell, and was stern and resumed:

"If the Republic should demand of you the sacrifice of your child herself, you would have no duty but to sacrifice her. Listen to what is to follow. In the mean while, be silent!"

Frantic acclamations were again raised. Doctor Manette sat down, with his eyes looking around, and his lips trembling; his daughter drew closer to him. The craving man on the jury leaned his head forward, and rested the usual hand to his mouth.

Defarge was produced when the court was quiet enough to admit of his being heard, and rapidly expounded the story of the imprisonment and of his having been released by the Doctor's service, and of the release, and of the state of the prisoner when released and delivered to him. This short examination followed, for the court was quick with its work.

"You did good service at the taking of the Bastile, citizen?"

"I believe so."

Here an excited woman screeched from the crowd: "You were one of the best patriots there. Why not say so? You were a cannoneer that day there, and you were among the first to enter the accursed fortress when it fell. Patriots, I speak the truth!"

It was The Vengeance who, amidst the warm commendations of the audience, thus assisted the proceedings. The President rang his bell: but The Vengeance, warming with the occasion, marvel, shrieked, "I defy that bell!" wherein she was likewise much commended.

"Inform the Tribunal of what you did that day within the Bastile, citizen."

"Well!" said Defarge, looking down at his wife, who stood at the bottom of the steps on which he was raised, looking steadily up at him. "I knew that this prisoner, of whom I speak, had been confined in a cell known as One Hundred and Five, North Tower. I knew it from having once shared pleasure with him. I knew him myself by no other name than One Hundred and Five, North Tower, when he made shoes under that window. I knew my gun that day, I resolved, when the place shall fall, to examine that cell. It falls. I mount to the cell, with a fellow-citizen who is one of you, directed by a jailer. I examine it very closely. In a hole in a chimney, which had been built up, but broken open and replaced, I find a written paper. This is that paper. I have made it my business to examine some specimens of the writing of Doctor Manette. This is the writing of Doctor Manette, to the hands of Monsieur the President."

"Let it be read."

In a dead silence and stillness—the prisoner's mother could indeed lovingly put her face to his wife only looking from him to look with solicitude at her father, Doctor Manette keeping his eyes fixed on the reader, Madame Defarge never taking hers from the prisoner, Defarge never taking his from his fostering wife, and all the other eyes there intent upon the Doctor, who saw none of them—the paper was read, as follows:

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"GUY LIVINGSTONE."

HARPER & BROTHERS,

329 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square), New York.

Publish this Day:

SWORD & GOWN.

By the Author of

"GUY LIVINGSTONE."

8vo, Paper,

Twenty-five Cents.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

Burnett's Kalliston,

As a wash for the complexion, has no equal. It is distinguished for its soothing and purifying effect, allaying all tendency to inflammation, especially that arising from bites of mosquitoes, stings of insects, &c. It is a powerful cleanser of the skin, removing tan, freckles, pimples, and all discolorations. Those, with its refreshing and invigorating properties, render it an indispensable requisite for the toilet.

Prepared only by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,

Boston.

For sale by druggists generally.

Price 50 Cents a Bottle.

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS.

HARNDEN'S EXPRESS

LEAVES NEW

TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,

BY STEAMSHIP,

FOR SAVANNAH,

Thence, by Georgia Central Railroad, to

MACON, MEMPHIS, ATLANTA,

AUGUSTA, MOBILE, KNOXVILLE,

NASHVILLE, COLUMBUS, MONTGOMERY,

NEW ORLEANS.

And all Towns in the interior of

Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

Every description of merchandise forwarded at Low rates, and warranted with promptness and despatch.

For further particulars apply at the office of

HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 78 Broadway.

Lester's Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

AND

Woodworth's Planing Machines,

Office 485 Broadway. J. H. ISBESTER.

Old Sachem's Bitters & Wigwam Tonic.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the System.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT,

No. 14 Spruce Street.

For Sale Everywhere.

READ!!!

Premium

OF THE

New York State Fair

AWARDED TO

Hostetter's Celebrated Stomach Bitters.

Another Proof of its Excellence!!!

Another Prize for its Goodness!!!

Another Assurance of its Fame!!!

It has taken the Premium at

Every State Fair ever held in the

United States

Where it has been exhibited.

All we ask is a fair and impartial trial, and we guarantee satisfaction!

Sold by all Druggists throughout the World.

Principal Depot 13 and 15 Park Row, New York.

Sole Manufacturers and Proprietors

HOSTETTER & SMITH,

Pittsburg, Pa.

See that the name of the Manufacturers is on every bottle!!

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. SIX LECTURES on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female Complaints, as delivered at the Hygeian Institute, for the last seven years. 418 pages, 52 Engravings. Price $1 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.

2nd. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys. Also, Epilepsy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes decrepitude. 311 pages, 6 engravings. Price 38 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county town and post office.

FINE WATCHES,

JEWELRY, SILVER, PLATED WARE, &c.

A. C. BENEDICT'S OLD STAND,

ESTABLISHED at No. 91 Bowery in 1818.

Store enlarged in 1850, and NEW STOCK OF GOODS.

STRANGERS will find it to their interest to examine my stock. Goods sold at the lowest possible prices for CASH. Terms 10 per cent. below Broadway prices.

WATCHES repaired and warranted.

A. C. BENEDICT, No. 91 Bowery, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.

PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWLE,

Sole Agents for the United States,

15 Dickman Street, New York.

THE POOR MAN'S SABBATH.

ADDRESSED TO SEPTUAGENARIAN PILLSBURY.

By JULIA CAREY BRENDARET.

Oh! plous Mister Pillsbury,
Pray spare our Sunday hours,
And pluck not from the poor man's life
His only day of flowers.
From the work-bench and the anvil,
From the store, and yard, and loom,
From the engine driver's fathom line,
Our week-day bugbear, thrum!

Then, with all the week for play,
No weariness have known;
But the workman have one only day
Which they can call their own:
But only days in which to pray,
And Sunday at the poor man's hearth
Is still a hallowed guest.

But fifty days in all the year
To pass in simple joys,
With our wives and with our sisters,
Our little girls and boys:
To take the fresh air in our walks
And see the trees in bud,
In the earth, while we are reading work
Is limited to pray.

We want to walk with wives and weans
In Sunday vesture clad,
And show the starvers which from the Saints's
Of Fifteen Sermon we had:
The meekness generous which they sell
So cheap to men and boys;
These are the sermons which we claim,
And these our Sunday joys!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR FOR 1860.

THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR is the pioneer of American Daily Newspapers, having been established sixty-three years. It is unsurpassed by any of its contemporaries for the value and variety of its contents, having attained its present popularity by its prompt publication of the most important news, the inclusion of mail facts and interesting miscellany.

THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR has no superior as a FAMILY NEWSPAPER, DAILY, SEMI-WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, or Record of Events. It is published every MONDAY and THURSDAY, and contains the latest Domestic and Foreign News up to the very hour of publication, including CONGRESSIONAL and MARKET REPORTS in New York and neighboring cities; Reliable Correspondence and Congressional Reports; Editorials on Public Measurements, both State and National; A Correspondence of unusual merit from London, Paris, and other European cities; The latest Telegraphic Despatches received by the evening mail, and the selected cream of the Press Comment, and ample City reports of every thing connected with Trade and Commerce in New York.

THE FAMILY PERIODICAL

the NEW YORK SPECTATOR is very confidently recommended. The Literary department is exercised over its columns, so that it shall be a safe as well as an entertaining and instructive family companion. Its editorial comments are written under a deep sense of responsibility; its notices of New Books and Periodicals are liberal and honest; its Agricultural Intelligence is supplied by a competent person; while its Trade, Equities of Exchange and Literary Gleanings are eminently of a very high order, and are such as to recommend it to a most desirable high-toned and pure morality.

The Publishers intend that the NEW YORK SPECTATOR shall always be the aim of competitors to emulate, and they enter upon a new year with a determined purpose to keep it up to the standard, and to make the SPECTATOR worthy of the wide and increasing patronage it receives.

TERMS.

One copy one year.... $ 2 00 | Fifteen copies 1 year, 25 00
Two copies one year 5 00 | sent to one address 25 00
Ten copies one year, and one additional 10 00 sent to one address 25 00

Payable invariably in advance at the office, or remitted by mail to the risk of publishers.

Any person sending us a Club of Twenty or more will be entitled to a copy gratis.

FRANCIS HALL & CO.,
No. 46 Pine Street,
New York.

The No Pine Diets!—JESSE HAWES'S PENFOLD LIQUID MALT DRINK is now retail in the world! Perfectly harmless, it gives a healthy appetite, improved color of the hair into a soft, brilliant, natural brown, and, as already stated, is perfectly harmless, and contains no alcohol, or other ingredient that can be injurious to the system. Sold by all Druggists, and by HARNDEN & Co., No. 704 CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia.

Deafness Cured, however caused, by a new method of treatment, discovered by Dr. NICHOLSON, at No. 374 Broadway, New York.

Queru's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly,

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Lung Diseases. Sold by druggists.

Queru's Patent Jellied Castor-Oil.—The great sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation of the bowels. It is the best purgative for children. To be had of the Inventor's Office, No. 116 Fulton Street, and of all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Dickman Street.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my pregnant jaborandi fluid, which will force them to grow well from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Cullender, 63 to 67 Crosby Street.

Quarterman's Patent Stove Polish.
No. 114 John Street, New York.

Improved Rimless Fire Arms.
W. I. Sharp, Manufacturer, 140 Fulton Street.

"Riggs' Truss," Waterproof and imperishable, can not injure the cost nor enlarge the rupture. 449 Broome Street, N. Y.

Patent Extension Tables.
At Heerdt's Manufactory, 145, 159 Wooster Street.

Stellwag & King, 37 Nassau Street, offer for sale Lasted Soles—a new superior article; likewise for export to Mexico, Central and South America.

THIS SUPERIOR Strong-bodied delicately-flavored Mountain COFFEE, For sale by CORNELL & CO No. 5 Beaver Street.

Café de Costa Rica C&C

oilet Vinegar

is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. Rimmel,
Perfumer, London and Paris.

EVERETT HOUSE,
HAWLEY & CLIFT, PROPRIETORS,
NORTH SIDE UNION SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.
500 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.
820 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
80 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

361 BROADWAY 539
BRIDAL SETTING
Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items. Are all reliable.

Singer's Sewing Machines.
SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUZES REDUCED TO $4.
Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $60 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.
Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

IMMENSE SUCCESS OF PAGE'S DUSSELDORF GALLERY, 548 Broadway. Open Day and Evening. Admission 25 cents.

SWORD AND GOWN!

TICKNOR & FIELDS
HAVE PUBLISHED
Sword and Gown.
A NOVEL.
By the Author of
"GUY LIVINGSTONE."
1 vol, 16mo. Price 75 cents.
Copies mailed on receipt of price.

TO THE NERVOUS OF BOTH SEXES.
A Retired Clergyman having been restored to health in a few days, after many years of great nervous suffering, is willing to assist others by telling them a copy of the prescription he used. Address Rev. John W. Dagnall, 164 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
FOR THE CURE OF ALL DISEASES
ARISING FROM
AN IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD.
In this purely vegetable preparation, the properties of an Anti-septic, a mild Cathartic, and a Tonic, Medicine are combined. It quickly removes from the blood the impurities of unhealthy secretions, which engender and fed disease, thus stricking at the root of the malady. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

THE ORIGINAL HAIR RESTORATIVE.

Heimstreet's Inimitable Hair Coloring.
The Only Reliable Article in Use.
FIFTEEN YEARS' EXPERIENCE

The attention of the public is called to this article, which is now being extensively advertised and sold in all parts of the country.
It gives it to be the best suited for RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR;
PREVENTING HAIR OUT ON BALD HEADS,
AND CAUSING IT TO GROW STRONG AND HEALTHY.
It is not a watery preparation, which will soon evaporate and leaving cold weather, but is composed of Oil and Stimulating Spirits, and IT WILL NOT FREEZE.
Those who desire an article which they can use and ALWAYS recommend, are invited to read the following, from a well-known Apothecary:

HEIMSTREET'S YEARS' EXPERIENCE WITH HAIR RESTORATIVES.

Messrs. W. E. Hagan & Co.:—Gents—I have been selling Heimstreet's "Inimitable Hair Restorative" for three or four years with good satisfaction and success. I have never had it returned to me, and have sold a number of bottles among several families who have been using it for years. I have never hesitated to recommend it for all it claims to do. Several ladies of our town who had their hair coming out very fast, and were becoming bald, have used it, and have now a full head of hair. Others have had their heads dark and color, produced by using two or more bottles of your articles; and last (excepting one) of many that have been induced to try it, by my recommending it, have used it, and have now their hair restored to the use of your Hair Coloring because as the only meritorious and reliable article in use.—Reading it as a curious article as cheap as any at the Link or Washer with which the market is flooded.
I am yours, very truly, S. B. EMMONS.
RETAIL PRICE, 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE. SOLD AT WHOLESALE BY ALL LARGE DEALERS IN THE UNITED STATES.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors,
Troy, New York.
Who also manufacture ROYCE & ESTERLY'S DENTIFRICE and ENGLISH'S METALLIZED INK.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S, PERFUMERY,
Sold by all Druggists in every city.
Wholesale Agent,
J. PHILLIPS,
87 Fulton St. New York.

WANTED.—Agents to canvass, for THE AMERICAN FREEMASON'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The States of Connecticut, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Tennessee, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, North and South Carolina and Virginia. New York and Pennsylvania excepted. Persons may apply but Master Masons in Regular standing, and qualified members of a Lodge in the State they desire to canvass, and to such most liberal inducements for work zealously, freely, and favorably will be offered.
Address the Publisher,
J. F. BRENHAM,
P. O. Box 617, New York.

REMOVAL.
JAMES BOGARDUS,
Architect in Iron, Consulting, Constructor, and Patentee of Iron Buildings,
Patentee and Manufacturer of
BOGARDUS'S ECCENTRIC UNIVERSAL MILL.
Machine Room corner of White and 4th Streets,
In Harlem Railroad Depot.
Office No. 56 Centre Street, near Chambers, New York.
Iron Building corner Centre and Duane Sts., formerly occupied, has been removed to widening Duane Street.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our late importation of Garnet and Coral Jewelry, consisting of Necklaces, Brooches, ear-rings, necklaces, charms, hair-pins, &c. &c.
OSBORN, BOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
No. 327 Broadway, corner of Spring Street.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.
This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, controlling and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLD, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, WHOOPING-COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, and all diseases of the LUNGS: while even CONSUMPTIVES itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.
The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves it to be worthy of the confidence so remarkably approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of higher claims.
To guard against Counterfeits, all of which there are several worthless ones, see that each bottle has the written signature of I. BUTTS, M. D., as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Sth. W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.
Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

DUSSELDORF GALLERY, 548 Broadway. PAGE'S PAINTINGS.
Immense Success. Rearrangement of entire Collection. Open Day and Evening. Admission 25 cents.

THE NEW LINE OF HUMBOLDT.—
(Up the Orenoco.)
The most picturesque portion of the Biography is the chapter "UP THE ORINOCO." It is the richest specimen of Natural Writing in any language. A marvellously graphic gallery of Tropic landscapes, primeval forests, populated with flowers and birds of the most splendid hues, the solitudes of nature; and the whole steeped in golden sunshine, or glowing with the soft light of Southern constellations—it is a perfect poem.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP
AND ROSE-LEAF SOAP are confidently recommended for their emollient properties and delightful aroma.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

F. S. CLEAVER'S
PRIZE MEDAL HONEY SOAP.
The only genuine, possessing a free and creamy lather, a lasting and delicate perfume, and is warranted not to injure the skin.

Beware of Counterfeits.

F. S. Cleaver's celebrated Musk, and Brown Windsor, and Glycerine Soaps, also Superlucent Tooth Powder for the teeth and gums, to be had of all the respectable Drug and Fancy Stores throughout the country.
Manufactory in London.
Wholesale Depot 31 and 33 Dey Street, New York.
J. C. ROYSTON, Agt.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes of Paris and London.
Sold by the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

THE NEW LIFE OF HUMBOLDT.—
(Humboldt, the Scholar.)
Humboldt spent over twenty years of his life in Paris, working up the results of his famous journeys in the New World. He produced a multitude of books during this time, many of which are of the highest importance to science. A comprehensive account of them, with extracts from the most important, may be read in the new work entitled "Books;" nowhere else can even a list of these works be found.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER
is a delicate toilet requisite to the skin, and renders it soft and beautiful.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

THE NEW LIFE OF HUMBOLDT.—
(Humboldt, the Scholar.)
Humboldt spent over twenty years of his life in Paris, working up the results of his famous journeys in the New World. He produced a multitude of books during this time, many of which are of the highest importance to science. A comprehensive account of them, with extracts from the most important, may be read in the new work entitled "Books;" nowhere else can even a list of these works be found.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,
FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A
FAMILY PHYSIC,

are so compound that disease within the range of their action can rarely withstand or evade them. Their penetrating properties search out the system, and derange or expel the obscure and hidden organisms, correcting its diseased action, and restoring its healthy vitalities as a consequence of these properties. No one would dive to bowed down with pain or physical debility is advertised that his health or energy restored by a remedy at once so simple and inviting.
Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also many formidable and dangerous diseases; such as Costiveness, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Erysipelas, Headache, Piles, Rheumatism, Eruptions and Skin Diseases, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Worms, Tetter, Tumors and Salt Rheum, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, as a Dinner Pill, and for Purifying the Blood.
They are sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best aperient in the world for all the purposes of a family physic.
Prices 25 cents per Box; Five Boxes for $1.00.
PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.
Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

Saponifier. Saponifier. Saponifier.
No Family, or Public or Private Institution, should be without this economical and ready Soap Maker.
Full directions for making Soft, Hard, and Fancy Soaps, in three hours, with the above article, for 4 cents per lb., accompany each pound box can.
Depot 64 Maiden Lane, and Grocers generally. Beware of Counterfeits. The success of this article has induced unprincipled parties to imitate it, who are being sued for infringing our patented rights.
The genuine manufactured only by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Co.
Office 396 Penn Street, Pittsburgh, Pa.
LEWIS, JAMES & CO., Agents,
Philadelphia.

ELLIOT & FATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office building, Washington, D. C.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER
PAINT OF NEW JERSEY, Established 1850.
For Roofing, Fences, Barns, Outbuildings, Roads, Paper, &c., dries readily, forming a metallic coat, spark and water proof. Durable and Economical. Depot 74 Maiden Lane, New York.
HICKS & BETTS, Agents.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES.—Just published, and sent free to any address, MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 125th edition, over 400 pages, 12mo. cloth, and above 100 Engravings, illustrative of the Human System, Male and Female Physiology and Sexual Organs, and Diseases of the Sexual Organs. This Medical Adviser is the best book every adult person, as it contains information of the most vital importance. Sold by H. G. LAWRENCE, No. 1 Vesey Street, Astor House.

THE NEW LIFE OF HUMBOLDT.—
(Humboldt in Asia.)
One of the most memorable epochs in Humboldt's life was his journey into Siberia. It was an important journey, for in addition to its scientific results, discoveries were found for the first time in the Ural Mountains. Humboldt and his companions penetrated as far as the frontiers of China, and had an interview with the Chinese officials. An account of this interview may be found in the chapter entitled "Central Asia."

Lyceum Lectures.
By
Rev. J. C. Fletcher.
Address the Lecturer, care of Messrs. Tickner & Fields, Boston, Mass.

The undersigned is now making his engagements for the Lecture Season of 1859-60. The subjects by which he calls the attention of Lecture Committees are as follows: (1.) Judge Jeffreys, and Most Timorous. (2.) Brazil and the Brazilians. (3.) The Land of Tell. (4.) Northern Light and Southern Shade. (5.) Yankee Notions. These will be delivered separately or in courses. Fletcher's Lectures are highly commended by Historical Society, private citizens, Boards of Lyceum Library Associations, Smithsonian Institute, and many Lyceums in different parts of the country. Those who have been in reserting to them, Luther Bradish, Rev. Dr. Ingraham, Rev. Dr. Wainwright, New York City; Rev. S. Hillard, Jr., Boston, Mass.; Dr. Holland (Timothy Titcomb), Springfield, Mass.; Prof. Henry, Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D. C.

A. S. Barnes & Burr's
New Publications.
No. 51 & 53 John Street, New York.

1.
MODERN PHILOLOGY; its History, Influence, and Discoveries. By D. W. Dwight. With Maps, Tables Views, etc. 2 vols. 8vo. $5.00.

2.
THE HIGHER CHRISTIAN EDUCATION. By W. Dwight. $1.00.

3.
LECTURES ON MENTAL AND MORAL CULTURE. By Andrew A. Lord. $1.00.

4.
NORMAL METHODS OF TEACHING THE COMMON BRANCHES OF EDUCATION. By Alfred Holbrook. $1.00.

5.
MCNALLY'S SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY. Enlarged by new Maps, and a Treatise on Physical Geography. $1.

6.
SMITH AND MARTIN'S PRACTICAL BOOKKEEPING, for Youth, by Single and Double Entry. 75 c.

7.
CESAR'S COMMENTARIES, ILLUSTRATED. With Notes, Maps, and Plans. By Charles Anthon, LL.D. $1.50.

8.
NORTHEN'S NEW SERIES OF SPEAKERS, viz.:
1. Little Orator. 36 cents; 2. National Orator, 75 cents; 3. Juvenile Speaker, 50 cents.

9.
SCHOOL MANUAL OF VOCAL MUSIC. Containing Selections from Scripture, Hymns, and Prayers. 12 c.

10.
TEACHER'S REGISTER, for Record of School's Names and Standing. 50 cents.

11.
ELEMENTS OF MECHANICS, By W. G. Peck. Professor of Mathematics, Columbia College. $1.25.

12.
NEW ELEMENTARY ALGEBRA. Embracing the First Principles of the Science. By Charles Davies, LL.D. Author of a Complete Course of Mathematics. 75 c.
Single copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of above prices.
A. S. BARNES & BURR,
51 and 53 John Street.

5000 AGENTS WANTED.—To sell a new inventions. Agents have made over $20,00 per week. Address at once all other offers declined. Send four stamps, and get 36 paper packages, assorted. Address FITCH & CO., Lowell, Mass.

READER—If you want Employment that will pay, call on Agents, Boston, with stamp, for particulars. S. M. MYRICK & Co., Lynn, Mass.

STRANGERS should not fail to call and see us, and examine our large assortment of GASLIGHT at No. 171 Broadway, N. Y. All are welcome, sales or not. BUTLER, HOSFORD & Co.

Every Number of Harper's Magazine contains from 70 to 80 pages—and from one to three illustrations—and at the end of the year a Volume.

Close of the Nineteenth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR NOVEMBER.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $1.00
Two Copies for One Year . . . . . $ 2.00
Three or Five Copies for One Year (each) $ 1.00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, together, one year, $4.00.
The Postage upon "Harper's Magazine" must be paid at the office where it is received. Postage, 24 cts. Thirty-six Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
Five Cents a Number; $2.50 a Year.
MR. GILBERT'S NEW AND POPULAR NOVEL, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," splendidly illustrated by HABLOT K. BROWNE, will be commenced in Harper's Weekly on May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.
GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of Domestic Life, entitled "TRUMPS," was commenced in "Harper's Weekly" on April 2.
TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks . . . . . $ 2.00
One Copy for One Year . . . . . $ 10.00
One Copy for Two Years . . . . . $ 18.00
Two Copies for One Year . . . . . $ 20.00
Three Copies for One Year . . . . . $ 30.00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.
A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.
 Persons living in the City of New York will please call at the Office of the Publishers, or remit the amount in their names and residences, with the name of the nearest Post-office, by the Office Delivery System.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

FLY-MAKING IN THE HOLIDAYS.

"I say, Pen, just give me two or three of your Eyelashes to finish off this Black Palmer; there's a good Girl!"

ANGELINA (entering the Sanctum suddenly). "See, CHARLES! look at dear Baby in her new country dress!" (Startling, but unexpected effect on CHARLES.

DELANO

Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

and

Office

Salesroom

No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

Vest inflated.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Shirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Waists and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

Farrel, Herring & Co.'s

(Herring's Patent)

Champion Fire and Burglar Proof Safes,

629 CHESTNUT STREET (Jayne's Hall)

PHILADELPHIA.

Bilsborrow and Parker Safes for Dwelling Houses, &c.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
EIDER DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DREADNAUGHT BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS

in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.

WARREN, BOYD & CO.
Nos. 255, 253, and 360 Broadway.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON,
FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUPPRESS. FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as saddens the female life, a truly efficient medicine must be their best friend. Where the most eminent physicians have failed, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—New Bedford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our own family."—Weekly Advocate, Phila. "No article ever answered the recommendations like this. I have used it in my practice with astonishing results."—L. S. PERKINS, M.D., Merrill, O. "I have tested it in cases of Irregularities, Uterine Obstructions, Flooding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, &c., with great success. It is worthy of the notice of the profession."—CHARLES MAY, Baltimore, Md. "Female complaints, medical men to see it."—JESSE LOWE, M.D., Lawrenceville, Ga. Sent by express in form a thousand ounces, showing it is

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the Female Sex. Daughters, Wives, and Mothers! Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by Agents. ☞ Do not confound Dr. MARCHISI'S with any other name. It is sold at $3 per bottle, or three bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every Town in the United States, excise money, and order by Express. Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
15 and 16 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Or J. P. DE CAMP, Cincinnati; Weeks & Potter, Boston; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans. J. B. MARCHISI, M.D.

Life and Travels
OF HUMBOLDT.
WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY BAYARD TAYLOR.
12mo, cloth, with steel portrait. Price $1 25.

Containing a full account of his life from birth to death; a picturesque summary of his travels in the New World and Asia; biographical sketches of his scientific and literary associates; a complete resume of his various works, with extracts from the most important and lucid statements of his achievements in all departments of science, &c. Sent by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on the receipt of the price, by

RUDD & CARLTON, Publishers and Booksellers,
No. 130 Grand Street, near Broadway, New York.

SHELDON & COMPANY,
No. 115 Nassau Street, New York,
will publish,
On SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22,

I.
SPURGEON'S SERMONS,
SIXTH SERIES.
WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE AUTHOR,
and containing a Steel Plate Illustration of
SPURGEON'S NEW TABERNACLE.
1 vol. 12mo, uniform, price $1.

The publishers have the pleasure of presenting to the American public a new and splendid volume of sermons by Mr. Spurgeon. This is a fitting occasion to say, that these sermons are published in this book precisely as they come to us from the hand of the author himself, with the revisions marked by his own pen, and without a passage or word being omitted or added. The discourses are marked by that glowing fervor, intense earnestness, strong conception, vigorous expression, and deep evangelical gospel truth, that have made this preacher, in the view of his youth, the most popular preacher in England.

We trust confidently that this volume will not be found one whit behind any that has preceded it, and that it will rather exhibit the advancing stature of this preacher in his intellectual grasp, his varied learning, and deeper insight into human nature, as well as his increased spirituality and self-devotion.

II.
THE TEARS OF JESUS OF NAZARETH.
By Rev. WM. C. DENDIE, D.D.,
Author of "The Pulpit Gift-Book," etc.
1 vol. 12mo, price 75 cents.

III.
THE LIFE OF VITTORIA COLONNA.
By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE.
Being vol. 16 of the Household Library, bound in uniform style. 1 vol. 12mo, price 50 cents.

IV.
THE LIFE OF JULIUS CÆSAR.
By HENRY G. LIDDELL, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford.
Being vol. 17 of the Household Library. 1 vol. 12mo, uniform, price 50 cents.

V.
UNIVERSAL HISTORY.
Arranged to illustrate Boyd's Chart of Chronology.
By ELIZABETH P. PEABODY.
Complete in one oblong quarto volume, with blanks for reproducing. Price $1 25.

VI.
A new Edition of
AN OUTLINE OF THE RELIGIOUS LAWS OF THOUGHT:
A TREATISE ON PURE AND APPLIED LOGIC.
By WILLIAM THOMSON, D.D.,
Provost of the Queen's College, Oxford.
1 vol. 12mo, tinted paper. Price $1.

VII.
THE ELEMENTS OF MORAL SCIENCE.
By J. L. DIMAN, D.D., late President of Mercer University, Georgia, author of "Manual of Theology," "Church Order," etc., etc. 1 vol. 12mo. Price $1.

Hosiery
and Men's Furnishing Goods.
A great assortment of best goods at prices generally paid for inferior qualities.
Call, examine, and compare. One price, and money cheerfully refunded in case of dissatisfaction.

A. RANKIN & CO.,
No. 637 Broadway and No. 96 Bowery.
Established in 1813.

CONSUMPTION at last vanquished.
Proved by thousands beyond a doubt that the Imperial WINE BITTERS (the great Discovery of the Age) has cured, after all other remedies failed.
For sale by CHAS. WITHERFIELD, 649 and 651 Broadway, New York, and by all Druggists.

Thomas Andrews'
"Excelsior" Yeast Powder
Is sure to supercede all other preparations where quick yeast is required. Nothing can excel the purity or efficacy of this compound. Every good housekeeper should try our Yeast Powder; it is ready for use in one minute! Half a million of cans sold this year! Get our "EXCELSIOR" YEAST POWDER from your grocer, and take no other, if you want the best.
THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
136 and 138 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years!

Glass Shades!
Glass Shades made to order!!
Of all sizes, for covering Clocks, Flowers, &c., constantly on hand and made to order.
Depot, No. 158 William, corner of Ann Street.

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the so-called "Gins"—"Arrack," "Whiskey," and "Brandy"—&c., &c., in more than half of all the prescriptions of those stomachs, and constitutions as possessing all of the medicinal and valuable qualities made and directed—which belongs to all and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and sold by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS
No. 39 Broadway, N. Y.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN,
590 MULBERRY STREET, NEW YORK.
Being in constant receipt of invoices from our brethren, respecting Sewing Machines, with requests to recommend the best, we now have, in connection with same individuals, carefully and thoroughly examined the various machines of prominence, and have selected one, and find none made to The WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 505 Broadway, New York, to truly combine the essentials of a good instrument, and such as we can confidently recommend.
Having seen so favorable returns from their use, in our own and the households of our friends, we are desirous that their benefits should be shared by all our brethren, and hence have interested ourselves in their behalf.
With best wishes, your Brethren,

Abel Stevens,	Thos. Carlton,
James Floy,	J. Porter,
Daniel Wise,	J. Benj. Edwards,
David Terry.	Wm. A. Cox.

Forty Dollars per Month.
500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Patent Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machines. Salary $40 per month, with all expenses paid. For sample machine, and full particulars, address, with stamp enclosed for return postage,
J. M. DAGGETT & CO.,
Boston, Mass.

1759 pages. Price $6 50. Sold by all Booksellers.
G. & C. MERRIAM,
Springfield, Mass.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
At Reduced Prices.
READ WHAT A PUNISHMENTSMITH HAS SAYS.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines have more than sustained my expectations. Since I purchased one of them, I have three of them in operation in different places, and, after four years' trial, have no fault to find. Yours, A. H. Bingham, Senator of South Carolina."

493 Broadway, New York. 18 Summer Street, Boston. 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore. 58 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati. 118 Camp Street, New Orleans. And 569 King Street, Charleston.

Five Popular and Fast Selling BOOKS.

MINISTER'S WOOING. Price $1 25.
RUTLEDGE. Miss Evans. $1 25.
FROM DAWN TO DAYLIGHT. $1 00.
MILBURN'S TEN YEARS OF PREACHER LIFE. $1 00.
SYLVIA'S WORLD. By Mrs. King. $1 00.

Single copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by DERBY & JACKSON,
119 Nassau Street,
New York.

THE UNIVERSAL COUGH REMEDY
For all Lung Complaints.
THE CELEBRATED TOLU ANODYNE
The great Nonsuchic Remedy.
And adapted to all Nervous Complaints.
The celebrated New England preparations are now being distributed through the country, to which we invite the attention of the afflicted. Pamphlets, testimonials, and everything to strengthen confidence, may be found with dealers, and we ask all to call for them.
J. W. HUNNEWELL & Co., Commercial Wharf, Boston.
GEO. HUNNEWELL, 146 West Street, New York.
Also for sale by the usual Wholesale Agents in every city.
C. L. HUNNEWELL, Pharmaceutist, Superintendent.

Fair of the American Institute,
At Palace Garden,
W. 14th Street, near the 6th Avenue,
NOW OPEN.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 151.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

EFFECT OF JOHN BROWN'S INVASION AT THE SOUTH.

"MUCH OBLIGED TO DAR AR POSSUM WATTOMIE FOR DESE PIKES HE GIN US—DEY'S TURRIBLE HANDY TO DIG TATERS WID."

"WHAT'S DEM FOOL NIGGERS FRAID ON? I'D LIKE TER SEE ONE O' DEM FOLKS ONDERTAKE TO CARRY ME OFF, I WOULD!"

A SOUTHERN PLANTER ARMING HIS SLAVES TO RESIST INVASION.

KATIE.

BY C. H. WEBB.

[A woman lady had taken the sole care of her mother during a long and painful illness. After her mother's death she performed the last duties previous to interment with mechanical precision, and without shedding a tear. Her first words were spoken at the grave, when the sexton had raised his spade to throw earth upon the coffin. "Stop," cried Katie, wrenching his arm and shoulder; a basket of flowers into the grave, "I always covered mother up, and she used to say I did it so gently." Three were few on the funeral body.]

I have always covered mother
Since the pain came to her brow;
And she said I did it gently—
None else shall do it now.

I have always smoothed her pillow,
And drawn the curtain fold;
And I'll not forget thee now, mother,
When they lower thee all so cold.

'Neath the willows, deep and narrow
They have made thy bed, I know,
But they shall not soil thy robes, mother,
With the damp earth-mould below.

See, I've plucked some wild flowers, mother,
And I'll strew them on thy breast;
But the bed shall fall so gently
That they may not break thy rest.

I'd have brought thee brighter flowers, mother,
But the roses fled with June,
And the daisies and the summer
Went with the sweet May moon.

But the buds fell from the stem, mother,
To be caught by hands on high—
Now they blossom in God's garden;
Pale lilies of the sky.

And 'tis thus with souls like thine, mother,
For they are from life to love;
And they leave this dark earth-garden
For the golden walks above.

Oh, the sweet star-lilies blossom
Where no hand may pluck them down,
Or I'd weave, in pity to my love, mother,
A purer, fairer crown.

But the angel's wings are free, mother,
And you can wander there,
Where the flowers are blooming ever
With a fragrance that is rare.

Now the counterpane is spread, mother,
You'll wake to morning light—
God's hand has drawn the curtain,
So, mother sweet, good-night!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1859.

"GREAT EASTERN" SUPPLEMENT.

In compliance with numerous requests we publish, together with this number of the Weekly,

A Supplement of Sixteen Pages, wholly devoted to the Great Eastern steamship. As our readers are aware, the movements of that vessel are still very uncertain, though her departure for the United States is likely to take place at no distant day. In any event, there are few topics of such general interest as and we have no doubt but our readers will be glad to have a full account of her, profusely illustrated, for Six Cents.

The Greatest Ship in the World!

THE SAN JUAN DISPUTE.

IT is understood that Lord John Russell, the present Foreign Minister of Great Britain, has sent a pretty sharp dispatch to our Government on the subject of General Harney's recent occupation of the island of San Juan. In reply the Herald informs us that Mr. Cass has indited a dispatch vindicating Harney, and reading John Bull a severe lesson on his filibustering propensities.

We doubt, for our part, whether Mr. Cass has done any thing of the kind. Mr. Cass is a very old man, and by no means an belligerent as he used to be. Mr. Cass was ready to abandon our German population to their cast-off oppressors till his and other journals recalled them to a sense of his duty. Moreover, a man of large property and extended interests of various kinds, Mr. Cass can be likely to promote disorder in the financial world as he was before his fortune was made.

It is possible, of course, in view of the Presidential election of next year, that Mr. Cass may have allowed ambition to induce him to foment a new British quarrel. If by any chance a war with England could be fairly got on the tapis, the Northern vote next year would certainly be Democratic, and as the state of the slavery controversy naturally alarms Northern Democrats, it is just possible that Mr. Cass may have had an eye to the possible advantage which his party, in his section, would derive from an active quarrel with Great Britain.

But, on the other hand, whatever the views of the Michigan statesman may be, it is not likely that the influence of the Southern members of the Cabinet is so small that Mr. Cass has been allowed to menace Great Britain for the sake of strengthening the Democratic vote in a few Northern States.

In the long run nations, like individuals, will act altogether on grounds of principle and passion. At the present day, the actions of both are mostly swayed by interest. And nothing can be more hostile to the interest of the South than the mere rumor of a war with England. There has rarely changed since the war of 1812, when nine hundred thousand dollars paid our whole contingent for a month. The South is now growing enormously rich by exporting cotton to England. Last year it exported somebody like 4,000,000 bales, the price of cotton, most of which went to Great Britain. This year it will probably export nearly 5,000,000 bales, of which 3,000,000 will go to the lion's share. A war with Great Britain would not only stop British consumption, but would result in a combination not to send cotton to any foreign port, as the enormous navy of England would sweep every sea. At the present time, middling cotton is worth 12c. per pound from 5 to 6 cents per pound, sells at say 11 cents, and other descriptions in proportion. In the event of war with England the first cotton producers being shut out from three-fourths of their usual market, the price would probably decline half the cost of production, and we should have middling uplands hard of sale at 5 cents per pound. The price of Southern land and labor could not fail to decline. And for the sake of securing the supremacy of the Democrats in certain Northern States, Mr. Cass be allowed to provoke England, the mere possibility of an outbreak will, long before actual hostilities, cause the price of cotton, negroes, and land to decline so enormously that half the Southern planters will be ruined.

For this reason, we do not apprehend that Mr. Cass has done any thing of the kind. Unobtrusmtating dispatches about the island of San Juan.

The question at issue between Great Britain and this country is, in truth, one of so simple a nature that, without shameful perversity on one side or the other, it is hard to see how to quarrel about it. It is, as we stated a couple of weeks since, a question for naval men and engineers to decide. "The channel," which lies in Rosario or Haro Strait is a purely naval problem, to be solved, not by politicians or editors, but by sailors. If the two Governments can say any honest men at their heads, they should make haste to have thorough reports on the locality prepared by experienced and high-minded naval men. These reports should settle the question at once. If any doubt should still exist, the difficulty might be referred to a foreign arbitrator—either a government, as Russia or Sweden, or a competent geographer, as Professor Guyot. The talk about having grown out of this difficulty is more nonsense; about as silly as General Harney's conduct.

MR. WARD IN CHINA.

THE news is that our minister, Mr. Ward, has been received respectfully at Pekin, and has exchanged ratifications of the treaty of 1858 with the Chinese Government. Every thing is said to have passed off pleasantly, and Mr. Ward is said to be in the best humor possible with the Chinese—who, on their side, say no expressed an exclaiming against the folly of the British Government in sending thunderheads like Colonel Bruce and Admiral Hope to deal with them, while the Celestial Empire can boast of mind and ability like Mr. Ward to represent them. We make no comment on this intelligence; it will be time enough to do so when the details are authoritatively confirmed.

It will be remembered by the readers of this journal that, when the first dispatch of this class we stated that, if there was another mouth to the river further north which was navigable by vessels of moderate draught, there was no excuse for the attack on the forts. Recent intelligence would seem to show that there is such a mouth and that we are not likely to be involved in guilty of great precipitation—to use no harsher term—in attacking the forts before they made sure that the Chinese were deceiving them.

We are glad to find that Mr. Ward's active sympathy with the maritime powers of Europe does not interfere with the duty of neutral. The latter seem—if the accounts to hand can be relied upon—to be rather ashamed of the Peh-ho affair, and are represented as making excuses for the conduct of their officials in beating the British back from the forts.

It is pretty difficult to decide between the contending parties in China. The Chinese have so uniformly proved themselves unreliable and tricky that the presumption of law is always against their fair dealing; and, on the other hand, John Bull has always lorded it so mightily over the Asiatics that it is not always safe to assume that he is really wronged when he makes an outcry. A few more weeks must yet elapse before we can pronounce a judgment on the question at issue; till then, prudent people will reserve their decision.

JEWISH PROSPECTS

A NOVELTY of considerable importance has lately been introduced into the religious ceremonies for the purpose of substituting the Christian Sunday for the Jewish Sabbath. It is reported that the Jews have their religious services as usual in their synagogues, on Sunday, instead of Saturday, as at present. The advocates of the new system have hitherto a miserable chapel up town, and seceded from the synagogue of which they were members.

This is a very curious movement in the effect of this movement. By keeping Sunday as their holy day instead of Saturday, the Jews will effectually do away with the dividing line between themselves and the Christians. We have a number of sects, all called Christian, and yet whose doctrines differ as widely as the Jew system from the Christian. The principal points which are common to all are a reverence—various in kind, but always sincere—for the Bible, and a tacit understanding to set apart Sunday for especial religious observance. Now, though the Jews reject the New Testament, they pay no Christians in their respect for the Old; and if they conclude to follow the Christian example in observing Sunday in their Sabbath instead of Saturday, the remaining differences between themselves and the Christians will hardly be more important than those which divide the several Christian churches.

There are reasons for expecting the success of the new movement. It is well known that the Jews are among the foremost merchants of the world. Many of our leading foreign bankers and importers are Jews. To these persons the existing rites of the synagogue are very inconvenient. They can not obey the precept of the Jewish and Christian faith from Saturday without injuring their business; nor is it of any use to them to be able to work on Sunday, for the ordinary stores of trade are closed, and there is no one to do business with. In the specie business, for instance, in which the proprietors of this journal are engaged, Saturday is the busiest day of the week, as it is on that day that the heaviest specie shipments are made from this port. In Europe the monetary disorder of the Jews is such that they are enabled to impose their will upon the financiers of Paris, London, and Frankfort Saturday is always a dull day among financiers; government loans are not given out, the money market is at a public loan so that it should not fall on a Jewish festival. Here, numerous, wealthy, and influential as the Jews are, they possess no equivalent power; it has never been expected that Commodore Vanderbilt would alter the sailing of his steamers, or that the General Government would change the fixed programme for its loans, in order to defer to Jewish custom. The Jews are not strong enough to become unelecting their religion or their business; they can not do justice to both unless they adopt the new plan, and begin to keep Sunday, instead of Saturday, as their Sabbath.

While, however, we think that the new movement stands a fair chance of success, success must not regard it as a step toward the general Christianization of the Jews, and the ultimate absorption of the children of Israel in the element. It must always be remembered that Judaism is something more than a religion. It is a nationality, and a nationality independent of the accident of birth. All the baptism in the world can not turn Jews into any thing else than Jews. And though this is by no reason to question the sincerity of Jewish converts, or of the good men who are laboring among the Jews for the gospel's sake, all experience proves that neither argument, nor conversion, nor time, nor climate, nor custom can alter, in any material degree, the marked lineaments which have been the characteristics of the Jewish race from the time of the bondage in Egypt to the present day.

The late Prince Metternich—no mean prophet—told Monsieur Veuillot that, in his opinion, the most important movement of modern days, many was the German Jews. They were, he said, persons of unusual energy and invariable success in managing their own affairs, in money matters, and controlling the financial world; and they were, he added, with an emphasis which is not unintelligible, "capable of cutting their throats." Of this race, thus singled out by the great Austrian statesman, we have a large representation in this country. Relatively, we believe that the proportion of Jews among the thriving Germans of the large cities of the United States is very large indeed. And so far as industry, shrewdness, energy, and success are concerned, they are certainly verifying Prince Metternich's eulogy. Their future in this country, as in Europe, is a problem which is well deserving of sober thought.

MISS BLACKWELL'S LECTURES.

THE lectures by the Misses Blackwell, to which we alluded in a late number, will be given on 16th, 18th, and 22d November, at 3 P.M., at Clinton Hall. The subjects are as follows:

THE FIRST LECTURE—On the Utility of Physiological Knowledge to Women—will show the Nature and Objects of that Knowledge—its connection with every relation of Woman's Life, and the careful Study of the Laws of Health, which is required for the wise Discharge of Woman's Duty.

THE SECOND LECTURE—On the Utility of Medical Knowledge to Women—will illustrate the Practice of Women Physicians, their influence upon Health at Home, their relation to Public Charities, and the necessity which exists for such a Profession to exist.

THE THIRD LECTURE—On the Education of Women Physicians—will explain the true method of Education, the difficulties to be overcome, and the way in which they may be met. Europeans, Institutions for Partial Training, and Miss Nightingale's Efforts, in relation to Nurses, will be particularly noticed.

The lectures are given in aid of the New York Infirmary for Women and Children. We trust that the attendance will be large. Every thoughtful woman should make a point of hearing Miss Blackwell.

THE LOUNGER.

A MORNING'S SIGHTS.

At this moment New York has attractions for a stranger that may fairly be called metropolitan. Not that it has ever such an exhibition as that in a metropolis. The Lounger may begin with Church's Heart of the Andes, in Tenth Street; cross to Page's Venus, in the National Academy Rooms; stop at the corner of Ninth Street, and see Rosa Bonheur's pictures of the cows crossing the Pyrenees and the cattle at morning; then move on to Dr. Kane's collection of Arctican curiosities gathered in his explorations; and finish the morning at the Dusseldorf Gallery. There are places very near to each other, and we can easily compare the work of American and foreign artists.

There is another work, of a peculiarly national character, which challenges public attention. It is the large painting of Washington and Lafayette, at Mount Vernon, by Mr. Rossiter and Mr. Rossiter and Mignot. Mr. Rossiter, of course, needs no introduction. Mr. Mignot is the painter of the splendid Cordillera picture in this year's exhibition—an artist whose tendencies and talent seem to be sympathetic with those of Church, although entirely without imitation.

The picture in question is a very large work, and is very well to excite public attention. It is a tranquil, domestic passage in the life of Washington. It is a great man laid aside from his state, and has not yet put on the robe of chief civic station. A plain Virginia farmer, he lives upon his own estate, receives his friend and ally, the French Marquis.

But even in the piazza of the house at Mount Vernon, overlooking the windings of the Potomac. The transcript from nature is entirely faithful. The certain American look of the scenery upon the spot may see precisely the character of the house—its simple solid, dull, square form and its blinds, the door, the low upper rooms, including the one in which Washington died; the heavy, square columns, the floor of the piazza laid, we have, skirted with shrubbery and trees, and the distant river gleaming through the foliage, covered with the sails that were more frequent in the days when Farmer Washington made out his own bills of hoeing, and signed his produce directly to London—and all steeped in the calm magnificence of an August noon.

Washington stands almost fronting the spectator, and with that grandiose, statuesque dignity which the American public has come to know him. His arms are partly folded, but one hand is gently raised to point some remark which he is silently hearing. Lafayette, in a respectful attitude stands, partly leaning against a column, in an attitude of frequent grace, but with the hand leveled slightly with chivalric respect. A certain conscious self-assertion in the Virginia lord of the manor, and a respectful complaisance upon the part of the courtier of the Parisian salons are well marked. Behind the two, in the background, Mrs. Washington sits quietly, knitting; Mrs. Stuart, by a little table, reads a note; Master Parke Custis is reading, or rather studying, in company with his negro nurse; and his sister lays her head, half-concealed, upon her mother's knee. A few English pointers watch with curious apprehension the preparations to fire; and far on the edge of the lawn an negro is driving a cart off the published turf.

The whole scene is thoroughly domestic and peaceful; and the landscape has a vivid brilliance, a fullness of light, which is masterly. It is a piece of sunlight. The air is exceedingly warm, and is entirely loyal to the simplicity of the theme. It is a work designed, doubtless, in very general admiration. We have had so much representation of Washington the hero, that it is very pleasant to have him in his simple domestic performance. Perhaps the imagination so idolizes him that it is almost impossible to present a satisfactory portrait of that is to say, a portrait which reproduces our idea of the man. In the general feeling he is always present to us. We have been taught that to have had the ordinary duties of humanity, our revolutionary Lycurgus, Lawgiver, Solon, or as he thought he must have been in his youth sufficiently shows.

The picture of Washington and Lafayette at Mount Vernon is to be put upon public exhibition immediately.

As for the Males Crossing the Pyrenees, it is the most satisfactory work we have yet seen of Rosa Bonheur's, more so than the Horse Fair. It represents simply the summit of a pass in the mountains; snow-drifted, rocky peaks, piled around in sullen desolation, and across them strikes this dash of hurrying, picturesque life. The thorough animation of the crowd of animals coming round a rock at the turn of the pass, with pricked-up ears, and descending directly toward the spectator—a storm of tinkling, early-constructed, shrewd, shaggy brutes—is nobly contrasted with the perfect lonely silence of the mountain height. In the midst stalks the driver of the muleteer, with an orderly characteristic Spanish peasant face. It is picturesquely accurate and full of interest, and need to endless days of mule-driving, to ever-renewed footpaths, and a long draught of cheering wine. The picture has the true actuality which we find in all of her works; but the circumstances themselves are quite peculiar to the imaginative. There is not the ease with the Morning in the Highlands, where a group of indubitable cattle stand a little stiffened in the dew. But there is a power and charm about Leighton's in the picture; and therefore, good as it is, it is not a fair example.

From pictures of known animals to the stuffed skins of unknown and recently-discovered, you pass, in stepping from the corner of Ninth Street, to below the corner of Bleecker. There Mr. du Chaillu has set up his gorilla, chimpanzee, and other wonders brought by him from the neighborhood of the Gaboon River in Africa, which he was the first to penetrate and explore. There is an air of veracity in the collection which is attractive, for there is no attempt to make up a show where they are not. The implements—knives, hatchets, cups, whips, spears—are very curious; and the mats and clothes woven of the grass were an aesthetic taste which is surprising. The collection is not large, but it is very valuable, and well worth attention.

"DAKOTAH."

SOME friend appends this signature to a certain complaint which he sends to the Lounger, and which is of a kind that is continually occurring. He concludes his note by saying that "perhaps" —the very thing that is of the greatest moment—and then adds, that it does not alter his opinion.

What then? No paper is made for any single subscriber; and every paper which is published and continues to be published, practically to the proprietors, may be supposed to please the great mass of its readers and supporters. If they are individually displeased with it, they withdraw their aid, by no Dakotah does—express their displeasure. But if the case of complaint is general, it will be very sure that the only authority which can possibly understand the case has decided against them.

For instance, suppose that Dakotah writes—which he does not—that he thinks it a pity to carry in Harper's Weekly—that the subscription will decline terribly if there is, and that people don't want poetry in a weekly paper, and that it ought to, he doesn't.

That is the kind of note most frequently received by all editors—and what can they do but smile, and drop it in the basket, and appoint a special clerk to look over the correspondence? Almost all such notes into the fire until there arrive more than ten such every day? Do you not see the entire inanity of them, that any body possibly can know? He sees the books. He knows the receipts and the expenditures. He knows what papers sell more than others, for what kind of literary ware in the paper there is a popular demand. Of course he is not to suppose that Dakotah's letter is asked for. Prudence, for instance, has a certain kind of popularity. Is it prudent to cease to publish a prurient paper because it pays? How can he be paid for the loss of his self-respect? So when a man tries to establish a paper, however fine, man and himself as editor—if he be a man at all he can not do it, where moral questions are concerned.

It is, however, a curious fact, that the most profitably conducted of the "Harbors," "Dakotah," "Aristides," "A Subscriber," "An old Reader," and the whole corps of the correspondents of the papers, that an editor understands his business as well as other people. As a man is not necessarily a natural fool because he is a lawyer, he is not undoubtedly important, if true; and it is just as impertinent to volunteer advice to the conductor as it would be in a lawyer's, a shoemaker's, a clergyman's, or a broker's.

The great fact for every reader to remember is, the paper is not made for us. If he doesn't like it he can drop it. That seems very obvious with all malcontents upon magazines and journals. But let him also not forget, that the editor is managing his paper to make it, within honorable limits, the most profitable possible; and that while "A Subscriber" is displeased with a certain course, that very course may have gained "a subscriber" manifolded by a hundred.

A WORD UPON "PAINFUL DELICACY."

A CORRESPONDENT writes to the Lounger: "If you think my correspondent wrote in circumstantiation, I would most thankfully receive it, whatever it is. I find an almost painful delicacy in speaking of this, and were my circumstances wholly free from delicacy, how I would never do it."

Why not? There is many a rich merchant in South Street and Wall Street who does not hesitate to receive payment for the cotton and tea he sells—and half and quarter pounds of tea are probables than those for the body? A manuscript, or thought expressed upon paper, is thought made merchandise. Of course there is no relation that can be computed between the delight it may afford the reader and the money he pays for the book, because mental pleasure can not be estimated in money. But neither can you estimate the delight of mere existence by the money which buys the means of existence. Neither the brain-work of the trader or of the author can be properly paid for—it is only the tangible, external results they achieve which have pecuniary value.

Therefore, if Mr. Stewart would have no "painful delicacy" in receiving a dollar for a pair of gloves —or the publishers of this WEEKLY any reluctance to be paid five cents for every copy they produce—nor the clergy for being supported in return for their services, there is no reason why an author should suffer from such scruples.

The tough and fair-haired Thomas H. Benton used to be ridiculed for the sunny Missouri acres of which our correspondent speaks. He went to Arkansas because he liked the climate, and because but if the society chose to present him two hundred dollars as an honorarium—? On the whole, he was thrice a man and a statesman for what he called calling?

"What you want is fame—not money," said a shrewd old publisher to a young author; and, of course, every publishing house has a much larger balance of the latter than the first to set up against. And it is a kind of draft we all draw upon ourselves. "Fame and immortality are not to the same young author," This book ought to be very popular. I have no doubt it will sell like a house afire." "How many copies did you put down for?" inquires young author. "Oh! oh! I don't really I have so many books on my list unread—!"

Now every ardent young author does undoubtedly aspire to fame; but he does not expect to feed on his dreams while he is making the journey. He is a religious enthusiast who does not encourage to our Lady of Loretto, with hard peas in his shoes. The wise old neighbor who went to Loretto for him let very young, and was always his peas before starting, says to the enthusiast, "That's it! good-by. But I don't want is getting to Loretto, not something to eat."

How shall a pilgrim reach Loretto without something to eat? How shall a man get time if he starves while he is working for it? Honest work and wherever it is possible, honest pay, must be the last person who should feel "painful delicacy" in being paid for work is he whose labor blesses the mind and the heart of his race. He who works while for Government to keep a great cotton dealer from failing; but it would be worth while for it to keep a great poet from starving.

NOBLE CRITICS.

We are certainly unfortunate in two ways in this country. One is in the kind of English newspapers that come to us—the Times excepted. The intense snobbery which too-tons before them while they are here. That they should go home and abuse themselves for what they see is not surprising. But it is a great misfortune that we will not seem to be what they are when they are on our soil.

Last year a Lord Ribbledale and a Lord Robert Somerset with them, came to the New York newspapers, and the next news that we have of them in print is a letter to the London Times from one of them, and the other delivers a lecture upon America, of which the ignorance is not even amusing, but unpardonably dull.

Now there is, apropos, a presumption in favor of the nobleman. He is known to be a conservative whose name is a matter of pride. He has advantages of education and of social polish. He has, or is nobleman. He is known to be a conservative whose name is a matter of pride. He has advantages of education and of social polish. He has, or is supposed to have, a certain kind of literary culture. These advantages predispose a stranger to believe that he will be a delightful guest and a delightful companion. But experience is gradually annihilating this theory, and is now apparent that nothing can be taken for granted; and that a nobleman must be supposed to be as ill-bred and stupid as the vulgar boor who is not a nobleman.

Is there, then, no way of exterminating the toads that we serve up so profusely in honor of those distinguished guests?

There are certain people among us who keep up a whole procession of these unfortunate toads. They have them as landlords in the Tyrol keep basks of trout, and when the illustrious stranger arrives they are served up in every style. Mr. and Gunnybags sends a note asking a man to dinner, "to meet Lord Chimpanzee," he ought to put in the corner of the note the words "TOADS," as they put "cards" in the corner of evening invitations. Then we should always know what we are to eat.

And when Gunnybags arrives in London, Lord Chimpanzee will call immediately, will be not? and ask Lord Chimpanzee to dinner to meet Gunnybags Esquire, from the United States. Or, perhaps, Lord Chimpanzee will be not? and say that Americans pick their teeth with the heels of their boots, and that they are decorated by a secret device of their political principles.

Was it not the worthy Lord Redstock who, at the Burns' Supper in Boston, kept talking of "the great Webster," and calling him Timothy, or Daniel, or something equally familiar? Was he not also so familiar with what he was talking about as he was with the gay history of Egypt? And, for an apology, the only claim he had to be at the Supper and make a speech was that he was a Lord. That was a reason why he should be treated as one. But our English friends ought to be made aware that, if these gentlemen are ever good make fun of, it is not until they have covered the English name with ridicule in America.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—"AIX" writes us: we will find a letter to his address in the Chicago Post-Office.

—X. Z. K. The Lounger will try to find room for your very spirited lyric.

—TWO CONSTANT READERS. The expression is in Nicholas Rowe's "Fair Penitent," ACT. V., SC. 1:

"In this that laughter, spirit, joy lacharie?"

—TOOTSUM asks, who first used the expression, "A Power behind the throne greater than the throne itself?"

—C. M. In French to say simply, "Thank you," is to decline.

—L. H. J. To publish what you say about the "Illfated Purple" would only excite unpleasant feeling to no possible purpose.

—Here is a genuine letter, from which only three words are omitted which might serve to identify the city from which it is written, and so bring ridicule upon the author. It is a case, probably, beyond advice; but the best possible method for the writer to pursue is to print his poems and entertain if the world recognizes them as modeled upon Tennyson and Longfellow, and so equal to them as Bryant and Read—who does not spell his name with an E. If it does not, the next step to be taken is to write a volume of his letters and submit upon the part of the writer. Great genius may be undervalued, but small genius is never. Genius is always the full measure of its greatest service.

—"Mr. Lounger," pronounced of literary talent, and believes myself fully competent to justify my writing that talent to criticism. The only favor I shall ask is that of gratis." Soon understand better the low standard of taste which governs the compositions of the day, which upon my ability, or I would not trouble you with this application. Should you, however, have occasion at any regular contributor to your Magazine or Weekly, I am willing to commence my labors for the first Number of Longfellow are my models, and that my productions will, at least, equal in this time of T. S. Arthur and Mrs. Whitney of New York; and, if it is your pleasure to contribute to my support, you will find in the columns of my remittances, not in point of my talents."

"Most respectfully yours."

—H. P. R. suggests that Mr. Lowe should take with him to his gas-balloon only an apparatus for generating hydrogen by means of sulphuric acid, water, and zinc—and that he should ascend in the night. If Mr. Lowe wishes to know why, if the Sage of Brooklyn has not picked up a number of his fellow-citizens in the manner of a mailsack, and "fill an order for pickled heat?"

THE EXILED PRINCES OF CENTRAL ITALY.

THE report, by the last steamer, that Napoleon III. has addressed a letter to the King of Sardinia, announcing the restoration of the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena, while Parma is to be annexed to Piedmont, renews the public interest in the Princes whose fortune it has become to be definitely settled. On the following page we give, therefore, three portraits of these short sketch below will place the reader in possession of the leading facts in their lives.

The Duchess Louise, Regent of Parma during the minority of her son, Robert I. (who was born April 9, 1848), is a daughter of the last Duke de Berry. After the assassination of her husband, Count Reigning Duke, Ferdinand Charles III., the Duchess Louise assumed the regency. Four months thereafter (in July, 1854), she was nearly expelled, as it was supposed that she was governed by the troops, who adhered to her cause. She remained true to her also in the disturbances which followed the outbreak of the recent Italian war, and the Duchess had, by their help, already quelled the internal disturbances, when the final issue of the battle of Magenta compelled her to fly. The Duchess has four children—Robert I., the heir to the throne; Margaret, born January 1, 1847; Alice, born December 27, 1849; and Henry, Count de Bourbon, born March 14, 1851.

The Grand Duke Ferdinand IV. of Tuscany, was born on June 10, 1835. He is a descendant of two of the oldest families of Europe, the Lorrainer, Leopold II., being of the House of Hapsburg, while the ancestors of the Princes of the Two Sicilies belonged to his people by various oppressive measures, and was generally looked upon as a liberal or progressive action. The New-Year's Speech of Napoleon III. to Baron Hübner alarmed Leopold, and he sent the Baron to Rome and Vienna, with the purpose of establishing a more intimate bond of union with those States. While at Vienna Grand Ferdinand lost his duchess, who died suddenly at Naples, February 10, 1859. On the outbreak of the war Leopold II. was joined by his people, who were in favor of his son, and refusing this, was compelled to flee. The Duke of Modena also was expelled duchess. He has three brothers—Charles, born 1833; Louis, born 1847; and John Nepomuk, born 1852.

Francis V., Duke of Modena, was born June 1, 1819, and began to reign January 21, 1846. His father, Francis IV., was one of the most violent conservatives and most unscrupulous men in Europe. While Reigning Duke he offered to the Jesuits Carbonari, the secret political societies of Italy, but only to intercept their correspondence and betray membership. In his organ, the Voce di Torth, he continually advocated the strongest measures against popular liberty and enlightened progress; and it was his chief pride that he was the only European prince who never recognized Louis Philippe as King of France. The son of this old fogy was educated by Jesuits, and surrounded by bigoted priests from his earliest youth. Such an education to the throne he has shown himself a worthy successor of his father, and has carried out his views to the extent of his power. The news of the battle of Magenta forced him to fly, but he took with him but a few thousand crowns with which to raise troops awaiting the turn of events, and hopes to win back his throne.

While the Princes are waiting the pleasure of their Royal and Imperial cousins, their liberated people have decided for themselves never voluntarily to take them back. Their dynasties were publicly and solemnly disinherited—in Modena on the 12th of August, in Florence on the 20th of August, and in Parma on the 10th of September of the present year; and all three States have chosen Victor Emanuel of Sardinia as their ruler, and his laws as their laws.

Sketches of the People who oppose our Sunday Laws.

No. V.

SUNDAY IN CHATHAM STREET.

CHATHAM STREET, on Sunday, is full of life. Its sidewalks teem with wayfarers wandering restlessly about, seeking purchase, many adorned in profoundest business thoughts. Upon the curbstones gather groups of loungers. Here, in one place a dozen idlers give heed to the words of a three-cornered gentleman in a red shirt and ruffled black trowsers, whose hat-rim rests defiantly upon his right eyebrow, shutting his grim features from the world. Around, and above him, are ready tucked, give evidence of his full preparation for any quarrel—a preparation which Thursday's police court teeth he propounds grave principles. He lays these his political heart. He demonstrates beyond all question that the success of the popular party in the approaching struggle depends upon the annihilation of the enemy. He is, in fact, having conquered his humblest, hesitates to offer. He then turns aside, and, leaning confidingly upon a lamp-post, communes with the events of the week's politics whose occupation is the improvement of the understanding, and to whom his post has neatly absorbed:

"How doth the little busy boy Improve each shining hour"

and intrusts to him, one by one, his basted feet, as the polish proceeds to perfection. Here the contest, until suddenly perking his experienced ear in the direction of the City Hall, he bears the rustle of the machinery which governs the Tombs clock, and, shouting exultant, overseas the little boot-stand, and dashes away in hope of thereby securing his "fellers" to elicit the rope of his beloved machine, while the young distributor of lustre, in desperation at the loss of his best customer, with defiance has attained a sufficient distance, and then hurls after him the most eloquent denunciation he can. The crowd, too, released from the thralldom of personal fear, utter offensive remarks concerning their late leader, flourish all acquaintance with impudence, and even go so far as to pronounce "forty's fellers" a set of knaves.

Similar gatherings, noisy in greater or less degree, are every where seen. By one, the character and tongue of each of the new proprietors is discussed in the neighborhood, and who has not yet accustomed himself to his little way is described in terms unfavorable to him, and in a manner calculated to injure his self-respect, until he turns a corner close by, when the voices of execration are hushed, and lowering eyes speak silent animosity. Along the principal thoroughfares, the tones altered as to raiment, and with faces smeared with mud and tuff, the latter accumulated from a cook-shop over which rises the living representative of the proprietor. There is a Babel-like confusion of tongues. Hebrew German, and Irish, French Irish, a little Hebrew, and a great deal of variously-broken English are simultaneously heard. It needs curious ears to detect the prevailing accent—not lacing to the Poets, for instance—and you will see strange sights in the Jewish Sunday assemblies. You will smell strange smells. Half-naked mothers, with infants in their arms, lying in open doorways, affording access to outside gazing by reason of early potations, and unable to remonstrate with anyone against the rough handling of intruders trample over them. Collars, from which issue to gether foul odors and inharmonious chantings, not expressive of worship, are frequently seen with frowzy young women, vying in salacious repartee with delighted lads near at hand. Farinet displays between prize-ring candidates, opening in pleasantry, and terminating in wrath. Children revelling in unrestrained play at every step.

The Jewish infusion in this community is rapidly but quietly absorbing Sunday trade, as the signs upon the houses and over the shop doors would show this at once. You see nothing but Isaacs and Levys and similar names, singularly multiplied, in some cases, of their full Hebraic force by a pronunciation that is sometimes quite Celtic, at present a dealer in fancy jewelry. You do not believe, at all, that he is the subject of the royal road about, and are convinced that the only fiddler he dreams of is the fiddler to riches. Another dealer in the himself as "Professor" of Hebrew "Sleep John," and, as he stands in his shop window, you hear him at his practice as he sits at his last job that. Another has a profession of Hebrew inscriptions over his door, as though it were necessary that to give positive public assurance of his nationality. And many proclaim, in largest gilded letters, that in matters of enterprise, liberality, honesty, and so forth, they stand eminent above all competitors, which, for quiet humor, strikes you as unexpectedly droll.

Sunday, among the Israelites here, is the liveliest and most exciting day of the week. As it is to them no Sabbath, they are untouched by conscientious compunctions, and give themselves up to lucrative pursuits.

At first sight the current of trade seems to have but one unvarying course. The entire business spirit appears to turn upon the buying and selling of clothing. Garments ready fashioned, of all varieties, adorn the walls and windows. Trousers float languidly overhead, and shaggy over-coats, with outstretched arms, embrace the passing breezes. Only the closest investigation reveals that other departments of trade exist; and, indeed, they are very few. A limited supply of coffee, cheap, and dingily characteristic of the locality, is exposed for sale. The dealer glares grimly upon the familiar passers-by, as if calculating upon the amount of custom they will all eventually bring him. There are also one or two Daguerreotype establishments, in which the neighbors sometimes get their ugliness ineffaceably stamped at the lowest rates of physiognomical transmission. Cigar merchants, to the number of half a dozen, offer for sale their cloud-compelling wares. But all these minor institutions are absorbed and lost in the multitudinous array of clothing-stands which stretch out before the view, a deep, unbroken vista. Of the separate stalls that together make up this vast aggregation, each is a curious study. Every one is modeled after the same pattern. You see a close and contracted apartment, full of deformed angles and queer dilapidated corners, of which the floor is so thickly incrusted with dirt as to reduce still farther its already too limited dimensions. In a remote corner sits coolly the antique proprietor, calmly sleeping, and dreaming, no doubt, of huge sales and measureless profits. His hair, which nature would prefer to have white, but which habits of unbroken years have tinged with an unpleasant earthy hue, drops in tangled shreds over his wrinkled forehead. His eyes, though closed, seem to glisten even under their lids with leers of complacent self-approval. His nose, prodigious as to bulk, and unhealthily pinkish as to color, rests comfortably upon his chin, and gushes forth snores of satisfaction. His pendulous lips roll and quiver, as if preparing for a lusty smack over the remembrance of some acutely driven bargain. His hands, too, which are folded over his lap, are rubbing nervously together—itching, no doubt, for the beloved touch of lacre more or less filthy. Altogether a worthy fellow, no doubt, but on the whole, perhaps, not overagreeable to gaze at. A woman, apparently his wife, serves purchasers while he reposes. The shop is well stocked with goods. Shelves from floor to ceiling are jammed full, and hooks depending from every cross-beam are overhung, with articles of apparel. These are all plastered with brief inscriptions setting forth particulars of style and price in most attractive gilded characters. A coat of remote origin, once white, but now of many colors, is designated, "Our Taste Exactly," and is set down as valued at eight dollars. This seems to be a standard price. Nether garments, with decorative bands so broad that the wearer would appear to carry on his legs a pair of stripes, with trowsers attached, rather than the ordinary opposite, are surmounted with the printed information, "Will just suit you." Other equally eccentric labels are shown, as "The Fox Cut," "The Shankum," "Utah," "My Chum," "Captain Joe's," "Our Machine," "Just the Cut," "Rich," "Dashing," "Becoming," and many more similarly startling. A vest is proclaimed to be the "Edwin Forrest" style. It appears to you well named, for it is loud and splashy, not to say splurgy, and its heavy borders of deepest red forcibly suggest the pats of paint which form the principal element of that distinguished tragedian's patois.

The hum of traffic is incessant. Voices of clothes vendors calling in loud tones to the populace to walk into their shops, after the manner of the Spider and the Fly; querulous remonstrances against extortion by outwitted purchasers; stern vows of vengeance from the lips of victims; fierce expostulations, often rising to angry tumults entailing physical exercises on the part of the police, all blend in chaotic confusion. The clamor swells throughout the day. Toward evening it subsides. The shops are closed. The salesmen turn their steps to the Bowery, where the Stadt Theatre and the beer gardens await them. Many of their customers go and do likewise; and many, perhaps the greater number, adhere to the more immediate vicinity, and breathe the more congenial atmosphere which settles over the Five Points.

FERDINAND IV., GRAND DUKE OF TUSCANY. LOUISE, GRAND DUCHESS OF PARMA. FRANCIS V., DUKE OF MODENA.

THE EXILED SOVEREIGNS OF THE ITALIAN DUCHIES.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

CHATHAM STREET, NEW YORK, ON SUNDAY.

"GOOD-BY, MR. NEWT, GOOD-BY!"

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

By George William Curtis.

CHAPTER LXXV.

COOKEY!

SINCE her removal to New York Hope Wayne had not often met Abel Nott. Engaged in the many duties and pleasures of a metropolis, she had resisted all the efforts made to draw her into the vortex of fashion and the world. From the Round Dable, at which she sat with her particular friends, she looked at the great, grotesque spectacle of Society—the flare, the feathers, the flirtation, the eagerness, the chagrin, the masks indefinitely gilded into smiles and worn by such melancholy faces, the vague expectation of a substance as splendid as the promise and the show, the gratification of receiving years, the hopes, the regrets, the romance, the quiet love, the genuine heroism, the cheerful sympathy, the humor, wit, intelligence—she looked at them all—she heard the music of the vows, the protestations, the sound of sighing and sharp complaint—" Yes, yes," she seemed to say, "I know that you are speaking, that the corsi cause gleam beneath, and sea anemones cling to emerald rocks—but thank you! I have sailed upon your bright bosom, and oh! I was so sea-sick!"

In the street sometimes she met Abel, who bowed low and stared at her with black eyes. She bent and passed on, but not without remarking how, in the long intervals, the youth had ceased to be young, and the man was already old—how the cares of appearance declined, but the cheek was heavier and more haggard, the eye restless and discolored—how the step lost its bounding ease of elastic bound, and became shuffling, hurried, reckless. She never passed him unconsciously—never without a secret melancholy—as at impersonal as the sadness born of a November day. Hope Wayne could not forget that in that form—her love differed from then!—had been incarnated the first being she had loved. It was her—it was not he—it never was he—so she felt—had long felt, without ever saying it to herself. She sometimes shuddered, often wondered, always pitied—and passed onward him, passed on.

The happy hours of her life were the visits of Lawrence Nott. The sound of his voice in the hall, of his step on the stair, gave her a sense of profound peace. Often, when at the table with Mrs. Simcoe, in her light morning-dress, and with the deer of sleep yet fresh upon her cheeks, she heard the sound, and her heart seemed to stop and listen. Often, as time wore on, and the interviews were prolonged and more delayed, she was conscious that the gaze of her old friend became curiously fixed upon her whenever Lawrence Nott came. Often, in the tranquil evenings, when they sat together in the pleasant room, Hope Wayne cheerfully chatting, or sewing, or reading aloud, Mrs. Simcoe looked at her so wistfully—so as if about to impart of telling some strange story—that Hope could not help saying, brightly, "Out with it, aunty." But as the younger woman spoke the resolution glimmered away in the eyes of her companion, and was succeeded by a yearning, tender pity.

Still Lawrence Nott came to the house, to consult, to inquire, to bring bill that he had paid, to hear of a new utensil for the kitchen, to see about coal, about wood, about fires, about a hole in a carpet, as a fact—he knew every thing in the house by heart, and yet he did not know how or why. He wanted to come—he thought he came too often. What could he do?

Hope sang as she sat in her chamber, as she read in the parlor, as she went about her house, doing her nameless, innumerable household duties. Her voice was rich and full and womanly; and the singing was not the fragmentary, sparkling gush of good spirits and the mere overflow of a happy temperament; it was a deep, sweet use of music, as if a woman's soul were intoning a woman's heart, and as if the woman were at peace.

But the face of Mrs. Simcoe grew sadder and sadder as Hope's singing was sweeter and more and significant of utter rest. The look in her eyes of watchful imminent, of something like fear, of something shocked on her tongue, grew more and more marked. Hope Wayne brightly said, "Out with it, aunty," and Amy Waring came often to the house. She was older than Hope, and it was natural that she should be a little grave. They had a hundred plans in concert for benefiting the people. Amy and Hope were a charitable society.

"Fiddle diddle!" said Aunt Dogon, when she was speaking of his two friends to her nephew Lawrence. "Does this brace of angels think that virtue consists in making shirts for poor people?"

Lawrence looked at his aunt with the interest of a boy, and answered kindly,

"I don't know that they do, Aunt Dogon; but I suppose they don't think it consists in not making them."

"Phew!" said Mrs. Dogon, tossing her cap-strings back petulantly. "I wish they'd organize to make a kind of rope-ladder of all their charity-garments, and climb up into heaven that way!"

"Perhaps they do," replied Lawrence, in the same tone. "They look as if they were on good confidant. But I suppose that even if the ladder doesn't reach, it's better to go a little way up than not to start at all."

"There! Lawrence, that comes of your not going to church. If you would go, you'd be a little better man, and go to bear Dr. Mandy preach, say once a year. Then you'd talk theastically, "you would learn that it isn't good works that are the necessary thing."

"I hope, Aunt Dogon," repeated Lawrence, laughing—"I really hope that it's good words, then, for your sake. But, anyway, you ought to be satisfied with believing that it isn't good works, and showing that you believe it. If charity be a sin, Miss Amy Waring and Miss Hope Wayne are dreadful sinners. But then, Aunt Dogon, what a saint you must be!"

Mrs. Dogon sniffed and was silent, and Lawrence Newt left her.

He stopped at Hope Wayne's, and sat with her for a long time in her library, or, as she called it, her office.

"I am the man of the house," she said, "and my place of business is an office."

In the office they sat there for a long time. Mrs. Simcoe sat in the parlor opposite, with the door open. She held in her hand a golden locket with the glossy curl which she had shown to Lawrence Newt at Pinewood, and her body slowly swayed over it, while she held it to and fro in the old library. The severity of her face was permanently softened, and the pencil at the miniature her expression was rather of tender melancholy, and even forgiveness, than poignant grief.

Hope had been at a loss to comprehend her aunt's coolness in speaking of Lawrence Newt. Very carefully and remotely Mrs. Simcoe had sometimes spoken of him and his solitary life, and alluded by implication to his age. She mentioned him casually, when fit occasion offered, as a man who would be a good wife, of course, and had no other future than a tranquil age and death. Not too often—never suddenly—never too pointedly, but gradually, covertly, passively, the words were dropped; the process was as invisible and noiseless as the consumption of oxygen in the air by leaves at night. But it was a process of poisoning. It was a process that night, that Hope Wayne sometimes gradually smothered what can only breathe and thrive in the purest air.

Very carefully, very tenderly was it all done; but every hint, every suggestion, every implication of Mrs. Simcoe's had struck upon Hope Wayne's heart like a thunder-peal. Did Mrs. Simcoe not know that the heart is sometimes a whispering gallery, and that every whisper roars?

But Hope from her cradle had seen a cloud of mystery wrapping her aunty, so she smiled involuntarily when she was told it, and looked grave unconsciously when she was alone; for she did not like to have the cloud dip down upon Lawrence Newt. And so it happened that in those chatting, tending, sewing evenings she herself sometimes looked as if there were something imminent on her tongue too; but Mrs. Simcoe did not see it.

She sat now waiting patiently for the door of the library to open. There was a placid air of resolution in her sad and anxious face, as if she were only awaiting the moment when she should disburden her heart of the weight it had so long secretly carried. There was entire silence in the house. The rich curtains, the soft carpet, the sumptuous furniture—every object on which the eye fell seemed made to steal the sting from sound; and the noise of the street—the jarring of carts—the distant shriek of the belated milkman—the long, wavering, melancholy cry of the chimney-sweep—came hushed and indistinct into the parlor where the sad lady of a house sat silently waiting.

At length the door opened and Lawrence Newt came out. He was passing toward the front door, when Mrs. Simcoe rose and went into the hall, and said, "Stop a moment."

He turned, half smiled, but saw her face, and his own settled into its armor.

Mrs. Simcoe beckoned him toward the parlor; and as he went in she stepped to the library door and said—

"Hope, Mr. Newt and I are talking together in the parlor."

Hope bowed and made no reply. Mrs. Simcoe entered the other room and closed the door.

"Mr. Newt," she said, in a low voice, "you can not wonder that I am anxious."

He looked at her and made no reply.

"I am, perhaps, more than you know; not, I am sure, more than you suspect."

Lawrence Newt was a little troubled, but it was only evident in the quiet closing and unclosing of his hand.

They stood for a few moments without speaking. Then she opened the miniature, and when she saw that he observed it she said, very slowly,

"Is it quite fair, Mr. Newt?"

"Mrs. Simcoe," he replied, instantly, "you have a right to concern me since I was a boy. I forgive you. Now tell me what you mean as you mean it."

His firm, low voice reassured her.

"Why do you come here so often?"

"To help Miss Hope."

"Is it necessary that you should come?"

"She wishes it."

"Why?"

He paused a moment. Mrs. Simcoe continued:

"Lawrence Newt, at least let us be candid with each other. By the memory of the dead who loved you—who, we have known, then, should be no cloud between us about Hope Wayne. Are your own words true? Is it true you feel as frankly as you feel it."

There was simple truth in the earnest face before him. The lady who was speaking she raised her hand involuntarily to her breast, and gasped as if for breathing. Her words were calm, but she answered—

"I waited, for I did not know how to answer. Now do I not?"

"And yet you have had some impression—some feeling—some conviction. You know whether it is necessary that you should come—whether she wants you for an hour's chat, as an old friend—or—" She waited a moment, and added—"or as something else."

Lawrence Newt stood before her while he remembered curiously his interview with Aunt Martha, but he could not say to Mrs. Simcoe that which he said to her.

"What can I say?" he asked at length in a troubled voice.

"Lawrence Newt, say if you think she loves you, and tell me," she said, drawing herself erect and back from him, and twilight of the old library at Pinewood, while her face was pensive and upward—"tell me, as you have pledged hereafter; me, to whom her mother gave her when she died, knowing that she herself loved you also."

Her voice died away, overpowered by emotion. She still looked at him, as he stood silent, and suspicion, incredulity, and scorn were mingled in her look, while her uplifted finger still dwelt, as if appealing, to Heaven. Then she asked abruptly and coarsely,

"To which, in the name of God, are you false—the mother or the daughter?"

"Stop!" replied Lawrence Newt, in a tone so imperious that the hand of his companion fell at her side, and the scorn and suspicion faded from her eyes. "Mrs. Simcoe, there are things that even you must not say. You have lived alone with a great sorrow; you are too swift; you are unjust. Even if I had known what you ask about Miss Hope, I am not sure that I should have done differently. Certainly while I did not know—while, at most, I could only suspect, I could do nothing else. I have feared rather than believed — now that, until very lately. Would it have been kind, or wise, or right to have staid away altogether, when, as you know, I constantly meet her at our little Club? Was I to say, 'Miss Hope, I see you love me, but I do not love you?' And what right had I to hint the same thing by my actions, at the cost of utter misapprehension and pain to her? Mrs. Simcoe, I do love Hope Wayne too tenderly, and respect her too truly, not to try to protect her against the sting of her own womanly pride. And so I have not staid away. I have not avoided a woman in whom I must always have so deep, so strange an interest. I have been friend and almost father, and never by a whisper, even, by a look, by a quivering lid, have I implied any thing more."

His voice trembled as he spoke. He had no right to be silent any longer, and as he finished Mrs. Simcoe took his hand.

"Forgive me! I love her so dearly—and I too am a woman."

She sank upon the sofa as she spoke, and covered her face for a little while. The tears stole quietly down her cheeks. Lawrence Newt stood by her easily, for his mind was deeply perplexed. They both remained for some time without speaking, until Mrs. Simcoe asked,

"What can we do?"

Lawrence Newt shook his head mournfully.

"Does she know?" she said, inquiringly. "I mean, do you think she supposes that you know?"

"I am not sure," he answered, "that she knows herself what she feels; and, if possible, she would least know it. If I were sure it would be to make it seem impossible to her to feel so."

He spoke musingly.

"Then," he added, "if it be indeed as you think, and she know all, the whole would pass away from her like a dream."

They were silent again. At length Mrs. Simcoe said:

"I will do it."

"What?" asked Lawrence.

"I will leave her meaning to do for a long, long time," replied the other. "I will tell her the story."

An indefinable expression settled upon Lawrence Newt's face as she spoke.

"Has she never asked?" he inquired.

"Often; but I have always avoided telling. She had better be done. It is the only way. But I hoped it would never be necessary. God bless us all!"

He moved toward the door when he had finished, but not until he had shaken her warmly by the hand.

"You will come as before?" she said.

"Of course, there will not be the slightest change on my part. And, Mrs. Simcoe, remember that next week, certainly, I shall meet Miss Hope at Miss Amy Waring's. Our meeting had better be there; so before then, please—"

He bowed and went out. As he passed the library door he involuntarily looked in. There sat Hope Wayne, reading; but as she heard him she raised the head of golden hair, the dewy cheeks, the thoughtful brow, and as she bowed to him the clear blue eyes smiled the words her tongue uttered—

"Good-by, Mr. Newt, good-by!"

The word followed him out of the door and down the street. The air rang with them every where. The people he passed seemed to look at him as if they were repeating them. Distant echoes caught them up and whispered them. He heard no noise of carriages, no hum of business; he only heard, fainter and fainter, softer and softer, sadder and sadder, and ever following on, "Good-by, Mr. Newt, good-by!"

UNDER THE PORTRAIT.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

SUPERSTITION.

AFTER Gerald Bennet and his wife had strolled away from the house in the moonlight, Edward Wynne and Ellen came in from their walk. The latter was looking very low, and her cheeks were blooming in the glass on the table. They seated themselves together and continued a conversation commenced outside.

"So you never knew her?" asked Ellen.

"Never."

"Poor Edward!" she said, kindly, and somehow her hand slid into his, and she laid her head on his shoulder under the heavy mass of black hair.

"I wish nobody tell you any thing about her?" she asked.

"Nobody. Nobody knew any thing, except perhaps Lawrence Newt, and, somehow, I could never ask him," answered Edward. "Let me turn up the lamp, I can't see my pictures," he added, rising, and going to the table.

They called it over because because they had remarked that they always sat beneath it, as on the evening when Mr. and Mrs. Bennet had remarked them.

"Yes, our picture," he said, as he returned and seated himself, and looked at the handsome face in the portrait, "for it was under that that we—"

There was a sudden stopping of six mouth by the parting over of the plumpest little hand, and a blushing of cheeks, and a smiling of eyes, and a meeting of the black curls and the fair hair.

"Are you not afraid to marry a man who never had a father or mother?" he asked.

"It isn't either of them that I marry," replied Ellen, smiling, and looking at the picture.

He was gazing thoughtfully at the portrait, the passionate, flashing face with the dark hair. But as if suddenly struck by pain, the thoughtfulness passed out of it, and his eyes too flashed, and he said to Ellen,

"I wonder why it is that I have an association o such pain with our picture—pain mingled with the pleasure? I don't see that there is the slightest reason for it, but every time I look at it I am reminded of something that took place long ago at school in Dalsfield. In fact, it was just after Gerbal came. It is very strange, shall begin to be superstitious."

The youth with the swarthy skin and the great unchanged black eyes looked as if he might easily be so.

"Why, what is it, Edward?" asked Ellen.

"It was a storm, one evening, when a man was drowned. I merely remember that it was twilight, and that there was a boat with a bale of the rope of the boat track and pulled it down to the shore—and that the man was found. Jim Greenwich found him, and he was brought to the house under a cloak. I did not see him, none of us could have seen him, but we saw the form of the dead man under the cloak."

His cheek turned pale as he spoke, and his eye was restless. Ellen, who was growing at him, suddenly looked more uneasily, took both of his hands in hers, and with a look of fresh fear, as she sat, gazed alternately at him and at the portrait—felt herself, also, turn pale, and said:

"Edward, I am superstitious too. I am sure there is our picture is some mysterious way."

Returning once hand, she playfully pushed the heavy curls behind his ears with the other, and started at the result.

"Edward!" she cried, in a frightened tone.

"Why, Nelly, what is it?" he asked, calmly, for her protector instantly had entirely pacified his, and made him very curious.

She made no reply, but covered her face with her hands. Then, as a gust of fresh breeze, she looked at him once more, and saying,

"Oh, Edward!" she burst into tears.

Edward Wynne was alarmed. He put his arm around her, and drew her head back to his shoulder.

"Darling, what is it? what is the matter?"

As soon as she felt herself tranquil, she said to him:

"You know that is the portrait of my mother's sister."

"Yes."

"And nothing more?"

"No, certainly not."

"Mother has never said any thing, nor Gabriel?"

"No, Nelly, I have been so busy finding out about the niece that I had not yet arrived at the aunt, and I know nothing about her or her portrait," replied Edward, cheerfully.

Ellen did not immediately say any thing. At length she began:

"It's a sad story, and I don't know much about it. I merely know that she died a great many years ago, and that there was something very unhappy in her history. But—just as I saw that you looked just like her portrait, and is frightens me."

"My darling, she has black hair and so have I—that is all you see."

"No, no," Ellen was a sort of expression. Likeness of feature is nothing. Likeness is in souls, not in features. Besides you and this you had some superstition about it, because you always thought of certain things when you looked at it. There! don't! that's what I mean! You are looking now just as the face in the portrait looks."

Edward Wynne smiled.

"My superstitions are very harmless affairs, Ellen. I have had others in my life."

"Have you? about what?"

"It is about whom, not what, that I am thinking."

"Well, about whom?" asked Ellen, eagerly. "Let me see. Do you know Mr. Abel Newt?"

"Yes."

"Twas about him!

"What was it?"

"Oh! it goes back to school again. I used to watch him and hear him talk, and I thought he was a bad fellow."

Ellen laughed at Edward's simplicity.

"I don't think that shows wonderful superstition," she said. "I've often thought so without having been at school with him."

"Oh yes, but I don't mean that. I mean that somehow his badness was mixed up with me, or would be."

Ellen looked from Ellen's eyes.

"Don't say so, Edward," she said, half audibly. "After all, superstitions are very foolish things. Don't you think so?"

"Amen!" said Edward. "So please not to think that I look like your aunt's portrait."

"Yes—but, Edward, you do."

"Superstition is very foolish thing."

"Yes, but this isn't superstition."

"Well, but that isn't superstition."

Edward, you are a little cross to-night."

"Ellen, you are a good deal unjust to-night. You ought to know a little afraid of me, because I look like your aunt's portrait."

Edward, you are not kind."

"Ellen, you are unreasonable."

There was a moment of painful silence. The next instant Edward was on his shoulder, and his eyes were singularly lumid. Then they both laughed out.

"What children we are!" he said.

"Geese!" said she.

The door opened, and Mr. and Mrs. Bennet came in.

"We're waiting for you, mamma," said Ellen, slipping a little away from him.

"Oh! you're waiting, are you?" replied Mrs. Bennet, as she took off her shawl, and with the dear old smile upon her face that Ellen remembered so long as she remembered her mother; and she thought she think how pleased she should remember it long and long after she saw it no more.

"Waiting as very tedious business, Edward," said Mr. Bennet to the young man, as he seated himself beside him. "I hope you have not numerous light in his eyes.

"Ellen is a darling, Sir," answered the young man, with mock gravity.

Mr. and Mrs. Bennet's eyes met. They were thinking of the home they had just left; of the son and daughter they had seen there. Do not if to suppose one to his daughter, by saying something else to her daughter, Mrs. Bennet said to Ellen.

"My dear, we are ready to-night."

"To think of her being Abel's sister!" replied Ellen.

"Yes, but, my dear, one perfect rose in a garden is a great deal."

"How could it is to transplant it, Master Gabriel" cried Edward Wynne to Gabriel, who had opened the door the moment before, and heard what his father had said.

"Pity begins at home, Sir, with charity," replied Gabriel, with Mrs. Rose. "he said, bowing to Ellen, "please don't budge—don't examine a curiosity—stay."

"Gabriel, dear, your father said one perfect rose. Some gardens that I know have two," said Ellen, archly.

The happy tears were in her eyes. Gabriel solemnly arose, and stepping up into his chair, took a position on the mantel-piece.

Then he went up to her and kissed her on the forehead.

"Will you tell me, my mother," said he, "why all mammas try to spoil their sons? Nothing but the fact that I am a model gentleman has preserved me, I am sure. And I don't believe," he added, half smiling, "that my future brothers-in-law, Abel Newt, thinks that I am not spoiled."

He looked serious again; and when Ellen asked her mother where she had been she was obliged to tell her of the evening.

"How frightened I was!" said Edward, smiling.

"You were a little boy."

"Yes, but you were not a very large one."

One question and reminiscence led to another, until, at length, Edward and Gabriel drew off together, and sat earnestly conversing under the portrait. Gabriel was telling him what he had heard of Abel's political intentions.

The parents and daughter sat chatting upon the sofa, but their eyes were upon the two young men. As Gabriel's recital proceeded the face of Lilla Rose became pale, and always called him, slid through the whole gamut of expression. He was amused, surprised, interested, and indignant by turns.

Suddenly Ellen seized each parent by a hand, as they sat, and looked at them wonderingly and almost imperceptibly toward her brother and Ellen. The eyes of the father and mother obeyed, and could not help seeing the strange and startling likeness of Edward, whose hair was still partially peaked behind his ears, to the face of the portrait over him.

"Do you see it?" she breathed, almost inaudibly.

They shook their heads assuringly.

"What does it mean? Why does he look like her?"

They did not reply. They did not know themselves.

"A coincidence, dear," said Mrs. Bennet.

"We've no right to say so until we know," whispered Ellen.

"But, my dear, likenesses are showing themselves all the time," murmured her mother.

"But when they are real likenesses they mean something. I don't mean resemblance of color or curves; I mean a likeness of soul," returned Ellen, full of energy, and resolved to know.

It was very curious to watch the living head of the young man and the painted one of the young woman. They could not remove their eyes. Ellen was more and more excited.

"Mother."

"Yes, Ellen."

"You know Edward knows nothing of his father or mother."

Mrs. Bennet turned pale. Ellen did not see it, because she was looking at her lover. Mrs. Bennet turned pale because she was so sudden. It struck her very strongly that she knew and had never put together.

Her husband heard, too, with dreamy eyes.

"Why not?" he said, slowly and quietly, in a low whisper.

Ellen sat upright, white and cold; for her father implied in two words all that lay inside, but a fully developed mystery in a sense. She put her mouth close to her mother's ear.

"Why not?" she whispered, as if the words came involuntarily and would not be denounced.

"Hush then!" asked Edward, in so loud a voice that Ellen started from the sofa. He was so deeply interested in what he was hearing that his sister's request to keep silent out of the level low tone in which they were talking.

Mr. Bennet looked and saw his daughter's hand as she sank back to her seat.

"Ellen, the question is answered—What's that?"

LITERARY

RAVE FELTON; or, A Page at Realities, by Mrs. Weston, is an interesting story just published by Derby & Jackson, the son of the late Rev. Dr. L. F. Weston. Mrs. Weston is an agreeable writer for story, the incidents of which are real, is calculated to become popular. The author is a Christian woman, who enjoys the esteem of such men as Rev. Drs. Cheever, Adams, Joel Parker, and others.

Two handsome steel engravings of Washington and Everett, with a view of Mount Vernon, have been published by O. H. Bailey & Co., of 62 Broadway. "Washington in Domestic Life" is a popular study. Both engravings are handsome works of art.

Our venerable friend, Dr. Francis, has published, in pamphlet form, an admirable and appreciative sketch of Samuel L. Mitchill, the distinguished physician, and perhaps we may say philosopher. No one knew him better. No one could have done the work as gracefully or completely. Dr. Francis occasionally contributes a paper of this kind to our historical and biographical literature, and we trust he may live long to be, as he now is, a constant referee on historical and learned points, both in his own profession and in reference to the worthies of New York in past time.

The publishing season is evidently prosperous. We can hardly attempt to keep before our readers a very minute view of the literature of the day, as the Fall advances, our table is loaded down with new books and the summer accumulation.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

STATE ELECTIONS.

State elections have taken place on Tuesday in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Louisiana. From the returns, it is evident enough though it is probable that the Republican candidates have been elected in all the States except New Jersey, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and Illinois the Republicans have been carried. It is not too soon to speak positively with regard to Louisiana.

THE STATE ELECTION IN DOUBT.

We read in the Albany Evening Journal of October 31:

"There is more uncertainty about the election of that part of the Democratic State ticket nominated by the American than the first reports led us to suppose. There are a few counties in which the votes of dozen or half a dozen votes will decide the election. In the city Democratic papers adopted an ingenious device to secure the election of their ticket. They issued small tickets containing the names of Democratic candidates and Lecompton. We do not, of course, place implicit reliance on these estimates, and they are liable to be greatly changed by the actual returns, but they would seem to indicate that we must await official returns for its determination.

	Joun. Rep.	Lecompton Dem.
Majorities thus far.....	1,000	275
Republican majority.....		725

The same correspondent says, in its vote for Governor gave the following majorities;

Morgan, Rep.,	19,021
Morgan, Repub.,	67,374
Republican majority.....	48,353

For course, we find in the Albany Evening Journal of the same day: "The vote, as indicated by the returns received up to this hour, is very close, and we cannot conclude to speak with any degree of certainty, of the result. The vote of the city is very close, and the majority for Lecompton will be very ordinary, based upon the figures from a few towns. We have no doubt, however, that Republican gains will be made, but for any reasonable supposition, he brought by the official returns, will be sufficient to liberal majority over all the democratic reports. And yet Mr. Lovejoy-with is 1,000 ahead of Mr. Jones. We do not know how these figures can be reduced, while we hope in several counties to improve them.

We confine our figures to Secretary of State, not only because Mr. Jones was on the Union ticket, but because we believe to run ahead of all his political associates. If Mr. Lovejoy is elected, the Republican ticket is elected. If Mr. Lovejoy-with is elected, it is not deemed possible that any of the Republican candidates can be defeated.

"We still hope for the election of our entire State ticket; but it would be quite preposterous to set up any such claim as that the election of the entire Republican ticket is certain. The returns which will make result on a portion of the ticket."

THE TRIAL OF THE HARPER'S FERRY OUTLAWS.

The trial of the Harper's Ferry conspirators is proceeding, up to the time of our writing. On Saturday, the colored prisoner, William Copeland, was found guilty of the three counts of the indictment, upon which Brown was convicted: but a bill of exceptions was submitted, on the ground that a negro, not being under the Dred Scott decision a citizen of the United States, must be incapable of treason. The case was argued by the prosecution, and was submitted to the Grand Jury of Jefferson for the absence of that body, Andrew Stevens was brought to the bar, when Mr. Botts, the counsel assigning attorney, announced that after conference with Governor Wise, he had concluded to withdraw the plea of not guilty entered there, in order that his trial might elicit evidence, now in the hands of the prosecution, as to the guilt of the abolitionists of the North." A conversation between the several counsel ensued, at the close of which Mr. Botts consented to use the prisoner Hayslett for this purpose; a. The prisoner was accordingly sworn, and testified in the case of Stevens, before the Judge's tribunal. The case of Cooke, against whom a true bill was found by the Grand Jury, was then called, and the prisoner arraigned. During the counsel for the State produced in evidence a full copy of the Virginia Code of 1849, which was received, and the trial proceeded.

COOKE AND OTHERS CONVICTED.

The trial of John E. Cooke, the lieutenant of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry fame, was commenced on Tuesday, in the Court House at Charlestown, Va.

Throughout the proceedings, Cooke displayed the coolest and most unconcerned bearing, and in the closing stages to insurrection, and murder, and treason, he was perfectly composed. The charge to the jury by the prisoner, to which Dr. Howe, of Boston, and Frederick Douglass stood as witnesses, was very full and clear, and bound a repetition of the testimony given in the preceding cases. The jury left the Court at 10 o'clock on Wednesday. Notwithstanding the utmost efforts of his counsel, the prisoner was found guilty on the three counts of exciting insurrection, and the Court overruled the motion for a new trial. A jury was then sworn, and the Court sentenced him, with Green, Coppic, and Copeland, to be hung on the 2d December next. The prisoner received the sentence to-day from all he executed, but appeared much depressed.

WHEN THE EXECUTIONS WILL TAKE PLACE.

The latest dispatch from Charlestown, dated November 11, says: "Before the prisoners were brought in for sentence the negroes, Copeland and Green, declined to say anything. Cooke, in a speech of considerable length, pleading that they had any knowledge of Brown's intention to invade Virginia. They were told by the Court when they were called upon to take the oath of obedience to the Constitution of the United States, that they could not do it, and did not think they should be long. Hartfelt will not be executed on the 2d, as he has been sick, but probably on the second day after Legislature.

WHAT THE EXECUTIONS WILL TAKE PLACE.

The latest dispatch from Charlestown, dated November 11, says: "Before the prisoners were brought in for sentence the negroes, Copeland and Green, declined to say anything. Cooke, in a speech of considerable length, pleading that they had any knowledge of Brown's intention to invade Virginia. They were told by the Court when they were called upon to take the oath of obedience to the Constitution of the United States, that they could not do it, and did not think they should be long. Hartfelt will not be executed on the 2d, as he has been sick, but probably on the second day after Legislature.

A YANKEE AT CHARLESTOWN.

The Boston Journal says: "Many circumstances attending the espionage upon strangers sometimes afford us much amusement. The following is a specimen. Last week a Yankee in the Courthouse yard, between a stranger and one of the Virginia militia, [Governor Wise's body guard] ensued:

"STRANGER (to Virginian). 'What are you staring at?'

"VIRGINIAN. 'I am staring at you. What are you doing in this town?'

"STRANGER. 'What am I doing? I'm minding my business, and that's as much as any one man can do, I reckon.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'I think you're minding mine.'

"STRANGER. 'Minding my business, I tell you.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'I say, you have been to great excitement here.'

"STRANGER. 'I don't know what you are darned if I want to know.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Come, tell me where you were from?'

"STRANGER. 'I'm from Georgia.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'You say so. Are you a native of Georgia?'

"STRANGER. 'No, but my wife is; that's enough for you.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Do you know Governor Wise?'

"STRANGER. 'No, nor I don't want to know him.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Do you know President Buchanan?'

"STRANGER. 'No, nor I don't want to know him.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Do you know Brown?'

"STRANGER. 'No, nor I don't want to know him.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Well, I don't believe you.'

"STRANGER. 'Well, I don't believe you either.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Well, I want to know your business. What is it?'

"STRANGER. 'Do you want to know?'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Yes.'

"STRANGER. 'Because his hand took a capacious packet, and grabbing out a half-pint bottle of medicine. 'Well, this is my business, I'm a get Dr. Swaim's Panacea, a medicine, which cures cramp, scalds, bruises, rheumatism, sunstroke, affections of the throat, and all other complaints too numerous to let up, I reckon.'

"VIRGINIAN. 'Well, I guess you had better look to your business, and not be staring at me.' Whereupon the gentlemen launched forth upon its various merits. This however did not last long, and the stranger, on the order of the jail, when he was detained a short time, and then released, with a caution. The next morning the stranger obeyed the injunction."

GERRIT SMITH INSANE.

With regard to the insanity of Gerrit Smith the Utica Herald of the 10th inst. says:

"We read in the Albany Journal to learn that Gerrit Smith, the free-hearted but sadly erratic philanthropist, has been adjudged insane by a jury in the city of Peterboro, in Madison. We have not been surprised to hear of this decision on account of marked insanity. We have seen him recently, and his conduct has been such as to excite great mirth, and that an attendant keeps constant watch over him. We have also been told that he is violent at times himself. This result we hear attributed to the numerous acts of folly which he has done with his property, although many will regard it as the consequence of long-settled and confirmed insanity.

"Mr. Smith is said to have a hereditary predisposition to insanity. His father died in a fit of insanity, and the possessor of an immense estate and surrounded by every luxury imaginable, committed suicide by means of pyrotechnical despondency, during which he was under the influence of a powerful dose of laudanum.

"Gerrit Smith is said, so far as we have heard, to have his legacies and money affairs. It is also said that the bulk of his property will go to his cousin. Should he survive him an inmate of a lunatic asylum, though, when he died, he was not officially regarded as in possession of his reason. Gerrit Smith has lost all his children, except one, the wife of Colonel Miller, of Peterboro, a nephew of Mrs. Smith, Colonel Fitzhugh, was the captain of the fugitive slave, a fact which has made him the enemy of Mr. Smith. John Cochrane, a democratic politician of this city, is a cousin of Gerrit Smith, and has also by his speeches, pamped himself of any complicity with the doings of Mr. Smith.

"Gerrit Smith has been for years the victim of monomania. He has given away his property to such an extent in his writings to the Harper's Ferry matter, and expenses himself accordingly.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

A dispatch to the Herald, dated Utica, November 11, says:

"Hon. Gerrit Smith, ex-member of Congress, has been confined in the Lunatic Asylum here since Monday last. His mind is evidently disordered, but his recollection is not completely lost on less been represented, and his physicians hope that the repose and care to which he is subjected, and the absence of excitement, will restore him to health.

"It was only by strategem that the friends succeeded in getting him here. He has been, ever since the arrest of Preon and his Harper's Ferry followers, bursted with the idea that he was entirely responsible for all the lives that were lost, and that he was the cause of the widow's tears that reflected and the fear of being called on to answer at the bar of justice preyed upon him, that his mind never emerged from a tendency to be unhinged, gave way, and reason deserted its throne.

"For some days before the absolute necessity of restrictive measures became apparent to his friends and relatives, his manner evinced nervous anxiety to anticipate the requisitions which he expected would be made upon him, and he proceeded to Virginia and placed himself into the hands of the authorities. When it was received by him that nothing was required of him, that he was taken advantage of. His friends pretended to obtain in his wife's name, that when he sent for her he was to be under the impression that he was on his way to Richmond to see her.

"I am sustained in this through he representations I have outlined. John Brown is Kansas, he is no way implicated in the secret movements of that sort of unfortunate individual. His position as tenant of the asylum here is, therefore, explained by the fact that the excitement and misery of mind he is known to have possessed, and which has given way, proceeded from the said by the Governor against on the sad events which have followed the mad course of his unhappy son.

"That Gerrit Smith's case is one of decided leniency is certain. But this has been considered by his friends as a GENERAL SCOTT IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The Herald correspondent in San Francisco, writes, on October 20 : "The past week has been epidemical in California, in the several departments of Government. General Scott for Puget Sound. The session demonstrated further the strength and the old chuckles has on the affections of the people, who did him honor, in a spontaneous manner, as no man has been honored before in this State. General Scott arrived on the 13th instant, and left in the steamer Columbia for Puget Sound on the day following. He will be absent about five weeks. The fullest confidence is manifested that he will make such arrangements concerning the British claims on San Juan as will conduce to the honor of the nation.

AFFAIRS AT SAN JUAN.

"Our last advices from San Juan state that great excitement had been given on the island in consequence of a report having been started that the British authorities had approved General Harney's conduct. Affairs remained unchanged. The American commander was in possession, though actively engaged in strengthening all the points of interest. Every thing was going on as usual in commanding positions, and the garrison enjoyed excellent health. The feeling in California here at Washington is strongly in favor of sustaining Harney; and if, as it is said, he has acted in the premises, there will be great disappointment felt. Governor Douglass has commanded universal respect. The Americans there have executed from him. He was, at last accounts, on a visit to Victoria. He is a man of great ability, and one whom the people here would like to see President. Every thing was going on smoothly in affairs on Juan, and rejoiced that the British had left the barren rocks which can be exercise authority—a feeling which is universally participated in by all the American residents. The matter will probably be in Victoria by the time General Scott reaches San Juan, and he there might be expected that a peaceable arrangement with the dogged and incompetent Governor, were not General Admiral Harney's love of discretion and experience, will also be on the spot. The official position of Admiral in the navy service has been happily in possession in Puget Sound. A report generally prevailed in San Francisco that the Russian fleet the British Boundary Commissioner's first report declared San Juan to belong to England. The report that this document was sent by Douglass to the Secretary of State, and that it was signed by the Commissioner went to work again, and declared the island for England."

AN ELEPHANT AT LARGE.

We read in the Tribune: "An exciting scene was witnessed in Williamsburg about ten o'clock on Friday morning. Van Amburgh's Menagerie, stationed on South Fifth Street, between Fifth and Seventh streets, was the locale of the occurrence. While a lad was unloading carfood from a wagon with a pitchfork, one of the elephants, the elephant, broke out into one of his periodical fits of fury, and, turning toward the keeper, made a rush at him with his trunk. Missing the animal, the blow fell upon the back of the lad, who received a severe contusion, fore, or he must have killed instantly. The elephant, after his first fit was passed and the frightened animal, after a severe lug from the keeper's trunk, desisted from his fury, the vehicle against the centre-pole, disengaging himself at the same time, and, with the pole hanging to his trunk, but deliberately saw the waggon to pieces, dinging the wreck about him in the air. The ropes attached to the wheels next engaged his attention; and from the reckless way in which he turned and wrenched them, the Italians of the bears, kyenas, wolves, zebras, and other wild animals, it was probable that his whole menagerie would soon be let loose in the streets.

HOW HE GOT OUT.

"The circumstances of the affair appear to be as follows: The animal is accustomed to the menagerie, and comfortably, during cold weather, in the basement, and is quite mild most times; but when he is in his fits of fury he is dangerous in his way. The immediate cause of his outbreak on Friday was appears to have been a difficulty which he took to the horse, and it was against that animal that his first attack was directed. To the advantage of the absence of his keeper, he rushed at it, and accidentally struck it with his trunk. The blow severed suddenly, and the blow, although with greatly diminished force, struck the lad on the back, injuring him severely. The horse, in its fright, darted off, and, striking the wagon against the corner of one of the tent, broke the harness, and escaped to the street. Becoming more and more excited, the elephant, after he had turned the entire cage upside down, and torn beneath up with his trunk, and thrown it to from beneath the canvas of the tent, would no spoil it. Finding that the keeper of the menagerie had made good his escape, except the keeper of the animal, he, in his fury, made for him. The keeper evidently the hyena in one compartment and seeing a wolves in another, and, with the point of attack. This he tore to pieces, and scattered them about the premises, letting out the wolves and hyenas, who ran away with the utmost terror.

HOOK AND LADDER COMPANY CALLED OUT.

"The menagerie was then surrounded by a crowd, spotting them in turn, and smashing them in pieces. The keeper and his assistants were also present, and attempted to put to practice his usual device to gain the ascendency over the animal, but found him too much utterly unavailing. In consequence of the excitement, the fire-bell was rung, and Hook and Ladder, and dragging after him the chain with which he was usually confined. The crowd followed him down the street into an open space, but for distant from the menagerie, and there, with the aid of one or two others, succeeded in getting him into an excavation made for a cellar. He refused to chain back his journeys, however, and was again followed into a store and yard, where he was at last secured and impeded in his progress. He was kept here until the long pikes and halberds of Young America arrived, and the company were brought upon the ground, and manned by the terrified keeper, he used as a weapon of the crowd insurrection. Thus attacked from all sides, he was soon overpowered, and the ropes and chains that he had on were secured, and easily transported.

His ears, trunk, sides, back, and inside were studded with pikes, and grappled and held with hooks. His attention was then diverted until his keeper could venture up behind him and throw a rope about his legs.

"This was done with such celerity that the rope was passed round and rested again, and, secured before the beast became aware of what was being done, he was captured.

HANSIBAL FINDS A PRISAL.

"The ground had by this time been cleared in thousands, and had not Hannibal effected an escape from the hooks and pikes, it is probable that a large number of the spectators would have lost their lives. They were urged by the showmen to keep out of the way, but all that was said or done could scarcely induce them to do otherwise than push forward to see what was going on.

"The animal was not totally conquered after all. A fierce fight took and two feet square having been chained to the ground, Hannibal, with his trunk, took pody embraced an unexpected opportunity to outwit the ear. He put the specimen to flight, and chased them about the showyard, dragging the chain and fastening alone after him as if it were a stick. The crowd scattered precipitately, but the elephant soon turned round again triumphal, and the elephant was this time secured without much trouble. He was then provided with a heavy chain, and he was translated over and secured, and about four inches of the chain remaining, owing to the death of three and four inches at every blow. The elephant was then led back to his cage, and, after having fed, was, during the time, he replace his blood-letting he showed no disposition to be further troublesome. He is a very large specimen of his race, and will always be the centre of wild animals by the term of 'dogging.' When this animal manifests himself in his fits of fury, he is a most violent safe to release a ferocious beast.

"The elephant was purchased, it is supposed here, in the show-ground, where he was recently fattened by means of large

HIS HISTORY.

"This elephant was brought to America in the year 1841 by Mr. Van Amburgh, and is one of the largest in the species. He is eight to nine feet high, is reckoned to be one-third larger than any other elephant ever brought to this country. His weight is estimated at 7 is considerably larger than the majority of elephants of his size. He is now about ten years of age. When Hannibal was imported, in 1841, it was thought that he would not live more than a few years, and since then the showmen have contributed that he is still young—the average age of the elephant being from 30 to 40 years.

"This animal's reputation was formerly almost unparalleled for viciousness, but during the last five years he has been comparatively tame, and has been used to perform in the ring. He is the only elephant in this country that has had killed, on different occasions, as many as seven persons. This fact, however, is not to be wondered at, for his outbreak previous to the present one, was in 1850, when he was running loose in the streets of Boston, and, with a pretty general demolition of the Company's cages and other paraphernalia, succeeded in killing seven of the menagerie before he was captured.

"The menagerie belongs to Van Amburgh & Co. by the sargent and eager reputed yesterday, amounts to a considerable sum. The wild animals are insured in the safest and secured without difficulty."

AN ARMED AMERICAN STEAMER.

The new ocean steamship, which it is proposed to build for the Government to be rendered subsidized, is to be of the following dimensions :

Length (three-quarters of a mile).... 4000 feet
Breadth..... 400 "
Depth..... 64 "

She is to be constructed alike, in the form of a wedge. The wedge form is 1250 feet long; leaving the remainder 2750 feet long. The wedge is 400 feet wide at first and attached 200 feet long to each of the ends. The wedge is 64 feet deep, and the remainder of the ship is 32 feet deep. The wedge is constructed of iron, and its has a vacuum equal to a room 25 feet wide, 10 feet deep, and 1250 feet long. The remainder of the ship is under one is 14 inch to thickness, the latter one but 1 inch thick. The wedge is to be made to sink from the bottom to the top of the vessel. The spars between the wedge and the ship are to be made of hollow cylinders three feet square, so if the outside will be broken, there are but little chance of sinking. The wedge is to be in air-tight sections, and if breach in two no lives will be endangered. There are to be twelve of these sections 200 feet apart. The first, 12 feet from the ends, is constructed of iron, and the rest of wood. To learn the wooden way, will suggest a weight of 2250 tons.

THE ARMAMENT.

The venerable Dr. Lyman Beecher has reached his 84th year. This is in good health. The Independent says: "During the past summer he has visited six of the principal cities of the Northern and Western States. While in Hartford he attended the wedding of one of his grand-daughters, and had his return trip visited Guilford, Connecticut, to review the scenes of his early life, and where he resided for 40 years. The gathering of seven children was living. His health is generally good, and he is able to preach, and does preach every Plymouth Church, in which he often hears a part. He is cheerful, social, and full of his old humor, and is kind and classmate, the venerable S. T. Staples, Esq., of New York."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

WRECK OF THE "ROYAL CHARTER."

THE loss of the Royal Charter, near Bangor, has been the most disastrous of all the recent shipwrecks. The number and damage of rattlesnake details have not yet been published.

The Liverpool Mercury of October 21 says: "We have to state that the vessel struck at 7 P.M., the strain being so great that the engine fell in the hold. The vessel was in fact, but soon immersed of a dreadful death was apparent. The vessel was in fact, but soon immersed of a dreadful death was apparent. The vessel was in fact, but soon immersed of a heavier, by which several lives were saved, and more would have been but for the violence of the storm. In the dreadful crash, the funnel and machinery giving way, the vessel immediately rose over the reef, leaving the lifeboats or pointed to the waves. Four hundred and fifty souls were thrown into the sea, and the greater part of all the women perished. There was no pilot on board, but the captain was well acquainted with the coast, and had taken every precaution. The Royal Charter was a fine vessel. A detachment of marines has been sent from Liverpool to Carnarvon, to aid the Customs against the local authorities.

Passengers generally no longer state that the country people had commenced to plunder the wreck.

The Royal Charter was built at Sunderland, and launched in August, 1853. She cost about £70,000, and was insured for £40,000. Her cargo was insured for £70,000. The ship was insured to the amount of £40,000. Insurances on the cargo have not transpired.

FRANCE.

NO TROUBLE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The Herald correspondent says: "I have just learned from the highest authority that the visit of the Emperor to the Tuileries is to a fair way of being settled. I felt sure such would be the case, and I am glad to see by the last proceeding of a Paris paper, published in Paris, and conducted by the Government, will cause the re-establishment of the Minister of War started for London to arrange the matter. The Emperor has been accompanied on his trip by the China expedition. A confidential agent also left Paris for London from the Minister of War at Metz, to confer with the English Admiralty relative to the same affairs.

THE WAR BETWEEN THE EMPEROR AND THE CHURCH.

He also writes: "A great outcry is now being made here by the Church of a book lately published in Paris, and issued by no mean persons the organ of Catholicism in France, because the government has forbidden the booksellers to publish any more of the form and not very reasonable complaint, considering that the publication against those in any way inclined to attack the Pope's temporal power. The Emperor has given his word of honor to pursue his present course of policy, and to put down all opposition that the clergy may offer to the reforms at much needed in Italy. He feels strong in the justice of his cause, and relies upon the sympathy of Europe. The days of anathemas and excommunications are gone by, and a Catholic Prince may act for the good of his subjects without asking the permission of the Pope. The Emperor Napoleon has done well in refusing to allow the Papal Nuncio to read the Bull of excommunication. It is a document which has the semblance of their office, not amenable to the laws of the press. By stopping the publication of these documents he renders it necessary that the bishops should speak them from the pulpit. Now, every one of these is liable to prosecution, and has entailed on these furious entries to the walls of a church, and the people will be ready to take the side of the majority of the people resolving against them. The Emperor is fully aware of the danger of a conflict with the Church, with the clergy; but, at the same time, he is by far too strong for them, and will not allow them to be allowed defending himself.

THE MIRABELLE DEATH OF JEROME.

"A near relative of the Emperor is quite ill, so much so as to be given up by the doctors. This is Jerome, the old man. Should he pass away, there will be no Court mourning, as the Emperor is not fond of Court mourning. None of our high functionaries would upon their salaries be able to afford it. Besides, there is a feeling of appreciation in overlooking the class of people I first refer to, and the Emperor is in the habit when they need not for the speedy recovery of Prince Jerome."

SWITZERLAND.

THE PEACE AND THE CONGRESS.

At latest dates, the Zurich Conference had again assembled. General Kaufmann, representing the Emperor of Count Colombini, deceased, and all the treaties were signed on the 10th of October.

It is evident that Napoleon only wants to fulfill his promises to the letter.

It was asserted that the European Congress would take place, with the selection of Zurich.

ITALY.

NAPOLEON WANTS THE DUKES RESTORED.

Napoleon has sent a letter to the King of Sardinia, urging him to carry out the Villafranca agreement. In this letter he says that the Austrian troops will be ordered to be recalled to Modena, that Parma be united to Piedmont, that the Pope be restored to the possession of his territory, be restored to the reign of the Grand Duke, and that the Duke of Modena be restored to his duchy by moderate reforms, be carried out.

Garibaldi has gone to Genoa to see for an interview with the King of Sardinia. He was enthusiastically received by the people.

PROPAGLE RISING IN NAPLES.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald, of October 17, says the news is vital enough, for, according to all human probability, a revolution will break out in Naples before long.

The King has addressed a proclamation to the Neapolitans. The following are extracts :

"NEAPOLITANS :

"I DECREE:—We have consulted the Austrians, we have been deceived and betrayed by them. We will not have beaten them. We have fought as Italians fight when they are brave. We have not been beaten, but the victory was heard in every district except yours, and we know your hearts are with us. Your King is not a coward. Yes, Providence has decreed the union and alliance of Italy, and I will not be the man to oppose the wishes of the people's inter le will. In vain they sent to me discord and civil war. I will not be the strangers in vain. Our country is free from the Alps to the sea, and I will not be the man to oppose the wishes of the people's interests. Yes, I will not be the man to oppose the wishes of the people's interests. Yes, I will not be the man to oppose the wishes of the people's interests. Yes,

RECEIVING THE RETURNS AT TAMMANY

TAMMANY HALL ON ELECTION NIGHT.

Every one has heard of old Tammany, but very few have ever seen the venerable institution. We therefore present our readers with the above engraving, which, as its title indicates, introduces the reader to that famous place on Election night, just as the returns for the various city wards are coming in. Marshal Rynders and other lights of the Democracy are announcing the majorities in a stentorian voice, and groans and hisses or cheers and shouts evince the feeling of the multitude at each announcement. Our artist says:

"Not even the ditch of the Malakoff or the blood-stained fosse of the memorable Redan can contrast with Tammany Hall for condensed activity (a bull) and mad abandon.

"Standing on the seat at the rear of the hall during the announcements, etc., 'tis a perfect pandemonium of action—of vivid expression—of untamable excitement. A kind of regulated madness! So regulated that the rampant politician exhibits his shrewd triumph as he stampingly calculates the odds. The old Tammany man, even at that instant, can tell to an admiring few some reminiscence of former triumph or some crafty movement of the present. One man in the centre of the inner room who had won a wager on the allegiance of the announced district, was particularly emphatic. He wore a shiny hat (and indeed all the shrewd men were shiny hats), and he menaced, good-humoredly, some of the [illegible] ballot and a coun[illegible]

"The platform of the orators [illegible] singleness of purpose. The [illegible] rival Napoleon [illegible]

ON ELECTION NIGHT, NOVEMBER 8, 1859.

who stood beneath their forces, and simplicity of behavior, was truly impulsiveness of edifying."

s a treat for Gari- The Herald reporter thus portrays the scene depicted by our artist:

ous study. Any one "The Chairman read the returns as they were brought standing here, for in from time to time, and the announcements of the Demss of mind, might ocratic majorities were received with tremendous cheer- Their devotion to ing. During the intervals Captain Rynders, who appeared to be in all his glory, kept the audience in good-humor by his off-hand remarks and keen repartees.

"At length Jim Nesbitt was called upon for a song, and, mounting the rostrum, commenced to sing 'Paddy on the Railroad.' Some of the crowd did not seem to relish the song, and shouted, 'Dry up, Jim!' etc.; but Jim was not to be dried up, and feeling especially aggrieved at one individual's remarks, incontinently shied a water-pitcher at his head, following up the assault by jumping down and striking out right and left. 'Hit him!' cried the boys, and right and left through the crowd the combatants swayed, amidst the most confounding din. Nesbitt finally returned to the stand with a black eye; and half a dozen of his friends, jumping down into the crowd, after a brief combat, drove the offensive individual and his backers out of the hall.

"The reading of the returns was then resumed, with occasional episodes of hard talk, 'rushes,' and fights. 'Who'll be next Mayor, Rynders?' cried one. 'Nuddy Wood will, you fool,' answered a man at his elbow. No sooner were these words uttered than somebody's fist came in contact with the Wood man's nose, starting a crimson torrent; and before he had time to catch breath the unlucky wight was hustled down the stairs. Captain Rynders remarked that he could tell better who was Mayor after the election, at which the crowd laughed and cheered lustily."

Brunel, DIED SEPTEMBER, 1859.
Stephenson, DIED OCTOBER, 1859.

A NATION'S FINGER—they rest. To mock
Bronzen like their wills with sculptured tomb were shame!
Where the bridged chasm, or where the pierced road
Attests mind's victory, read each hero-name.

Yet in an epitaph their names shall live.
That Silence, there, may pay one noble due
Where Speech can not. Of what course was give,
No job, O Known and Sure, they grudged to you!

"UP FOR OFFICE."

BY ELLA RODMAN.

ANY woman who is a little self-willed, a little haughty, and a great deal spoiled, and who has been hard in an amiable, fascinating, aggravating creature, always "up for office," will sympathize with my story.

I have a perfect detestation, which is a mixture of contempt and hatred, for every Democrat that was; I have erected an oratory in my soul for the worship of General Washington—not so much, I think, on account of his many virtues as because he was an old Federalist; and as I am the only person in the Union who entertains just the sentiments that I do, they approach the very climax of intensity.

Lastly, Mr. Jones has soaked into the country, actuated to this step by a variety of motives, among which are a hypochondriac wife and the dogma of "raising your own vegetables," "more encouraging field for a rising man," etc., etc., ad infinitum.

Bless his handsome face! How could any one imagine, to see him toiling over the hot fire (a fellow) with that particularly benevolent aspect, as though every dirty little boy that he passed had a note that would be extensive for his benefit, that he was so tormenting? But I shall come to his evil doings, as the Declaration of Independence hath it, "in the course of human events."

When visitors began to flock in, my delight in country life was somewhat checked; they were such an outside-looking set; but on expressing my such sentiments, Mr. Jones entered upon a long and solemn lecture that always ended with the magical word "constituents," and as I was adopted in the most public manner, I felt it my duty to return these visits, I had not the heart to refuse.

One Sunday morning, about the end of church, a woman pushed rudely past me, catching, as she did so, a clumsy country shoe in my bunge dress, and tearing an entire breadth of my best barège, trailing manner. It was "a pattern dress"—one that I had ordered in a moment of mad extravagance —so that it had a value in my eyes, independent of its merits; and my one who knew it his heart would excuse the blow to my feelings upon the wiry, freckled female who had perpetrated the outrage.

Her eye met mine—a light-colored, stony sort of eye—an eye accustomed to fling back defiance, and slight in its way it was, it encountered it; and as she leaned her head with an air that said, as plainly as words could, "I don't care a straw for you, or any one, my dog!" I felt that we were sworn enemies.

Alas! that a lady service had done us both but little good; and my indignant feelings were heightened by seeing Mr. Jones, who had been unconscious of this little pantomime, bow to that horrid woman just as she turned from me as though she had been the President's wife at least.

"Who is that creature?" I inquired, in a peremptory tone, as soon as we emerged into the open air.

"What creature, darling?" queried the individual interrogated, effervescing with good-nature, and a sort of unmeaning smile that seemed to seem to restrain at my anger.

"That vulgar woman," I replied, "to whom you just bowed with such an excess of politeness. She has spoiled my dress, my beautiful 'pattern dress.'"

Mr. Jones was very sorry—so had that I should be pleased—of course he was sorry that I should did not intend it—would send me another as soon as he went to the city—until I could have bored his ears for having so unkindly misunderstanding me so. As to the woman, he did not know who she was—did not know that she had been guilty—maybe so to many people whom he did not know.

Our neighbors were not very close to us, and in one of the nearest houses lived an old man who supplied us with eggs, milk, etc., and was a considerable amusement. This ancient individual, who bore a striking resemblance to some of the "Ishe-Lord" that terrified my childhood, had a habit of resting his chin on our gate, and talking, very, the words seeming to proceed from his very nose's wiber? and on looking up to see whence the sound proceeded, he met with with a comical nod and an intimation that "them 'ere eggs was fresh laid."

I took the eggs, and found them to be all that was represented, being very well satisfied to obtain them with as little trouble as but Mr. Dimas, the proprietor of the chin on the gate, did not intimate that the acquaintance should end here. Evening after evening found him hanging over our front gate talking to Mr. Jones, whom he managed to keep perpetually by the button; and from the pleased expression of that gentleman's face, one would suppose that the conversation was of the highest possible advantage to him.

I rallied him on his new friend, not perhaps without a slightly scornful accent.

"My dear child!"—most benignantly—"remember that I am 'up for office.'"

"Up for office!" I was not very likely to forget that. I saw my dear one marriage he had also been a perfect misopia, only put 'up' to be knocked down; but I could not quite comprehend that one insignificant old man held the reins of office in his hands. What in the world had Mr. Dimas to do with "my husband's" being up for office?

"Considerable, my little Queen of Sheba," with that aggravating smile of superiority. "In politics, you know, there is always a 'wheel within a wheel;' and although Mr. Dimas, by himself, is one of the lowest of the low, he has a great deal of use, and has, like most people, acquaintances whom he can influence in voting."

"A fine state of things!" was my indignant remark, "when a gentleman of your family and standing, whose ancestors have lived in Jones's Hill, can not obtain from his country a petty office without conciliating all the loafers around! If this is a free country, I should like to know why?"

For this remonstrance speech I was gently patted and soothed to quiescence. "Jones's Hill" should not be quite safe on my shoulders if allowed to hold forth any longer.

"I am only elected by the people," said my democratic husband.

"What a comfort to be," rejoined, "I suppose you mean that portion of the community who are the least fitted to elect. But there is no danger of your succeeding, I continued, proudly, "for I am no much of a gentleman for them."

Confound my husband's dog, alarmed at the dangerous term, "I am not 'a gentleman,' but 'one of the people.' My grandfather was an honest mechanic, and I am not ashamed to own that he ate his meals."

This unlucky fact was regularly inserted in every stump speech: the wretched old gentleman in question having had a dreadful tinkering propensity, and actually exercising it for the benefit of a table, although the fact that he never made but one other was carefully suppressed.

While indulging in indignant silence my husband took the opportunity to admonish me for pride.

"Our neighbors here call you 'stuck up,'" said he, very kindly. "They think that you consider yourself above them."

"They think the exact truth, then," I replied, with a haughty toss.

"Have any formal complaints been lodged against me?" I continued, wondering what on this was tending to.

Mr. Dimas was afraid that I was rather proud. "Why, I declare, I am proud of my own skin! No, but I should have called upon his daughter. This was the first intimation of that interesting female's existence; but Mr. Jones assured me, in form me that Mrs. Shots was the mother of a large family of girls, and that the gentleman in question was obliged to manage the farm herself; consequently she was too much occupied for visiting, and would be pleased and flattered at my first advances, and making the first call.

At this I positively refused to visit my poultryman's family, and felt myself an insulted woman; but Mr. J. skillfully administered flattery, smiled, and hoped that I would, for the sake of my future, and felt myself an insulted woman; but Mr. J. skillfully administered flattery, smiled, and hoped that I would, for the sake of my future—until, after a few days, I fairly gave in, and promised to call upon the lady's family on the following day.

Mr. Jones and I talked the matter over as though the visit were a matter of importance.

"The idea must not get abroad that my wife is 'stuck up,'" said Mr. J.; "country people will forgive any thing in a woman but that; and the wife of a man in public life has a great deal in her power to injure or benefit her husband, you know."

This was quite a formidable speech, and I resolved to be unusually gracious; and, certainly, paying the first visit to one of "the people" could not affect my position in any way. It would be very pleasant for Mrs. Shots to have a visitor from town, and as Mrs. Shots had a husband and father she was well worth propitiating.

Such were my thoughts as I donned a simple but becoming dress, for it would not do to overdress the part of the lady visitor to the wife of my husband said, approvingly; "Now, let my little wife look out not her own lovely self, and she will do." I felt pleased with myself as I left the house, and set forth smilingly upon my mission.

The farm-house was a rickety-looking red house, dreary and unshaded; and on endeavoring to open the gate a savage dog rushed at me with a growl that I thought peculiarly at key. This was discouraging; but I have a horror of dogs, and therefore I stood still and waited. A tall, sandy-haired, freckled youth, with a decidedly unamiable expression, came up the narrow path that divided the two front grass and weeds on the side of the house, and inhospitably asked me what I wanted.

Considering that this was a rickety-looking red house, dreary and unshaded; and on endeavoring to open the gate a savage dog rushed at me with a growl that I thought peculiarly at key. This was discouraging; but I have a horror of dogs, and therefore I stood still and waited. A tall, sandy-haired, freckled youth, with a decidedly unamiable expression, came up the narrow path that divided the two front grass and weeds on the side of the house, and inhospitably asked me what I wanted.

Considering that this was a rickety-looking red house, dreary and unshaded; and on endeavoring to open the gate a savage dog rushed at me with a growl that I thought peculiarly at key. This was discouraging; but I have a horror of dogs, and therefore I stood still and waited. A tall, sandy-haired, freckled youth, with a decidedly unamiable expression, came up the narrow path that divided the two front grass and weeds on the side of the house, and inhospitably asked me what I wanted.

As I glanced at her freckled face and shrewish features, quite unabashed by the thin hair that was tucked behind her ears, an unpleasant feeling of recognition came over me; and on meeting the fixed gaze of that stony eye the whole dreadful truth flashed upon me. Mrs. Shots and the destroyer of my new dress were one and the same person; and the look which she now gave me was such as plainly told me that my story as known.

Mrs. Shots said not a word, but looked defiant; and gathering up my courage to meet the circumstances, I said, in the most dignified manner I particularly affable,

"We are quite near neighbors, Mrs. Shots, and I believe that, as a stranger, I had a right to expect the first call; but hearing that you devoted yourself to your dairy, and having more leisure myself, I have dispensed with ceremony, and made you the first visit."

Mrs. Shots looked straight at me all the time that I was speaking, and then, giving her hair an extra push behind her ears, she replied, in a sullen tone,

"I never have no time for gaddin', and if I had, shouldn't care to be spookin' round 'mong my neighbors. As to 'devotin' myself to my family,' I don't b'lieve in no such pap—I work 'em like cattle themselves, and help me considerable, too."

What a comfort to be able to work with wife and mother I had imagined! But my wife was to be blind and deaf. I remembered Mr. Jones, and thought it over; and, fearful to appear like my putting on an extra amount of affability, I proceeded to question her about the dairy, inquired after farm, asked after Mr. Shots, and whatever I supposed would be agreeable, to all of which Mrs. Shots replied in a way that showed that she had neither imperfect at that.

This was unpleasant, to be sure, but I had gone my duty; and I left the inhospitable mansion with a sort of gleeful feeling at the idea of Mr. Jones having to dine with his wife, which was almost closed the door in my face with a slam, and I set off on as pains to conceal her satisfaction at my departure.

I related my adventure to Mr. Jones, who was greatly disconcerted to approve of my conduct, and in his overdoing charity was quite sure that Mrs. Shots's way of politeness proceeded from ignorance, and embarrassment at the unexpected honor conferred upon her by my visit. The idea of associating country people with their superiors in life was simply ridiculous; but I comforted myself with the supposition that the visit would not be returned.

I was mistaken; it was returned—and quite soon, indeed, before being accustomed to the sandy-haired youth who had questioned my right of entrance, and a sandy-haired girl, who proved to be Miss Shots, against whom the full force of "skinning alive" had been uttered. But Zerah was a little boy, and as Mrs. Shots had no more terrible punishment, promised at least six times during the visit, produced not the slightest effect upon him.

In the pride of my heart I displayed to Mrs. Shots all the much-admired things that my prodigious female, after a glance at his violet eyes and wild-rose cheeks, pronounced him "a sickly-looking child," and warning me that if I didn't feed him on somethin' else besides mountain-sass he'd never live, turned from him as though unworthy of further notice.

I was fairly boiling over, and was about to utter my wrath in words, when the child, who, fortunately, at this juncture Mr. Jones made his appearance, and with an Oriental salute to Mrs. Shots, pressing her hand tenderly, patting the girl and boy on the head—perplexing that the latter should be ignorant of the United States—and with the former a regular heart-breaker—inquiring after the health of the family, and the like, left the depend upon the answer, and signing legerdemain I told that the excellent man had a cold in his head; and Mrs. Shots, who knew Mr. Jones, was so awed by as ever; and that this was but the beginning of the many visits that passed between the families; and conducting himself altogether so very unbecoming a manner that Mrs. Shots was almost "stuck up."

I think that Polly and Jerusha had every moment of the room in their hands during this seemingly-interminable visit; and in the corner of the floor, after their departure, gave me the uncharacteristic of a pocket-handkerchief that covered every insel-puddle on their way to the house, with corpses instructions not to wipe their feet until they were upon the parlor carpet, I found.

"Very nice woman Mrs. Shots," said Mr. Jones, benignly, when this trio had turned their backs upon us.

"Very," I replied, emphatically; "so very interesting!"

There was a sort of twinkle in Mr. Jones's eye, and I could not help unconsciously to myself that "it was all for the good of his country"—which I very much doubted.

The ice was broken, however. Very soon after this visit, Mr. J. made his appearance one day with a beaming face, which boded sure of communicating pleasant news, and informed me that I was invited to take tea with Mrs. Shots. The invitation had been given to him through Mr. Dimas, and Mr. Jones was not invited because, as the old man observed, "he allowed it was to be a sort of winmin's affair."

At first I was struck dumb at the bare idea; and Mr. J. began to address his powers of speech to enlarge upon the advantages that were to accrue to him from my sociability with the people around. Old Dimas had been so pleased with my calling upon his daughter that he had gone among his friends, talking up Mr. Jones as the only eligible candidate, and a great deal more to accomplished among such people. To decline Mrs. Shots's invitation would give mortal offense; so, wondering all the time why the woman asked me, I resolved to carry out my unlucky idea with which I had begun, and see what would come of this tea-visit.

Mr. Jones warmly advocated my starting at one o'clock, for country people, he said, kept early hours; but I would not go before three, and by way of looking sociable, I took my knitting with me, a little blanket of bright colors which I was manufacturing for baby.

It was in one of those days when I was expected that savage dog might have been kept out of the way; but as I opened the gate he made a spring at me, displaying such a formidable row of teeth that I shrieked at the top of my voice. The weirdsisters rushed to the rescue—Polly with a threshing-swam before me—and not being particularly courageous, as I particularly strong, I fainted.

When I opened my eyes I found myself surrounded by none of the romantic circumstances that attend the fainting of heroines in novels. I had been landed on "the steps," my face and hair and dress dripping with water, a liberal shower of which had taken all the stiffening out of my nice muslin dress, an odious smell of burned feathers was under my nose, and a bunch of yellow curls, all shapes and sizes, from Miss Shots down to the smallest infant, capable of going alone, were surveying me with a mixture of curiosity and contempt.

I made an effort to sit up, and told Mrs. Shots that I believed I had been frightened.

"Not at your age," she exclaimed, in a tone of querulous surprise, as though that circumstance cured the virtue of gentleness to such an extreme that it was a positive vice. "Why, Ye wouldn't hurt you!"

And, pray, how was I to know that? He certainly did every thing but the actual biting; and, under the circumstances, my fear was perfectly excusable. But Mrs. Shots shared the ill-bred opinion common to owners of ugly dogs, who, because they do not bite them, have no consideration for the fears of others.

I saw that I had no sympathy to expect from my hostess, and, thinking of my appearance as well as I could, I professed to be entirely recovered, and awaited an invitation into the house.

"I ain't thinkin' yet I'll stop, yet," said Mrs. Shots; "do you choose to set here till I git through?"

The stoop was rather sunny, but as I had evidently come too early, I acquiesced with the best grace I could command, and Mrs. Shots's fair graces by waited for my answer, dissipated her boisterous hilarity, and, in the manner of a couple of eight or nine as unattractive-looking children as I ever beheld.

Jerusha, a girl of twelve, who evidently considered herself an old acquaintance, asked me why I came the same day; and when I smilingly replied that I wanted to see them, she said that "mother didn't want to see me, because she wasn't ready." I then ventured to remark that I had come to help her it, and I worked on my blanket in silence.

The fright and fun together had given me a violent nervous headache; and the sight of the throbbing temples, creaking the first onset from that band of young Goths, was the last, they would prove my tormenters. They approached very timidly, and surveyed my work—one fought with another for a moment, and then Polly and that creature to lay hold of my dress and hair to satisfy themselves regarding the fabrics—which, though not particularly attached to Mrs. Shots, I longed for her appearance, for I was quite unable to cope with the three if I broken silence.

They waxed bolder, and pulled my hair, snatched my work from my lap and threw it to the floor, and when I called them naughty children, they set up a shout of derision and took to their heels —some turning somersaults, two or three swinging on the gate, and some climbing the trees like apes, and making my heart run cold with the fear that they would be dashed to pieces before my eyes. But I need not have troubled myself—such children invariably thrive, and the mischief-makers always they happen to tumble, always alight, like cats, on their feet.

At length, when I was half blinded by the sun, and visions of impish children, in various stages of dislocation, were swimming before my eyes, Mrs. Shots made her appearance; and upon giving her an account of my persecutors, she observed, in quite an offended tone, that "they didn't do much used to children?"

I was just about to reply that I was not used to such atrocious ones; but as this would have been but a breaking out of hostilities, I prudently restrained myself.

My delicate piece of work was in rather a bad condition, having dropped several times in a sitting contact of mother Earth; but when I held it up for her inspection, her hostess pronounced it "shuller kind of knittin'," and "guessed that a baby wasn't an Indian that it couldn't do without a blanket."

All of which was highly provoking; but somehow, she said, was something worth doing, and she produced about a bushel of strawberries to hull, which she set me to work to do.

Actuated by a benevolent motive, I offered to help her.

"Well," was the gracious reply, "I'm agreeable."

I went to work, staining my fingers, and increasing my headache, thinking it the most curious visit I had ever made, and that I should most frequently enlivened by assaults of young Shots upon the strawberries, who received blows and reproaches with the most imperturbable good-nature; and had she executed her threats, Mrs. Shots would have had no berries to hull when before she retired that night.

"What time do you choose tea?" inquired my hostess, quite unexpectedly.

I was rather surprised at the question, but replied politely that the time which was most convenient for her would suit me best.

"Suppose," said the baby, calmly, "that it would be most convenient for me to have it at seven, and that you'd make up your mind to go home at six, where would you be then?"

"In a haven of rest," was my inward answer, as I called to mind my cool, pretty room, and longed to stretch myself on the comfortable couch.

As this was a very cool manner of asking me how long I intended to stay, I was obliged to answer, with some embarrassment, that I had told Mr. Jones to come early for me, but I did not think he would come before seven.

"Tara," said Mrs. Shots, in a business-like way, "I'll give you your tea at six."

"Very soon I was left alone for so long a space of time that I began to think Mrs. Shots must be employed in manufacturing every separate article that was to grace the breakfast, lunch and tea table.

After an immense length of time Jerusha was deputed to inform me that "Missis wished I was to walk out to tea," and, following that damsel, I found myself in the kitchen, which had a sanded floor and much crockery. Mr. Shots sat down to seated at the head of the table, surrounded by hot slices of bacon, and motioned me to a seat where the children were thickest. Not the sign of a man was visible, and I felt disappointed.

I was really requested to help the children, while their mother poured out the tea; and the voracious manner in which they devoured the doughy short-cake and saw-dust gingerbread was quite alarming. The butter was rancid, the tea was sweetened with brown sugar, not delectable, and the other edibles ditto—the only eatable article was a pudding made of preserves, and unsustaining as it was on the tea-table, I was doing full justice to it, when the peculiar appearance of a fragment that caught my eye induced me to examine it more closely. There was no mistake—it was full of little red ants! And in unutterable horror I announced the discovery to Mrs. Shots.

"La!" said she, with the utmost composure, "they're innocent little creeters; they got into that preserves, and I thought I'd save it by makin' it into a pudding."

I was perfectly indignant at this revelation, and expressed myself in that effect.

"You're dreadful particular," said Mrs. Shots, contemptuously: "should think you'd be alerred of your own shadder!"

Meanwhile I was kicked under the table by my interesting companions, who were continually screaming, crying, and kicking, with a view to produce things, and raising a perfect Bedlam about my ears. I was completely worn-out and sick; and when Mr. Jones arrived, a little before the time he had mentioned, I was ready to insist into tears.

He looked as much worn troubled. "It is quite as you can," said he, in a husky voice.

"What is the matter?" I exclaimed. Little Eddie—"

Yes, little Eddie had had a dangerous fall; in my absence, through the carelessness of his nurse-girl, and was now screaming with pain from a gash on his temple.

How I got home I do not know, nor what transpired for some weeks after. A brain fever, produced by all that I suffered at the hands of Mrs. Shots, and the dreadful fear that capped the climax, prostrated me on a sick bed; when I raved of red ants, fractious children, and savage dogs, to the intense surprise of Mr. Jones and the perplexity of those around.

Little Eddie will carry a scar on his temple to his dying day as a reminder of Mrs. Shots, whose very name makes me shudder with horror; and Mr. Jones, when talking over the causes of his defeat, discovered that Mrs. Shots had worked for his opponent, and that old Mr. Dirtoss, in trying to vote for him, had been driven from the polls by a pack of roydies, and his coat-tails torn almost back besides.

Mrs. Shots indulged very freely in personal remarks, and a kind friend brought to me the pearls which dropped from that lady's mouth after my visit.

"If there was one thing in this world," observed that rigid disciplinarian, "that made her more goud than another, it was to bring down the airs of stuck-up people, and rub dirt on folks' shoes who never wanted to be cleaned—more blighter than their neighbors. A more shaller, useless piece of goods than that very Miss Jones she never come across; and as to 'lecting Mister Jones for Gov'ner, she guessed she didn't do much toward it. Jim Shots, of course he'd vote for any one she told him not to, and never dared not to vote where she told him. Now she would tell him, some girl in him, and one that wasn't like Saul, a head and shoulders above his neighbors, and she preferred as honest Abe Lincoln to Stephen Douglas (the successful candidate) to a nimmy pimmy lawyer like 'e' Mister Jones! Follow Shots, was he? a grandfather's makin' a sale, she didn't believe a word of that story—didn't believe any of the foolify-ever-lies a man came to do up Shots with, and his silly little wife wasn't fer close over a Joseph's coat of many colors for her precious baby—that she was. She brought them strawberries out a purpose to let her be cured with that stuff about her life. To see her airs, too! So coy condescendin', and supposin' that country fellow didn't know nothin'. She guessed she knew what was what as well as Miss Jones, whose husband had better wrap her in cotton and lay her in a glass case for the rest of her life—went into a conniption at the sight of rose Snow, if he hadn't! Rose Snow, indeed and alabaster skin, was worth a dozen of her, and turned up her nose at some innocent little ants in the preserves! It was what she'd do, she was made of that day, in church, when she looked as neat as fex herself and Mrs. Jones, and her feet on her dress, that was trailin' half a yard behind her—serve her right for doin' more stuff than her betters. She was a precious hard to get a visitin', to be sure! And the next time she waited to enjoy herself, Jemima Shots was ready to give her some more of the same sort. An honest woman who worked the very hair of her head, as she did, and brought up a hundred and nine children, was fit to hold a candle to any lady, and wasn't goin' to be condescended to by a little chit like Miss Jones!"

I was glad that Mr. Jones was present at the second-hand hearing of this tirade, for it gave him a better insight into matters and things than he would otherwise have attained.

My visiting-list has since been left to my own arrangement; and that last defeat abated my husband's ardor so materially that it is several months since he has been "up for office."

A SHARK STORY.

One night I was swimming across the channel on my way home from a visit to Jessita. The sky was nearly cloudy. Nevertheless, it was not so dark as to hinder me from seeing, in the middle of the waves, a dark object, which could be no less than the head of a man. In fact, I saw that it was a man, who was swimming in the direction of Espiritu-Santo.

At once resolved to find out who the swimmer was; and not wishing to be seen myself, I dived under the surface of the water. When about to repeat I caught sight of his head; he was close by. The water was clear, and I could see perfectly that he was swimming with great regularity; so fast, indeed, that I was obliged to put forth my utmost skill to overtake him. I knew there was not one man upon the island who was any thing near my match in swimming. Who then could it be? At each moment he had reached the water's edge, and was climbing up the rocks. I was beginning that I was passed over his clothes rendered him visible for a moment. I recognized his form; it was Rafael, the diver.

"He, indeed!" thought I: "he is to be my rival in love, as he has rivaled me in every thing else."

At this thought a sudden hatred for Rafael entered my heart. All the jealousy and suspicion proved true, that Rafael and I should meet but once more. For a moment I thought of calling out to his swimming. But I did not do so. Why, I cannot; but there are certain moments in a man's life when he does not know why he does things. In my indecision I permitted him to proceed; and he had scarcely passed over the summit of the rocks when I cocked my pistol and fired. At this point I could easily watch his movements. I saw him take a step or two, and fall to the bed of fantasy—a path I but often followed myself, and which I knew so well. I saw him reach the door, knock gently, and enter the house.

Without further pause I launched myself upon the track of my victim. I had determined upon the to the door of the hut. I stood and listened. I could hear the feeble murmur of a conversation carried on in low tones, but no words could be distinctly.

This, then, was her lover. The thought filled my heart with the direst vengeance, and I resolved to rid myself at once of my favored rival.

I was armed with a knife. My hand pressed mechanically to my belt, where I habitually carried my knife, and I was equally to grow my hand upon the hilt. My hand pressed mechanically to my belt, where I habitually carried my knife, and I was equally to grow there! in its place was the estoca, which, though an available weapon against a shark, would be of slight service in a struggle with a man.

For a while I hesitated as to what course I should follow, but there was only one feasible method to hope of success. My knife was in my hut; there would still be time to return and fetch it before the departure from the cottage.

Faster than I had run back to the cliff, and descending rapidly to the water I plunged in and swam across the channel. I soon passed myself, and, on reaching the opposite shore, found, when I perceived that the wind was rising into a storm. A canoe was moored at the foot of the cliffs; I stepped into it in hopes of saving time. I knew I could take the canoe across the channel much faster than I could swim there.

When I had rowed out near the middle of the channel I became aware that the wind was every moment rising higher, and could hear many sounds that indicated the approach of a storm. The canoe was rocked violently by the waves. Above the cliffs; the sea-swell howled amidst the dark waves, and now and then mingling with the sighing of the wind the lamentos uttered its melancholy cry, resembling the plaintive accents of some creature in pain.

All at once another and very different sound fell upon my ear. It was the sharp bark from the bosom of the ocean, but the rushing of the waves carried it away, and I fancied for a moment that I had been deceived by my own fears. For two-ounds after the cry again reached me. This time I was sure of it. It was a cry for assistance in extreme anguish—the heart-rending appeal of some human being in distress.

As the voice came from the direction of Espiritu-Santo, it at once occurred to me that it was Rafael who was in peril of perishing. With equal promptness struggling for mastery in my heart, I leaned forward in my canoe, and, shading my eyes with my hand, endeavored to pierce the darkness. But the night was too obscure. Nothing could be seen at a distance. I could hear, however, the cries of distress still continued, and then distinctly the words,

"A boat! for the love of God, a boat!"

It was the voice of Rafael. I could not hinder myself from trembling.

My emotion lasted but a short while. I heard something plashing forcibly in the water at no great distance, and, looking in that way, I saw the direction of the sound. The next moment I distinguished Rafael in the middle of a circle of white foam, which he was making around him. I was at first astonished that, instead of threatening destinancy, he did not at once make for the canoe, which he must have seen approaching him. But the cause of his immobility was soon apparent. At a short distance from him, and about three feet under the surface, was shining a phosphoric light. This light was gradually advancing upon Rafael. It was a monster—one of the largest I ever saw. A stroke of the oar brought me close to Rafael.

He uttered a cry on perceiving me, but he had not a moment to speak; instead of fatigue had taken away his voice.

The monster could be raised his hands, and caught hold of the canoe; but his arms, strong though he was, could not sustain the weight of his body. His eyes, although glaring with terror, regarded me with so expressive a look that I grasped his hands in mine, and with all my force forcibly against the side of the canoe. The tiburon was still advancing. One single instant the legs of Rafael disappeared—another—a fearful shriek escaped his lips; his eyes closed suddenly; his hands loosened their hold upon the canoe, and his body fell back into the sea. The lower half was already gone. The tiburon had cut him in two!

"And could you have rescued him?" asked my listener.

"I hope so," I replied in a significant tone: "perhaps I compressed his hands too forcibly against the boat."

"But not with an evil intention, I hope?"

Well, if it must be confessed, I believe I hindered Don Rafael from getting into the canoe.

At the moment that Rafael disappeared under the waves, I plunged in myself, although the tiburon had ate up all of a rival that had become hateful to me, it had also provoked me by the best in swimming. I struck out with all my strength. But I had touched the lower of my calling; for Rafael was a diver, and I could not have forgot that I was a Cogotas of divers. Besides, it was tasted human flesh, and would be sure soon to return for another victim or two.

There is nothing excites the ferocious disposition of sharks so much as a stormy night, such as that on which my story was destroyed by one. I am speaking of the tiburons, and not of the common shark—that species of which the oil is used in a glowy substance, which is distilled in two little holes situated near their mouths, spreads all over the body, and letting them to swim with quickness, especially when in thunders. This light reminded them violent fury, and the more darker the night the more plainly are they seen. But how good they themselves are not sharp-sighted, and a silent swimmer may be not destroyed by one. And to this that they can not lay hold of you without turning on their backs, which you may perceive that a during man—one who swims well—has a fair chance of success in a combat with one of these.

I dived directly for a little depth, for there should not lose my wind, and that I might be able also to see my enemy. I had scarcely left the waves rolled over my head with a noise resembling thunder, but down where I was the water was perfectly still. At that moment a dark mass came pressing against me. It was the upper part of poor Rafael. It seemed as if it were to ward off ways to meet.

I thought by this that the antagonist I was to sustain if could not be far off—in fact, at that same instant I saw a ray of light, which, at first almost imperceptible, grew gradually to a great larger and larger. I knew it was the tiburon. We appeared to be at the same level, but the shark was mounting, and I knew it would be able to do give my antagonist the advantage of getting above me; for in that case it would not be necessary for him to get upon his back to serve me as he had done poor Rafael. I made an effort, therefore, and rose nearer to the surface.

The tiburon now swam diagonally toward me. With such rapidity that it seemed almost to wax by my side, and so near that I could distinguish the phosphoric brilliance upon his skin—the membrane that lined his eyes—and the small round eyes. fed his brown fins bending against my body. Fragments of flesh were yet sticking in his lower jaw, which at intervals he closed against the upper with the satisfied smack of a gourmand. Just at this moment a cross shone out from my hand, and rendered more visible the silver-colored belly of the shark. I was aware that he meant to turn upon me, and lunging myself forward I plunged my knife—the same which I had intended for Rafael—up to the hilt in the breast of the tiburon. Then drawing the blade as far as my arm could reach, I made a deep long cut down the monster's belly.

It proved a death wound; the shark made one prodigious bound, and, striking the water once or twice with his tail, floated motionless upon the waves. At sight of my great antagonist thus conquered his late companions in the destruction myself from uttering a shout of triumph, which, despite the howling of the storm, was heard on both sides.

COLDSTREAM.

A LARGE party is assembled to celebrate the feast of St. Partridge at Bavelstoke Hall, an old country house about two miles distant from the northwest coast of Devon.

Our host Tyrawley resembles Sir Charles Coldstream in everything but his name. He has been every where and done every thing; but he is by no means used up, and can still take an interest in whatever his friends and guests do. Nor is his every thing every body else's every thing.

Mr. Tyrawley has fought in more than one state of South America, and has wandered for more than two years from side to side of the Pacific. A curious reputation hovers round him. He is supposed to have done many things, but nobody ever clear knows what they are; and it is not likely that much information on the point will be obtained from him, for he seldom talks much, and never speaks of himself. His present mission appears to be to kill partridges, play cricket, and dress himself. Not that it must be supposed that he has any thing in the habit of wearing less clothing than the custom of the country in which he may have been located required; but only that at the present time he selects much attention to his wardrobe and gauze neckties, and cured mustaches.

Such as he is, however, he is an object of interest to the feminine portion of the party at Bavelstoke Hall; for he is both rich and handsome, as well as unmarried, and he can be no more than two-and-thirty.

Pretty Constance Bayston had grey eyes and black hair. And the nicest critic of feminine appearance might be defied to state what she had on her head for hour after hour. For she is not one ever look at any thing except her face.

Yet Constance is a thorough woman, and still unmarried. Alas, what cowards men are! The fact is that Constance is very clever; but as Mr. Tyrawley is rich, and clever enough, too.

Is she a little vexed at her present condition? Certainly she does not exhibit any tendency to carry out Mrs. Millikin's suggestion, as it has once been repeated to her. The young men are more afraid of her than ever after the first three days my very sharp things, sometimes. Especially she is severe upon the little battles of fashionable existence. She appears to consider that she has a special mission to arouse them; but they do not appear to like being aroused.

In Mr. Tyrawley she affected to disbelieve. She hinted at his invention to have invented things that she did not believe he ever had done, or ever would do any thing worth doing; but that he planned himself as a man of very respectable, with a keen ignorant of its foundation, no one could impugn.

Mr. Tyrawley was not at all in love with Constance. Miss Constance was not as conscientious as usual but that she really entertained a higher opinion of the gentleman than she chose to confess. He certainly was not afraid of her, and had even dared to contradict her favorite theory of the general worthlessness of English gentlemen of the nineteenth century. It was one wet morning when she had been expounding Scott to three or four of her particular friends—and it must be confessed that the real reason why she had not gone out with the rest the decline of chivalry. Tyrawley was sitting half in and half out of range. Perhaps she had not noticed him. She was saying to Miss Bellowes:

"I can not agree with you, Miss Bellowes; indeed, I do not think we so largely resemble Scott's in our helmets, nor do we compel harmless individuals, who possibly may have nevertheless of the best to defend the respect of their lady love at the point of the lance; but of all that was good in old chivalry—of all that was noble, generous, self-sacrifice, you will find as much in the nineteenth century as in the twelfth."

Miss Bellowes was a pretty girl of eighteen summers, and Miss Constance saw a probability of a defeat from her own remarks. She therefore replied:

"You are too moderate in your claims for your contemporaries, Mr. Tyrawley. If I remember right, Sir Walter Scott was always very severe on the flagellation of a true knight."

"I am not going to speak the truth," he replied. "Your theory would have been more true the before the days of the Crimean war and the Indian mutiny; but the men who fought their ways in the trenches of the Redan, and who carried the guns of Delhi, may bear comparison with Bayard or Cœur de Lion."

"Oh! I do not allude to warriors," said she "of course they are brave they are brave. I—and here she hesitated a moment, till possibly piqued because her statement seemed to be received but in the passage of arms, she concluded—"but to our little gentlemen, who have no heart for any thing."

Tyrawley laughed. "Possibly my judge too much by the outside," he said. "I am afraid to find out what some of those whom you are pleased to call little gentlemen would be found to have heart enough for any thing that honor, or duty, or necessity could call upon them to do."

"I hope you are right," said Miss Constance, with a slightly contemptuous air, but not upper lip, which implied that she did not think so.

Tyrawley bowed, and the conversation terminated. But in the afternoon after the rain had held in the room the conversation of the young ladies was interrupted by Master George Bellowes, aged fourteen, who suddenly attacked his sister.

"I think you are wrong, you know, when you call Tyrawley a little gentleman."

"My dear," said Constance, with a start, "I never said any thing of the sort."

"Well, you implied it, you know, in your girl's words, and I think you make a mistake; for he has been with me often, and can shoot as well as a thing, and I hear he can ride no end. He was rather out of practice at the cricket-ball when he began, but he is improving every day. You should have seen how he hit two or three of the balls over the trees."

The day lingered on, after the usual fashion of wet days in September in full country house.

Tyrawley was in the library at last that it was past tea before he thought of going to bed. He always slept with his window open, and as he threw up the sash a fierce gust of wind blew out his candles, and blew down the looking-glass.

"Heaven and earth!" he exclaimed, "I wonder whether it's smashed—unlucky to break a looking-glass. Mem. Never to open the window. Nothing illuminated the room for a moment, and he bent out of the window. "The wind must be about north-east-over. Cheerful for any thing coming up to Bristol from the southward. I wonder what a storm is like on this coast. I have a great mind to go and see. I shall never be able to get that hall door open without waking them up; what a nuisance! Stay, capital idea! I'll go by the window."

Before starting upon his expedition he changed the remains of his evening dress (for he had been writing in his dressing-gown) for a flannel shirt and trousers, while a short pea-jacket and glazed hat completed his array. His room was on the first floor, and he had intended to drop from the window sill; but the branch of an elm came so near he found that unnecessary, as springing to it he was on the ground, like a cat, in an instant. His soon found his way across country, "like a bird," to the edge of the cliff. The sea for miles seemed one sheet of foam.

But a flash of lightning discovered a group of figures about a quarter of a mile distant; and he distinguished shouts in the intervals of the storm.

He was soon among them, and he found that all eyes were turned on a vessel which had struck on a rock within two hundred yards of the cliff. It was evident that she would go to pieces under their very eyes.

"Is there no way of opening communication with them?" he asked of an old coastguardsman.

"Why ye see, Sir, we have sent to Milford for Manby's rockets; but she must break up before they come."

"How far is Milford?"

"Better than seven mile, your honor."

"If we could get a rope to them we might save the crew."

"Every one of them, your honor; but it ain't possible."

"I think a man might swim out."

"The first wave would dash him to pieces against the cliff."

"What depth of water below?"

"The cliff goes down like a wall, forty fathom, at least."

"The deeper the better. What distance to the water?"

"A good fifty feet."

"Well, I have dived off the main yard of the Chesapeake. Now listen to me. Have you got some light, strong rope?"

"As much as you like."

"Well, take a double coil round my chest, and do you take care to pay it out fast enough as I draw upon it."

"You won't draw much after the first plunge; it will be the same thing as suicide, every inch."

"Well, we shall see. There's no time to be lost: lend me a knife."

And in an instant he whipped off his hat, boots, and pea-jacket, then with the knife he cut off its sleeves and passed the rope through them, that it might chafe him less.

The crew of the doll boatman brightened. There was evidently a method in his madness. "You are a very good swimmer, I suppose, Sir?"

"I have dived through the surf at Nukuheva a few times."

"I never knew a white man that could do that," Tyrawley smiled. "But whatever you do, 'he said,' mind and let me have plenty of rope. Now out of the way, my friends, and let me have a clear start."

He walked slowly to the edge of the cliff, looked over to see how much the rock sheltered current; then returned, looked to see that there was plenty of rope for him to carry out, then took a short run, and leaped as if from the springing-board of a plunging-bath. He touched the water full five-and-twenty feet from the edge of the cliff. Down into its dark depth he went, like a plummet, but soon to rise again. As he reached the surface he saw the crest of a mighty wave a few yards in front of him—the wave that he had been told was to dash him lifeless against the cliff. But now his old experience of the Pacific stands him in good stead. For two moments he drawn breath, then, ere it reaches him, he dives below its centre. The water dashes against the cliff, but the swimmer rises far beyond it. A faint cheer rises from the shore as they feel him draw upon the rope. The waves follow in succession, and he dives again and again, rising like an otter to take breath, making very steadily onward, though more below the water than above it.

We must now turn to the ship. The waves have made a clean breach over her bows. The crew are crowded upon the stern. They hold on to the bulwarks, and await the end, for no boat can live in such a sea. Suddenly she is hailed from the waters. "Ship ahoy!" shouts a loud, clear voice, which makes itself heard above the storm. "Throw me a rope or a buoy!" The life-buoy was still hanging in its accustomed place by the mainmast. The captain almost mechanically takes it down, and with well-directed aim throws it within a yard or two of the swimmer. In a moment it is under his arms, and in half a minute he is on board.

"Come on board, Sir," he says to the captain, pulling one of his wet curls professionally. The captain appeared to recognize him in a winter from the lower world; so, turning to the crew, he lifted up the rope he had brought from the shore. Then for the first time the captain and his mission flashed upon their mind, and a desperate cheer arises forth from all hands, instantly re-echoed from the shore. Then a strong cable is attached to the small rope and drawn on board—then a second—and the communication is complete. But no time is to be lost, for the stern shows signs of breaking up, and there is a leaky passage. While the captain is planning a sort of chair in which she might be moved, Tyrawley lets her up on his left arm, breaks himself with his right by the upper rope, and walks along the lower as if he had been a dancer. He is first on shore, for no sailor would leave till the lady was safe. But they soon follow, and in five minutes the ship is clear—five men—and the last trace of her is left.

Ravelstoke Hall has been aroused by the news of the wreck, and Mr. Ravelstoke has just arrived with brandy and blankets. Him Tyrawley avoids; and thinking he can be of no further use, he betakes himself across the country once more, and by the aid of the friendly elm regains his chamber without observation.

The lady, whom Tyrawley had deposited in a cottage, with a strong recommendation that she should go to sleep immediately, was soon carried off in triumph by Mr. Ravelstoke to the Hall, and welcomed by Lady Grace at half past three in the morning. There were very few of the guests who slept undisturbed that night. The unusual noise in the house aroused every body, and many excursions were made in unfinished costume to endeavor to ascertain what was going on. The excitement culminated when the miscellaneous assemblage who had conducted the captain and some of the crew to the Hall, after being well supplied with ale and stronger liquids, conceived that it would be the correct thing to give three cheers at the hour of half past five.

It was then that Lord Tolmulton, an Irish peer, laboring under an erroneous impression that the house was attacked, was discovered on the landing-place, in army cousting principally of a short dressing-gown, flannel-waistcoat, and a fowling-piece.

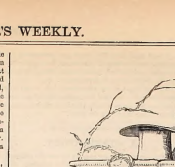
Breakfast that morning was a desultory meal. People finished, and talked about the wreck, and began again. It seemed quite impossible to obtain any thing like an accurate account of what had taken place. At last the captain appeared, and things almost overwhelmed by the multiplicity of questions, nevertheless, between the intervals of broiled ham and coffee, he managed to elucidate matters a little.

Then came the question, Who was it who swam out to the vessel? Tyrawley had only been able to velotake a few days, and was a stranger in the neighborhood. None of the servants had reached the coast till it was all over, so there had been no one to recognize him.

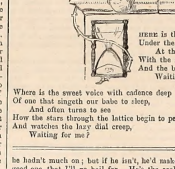
"I scarcely saw him," said the captain; "but he was a dark, tallish man, with a great deal of beard."

"Was he a gentleman?" asked Miss Constance Daynton, who had been taking a deep interest in the whole affair.

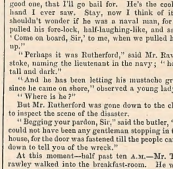
"Well, d'ye see, Miss, I can't exactly say, for



HERE is the form of girlish mould,
Under the spread of the branches old,
At the well-known trysting tree;
With the sunset lighting her tresses of gold,
And the breezes waving them fold upon fold
Waiting for me?



Where is the sweet voice with cadence deep
That I used to love to hear to sleep,
And often tunes to see
How the stars through the lattice begin to peep,
And watcher watch her busy dial creep,
Waiting for me?



Long since those locks are laid i' the clay,
And the form that was both passed away,
On earth no more to be;
But still in the spirit-world afar
She is the dearest of those that are Waiting for me.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER XIII.

FIFTY-TWO.

IN the black prison of the Conciergerie the doomed of the day awaited their fate. They were in number as the weeks of the year. Fifty-two were to toil that afternoon on the life-task of the city to the hundredth, everlasting sea. Before their cells were quit of them new occupants were already in them; before their blood ran into the blood spilled yesterday, the blood that was to mingle with theirs to-morrow was already set apart.

Two score and twelve were told off. From the farmer-general of seventy, whose riches could not buy him life, to the scrawny seamstress of twenty, whose poverty and obscurity could not save her. Fifty-two were confined together in the vices and neglects of men, will seize on victims of all degrees; and the frightful moral disorder, born of unspeakable suffering, intensified by compression, and heartless indifference, smote equally without distinction.

Charles Darnay, alone in a cell, had sustained himself with no flattering delusion since he came to it from his Trial. In every line of the narrative he had heard he had heard his condemnation. But, he had not comprehended that no personal influence could possibly save him—that he was virtually sentenced by the millions, and that units could avail him nothing.

Nevertheless, it was not easy, with the face he believed wife fresh before him, to compose his mind to what it must bear. His hold on life was strong, and it was very, very hard to loosen; by gradual efforts and degrees unclosed a little here, it clenched the tighter there, and when he brought his strength to bear on that hand and it yielded, this was closed again. There was a hurry, too, in all his thoughts, a turbulent and heated working of his blood, that contended against resignation. If, for a moment, he did feel resigned, then his wife and child, who had to live after him, seemed to protest and to make it a selfish thing.

But all this was at first. Before long the consideration that there was no disgrace in the fate he must meet, and that numbers were the same road wrongfully, and trod it firmly, every day, sprang up to stimulate him. Next followed the thought that much of the future peace of mind enjoyable by the dear ones depended on his quiet fortitude. So by degrees he calmed into the better state when he could raise his thoughts much higher, and draw comfort down.

Before it came to this last he had draft of his condemnation he had traveled thus far on his way. Being allowed to purchase the means of writing, and a light, he sat down to write until such time as the prison lamps should be extinguished.

He wrote a long letter to Lucie, showing her that he had known nothing of her father's imprisonment until he had heard of it from herself, and that he had been as ignorant as she of his father's and uncle's responsibility for that misery until the paper had been read. He had already explained to her that his concealment from herself of the name he had relinquished was the one condition—fully intelligible now—that her father had attached to their betrothal, and was the one promise he had still exacted on the morning of their marriage. He entreated her, for her father's sake, never to seek to know whether he had become oblivious of the existence of the paper, or had had it recalled to him (for the moment, or for good), by the story of the Tower, on that old Sunday under the dear plane-tree in the garden. If he had preserved any definite remembrance of it, there could be no doubt that he had supposed it destroyed with the Bastile, when he had found no mention of it among the relics of prisoners which the populace had discovered there, and which had been described to all the world.

He besought her—though he added that he knew it was needless—to absolve her father, by impressing him, through every tender means she could think of, with the truth that he had done nothing for which he could justly reproach himself, but had uniformly forgotten himself for their joint sakes. Next to her preservation of his own last grateful love and blessing, and her overcoming of her sorrow, to devote herself to their dear child, he adjured her, as they would meet in Heaven, to comfort her father.

To her father himself he wrote in the same strain; but he told her father that he expressly confided his wife and child to his care. And he told him this, very strongly, with the hope of rousing him from any despondency or dangerous retrospect toward which he foresaw he might be tending.

To Mr. Lorry he commended them all, and explained his worldly affairs. That done, with many added sentences of grateful friendship and warm attachment, all was done. He now thought of Carton. His mind was so full of the others that he never once thought of him.

He had time to finish these letters before the lights were put out. When he lay down on his straw bed he thought he had done with this world.

But it beckoned him back in his sleep, and showed itself in shining forms. Free and happy, back in the old house in Soho (though it had nothing in it like the old house), unconsciously released and light of heart, he was with Lucie again, and she told him she had been free, and he had never gone away. A pause of forgetfulness, and then he had even suffered, and had come back to her, and was recovering, and yet there was no difference in him. Another pause of oblivion, and he awoke in the solemn morning, unconscious where he was or what had happened, until it flashed upon his mind, "This is the day of my death!"

Thus had he come through the hours to the day when the fifty-two heads were to fall. And now, while he composed and hoped that he could meet the end with quiet heroism, a new action began in his waking thoughts which was very difficult to master.

He had never seen the instrument that was to terminate his life. How high it was from the ground, how many steps it had, where he would be stood, how he would be touched, whether the touching hands would be dyed red, which way his face would be turned, whether he would be the first, or might be the last: these and many similar questions, in nowise directed by his will, obtruded themselves even as he now again countless times. Neither were they connected with fear: he was conscious of no fear. Rather they originated in a strange besetting desire to know what to do when the time came; a desire gigantically disproportionate to the few swift moments to which it referred; a wondering that was more like the wondering of some other spirit within his than his own.

The hours went on as he walked to and fro, and the clocks struck the numbers he would never hear again. Nine gone forever, ten gone forever, eleven gone forever, twelve coming on to pass away. After a hard contest with that eccentric action of thought which had last perplexed him, he had got the better of it. He walked up and down, softly repeating their names to himself. The worst of the strife was over. He could walk up and down, free from distracting fancies, praying for himself and for them.

Twelve gone forever.

He had been apprized that the final hour was Three, and he knew he would be summoned some time earlier, inasmuch as the tumbrils jolted heavily and slowly through the streets. Therefore he resolved to keep Two before his mind as the hour, and so to strengthen himself in the interval that he might be able, after that time, to strengthen others.

Walking regularly to and fro with his arms folded on his breast, a very different man from the prisoner who had walked to and fro at La force, he heard One struck away from him without surprise. The hour had measured like most other hours. Devoutly thankful to Heaven for his received self-possession, he thought, "There is but another now," and turned to walk again.

Footsteps in the stone passage, outside the door. He stopped.

The key was put in the lock, and turned. Before the door was opened, or as it opened, a man said in a low voice, in English: "He has never seen me here; I have kept out of his way. Go you in alone; I wait near. Lose no time!"

The door was quickly opened and closed, and there stood before him face to face, quiet, intent, with his hand on the light of a mask of dark features and a cautionary finger on his lip, Sydney Carton.

There was something so bright and remarkable in his look, that, for the first moment, the prisoner misdoubted him to be an apparition in his own imagining. But he spoke, and it was his voice; he took the prisoner's hand, and it was his real grasp.

"Of all the people upon earth you least expected to see me!" he said.

"I could not believe it to be you. I can scarcely believe it now. You are not"—the apprehension came suddenly into his mind—"a prisoner?"

"No. I am accidentally possessed of a power over one of the keepers here, and in virtue of it I stand before you. I come from her—your wife, dear Darnay."

The prisoner wrung his hand.

"I bring you a request from her."

"What is it?"

"A most earnest, pressing, and emphatic entreaty addressed to you in the most touching tones of the voice so dear to you, that you well remember."

The prisoner turned his face partly aside.

"You have no time to ask me why I bring it, or what it means; I have no time to tell you. You must comply with it—take off those boots you wear, and draw mine instead of mine."

There was a chair against the wall of the cell, behind the prisoner. Carton, pressing forward, had already, with the speed of lightning, got him down into it, and stood over him barefoot.

"Draw mine on! Quick! Draw mine on! Put your hands to them; put your will to them. Quick!"

"Carton, there is no escaping from this place; it never can be done. You will only die with me. It is madness."

"It would be madness if I asked you to escape; but do I? When I ask you to pass out at that door, tell me it is madness and remain here, then accuse me of having acted basely toward you for this of mine. While you do it, let me take this coat from your shoulders, and draw on your hair like this of mine!"

With wonderful quickness, and with a strength, skill, and determination that made resistance supernatural, he forced all these changes upon him. The prisoner was like a young child in his hands.

"Carton! Dear Carton! It is madness. It can not be accomplished, it never can be done, it has been attempted, and has always failed. Consider not only what I say about it, but the pen and ink and paper on this table. Is your money enough to take you out?"

"It was, when you came in."

"Steady it again, and write what I shall dictate. Quick, dear friend, quick!"

Pressing his hand to his bewildered head, Darnay sat down at the table. Carton, with his right hand in his breast, stood close beside him.

"Write exactly as I speak."

"To whom do I address it?"

"To no one." Carton still had his hand in his breast.

"Do I date it?"

"No."

The prisoner looked up at each question. Carton, standing over him with his hand in his breast, looked down.

"If you remember," said Carton, dictating, "the words that passed between us, long ago, you will readily comprehend this when you see it. You do remember them, I know. It is not likely I should forget them."

He was drawing his hand from his breast; the prisoner changing to look up in his hurried wonder as he wrote, the hand stopped, closing upon something.

"Have you written 'forget them?'" Carton asked.

"I have. Is that a weapon in your hand?"

"No; I am not armed."

"What is it in your hand?"

You shall know directly. Write on; there are but a few words more." He dictated again.

"I am thankful that the time has come when I can prove them. That I do so, is no subject for regret or grief." As he said these words, again his pen faltered, and again the writer, his hand slowly and softly moved down close to the writer's face.

The pen dropped from Darnay's fingers on the table, and he looked at Carton vacantly.

"What paper is that?" he asked.

"Paper?"

"I am conscious of nothing; there can be nothing here. Take up the pen and finish. Hurry, hurry!"

As if his memory were impaired, or his faculties disordered, the prisoner made an effort to rally his attention. As he looked at Carton with clouded eyes and with an altered manner of breathing, Carton—his hand again in his breast—looked steadily at him.

"Hurry, hurry!"

The prisoner bent over the paper once more.

"If it had been otherwise;" Carton's hand was again watchfully and softly stealing down;

"I never should have used the longer opportunity. If it had been otherwise;" the hand was at the prisoner's face; "I should but have had so much the more to answer for. If it had been otherwise—" Carton looked at the pen and saw that it was trailing off into unintelligible signs.

Carton's hand moved back to his breast no more. The prisoner sprang up with a reproachful look, but Carton's hand was close and firm at his throat, and Carton's left arm encircled him round the waist. For a few seconds he struggled with the man who had come to lay down his life for his; but within a minute or so he was stretched insensible on the ground.

Quickly, but with hands as true to the purpose as his heart was, Carton dressed himself in the clothes the prisoner had laid aside, combed back his hair, and tied it with the ribbon the prisoner had worn. Then he softly called, "Enter there! Come in!" and the Spy presented himself.

"You see?" said Carton, looking up at him, as he knelt on one knee beside the insensible figure, putting the paper in the breast: "a type changed very great?"

"Mr. Carton," the Spy answered, with a timid snap of his fingers, "my hazard is not that, in the thick of business here, if you are true to the whole of your bargain."

"Don't fear me. I will be true to the death."

"You must be, Mr. Carton, if the tale of fifty-two is to be right. Being made right by you in that dress I shall have no fear."

"Have no fear! I shall soon be out of the way of harming you, and the rest will soon be far from here, please God! Now get assistance and take me to the coach."

"You?" said the Spy, nervously.

"Him, man, with whom I have exchanged. You go out at the gate by which you brought me in?"

"Of course."

"I was weak and faint when you brought me in, and I am fainter now you take me out. The parting interview has overpowered me. Such a thing has happened here often, and too often. Your life is in your own hands. Quick! Call assistance!"

"You swear not to betray me?" said the trembling Spy, as he paused for a last moment.

"Man, man!" returned Carton, stamping his foot; "have I sworn by no solemn vow already to go through with this that you waste the precious moments now? Take him yourself to the court-yard you know of, place him yourself in the carriage, show him yourself to Mr. Lorry, tell him yourself to give him no restorative but air, and to remember my words of last night, and his promise of last night, and drive away!"

The spy withdrew, and Carton seated himself at the table, resting his forehead on his hands. The Spy returned immediately, with two men.

"How, then?" said one of them, contemplating the fallen figure. "So afflicted to find that his friend has drawn a prize in the lottery of Sainte Guillotine?"

"A good patriot," said the other, "could hardly have been more afflicted if the Aristocrat had drawn a blank."

They raised the unconscious figure, placed it on a litter they had brought to the door, and bent to carry it away.

"The time is short, Evrémonde," said the Spy, in a warning voice.

"I know it well," answered Carton. "Be careful of my friend, I entreat you, and leave me."

"Come, then, my children!" said Barsad. "Lift him, and come away!"

The door closed, and Carton was left alone. Straining his powers of listening to the utmost, he listened for any sound that might denote suspicion or alarm. There was none. Keys turned, doors clashed, footsteps passed along distant passages: no cry was raised, or hurry made, that seemed unusual. Breathing more freely in a little while, he sat down at the table, and listened again until the clocks struck Two.

Sounds that he was not afraid of, for he distinctly knew their meaning, then began to be audible. Several doors were opened in succession, and finally his own. A jailer, with a list in his hand, looked in, merely saying, "Follow me, Evrémonde!" and he followed into a large dark room at a distance. It was a dark winter day, and what with the shadows within, and what with the shadows without, he could but dimly discern the others who were brought there to have their arms bound. Some were standing; some were seated. Some were lamenting, and in restless motion; but these were few. The great majority were silent and still, looking fixedly at the ground.

As he stood by the wall in a dim corner, while some of the fifty-two were brought in after him, one man stopped, in passing, to embrace him, as having a knowledge of him. He thrilled him with a great dread of discovery; but the man went on. A very few moments after that a young woman, with a slight girlish form, a sweet space for in which there was no vestige of color, and large, widely-opened, patient eyes, rose from the seat where he had observed her sitting, and came to speak to him.

"Citizen Evrémonde," she said, touching him with her cold hand, "I am a poor little seamstress who was with you in La Force."

He murmured for answer, "True. I forget what you were accused of?"

"Plots. Though the just Heaven knows I am innocent of any. Is it likely? Who would think of plotting with a poor little weak creature like me?"

The forlorn smile with which she said it so touched him that tears started from his eyes.

"I am not afraid to die, Citizen Evrémonde, but I have been confined so long, I am not unwilling to die, if the Republic, which is to do so much good to us poor, will profit by my death; but I do not know how that can be, Citizen Evrémonde. Such a poor weak little creature!"

As the last thing on earth that he himself was to warm and soften to, it warmed and softened to this pitiable girl.

"I know that you were released, Citizen Evrémonde. I hoped it was true?"

"It was. But I was again taken and condemned."

"If I may ride with you, Citizen Evrémonde, will you let me hold your hand? I am not afraid, but I am little and weak, and it will give me more courage."

As the patient eyes were lifted to his face he saw a sudden doubt in them, and then astonishment. He pressed the worn-out, long-worn young fingers, and touched his lips.

"Are you dying for him?" she whispered.

"And his wife and child. Hush! Yes."

"Oh, you will let me hold your brave hand, stronger?"

"Hush! Yes, my poor sister; to the last."

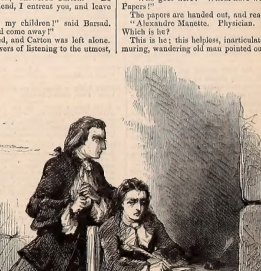
The same shadows that are falling on the prison are falling; in that same hour of the early afternoon, on the Barrier with the crowd about it, when a coach going out of Paris drives up to be examined.

"Who goes here? Whom have we within? Papers!"

The papers are handed out, and read.

"Alexandre Manette. Physician. French. Which is he?

This is he; this helpless, inarticulately-murmuring, wandering old man pointed out.



"WRITE EXACTLY AS I SPEAK."

"Apparently the Citizen-Doctor is not in his right mind? The Revolution-fever will have been too much for him?"

Gently too much for him.

"Hah! Many suffer with it, Lucie. His daughter. English. Which is she?"

This is she.

"Apparently it must be. Lucie, the wife of Evrémonde; is it not?"

It is.

"Hah! Evrémonde has an assignation elsewhere. Lucie, the child. English. This is she?"

She, and no other.

"Kiss me, child of Evrémonde. Now, thou hast kissed a good Republican; something new in thy family; remember it! Sydney Carton. Advocate. English. Which is he?"

He lies here, in the corner of the carriage. He, too, is pointed out.

"Apparently the English advocate is in a serious?"

It is hoped he will recover in the fresher air. It is represented that he is not in strong health, and has separated sadly from a friend who is under the displeasure of the Republic.

"Is this all? It is little for so much deal, that! Many are under the displeasure of the Republic, and must look out at the little window. Jarvis Lorry. Banker. English. Which is he?"

"I am he. Necessarily being the last."

It is Jarvis Lorry who has replied to all the previous questions. It is Jarvis Lorry who has alighted and stands with his hand on the window-door, replying to a group of officials. They leisurely walk round the carriage and leisurely mount the box, to look at the shut boot and pass it carries on the roof; the country-people hanging about press nearer to the coach-doors, and greedily stare in; a little child, carried by its mother, has its short arm held out for it, that it may touch the wig of an aristocrat who has come to the Guillotine.

"Behold your papers, Jarvis Lorry, countersigned."

"One can depart, citizen?"

"One can depart. Forward, my postilions! A good journey!"

"I salute you, citizens. And the first danger passed!"

These are again the words of Jarvis Lorry, as he clasps his hands, and looks upward. There is a terror in the carriage, there is weeping, there is the heavy breathing of the terrible traveler.

"Are we not going too slowly? Can they not be induced to go faster?" asks Lucie, clinging to the old man.

"It would seem like flight, my darling. I must not urge them too much: it would rouse suspicion."

"Look back, look back, and see if we are pursued?"

"The road is clear, my dearest. So far, we are not pursued."

Houses in two and threes pass by us, solitary farms, ruinous buildings, dye-works, tanneries, and the like, open country, avenues of leafless trees. The hard uneven pavement is under us, the soft grass by its side as either side. Sometimes we strike into the skirting mud, to avoid the stones that clatter us and shake us, and sometimes we stick up on a stone and recover. The agony of our impatience is then so great that, in our wild alarm and hurry, we are for getting out and running—hiding—doing anything but stopping.

Out of the open country, in again among ruinous buildings, solitary farms, dye-works, tanneries, and the like, cottages in twos and threes, avenues of leafless trees. The sun goes down, deceived us, and taken us back by another road? Is not this the same place twice? Thank Heaven, no. A village. Look back, look back, and see if we are pursued! Rush; the postilions house.

Leisurely our four horses are taken out; leisurely the coach stands; leisurely the agitated beroft of horses, and with no likelihood upon it of ever moving again; leisurely the new horses come into visible existence, one by one, out of nobody knows where; leisurely the new postilions follow, sucking and plaiting the lashes of their whips; leisurely the old postilions count their money in their hats, make reckonings, and arrive at dissatisfied results. All the time, overflowing with agony, are beating at a rate that would far outstrip the fastest gallop of the fastest horses ever foaled.

At length the new postilions are in their saddles, and the old are left behind. We are through the village, up the hill, and down the hill, and on the low watery grounds. Suddenly the postilions exchange speech with animation and gesticulation, and the horses are pulled up, almost on their haunches. We are pursued.

"Ho! Within the carriage there! Speak, then!"

"What is it?" asks Mr. Lorry, looking out at window.

"How many did they say?"

"I do not understand you."

"—At the last post. How many to the Guillotine to-day?"

"Fifty-two."

"I said so! A brave number! My fellow-citizen here would have it forty-two; ten more heads are worth having. The Guillotine goes handsomely. Live the Republic! Forward! Whoop then!"

The night comes on dark. He moves more; he is beginning to revive, and to speak intelligibly: he thinks they are still together; he asks him, by his name, what he has in his hand. O joy, so, kind Heaven, and help us! Look out, look out, and see if we are pursued.

The wind is rushing after us, and the clouds are flying after us, and the moon is plunging after us, and the whole wild night is in pursuit of us; but, so far, we are pursued by nothing else.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Throat Diseases.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches, or Cough Lozenges.—From Rev. E. H. Pratt, East Wooster-st., Conn. I feel grateful to you for placing within the reach of the suffering so valuable a remedy. I was afflicted for years with throat troubles, not less to my general health than to my throat. I recommend them with great pleasure on every hand."

To Housekeepers.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

361 BROADWAY 539
BRIDAL SUITES,
Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items.
Are all reliable.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar,
513 Broadway,
Under the St. Nicholas Hotel.

HUDSON'S BAY SABLE,
RUSSIAN SABLE,
MINK, MARTEN,
ROYAL ERMINE,
OF THE LATEST STYLES FROM EUROPE AND
CHILDREN'S FURS,
IN ELEGANT VARIETY,
STOCK LARGE,
ASSORTMENT COMPLETE,
PRICES MODERATE.
GENIN'S BAZAAR,
513 Broadway.

AUTHOR'S EDITION
OF
Tom Brown at Oxford.
TICKNOR & FIELDS, of BOSTON, will issue this new work, by the Author of

"TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS AT RUGBY,"

in Monthly Parts,

Price 12 cents each,

printed from the early stereotyped plates.
Part I. now ready.
Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

Red Whiskers or Gray are instantaneously changed into a natural looking brown, black, or auburn tint by the Instantaneous Hair Dye. Sold by all Hair Dyes. It is perfectly harmless, and will not injure the skin. Manufactory, 81 John-st., New York. Ascertain the like as to reader detection impossible. Sold by all Druggists of "Quack" Hair Dyes. Address as above.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
327 to 330 Pearl-st. (Franklin Square.)

Have just Published:

THE VIRGINIANS. A Tale of the Last Century. By W. M. THACKERAY. Illustrated by the Author. Part I. "Vanity Fair." "Pendennis." "Henry Esmond." One Vol. 8vo. Muslin, $1 50; paper, $1. Also, in English Hemistyle, &c. &c. With Illustrations by the Author. Part II. Ready December 1.

WOMEN ARTISTS in all Ages and Countries. By MRS. ELLET, Author of "Women of the American Revolution." 12mo. Muslin, $1 25.

FISHER'S RIVER (North Carolina), Scenes and Characters. By "SARPY." Who was Raised Thar." Illustrated by Darley and McLenan. 12mo. $1 25.

A GOOD FIGHT, and Other Tales. By CHARLES READE. Author of "Peg Woffington," "Christie Johnstone," &c. Endearing: I. "A Good Fight."—II. "Jack of all Trades."—III. "A Resurrection of a Thief."—IV. Illustrations. 12mo. Muslin, 75 cents.

SWORD AND GOWN. A Novel. By the Author of "Savile House." 12mo. Muslin, $1 25 each.

HARRY LEE; or, Hope for the Poor. With Illustrations. 12mo. Muslin, 75 cents.

A CIFE FOR A LIFE. By the Author of "John Halifax," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," &c. &c. With Illustrations. 8vo. Muslin, 75 cents. The Library Edition uniform with the Library Edition of "John Halifax," "Ogilvies," and "The Student's Library." Large 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

HENRY ST. JOHN, GENTLEMAN, A Tower of Hendrede, in the County of Prince George, Virginia. A Tale of 1737. By WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS, Author of "Lucile Beauchamp and Sibly," "The Virginia Comedians," &c. &c. 12mo. Muslin, $1 50.

MY THIRD BOOK. A Collection of Tales. By LORD CHARLES HOTTUS. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

GERALD FITZGERALD, "THE CHEVALIER." A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER. Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Jack Hinton," "The Dodd Family Abroad," "St. Jasper Cousin," "Maurice Tiernay," &c. &c. Complete. 8vo. Paper, 50 cents.

LIFE AND LIBERTY IN AMERICA; or, Sketches of a Tour in the United States and Canada in 1857-8. By CHARLES LEE, LL.D., F.S.A. With Ten Illustrations. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by mail, postage free, to any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

This is a book which treats of the thrilling interest of a romance, and yet vitally of the laws of life and health. A curious book. The table of contents is not copious. Of course it is not: a table of contents has no application to perfect confusion, and this book is the embodiment of perfect confusion, chronic disease. Dr. R. B. FOOTE of nameless fame, now at No. 9 Broadway, next door to Dr. Chapin's church, New York.

Hon. Edward Everett.

We are now sending post-paid, securely packed, our splendid new full-length Steel Engravings of EDWARD EVERETT and WASHINGTON on these terms:

Either Engraving and a $3 Magazine, one year $3 00
Both Engravings " " " " $4 00

No other terms. The Magazines are Harper's, Knickerbocker, Godey's Lady's Book, The Atlantic, and Blackwood.* Remit to

O. H. BAILEY & CO.,
Publishers, Broadway, New York,
AT WILLIAM HALL & SON'S Music Store.

* See Advertisement in last week's Weekly.

These celebrated and pleasant Bitters are highly recommended by the faculty as the purest and finest Tonic and general Stimulant ever offered to the public for General Debility, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, and other Derangements of the Stomach and Digestive Organs.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 145 Water Street.
For Sale Everywhere.

PIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP
is and EMOLLIENT SOAP of the highest quality, recommended for their emollient properties and delightful aroma.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our late importation of Coral and Garnet Jewelry, consisting of Sets, Necklaces, Bracelets, Earrings, Pins, Studs, Rings, Slides, Lockets, Charms, &c. &c.
OSBORNE, BOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
No. 257 Broadway, corner of Spring Street.

Special Announcement
FROM THE
Quaker City Publishing House!

100,000 Catalogues,
NEW, ENLARGED AND REVISED—NOW READY FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Superior Inducements to the Public!

A new and sure plan for obtaining GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, and other valuable Prizes. Full particulars, with numerous testimonials, will be sent free to all who apply.

Valuable Gifts, worth from 50 cents to $100, GUARANTEED to each purchaser. $100,000 in Gifts have been distributed to my patrons within the past six months, and they will be distributed during the next six months.

The inducements offered Agents are more liberal than those of any other house in the business.

Having the largest Publishing and Bookselling business for the last eight years, my experience enables me to conduct the business with the greatest satisfactories to all.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town and County. For full particulars address DUANE RULISON,
Quaker City Publishing House,
23 South Third Street,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS.
HARPENDEN'S EXPRESS
LEAVES EVERY
TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,
BY STEAMSHIP,
FOR SAVANNAH,
Thence, by Georgia Central Railroad, to
MACON, ATLANTA, AUGUSTA,
ALBANY, MOBILE, KNOXVILLE,
NASHVILLE, CHARLESTON, MONTGOMERY,
NEW ORLEANS,
And all Towns in the Interior of
Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

Every description of merchandise forwarded at Low rates, and delivered with promptness and despatch.
For further particulars apply at the offices of HARPENDEN'S EXPRESS, 74 Broadway.

New Books.
VERDANT GREEN. A College Story. By CUTHBERT BEDE. With 32 Illustrations. Price $1 00.
MICHELET'S LOVE (7 Annouv). $1 00.
LIFE OF LOUIS XIV. (by Hesekiel). $2 00.
BOSS & CARLETON'S COMIC COMPANION. $1 50.
Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price.
BOSS & CARLETON, Publishers, 139 Grand St., N. Y.

Grover & Baker's
NOISELESS
Family Sewing Machines,
AT REDUCED PRICES.

New York, Oct. 21, 1859.

The undersigned, Ministers and Laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having purchased and used in our families GROVER & BAKER'S NOISELESS FAMILY SEWING MACHINE," take pleasure in recommending it as an article highly conducive to the economics of a good machine. Its beautiful simplicity, its perfect adjustment, and the strength and elasticity of its stitch, unite to render it, in our opinion, a most valuable assistant in any family. We therefore, without solicitation, add our testimonial to all who have used it, and say to the public, that we believe it to be the best machine now in use.

C. LAREW,
R. S. STOCKTON,
M. VOORHIS,
A. STEVENS,
425 Broadway, New York; 15 Summer Street, Boston; 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; 265 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati; 118 Montgomery Street, San Francisco; 33 St. Francis Street, Mobile; 11 Camp Street, New Orleans.

ALL MACHINES WARRANTED.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD
FOR THE PIANO is having an immense sale, and rapidly taking the place of all other Instruction Books. Price $3, on receipt of which it will be sent by mail, post-paid. Sold by all Music Dealers, and by the Publishers, OLIVER DITSON & CO., BOSTON.

32. HEALTH OF AMERICA. 32.
Previous notices and testimonials have established the fact that THE GRAEFENBERG COMPANY'S MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON is the only reliable cure for those diseases which render the lives of women, from the age of 15 upward, miserable to an extent known only to themselves. Every form of difficult menstrual and single, and no social position, refinement of fortune, is a protection to life, effects and guarantee against them. Besides the local uterine symptoms, they are often attended with

Deranged Monthly Periods,
Irregularities,—Weakness,—Faintness,—
Deranged Appetite,—Indigestion,—
Pain in the Back and Kidneys,—Chills,—
Cold Hands and Feet,—Nervousness,—Hysterics,—
Neuralgia,—Palpitation of the Heart,—
Dizziness,—Nervousness,—Headache,—Faintness,— Disturbed Sleep,—Flushes of Heat,—General Pain,— Crawling and Pain at Pit of Stomach and Between Shoulders,—Acid Stomach,—Sinkings,—Indigestion,— Bloody passing of Urine with Pain,—Scanty passing of Urine,— Itching—Burning or Irritation of the Uterine Organs,— Dropsical Swellings,—
Dropsy—Female Weakness—Debility—Dead Weight—Nervous Irritability—
Starting—Constipation—Costiveness—
Irritable Temper—Sadness—Depraved Appetite—
Flatulency—Bloated and Irregular Bowels—
Unpleasant Dreams—Pains in the Uterine Organs—
Pain in the Head and Pain in the Limbs—
Loss of Memory—Bewilderment—Soreness in the Feet—
Pain in the Back.

THE GRAEFENBERG MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON will prevent all these distressing symptoms and may be fully depended upon. All other preparations are worthless imitations.

Letters of Advice and Instructions, from clergymen and publishers of the Graefenberg Company's Medicines, may be had gratis, by addressing Dr. Wilson, Box 1922, New York, and enclosing references to persons in the city. It will not be sent to any other address.

Price, $1 50 per bottle; Five bottles for $6. Sent by EXPRESS to all parts of the country. Office of the COMPANY, 25 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

DR. J. F. HERON may be consulted professionally, at his office, at the Graefenberg Company's Institutions, No. 32 Park Row. Office hours, 9 to 1 and 3 to 6.

DR. H. has had extended experience in this latter, §1 may be inclosed to insure reply.

DR. H. has had a large and practice of medicines adapted directly to the cure of the Graefenberg Institutions are chiefly for their own use, EXPRESS NOTICE TO STRANGERS. A weekly medical paper, published for Family Use, and elegantly embellished with Engravings, for promotion of the Science of Health, and Diseases of Women, on the receipt of which it is wanted to any part of the country.

THE HERO OF DELHI.

TWELVE YEARS OF A
SOLDIER'S LIFE IN INDIA,
Being Extracts from the Letters of the late
MAJOR W. S. R. HODSON, B.A.
First Bengal European Fusiliers, Commandant of Hodson's Horse.

INCLUDING
A Personal Narrative of the Siege of Delhi and Capture of the King and Princes,
Edited by his brother, REV. GEORGE H. HODSON, M.A.
With an Introduction by the Author of "School Days at Rugby."

The Author of "School Days at Rugby" says of the subject of this memoir:

"There is little chance that the subject of this paper will ever be known to the world as he ought to be. He carried out with his sword a name for himself which knows few equals in the history of India. But the deeds which have made him famous are known to yet together one of the best biographies in our language. Every Englishman who wishes to be proud of his race, to honor the heroes of the Indian mutiny will never be forgotten, and the names of our Indian heroes will be held up at the names of Lawrence, Havelock, and Hodson."

"Thirteen Illustrations.

FIRST AMERICAN, FROM THE THIRD ENGLISH EDITION.
1 vol. 16mo. Price $1 00.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED BY
TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.
Copies mailed, postage paid, on receipt of price.

ITCHING CHILBLAINS.
A sure relief, "Dupuy's Chilblain Balm." 25 cents per box; per mail 30 cents. Sold at 663 Broadway.

oilet Vinegar
is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a reviving Perfume, and a powerful Disinfectant.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. Rimmel,
Perfumer, London and Paris.

A Book for Everybody.

THE RIGHT WORD IN THE RIGHT PLACE: A Pocket Dictionary of Synonyms, Technical Terms, Abbreviations, Foreign Phrases, &c., with a Chapter on Punctuation and Proof-Reading. This will be an indispensable pocket-guide for every writer and speaker who would say exactly what he means, and in other words not less, and say it in the best way. In short, this work should be used by

POCKET AND DESK COMPANION
OF
THE EDITOR: THE ORATOR:
THE CORRESPONDENT: THE CLERGYMAN:
THE LAWYER: THE STUDY SCHOLAR:
THE STUDENT: THE AUTHOR:
THE LEGISLATOR: THE STUDENT, AND THE CONVEYANCER: THE SCHOOLMASTER.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

Sent by mail, to any address, on receipt of the price.

FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

Roman Eye Balsam.

For inflamed Eyelids, and for the cure of scrofulous humors or sweetness surrounding or near the Eye. In all cases of Sore Eyes, remember it is almost a specific.

Price 25 cents per jar. Forwarded per mail on receipt of postage stamps.

Prepared and sold by A. W. & D. SANDS, 241 William-street, Fulton, N. Y.

The Elegant Man and who he is.

BY JULIA CARY HERNDANDE.

Oh! Jennie, had you seen him
As he marched down the street;
His clothes, they were so stylish,
And his gloves they were so neat!
His features proud, his bearing high,
His smile, superb, commanding;
His air and looks at once proclaimed
A man of taste and standing.

We did not speak, he passed me by,
He nigher knows nor wants me;
Tis chance if ere we meet again,
But still in memory haunts me!
And he—this paragon of men—
Who so surpasses all others,
Is the "walking advertising man," [1]
Employed by the great SARSAPARILLA BROTHERS!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
F. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

DUSSELDORF GALLERY.

549 Broadway,

SONNTAG'S GREAT PICTURE,

"A DREAM OF ITALY."

Is just added to the above collection. OPEN DAY AND EVENING. Admission Seventy Cents.

A LIFE. FOR A LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN,"

In "A Life for a Life," the author is fortunate in a good subject, and has indeed a work of strong ethical fact. The reader having read the book through for the story, will be apt to be one of many persons to re-read and send again many pages and passages with greater interest. It is a book to be read slowly, and to be taken with a grateful leader delicacy; and in addition to its other merits, it is written in good, careful English.—Athenæum.

"A Life for a Life" is one of the best of the author's works. We like it better than "John Halifax." It is a book we should like every member of every family in England to read.—Herald.

Cheap Edition, 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
Library Edition, 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage pre-paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.

REMOVAL.

JAMES BOGARDUS,
Architect in Iron, Civil Engineer, Constructor, and Patentee of Iron Buildings,
Patentee of the Daguerreotype of Motion,
Proposes Erecting Extensive Universal Mills,
Machine Shops, Foundries, and Rolling Mills for Iron Steamers,
Has Invented Improvements in Ordnance,
Office No. 397 Canal Street, near Centre, New York.
Iron Building corner Canal and Duane Sts., formerly occupied, has been removed in widening Duane Street.

☞ Schmitt's Automatic Grain Scale. — Self-adding, self-weighing, self-registering. Patent Right, or Rights for sale.
WM. AUGUSTUS GOURDIN, Agent,
At office of George McBride Smith, No. 107 Front St.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S JOURNALS.

Now Ready, a New Edition, with Portrait, Maps, Index, and Illustrations. 8vo, $3 50.

☞ The only Complete and Unabridged American Edition.

Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa:

Including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loanda on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi, to the Eastern Ocean.

BY DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., D.C.L.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage pre-paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of three Dollars.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
At Reduced Prices.

READ WHAT A DISTINGUISHED MAN SAYS.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines have more than answered my highest expectations. Having now used them six months, I have tried them in a variety of different ways, and, after four years' trial, have no hesitation in saying that they are the best."—Hon. J. H. Hammond, Senator of South Carolina.

405 Broadway, New York. 18 Summer Street, Boston. 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore. 96 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati. 14 Camp Street, New Orleans. And 349 King Street, Charleston. 118 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHEN SWEET OF CONNECTICUT, the great natural Bone Setter.

Partial Deafness, Discharges from the Ear,
NOISES IN THE HEAD, CATARRH,
And all diseases of the Throat, EYE and EAR permanently cured by DRS. LIGHTHILL, No. 21 Bond Street, N. Y.
☞ Pamphlets sent gratis.

SANFORD'S HOT-AIR FURNACES!
PORTABLE OR SET IN BRICK.
THOUSANDS NOW IN USE.
SANFORD'S MAMMOTH OR GLOBE HEATER,
A favorite and economical Stove of great power.
SEND FOR A BOOK.
SANFORD, CRUSOW & CO.,
No. 239 Water Street.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and saving the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLD, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION OF THE LUNGS; while even CONSUMPTION itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.

It is your quaint Counsellor, of which there are several worthless ones, not that each bottle has the written signature of "I. BUTTS," as well as the printed name of the Proprietor, "SETH W. FOWLE & SONS, Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

HASLAM'S ARTIFICIAL EARS FOR THE DEAF conceeded. Send for circulars for illustrated circulars.
JEFFERSON HASLAM, 427 Broadway, N. Y.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 FAMILY MACHINE, $60.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines. It will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE for
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, FARKES & MOWER,
Wholesale Druggists,
12 Piccadilly, London, New York.

PIANO FORTES.
RAVEN, BACON & CO.,
Piano Forte Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 125 Grand Street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of instruments, with the recent improvements of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

Queen's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly.
The only available cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, in infant and adult.

Queen's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The finest remedy ever used in children. Also, Queen's Excelsior Corn Salve, 25 cents each. It is the best purgative for children. For Sale at the Depot, No. 120 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, FARKES & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 12 Piccadilly, London.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.

☞ A Clergyman having been cured of Consumption in his own family, after being given up to die by the most eminent physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, (which proved successful in every case,) to those afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, and he will send the same to any address, free of charge. Address, enclosing two stamps to pay return postage,
DANIEL ADEE,
217 County Street, N. Y.

Removal.
Wholesale and Retail office for Dr. H. JAMES'S CARABA DERMA, Nos. 34 and 36 John Street, N. Y. Agency of P. BROWN, Proprietor.

American Guano.
TO FARMERS AND DEALERS.
The Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable Manure ever discovered, is offered in large or small sale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address C. S. MARSHALL, Pres't, American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
R. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 69 Centre street.

Patent Extension Tables.
At Hewlett's Manufactory, 145, 139 Wooster Street.

Stolting's Ring, 1 Wilson's needle, offer for sale Ladies' Rogers—best new superior article; likewise for export to Mexico, Central and South America.

Foreign Music.
Webb & Allen, 1 Clinton Hall, Astor House, N. Y.

DISTINGUISH
THE LADIES' READY-MADE LINEN STORE,
981 Broadway, near 20th Street, for
LADIES' FINE LAUNDERED SHIRTS EXCLUSIVELY.
FINEST WORK ON PLAIN MATERIAL.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER
PAINT—A NEW, ELEGANT, Established Color,
For Rustic Wood, Iron, Tin, Bricks, Canvass, Muslin, Paper, &c., white metal, forming a metallic coat, spark and cinder proof. Durable and Economical. Depot 72 Maiden Lane, New York.

HICKS & BUTTS, Agents.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, and VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes in Paris and London.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER
Imparts a delicate rosy hue to the skin, and renders it soft and fair.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
EXTITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, DURABILITY IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.

602 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 RUMFORD STREET, BOSTON.
220 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
99 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

POWERFUL MICROSCOPES or Magnifying Glasses, for 25 cents. Magnifying more than five hundred times. Sent by mail everywhere. Five of different powers for $1. "Perfect little wonders."—Tribune. Address
C. B. UNDERWOOD, 114 Hanover Street, Boston.

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR Family or Manufacturing use. Will Knit Broadway, up stairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED.—To sell a new inventions. Agents have made over $25,000 in one,—others in all other similar agencies. Send four stamps, and get 50 pages particulars, gratis.
DANIEL ADEE, 217 County Street, Lowell, Mass.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES —Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in the market, or money refunded.
N.B.—PRICE REDUCED TO $50.
No. 569 Broadway.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read, and

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

No. 337.—DR. FITCH on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female Complaints, and the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 418 pages, 50 Engravings. —Price 50 cents; or sent for P. O. Orders.

No. 4 work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Head, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, and Kidney-ism, Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes disease. 121 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county town and office.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes 8vo, Illustrated, containing upward of 1500 Pages and
1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, and will be issued in Monthly Parts, at 25 cents each, on subscription offered. Applicants should address the publishers, as we would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES, Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 300 edition, over 400 pages, 12mo, cloth, and above 100 Illustrative Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York. This is the only popular medical book in the English or any adult person, as it imparts knowledge all long sought for in vain by the afflicted. Sold by R. LAW RENCE, No. 1 Vesey Street, Astor House.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 50 to 60 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

Commencement of the Twentieth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR DECEMBER.

CONTENTS.

WASHINGTON IN 1859.
With Nine Illustrations of the New Public Buildings.
HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA. By THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.
With Seven Illustrations.
INSECTS DESTRUCTIVE TO WHEAT.
With Twenty-three Illustrations.
THE ENCHANTED TITAN.
AN ARMISTICE.
THE RETURNED-TELLER. (Illustrated.)
THE GREAT LIBRARY OF STONEBURGH.
OUR OLD PEW.
WISDOM AND GOODNESS.
REGULAR HABITS. By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.
NOTES BY CHARLES LAMB TO THOMAS ALLSOP. By GEORGE WM. CURTIS.
"WENDY, WENDY, WICH."
A BIT OF ANGLING.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
HERRICKS'S VOYAGE OF LIFE.
Eighteen Humorous Drawings by MCLENAN.
FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.
With Two Illustrations.

The present Number commences the Twentieth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In the Introductory Notice prefixed to the first Number, the Publishers announced their intention to invest a periodical which no one who had the slightest relish for miscellaneous literature, or the slightest wish to keep himself informed of the progress and events of the literary genius of the age, would willingly be without. And they intended to publish it at so low a rate, and to give it a value so much beyond its price, that it would make its way into the hands or the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design the Twenty Volumes already published will abundantly show. Each of these contains as much matter as an ordinary octavo of 600 pages, costing, if illustrated as the style of the Magazine, at least $3 50 a volume. The Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine are thus equivalent to a library of more than a Hundred Volumes, comprising the best productions of the favored Novelists, Historians, Essayists, and Poets of the day.

Without entering into a comparison with other American periodicals, the Publishers may be permitted to say that HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains 16 per cent. more matter than any similar publication, and 33 per cent. more than any Monthly issued in Great Britain, including the Reviews of European Novelists and Essayists, HARPER'S MAGAZINE has originally furnished a large amount of original matter that is contained in any other similar publication, whether English or American. It has published articles from more than Two Hundred American writers, residing in every section of the country and every State of the Union. By thus welcoming contributions from every part of the land, the Publishers have efficiently promoted the Magazine from assuming a sectional character, and encouraged the growth of any "national scholarship" clique or party.

In the Illustrations department, HARPER'S is wholly without a rival. Nearly Two Thousand Engravings, mostly original, more than Six Thousand Engravings, most of them original, and the highest of their class, Portrait Drawings by DARLEY, PARSONS, HUNTINGTON, EASTMAN, WALKER, WILLIS, CHAPMAN, FREDERICKS, VOSS, BELLEW, BELLOWS, SHEPHERD, HOWARD, DALLAS, and others, and Fine Engravings have been published less than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Copies. Of the Fashion Plates, Illustrations have been considerably exceeded this amount. HARPER'S MAGAZINE has therefore, from the first, been the largest work in Quarter of a Million of Dollars to American Authors and Artists.

The Publishers have reason to believe that their large outlay has been remunerative beyond their most sanguine expectations. They hoped from the first that the Magazine would "make its way into the hands or the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States," but the number of these readers has proved far greater than they anticipated. They believe that the circulation of the Magazine will continue to increase with the growth and population of the country. They will, at all manner in which it will hereafter be conducted, keep pace with the progress of the times, and the value of the Volumes already issued.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE will continue to be sustained by the best talent that can be secured for it in all departments of literature, a hearty welcome will be given to new Authors. Every Number will contain fresh proofs of this, fresh names to the reading public, and the Editors trust that their list of Contributors will be found unrivalled.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year,	$4 00

The postage on HARPER'S MAGAZINE must be paid at the Office where it is received. The postage is Twenty-four Cents per year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

ITHE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER.—THREE CENTS EXTRA.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," Splendidly Illustrated by HABLOT K. BROWNE, commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

MR. WILLIAM H. RUSSELL'S Celebrated Serial Tale of American Life, entitled "TRUMPS," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 14.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for Six Months	2 50
One Copy for One Year	5 00
Two Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	40 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	80 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

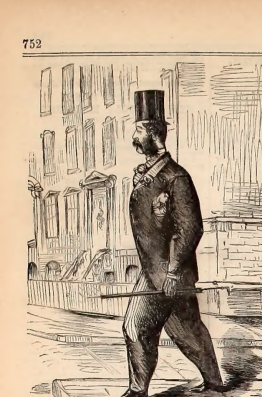
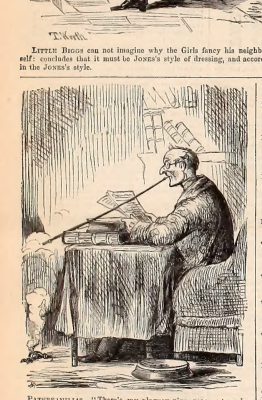
A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Publishers of Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.



LITTLE BIGGS can not imagine why the Girls fancy his neighbor JONES so much more than himself: concludes that it must be JONES's style of dressing, and accordingly orders a suit for himself cut in the JONES's style.



PATERFAMILIAS. "There's my plaguey pipe gone out again, and yet I've been pulling hard enough for at least ten minutes."

HARPER & BROTHERS,

327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square), New York,

Have out Ready:

THE VIRGINIANS.

A Tale of the Last Century.

By W. M. Thackeray.

AUTHOR OF

"The Newcomes," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "Henry Esmond," "The Great Hoggarty Diamond," "Lectures on the English Humorists," &c., &c.

With Illustrations by the Author.

8vo, Paper, $1 75; Muslin, $2 00.

[From the Edinburgh Review for Oct., 1859.

There is one point in which Fielding is a model for all time, and in which Mr. Thackeray is his worthy disciple, and, we venture to think, perfectly his equal. That point is, style and beauty of expression. Fielding's story was certainly more stirring, generally speaking, of him than ours. You may open any page of Fielding and enjoy him, and read it with pleasure, without reference to the story or context, merely as a piece of exquisite writing. The same may be said of Mr. Thackeray. It can hardly be said of any one else among the novelists of our day, most of whom seem never to have apprehended beauty of composition as a distinct object to be aimed at, and one which requires a distinct effort of the intellect in order to its achievement. Let them, if they wish to please greatly and live long, study their great leader's art in narrative, description, and dialogue, and those beautiful miniature essays, perfect in form as crystals, in which the sentiment of his novels is here and there condensed.

CYRUS BELL, Author of "Jane Eyre," &c.

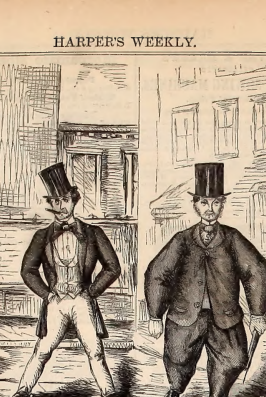
Why have I alluded to this man? I have alluded to him, reader, because I think I see in him an intellect profounder and more unique than his contemporaries have yet recognized, because I regard him as the first social regenerator of the day—as the very master of that working corps who would restore to us again the warped system of things: because I look to circumstantial or his writings has yet found the congenial hole into which, the terms which rightly characterize his talent. They say he is like Fielding: they talk of his wit, his humor, his knowledge of men. His resemblance Fielding as an eagle does a vulture; Fielding could sleep on carrion, but Thackeray never could. His wit is bright, his humor attractive, but both bear the same relation to his serious genius that the mere lambent shoot lightning, playing under the edge of the nimbus cloud, does to the electric death-spark hid in its womb.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage pre-paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.



The result can not fail to please.

Perfectly Pure

CREAM TARTAR

AND

BI-CARBONATE SODA.

We have the finest brands and best qualities in this line for the purpose of supplying the most particular GROCERIES, CONFECTIONERS, COFFEE-HOUSES, GROCER FAMILY STORES with an article perfectly pure and unadulterated, as represented on the papers and boxes. The CREAM TARTAR is prepared under our own supervision. We sell these goods in any desired package suitable for any trade.

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
126 and 128 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years!

Yet not inflated.

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

—

Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

Yet inflated.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving Coats, Vests, Shirts, and Jackets for Men and Boys, and Waists and Sacks for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

We would draw attention to the annexed unsolicited letter.

NEW ORLEANS, October 9, 1859.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Gentlemen:

Having been moved by one of your "PATENT LIFE-PRESERVING VESTS," I deem it my duty to make it known to the public. I was on the Steamboat "Princess" when she was burned, and had it not been for one of your Vests (which I assure you are invaluable), should have been drowned. I therefore cordially recommend it to the public.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your well wisher,
Captain I. B. THOMSEIN.

FROM THE

Springfield Republican.

W. E. HAGAR & Co., of TROY, N. Y., manufacture a hair restorative that takes precedence of all others. It renders the hair more soft and flexible, and stimulates its growth to luxuriance. In our special notice column may be found a strong testimonial to its merits which is only one of the many its manufacturers have received.

Sold everywhere—Price 50 cents a bottle.

The Eleventh Thousand now ready of

BEULAH.

By

AUGUSTA J. EVANS.

1 vol. 12mo, $1 25.

From GEO. WOOD, Author of "Peter Schemihll in America."

"I see it compared to Jane Eyre. They are both remarkable books, but Currer Bell never could have written such a book as 'Beulah.' It is a psychological wonder, such a book as 'Goethe' would have read with astonishment and delight, for he would have appreciated it."

Single copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers,
No. 119 Nassau Street, New York.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best style, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DREADNAUGHT BEAVERS,

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS

In great variety, at the lowest prices for cash.

WM. H. HAVILAND & CO.,
Nos. 226, 228, and 230 Broadway.

DR. J. D. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED

UTERINE CATHOLICON,

FOR THE RELIEF AND CURE OF SUFFERING FEMALES.

With such universal suffering as saddens the female life, a truly efficient medicine must be their best friend. Where the most eminent physicians have failed, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and happiness to the fireside. "The cures of Female Complaints by Marchisi's Catholicon are truly surprising."—New Bedford Standard. "It has cured an obstinate case in our own family."—Women's Advocate, Phila. "No article ever answered the recommendations like this. I use it in my practice with astonishing success."—E. R. PARKER, M.D., Marietta, O. "I have tested it in cases of Irregularities, Ulcerations, Leucorrhœa, Flooding and Painful Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteris, &c., with great success."—JOHN H. GRIFFITH, M.D., Cincinnati, O. "Has a CARDINAL, M.D., Baltimore, Md. "I prevail upon medical men to test it."—JESSE LOVE, M.D., Lancaster, Wis., Co. Such letters pour in from a thousand sources, showing it is

Never taken without Benefit.

It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the Female Sex. Daughters, Wives, and Mothers! Marchisi's Catholicon will cure you. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by Agents. ☞ Do not confound DR. MARCHISI with any other name. It is sold at $2 per bottle, or three bottles for $5, by an Agent in almost every town. When not found, existing orders, and order by Express. Address

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
12 and 13 PARK ROW, N. Y.,
Or J. D. PARK, Cincinnati; Sawyer, Carter, Boston; J. Wright & Co., New Orleans; Callender & Co., Philadelphia; J. S. MARCHISI, M. D.

$3 A DAY. $3

We want a few men in every State to act as our agents for an article of real worth. It is easily sold in every store and to every family.

We have some agents who are making from $10 to $20 a day profit. This is none of those recipes or humbug articles with which the country is flooded, but is something of actual utility, and all that is required to sell it, is to show it.—Any one in the United States sending us 15 cents will receive a sample by mail, postage paid, worth that amount, and all necessary information.

Write your name and P.O. address in a plain hand. Canada letters must contain 40 cents in specie.

Address VAN DEUSEN BROTHERS,
Kingston,
Ulster Co., N. Y.

ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, Oct. 10th, 1859.

Dear Sir:

Please send me $7 00, for which you will please deliver the Bearer one case of Dr. J. Bovee Doll's Imperial Wine Bitters. Those sold by all leading retailers' agencies in the country, so as to place the Bitters within the reach of all who desire to use them. Yours truly,

P. S.—I have been seven years troubled with Dyspepsia, the use of a few bottles I have been greatly benefited.

Yours truly,
J. McDONALD,
Montreal,
Canada.

TO CHARLES WITHERFIELD,
549 and 551 Broadway, N. Y.

Overcoats—$2 50, $4 50, $5 50, $6 50, $10 and $15.
BUSINESS SUITS—$6 50, $8 50, $9, $10, $12, $15, $20.
PANTS and VESTS—$1 to $10. Gents' Furnishing Goods, at GEO. A. HUTCHINSON'S,
Mammoth Clothing Store,
Nos. 209 and 211 Bowery.

Hosiery

and Men's Furnishing Goods.

A great assortment of best grades at prices generally paid for inferior qualities.

Call, examine, and compare. One price, and money cheerfully refunded in case of dissatisfaction.

A. RANKIN & CO.,
No. 627 Broadway and No. 96 Bowery.
Established in 1853.

THE UNIVERSAL COUGH REMEDY
For all Lung Complaints
THE CELEBRATED PULMONIC ANODYNE
The great Nostrum Remedy.
And adapted to all Pulmonary Complaints
This celebrated New England preparations are now being distributed throughout the country, to which we invite the attention of all. Circulars, testimonials, and every thing to enlighten the community, may be found with druggists generally, or will be sent free.
J. W. BUNNEWELL & Co., Commercial Wharf, Bost.
GEO. BUNNEWELL, 185 Water Street, New York.
Also for sale by the usual Wholesale Agents in every city.

J. L. BUNNEWELL, Pharmaceutist, Superintendent.

WALKER'S PIANO-FORTE WARE-ROOMS, Concert Hall, Astor Place and 5th Street, near Broadway.—A large stock of new and second hand PIANOS for sale. Description PIANOS FOR SALE and HIRE at reduced prices.

N.B.—The hire allowed in case of purchase.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 152.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

[From Advance Sheets, purchased direct from the Author.]

PREAMBLE.

THIS is the story of what a Woman's patience can endure, and of what a Man's resolution can achieve.

If the machinery of the Law could be depended on to fathom every case of suspicion, and to conduct every process of inquiry, with moderate assistance only from the lubricating influences of oil of gold, the events which fill these pages might have claimed their share of the public attention in a Court of Justice.

But the Law is still, in certain inevitable cases, the pre-engaged servant of the long purse; and the story is left to be told, for the first time, in this place. As the Judge might once have heard it, so the Reader shall hear it now. No circumstance of importance, from the beginning to the end of the disclosure, shall be related on hearsay evidence. When the writer of these introductory lines (Walter Hartright, by name) happens to be more closely connected than others with the incidents to be recorded, he will describe them in his own person. When his experience fails, he will retire from the position of narrator; and his task will be continued, from the point at which he has left it off, by other persons who can speak to the circumstances under notice from their own knowledge, just as clearly and positively as he has spoken before them.

Thus, the story here presented will be told by more than one pen, as the story of an offense against the laws is told in Court by more than one witness—with the same object, in both cases, to present the truth always in its most direct and most intelligible aspect; and to trace the course of one complete chain of events, by making the persons who have been most closely connected with them, at each successive stage, relate their own experience, word for word.

Let Walter Hartright, teacher of drawing, aged twenty-eight years, be heard first.

THE NARRATIVE OF WALTER HART-RIGHT, OF CLEMENT'S INN, LONDON.

I.

IT was the last day of July. The long hot summer was drawing to a close; and we, the weary pilgrims of the London pavement, were beginning to think of the cloud-shadows on the corn-fields, and the autumn breezes on the seashore.

For my own poor part, the fading summer left me out of health, out of spirits, and, if the truth must be told, out of money as well. During the past YEAR, I had not managed my professional resources as carefully as usual; and my extravagance now limited me to the prospect of spending the autumn economically between my mother's cottage at Hampstead, and my own chambers in town.

The evening, I remember, was still and cloudy; the London air was at its heaviest; the distant hum of the street-traffic was at its faintest. The small holes of the fire visible me and the great heart of the city around me seemed to be sinking in unison, languidly and more languidly, with the sinking sun. I roused myself from the book which I was dreaming over rather than reading, and left my chambers to meet the cool night air in the suburbs. It was one of the two evenings in every week which I was accustomed to spend with my mother and my sister. So I turned my steps northward, in the direction of Hampstead.

Events which I have yet to relate, make it necessary to mention in this place that my father had been dead some years at the period of which I am now writing; and that my sister Sarah, and I were the sole survivors of a family of five children. My father was a drawing-master before me. His exertions had made him highly successful in his profession; and his affectionate anxiety to provide for the future of those who were dependent on his labors, had impelled him, from the time of his marriage, to devote to the insuring of his life a much larger portion of his income than most men consider it necessary to set aside for that purpose. Thanks to his admirable prudence and self-denial, my mother and sister were left, after his death, in independence of the world as they had been during his lifetime. I succeeded to his connection, and had every reason to feel grateful for the prospect that awaited me at my starting in life.

The quiet delight was still trembling on the topmost ridges of the heath; and the view of London below me had sunk into a black gulf in the shape of the cloudy night, when I stood before the gate of my mother's cottage.

I had rarely rung the bell, before the house door was opened violently; my worthy Italian friend, Professor Pesca, appeared in the doorway; and, seizing me by both hands, began to receive me, with a shrill foreign parcely on an English cheer.

On his own account, and, I must be allowed to add, on mine also, the Professor merited the honor of a formal introduction. An accident has made him the starting-point of the strange family story which it is now my task and my duty to unfold.

I had first become acquainted with my Italian friend by meeting him at certain great houses, where he taught his own language and I taught drawing. All I then knew of the history of his life was, that he had once held a situation in the University of Padua; that he had left Italy for political reasons (the nature of which he uniformly declined to mention to any one); and that he had been for many years respectably established in London as a teacher of languages.

Without being actually a dwarf—for he was perfectly well-proportioned from head to foot—Pesca was, I think, the smallest human being I ever saw, out of a show-room. Remarkable as my whole, by his personal appearance, he was still further distinguished among the rank and file of mankind, by the harmless eccentricity of his character. The ruling idea by which he appeared to be, that he was bound to show his gratitude to the country which had afforded him an asylum and a means of subsistence, by doing his utmost to turn himself into an Englishman. Not content with paying the nation in general the compliment of invariably carrying an umbrella, and invariably wearing gaiters and a white hat, the Professor further aspired to become an Englishman in his habits and amusements, as well as in his personal appearance. Finding us distinguished, as a nation, by our love of athletic exercises, the little man, at the imminent risk of his heart, devoted himself impromptu to all our English sports and pastimes, whenever he had the opportunity of joining them; firmly persuaded that he could adopt our national amusements of the field, but an effort of will, precisely as he had adopted our national gaiters and our national white hat.

I had seen him risk his limbs blindly at a fox-hunt and in a cricket-field; and, soon afterward, I saw him risk his life, just as blindly, in the sea at Brighton. We had met there accidentally, and were bathing together. If we had been engaged in any exercise peculiar to my own nation, I should, of course, have looked after Pesca carefully; but, as foreigners are generally quite as well able to take care of themselves in the water as Englishmen, it never occurred to me that the art of swimming might merely add one more to the list of manly exercises which the Professor believed that he could learn impromptu. Soon after we had both struck out from shore, I stopped, finding my friend did not gain on me, and turned round to look for him. To my horror and amazement, I saw nothing between me and the beach but two little white arms, which struggled for an instant above the surface of the water, and then disappeared from view. When I dived for him, the poor little man was lying quietly coiled up at the bottom, in a hollow of shingle, looking by many degrees smaller than I had ever seen him look before. During the few minutes that elapsed while I was taking him in, he never revived him, and he ascended the steps of the machine with my assistance. With the partial recovery of his animation came the return of his wonderful delusion on the subject of swimming. As soon as his chattering teeth would let him speak, he smiled vacantly, and said he thought it must have been the Cramp.

When he had thoroughly recovered himself and had joined me on the beach, he was seen bowing broke through all artificial English restraints, in a moment. He overwhelmed me with the violent expressions of affection—exclaimed passionately, in his exaggerated Italian way, that he would hold his life, henceforth, at my disposal—and declared that he should never be happy again, until he had found an opportunity of proving his gratitude by rendering me some service which I might remember, on my side, to the end of my days. I did my best to stop the torrent of his tears and protestations, by persisting in treating the whole adventure as a good subject for a joke; and succeeded at last, as I imagined, in lessening Pesca's overwhelming sense of obligation to me. Little did I think, then—little did I think afterward when our pleasant Brighton holiday had drawn to an end —that the opportunity of serving me for which my grateful companion so ardently longed, was soon to come; that he was speedily to seize it on the instant; and that, by so doing, he was to turn the whole current of my existence into a new channel, and to alter me to myself almost past recognition.

Yet, so it was. If I had not dived for Professor Pesca, when he lay under water on his shingle bed, I should, in all human probability, never have been connected with the story which these pages will relate—I should never, perhaps, have heard even the name of the woman, who has lived in all my thoughts, who has possessed herself of all my energies, who has become the one guiding influence that now directs the purpose of my life.

II.

PESCA'S face and manner, on the evening when we confronted each other at my mother's gate, were more than sufficient to inform me that something extraordinary had happened. It was quite useless, however, to ask him for an immediate explanation. I could only conjecture, while he was dragging me in by both hands, that (knowing my habits) he had come up to the cottage to make sure of meeting me that night, and that he had some news to tell of an unusually agreeable kind.

We both bounced into the parlor in a highly abrupt and undignified manner. My mother sat by the open window, knitting and fanning herself. Pesca was one of her especial favorites; and his wildest eccentricities were always pardonable in her eyes. Poor dear soul! from the first moment when she found out that the little Professor was deeply and gratefully attached to her son, she opened her heart to him unreservedly, and took all his puzzling foreign peculiarities for granted, without so much as attempting to understand any one of them.

My sister Sarah, with all the advantages of youth, was, strangely enough, less pliable. She did full justice to Pesca's excellent qualities of heart; but she could not accept him implicitly, as my mother accepted him, for my sake. Her insular notions of propriety rose in perpetual revolt against Pesca's constitutional contempt for appearances; and she was always more or less undisguisedly astonished at her mother's familiarity with the eccentric little foreigner. I have observed, not only in my sister's case, but in the instances of others, that we of the young generation are nothing like so large and so impulsive as some of our elders. I constantly see old people blushed and excited by the prospect of some anticipated pleasure which altogether fails to ruffle the tranquillity of their serene grandchildren. Are we, I wonder, quite such genuine boys and girls now as our seniors were, in their time? Has the great advance in education taken rather too long a stride; and are we, in these modern days, just the least trifle in the world too well brought up?

Without attempting to answer these questions decisively, I may at least record that I never saw my mother and my sister together in Pesca's society, without finding my mother much the younger woman of the two. On this occasion, for example, while the old lady was laughing heartily over the boyish manner in which we tumbled into the parlor, Sarah was perturbedly picking up the broken pieces of a teacup, which the Professor had knocked off the table in his precipitate advance to meet me at the door.

"I TURNED ON THE INSTANT, WITH MY FINGERS TIGHTENING ROUND THE HANDLE OF MY STICK."

"I don't know what would have happened, Walter," said my mother, "if you had delayed much longer. Pesca has been half-mad with impatience; and I have been half-mad with curiosity. The Professor has brought some wonderful news from Italy, in which we are all more or less concerned; and he has cruelly refused to give us the smallest bit of it till you and Walter appeared.

"Very provoking: it spoils the Set," murmured Sarah to herself, mournfully absorbed over the ruins of the broken cup.

While these words were being spoken, Pesca, happily and finally unconscious of the irreparable wrong which the crockery had suffered at his hands, was dragging a large chair from the opposite end of the room, so as to command us all from it, in the character of an audience addressing an audience. Having turned the chair with its back toward us, he jumped into it on his knees, and excitedly addressed his small congregation of three from an impromptu pulpit.

"Now, my good dears," began Pesca (who always said "good dears" when he meant "worthy friends"), "listen to me. Walter has come—I recite my good news—I speak at last."

"Hear, hear!" said my mother, humoring the joke.

"The next thing he will break, mamma," whispered Sarah, "will be the back of the best arm-chair."

"I go back into my life, and I address myself to the noblest of created beings," continued Pesca, vehemently apostrophizing the mahogany self, over the top rail of the chair. "Who found me, dead at the bottom of the sea (through Cramp); and who pulled me up to the top; and what did I say when I got into my own life and my own clothes again?"

"Much more than was at all necessary," I answered, as promptly as possible to the less encouragement in connection with this appeal—invariable let loose the Professor's emotions in a flood of tears.

"I said," persisted Pesca, "that my life belonged to my dear friend, Walter, for the rest of my days—and so it does. I said that I should never be happy again till I had found the opportunity of doing a great kindness for Walter—and I have never been contented with myself till this moment. Now, I am happy, and the enthusiastic little man at the top of his voice, "the overflowing happiness bursts out of me at every pore of my body, like a prisoner; for on my faith, and soul, and house, the Sonne this is done at last, and the only word to say now, is—Hegit-all-right!"

It may be necessary to explain, here, that Pesca prided himself on being a perfect Englishman in his language, as well as in his dress, manners, and sentiments. Having come to him turning them, in his high relish for their sound, into the strangest sentences of their sense, into compound words and repetitions of his own, and always running them into each other, as if they consisted of one long syllable.

"Among the five London houses where I teach the language of my adoption," said the Professor, rushing into his long-deferred explanation without another word of preface, "there is one, my dears, in the City of the oldlime Dante to the young Misses, and oh!—how! real-blues—my dears! It is not a modern language to say how the sublime Dante puzzles the pretty heads of all three! No matter—all is good time—and these lessons for Walter for me. Now mind! Imagine to yourselves that I am teaching to my young Misses, as usual. We are all four of us down together in the Hell of Dante. At the Seventh Circle—but no matter for that till the Circles are safely in the three young Misses, for and into—at the Seventh Circle, nevertheless, my pupils are safely there; and I to set them going again, recite, explain, and blow myself up red-hot with useless enthusiasm, when—good—at bonn is a passage outside, and in comes the golden Papa, the mighty merchant with the native money in his two chins.—Ha! my good dears, I am clean than you think for to the business, now. Has you been patient, so? or have you not to yourselves, 'Deuce-what-the-deuce' Pesca is long-winded or quick?"

We declared that we were deeply interested. The Professor went on:

"In his hand, the golden Papa has a letter; and after he has made his excuse for disturbing me in our Inferno Region with such common mortal business of the house, he addresses himself to the three young Misses, and begins as you English begin every thing in this blessed world that you have to say, with a great O. 'O, my dears,' says the mighty merchant, 'I have got here a letter from my friend, Mr. ——' (the name has slipped out of my mind; but no matter; we shall come back to that; you—right-all-right). So the Papa says, 'I have got a letter from my friend, the Master' (he wears a recommend from me, of a drawing-master, to go down to his house in the country.' My-soul-bless-my-soul! when I heard the golden papa say those words, I—I had been big enough to reach up to him, I should have put my arms round his neck and pressed him to my bosom in a long and grateful hug! As it was, I only bonnced upon my chair. My seat was on thorns, and my soul was on fire to speak; but I held my tongue, and let Papa go on. 'Perhaps you know,' says this good man of money, unfolding his friend's letter this way and that, in his golden fingers and thumbs, 'perhaps you know, my dears, of a drawing-master to the Misses Sargent?' The three young Misses all look at each other, and then set pressed him to my bosom (he great O to begin), 'O, dear no, Papa!' But here is Mr. Pesca—' At the mention of myself I am bold to engage, by the mighty Dante, my good dears, mounts like blood to my head and I start from my chair as if a pistol-shot had go' from the ground through the bottom of my chair—I address myself to the mighty merchant, and I engage myself to the Misses to have the man. The first and foremost drawing-master in the world! Immediately I have the post to-night, and send him off, bag and baggage (English phrase again—ha!), send him off to the Misses Sargent. By the next morning's post. 'Stop, stop,' says the Papa, 'is he a foreigner or an Englishman?' I turn round to the mighty merchant, and I answer. 'Respectable?' says Papa. 'Sir,' I say (for this last question of his outrages me), 'sir, you have my friend's testimonials in him).' Sir, the immortal fire of genius burns in my friend's bosom.' 'Sir,' says Papa, 'I have his father had it before him!' 'Never mind,' says the golden barbarian of a Papa, 'never mind about his genius, Mr. Pesca, but is he sober?' Sir, genius in this country, unless it is accompanied by respectability—and then we are not to talk of such,' I answer. 'Respectable?' says Papa. 'Sir,' I say (for this last question of his outrages me), 'sir, you have my friend's testimonials in him). 'Sir, the immortal fire of genius burns in my friend's bosom.' 'Sir,' says Papa, 'I have his father had it before him!' 'Never mind,' says the golden barbarian of a Papa, 'never mind about his genius, Mr. Pesca, but is he sober?' Sir, genius in this country, unless it is accompanied by respectability—and then we are not to talk of such,' I answer. 'Respectable?' says Papa. 'Sir,' I say (for this last question of his outrages me), 'sir, you have my friend's testimonials in him).'

the manner of a woman in the humblest rank of life. The voice, little as I had yet heard of it, had something curiously still and mechanical in its tones, and the utterance was remarkably rapid. She held a small bag in her hand: and her dress—bonnet, shawl, and gown all of white —was, so far as I could guess, certainly not composed of very delicate or very expensive materials. Her figure was slight, and rather above the average height—her gait and actions free from the slightest approach to extravagance. This was all that I could observe of her, in the dim light and under the perplexing disadvantage circumstances of our meeting. What sort of woman she was, and how she came to be out alone in the high-road, an hour after midnight, I altogether failed to guess. The one thing of which I felt certain was, that the grossest of mankind could not have mistrustfully misconstrued my speaking, when at this unprecisely late hour and in that suspiciously lonely place.

"Did you hear me?" she said, still quietly and readily, and without the least fretfulness or impatience. "I asked if that was the way to London."

"Yes," I replied, "that is the way: it leads to St. John's Wood and the Regent's Park. You must excuse my not answering you before. I was rather startled by your sudden appearance in the road; and I am, even now, quite unable to account for it."

"You don't suspect me of doing any thing wrong, do you?" she said, without the least fretfulness or impatience. "I asked if that was the way to London."

"Yes," I replied, "that is the way: it leads to St. John's Wood and the Regent's Park. You must excuse my not answering you before. I was rather startled by your sudden appearance in the road; and I am, even now, quite unable to account for it."

"You don't suspect me of doing any thing wrong, do you?" she said, without the least fretfulness or impatience. "I asked if that was the way to London.

EN ROUTE FOR HARPER'S FERRY.—[SKETCHED BY PORTE CRAYON.]

EN ROUTE FOR HARPER'S FERRY.

Our artist, Porte Crayon, who was one of the first at Harper's Ferry after the late outbreak, and who has since followed up the affair with patient attention, has sent us the above design, representing the rush to Harper's Ferry from all parts of Virginia and Maryland. Old and young seem to have been quite excited, and to have marched with ardor, not knowing what they might not have to encounter at the end of their journey.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

THE BELCH PLATFORM.

"My dear Mr. Newt, as a friend who has the highest respect for you, and the firmest faith in your future, I am sure you will allow me to say one thing."

"Oh! certainly, my dear Belch; say two," replied Abel, with the utmost suavity, and secretly wondering whether he or the General were the cleverer man.

"I have no peculiar ability, I know," continued the other, "but I have, perhaps, a little more experience than you. We old men, you know, always plume ourselves upon experience, which we make do duty for all the virtues and all the talents."

"And it is trained for that service by being merely a synonym for a knowledge of all the sins and rascalities," said Abel, smiling, as he blew rings of smoke and passed the decanter to General Belch.

"True," replied the other; "very true. I see, my dear Newt, that you have had your eyes and your mind open, as I knew you must have had. And since we are going to act together—since, in fact, we are interested in the same plans—"

"And principles," interrupted Abel, laying his head back, and looking with half-closed eyes at the vanishing smoke.

"Oh yes, I was coming to that—in the same plans and principles, it is well that we should understand each other perfectly."

General Belch paused, looked at Abel, and took snuff.

"I think we do already," replied Abel.

"Still there are one or two points to which I would call your attention. In preparing your speech there are two great points to remember. One is, that you can not be too careful of what you say in regard to its bearing upon the party; and the other is, a general rule that the Public is an ass, but you must never let it know you think so. If there is one thing which the party has practically proved, it is that the people have no will of their own, but are sheep in the hands of the shepherd."

The General took snuff again.

"The Public, then, is an ass and a sheep?" inquired Abel.

"Yes," said the General, "an ass in capacity, and in preference of a thistle diet; a sheep in gregarious and stupid following. You say 'Co, co, co,' when you want a cow to follow you, and you say 'Glorious old party,' and 'Intelligence of the people,' and 'Preference of truth to victory,' and so forth, when you want the people to follow you."

"An ass, a sheep, and a cow," said Abel. "To what other departments of natural history do the people belong, General?"

"Adders," returned Belch, sententiously.

"How so?" asked Abel, amused.

"Because they are so cold and ungrateful," said the General.

"As when, for instance," returned Abel, "the Honorable Watkins Bodley, having faithfully served his constituency, is turned adrift by—by—the people."

He looked at Belch and laughed. The fat nose of the General glistened.

"No, no," said he, "your illustration is at fault. He did not faithfully serve his constituency. He was not sound upon the great Grant question."—The two gentlemen laughed together and filled their glasses.

THE ROYAL ROAD TO LEARNING—THE PRINCE OF WALES AT OXFORD.—[FROM PUNCH.]

THE EAGE IN THE MIRROR.

"No, no," resume d the General, "never forget that the great thing is drill—discipline. Keep the machinery well oiled, and your hand upon the crank, and all goes well."

"Until somebody comes with your hand," said Abel.

"Yes, of course—of course; but that is the very point. The fight is never among the sheep, but only among the shepherds. Look at our colonial system, hanging with Tom, Dick, and Ned, and culminating in the President — the roots rather red and unsightly, but oh! such a pretty flower, all bright with gilt gloves, and affability — contemplate the superb machinery," continued the General, warming with his primaries, the ward committees, the—in fact, all the rest of it—see how gloriously it works—the great result of the working of the whole is—"

"To establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our posterity," interrupted Abel, who had been scanning the Constitution, and who delivered the words with a theatrical jump of manner.

General Bebb smiled approvingly.

"That's it—that's the very tune. You'll do. The great result is, that we shall have his hand on the crank. And there are, therefore, always three parties in our beloved country:"

Abel looked inquiringly.

"First, the party of the few, who are in two bodies—the clique that have it, and the clique that haven't. They fight like fury among themselves, but when they scent a larger great party they all fight together, because the hopes of the crank for each individual of each body lie in the party itself, and in their obedience to its discipline. These are two of the parties. Then there is the great party of the ass, who have a marvelous unanimity, and never break up into quarrelsome bodies until there is a fair chance of the party's ousting the few. I say these things not because they are not pretty obvious, but because, as a man of fashion and society, you have probably not attended to these things. It's very dirty work for a gentleman. But I suppose any of us would be willing to pick a gold eagle out of the mud, even if we did soil our fingers; and I have no doubt a diver would dive into a sea of bilge-water if he could have the pearl he found at the bottom."

"Of course," replied Abel, in a tone that General Bebb did not entirely comprehend—"of course no gentleman knows any thing of politics, or is conscious of the condition of his country. Gentlemen are the natural governors of a country; and when they were erected into a hereditary governing class, self-respect forbids them to mix with inferior men. Good Heavens! what gentleman would be guilty of being an alderman in this town! Why, as you know, my dear Bebb, nothing but the strongest circumstances induces me to demean myself by going to Congress. By-the-by—"

"Well, what is it?" asked the General.

"I'm dreadfully hard up," said Abel. "I have just the d—dest luck you ever conceived, and I must raise some money."

The fat nose glistened again, while the General sat silently ponderous.

"I can lend you a thousand," he said, at length.

"Thank you. It will oblige me very much."

"Upon conditions," added the General.

"Conditions?" asked Abel, surprised.

"I mean understandings," said the General.

"Oh! certainly," answered Abel.

"You pledge yourself to me and our friends that you will at the earliest moment move in the matter of the grain—you engage to secure the votes somehow, relying upon the pecuniary aid of our friends who are interested—and you will repay me out of your first receipts. Elo well under. I have a high respect for cellar stairs, but they mustn't try to lead up to the roof. Good-by. Hail Newt! Something to be" laughed the General, as he shook hands and followed his fat nose out of the door.

Left to himself, Abel walked for some time up and down his room with his hands buried in his pockets and a sneering smile upon his face. He suddenly drew one hand out, raised it, clenched it, and tossed it violently away in the air, as he muttered, contemptuously,

"What a stupid fool! I wonder if he never thinks, as he looks in the glass, that it is not what he is made to lend him by."

Far the ugliness and fat-nosed General had omitted to look at the little paper he handed to him, thinking it would be hardly polite to do so under the circumstances. But he felt, as soon as he would have seen that the exact sum they had spoken of had been forgotten, and a very inconsiderable amount was specified.

It had flashed across Abel's mind in a moment that if the General unconsciously discovered it and were disposed to make trouble, the disclosure of the paper of instructions, and the bad written, and which Abel had in his possession, would ruin his hopes of political financiering. "And as for my election, why I have my certificate in my pocket."

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

MIDNIGHT.

GRADUALLY the noise died away from Abel's face, and he walked up and down the room, no longer carelessly, but fitfully; stopping sometimes —again starting more rapidly—leaning against the mantle, on which the clock pointed to midnight—then throwing himself into a chair, or upon a sofa; and so rising again he walked on.

His head bent forward—his eyes grew rounder and harder, and seemed to be burnished with the black, bad lustre—his step imperceptibly grew steadily—he looked about him carefully —he stood erect and breathless to listen—bit his nails, and walked on.

The clock upon the mantle pointed to half an hour after midnight. Abel Newt rose from the counter and put on his slippers. He lighted a candle and looked carefully under the bed and in the closet. Then he drew the curtains over the windows and went out into the other room, closing and locking the door behind him.

He prided noiselessly to the door that opened into the entry, and locked that softly and bolted it carefully. Then he stood with his ear to the wards filled the keyhole, and taking out his handkerchief he hung it over the hook of the door, so that it hid the keyhole, and no eye could by any chance have peered into the room.

He saw that the blinds of the windows were closed—the windows shut and locked, and the linen shades drawn over them. He also bet full the heavy damask curtains, so that the windows were quite secure from the rear. He stood in the centre of the room and looked every where that, by any chance, a person might be concealed.

Then moving upon tip-toe he drew a key from his pocket and fitted it into the lid of a secretary. As he turned it in the lock the snap of the bolt made him start. He was angered, even ghostly, as he stood, letting the lid back slowly lest it should creak or jar. With another key he opened a little drawer, and looking behind him as he did so, took out a small piece of paper, which he concealed in his hand.

Seating himself at the secretary, he put the candle before him, and remained for a moment with his face slightly averted, as though in a startling interstatus of listening. There was no sound but the regular ticking of the clock upon the mantle. He had not observed it before, but now he could hear nothing else.

Tick, tick. Tick, tick. It had a persistent, relentless, remorseless regularity. Tick, tick. Tick, tick. Every moment it appeared to be louder and louder. His brow wrinkled and his head bent forward more deeply, while his eyes were set straight before him. Tick, tick. Tick, tick. The solemn beat became human as he listened. He could not raise his head—he could not turn his eyes. He felt as if some awful shape stood over him with destroying eyes and inflexible tongue. But struggling, without moving, as a dreamer wrestles with the nightmare, he presently sprang bolt upright—his eyes wide and wild—the sweat oozing upon his ghastly forehead—his whole frame weak and quivering. With the same suddenness he turned defiantly, clenching his fists, in act to spring.

There was nothing there. He saw only the clock—he felt pendulum regularly swinging—he heard only the regular tick, tick; tick, tick.

A sickly smile glimmered on his face as he stepped toward the mantle, still clutching the paper in his hand, but crouching as he came, and leering, as if to leap upon an enemy unawares. Suddenly he started as if struck—a stifled shriek of horror burst from his lips—he snapped with his hand upward—the paper fell fluttering to the floor. Abel Newt had unexpectedly seen the reflection of his face in the mirror that covered the chimney behind the clock.

He recovered himself—swore bitterly, and stooped to pick up the paper. Then with sullen bravado, still staring at his reflection in the glass, he took off the glass shade of the clock, touched the pendulum and stopped it; then turning his back, crept to his chair, and sat down again.

The silence was profound, not a sound was audible but the creaking of his clothes as he moved slowly against the edge of the desk and drew his agitated breath. He raised the candle and bent his sickly face over the paper which he held before him. It was a note of his late firm indorsed by Lawrence Newt & Co. He had sent it to some private person, he studying every line, every dot—to intently that it seemed as if his eyes were burnt in. Then putting down the candle and spreading the name before him, he drew a sheet of tissue paper from a drawer and began to trace. The writing was perfectly legible—the finest stroke showed through the thin tissue. He pulled a pen and carefully drew the lines of the signature upon the tissue paper. Then raised it—the fac-simile was perfect.

Taking a thicker piece of paper, he laid the note before him, and slowly, carefully, copied the signature. It was not even a resemblance, but nothing more. He held the paper in the flame of the candle until it was consumed. He laid it again. He tried many times. Each time was a greater success.

To write a letter from his book he filled the blanks and wrote below the name of Lawrence Newt & Co., and found upon comparison with the indorsement that it was very like. Abel Newt grinned; his lips moved: he was muttering "Dear Uncle Lawrence."

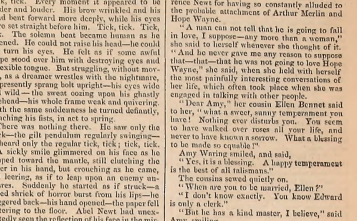
He stopped writing, and carefully burned, as before, the check and all the paper. Then certain that his hands in his cuffs were not seen by himself, as the hot, hurried thoughts flickered through his mind:

"Yes, yes, Mrs. Lawrence Newt, I shall not be master of Pinewood, but I shall be of your husband, and will be master of your property. Practice makes perfect. Dear Uncle Lawrence shall write you a letter."

His brain reeled and whirled as he sat. He remembered the words of his friend the General: "Nothing succeeds like a term to fail."

"No, by God!" he shouted, springing up, and clenching his hands.

He staggered. The walls of the room, the floor, the ceiling, the furniture heaved and rolled before his eyes. In the wild tumult that overwhelmed his brain, he was sinking in gurgling whirlpools—the peaceful lawn of Pinewood—the fight with Gabriel—the running horses—the "farewell forever, Miss Murray"—the shifting scenes of his subsequent life of dissipation—flame blazing with diamonds—the figure of his father drowning with white fingers upon his office desk—Lawrence and Gabriel pushing him out—they all swept before his consciousness in the moment of agony that drove out his hands wildly, clutched at the air, and plunged headlong upon the floor, senseless.



CHAPTER LXXIX.

SECRETS.

AMY WARING waited patiently until either Lawrence Newt or Hope Wayne should appear. They were engaged. Nobody suspected her secret: for she did not carry it in her face, nor believe that life was altogether a tragedy and the world a failure, because she had loved a man, who, as was entirely natural, loved another woman. She did not blame Lawrence Newt for having so constantly alluded to the probable attachment of Arthur Merlin and Hope Wayne.

"A man can not tell that he is going to fall in love, I suppose—any more than a woman," Amy said to herself whenever the thought of it.

"And he never gave me any reason to suppose that—that—that he was going to love Hope Wayne," she said, when she held with herself the most painfully interesting conversations of her life, which often took place when she was engaged in talking with other people.

"Dear Amy," her cousin Ellen Bennet said to her, "what a sweet, sunny temperament you have! Nothing ever disturbs you. You seem to have walked over none of your life, and never to have known a sorrow. What a blessing to be made so equable!"

Amy Waring smiled, and said,

"Yes, it is a blessing. A happy temperament is the best of all talismans."

The cousins sewed quietly on.

"When are you to be married, Ellen?"

"I don't know exactly. You know Edward is only a clerk."

"But he has a kind master, I believe," said Amy, smiling.

"Yes, I think if there be such a thing Edward has found it."

"Do you speak of the junior partner?" asked Amy, pleasantly.

"No, I do not, but of the senior. I mean, of course, the firm; for I never knew two men so matched in spirit and tastes as Lawrence Newt and Gabriel. Why doesn't Hope Wayne take him?"

"What?" asked Amy.

"Why, it is in the books, you know—it must be that they are going to marry each other, and I don't think they've any time to lose."

"I suppose it will all come right in due time," replied Amy, busily working.

"Amy," said Ellen, after a pause, during which there was incessant stitching.

"Well, dear," replied Amy, but felt that she winced a little at something in the tone with which Ellen spoke.

"Do you know I used to think when you and Lawrence Newt were at our house so much together that he wanted to marry you?"

Amy held it with a half amazed air, while her busy needle moved on.

"Me, dear?"

"Yes, you."

"Why, Ellen, what a strange idea! Mr. Newt and I have always been good friends; and I am sure I don't see how he can help being on as good terms with Hope Wayne."

"Oh! no! no! I'm sure," answered Ellen, with alacrity.

"I don't wonder that he wants to marry her," continued Amy.

"Of course not—no indeed," said Ellen, with order, as if she were thinking of the utter impossibility of his ever having known of the existence of mother wit.

Was it with some vague, remote hope that Ellen would one speak of it as a matter to entirely beyond question, but might give him a little less absolutely to Hope Wayne that Amy, in a low quite pale, persisted?

"No, it would certainly be strange if he did not."

As Amy repeated the words a sudden light shot into Ellen's eyes. She turned and looked in surprise at her cousin:

"Why, Amy, it is Hope Wayne, then?"

"Hope Wayne—what do you mean?" asked Amy.

"Why, it is Hope Wayne who makes the difficulty, and will not have him! Gracious, gracious! I suppose she thinks him too old. He isn't so very, very old, I'm sure; and whatever his years may be, his heart is as young as mine or yours, Amy."

CAN IT BE POSSIBLE?

"Younger than mine, dear," said Amy Warring, kindly.

Ellen was touched by the indefinable tenderness with which these words were spoken. The tears came into her eyes, and laying down her work she put her arm around Amy's waist. As she did so, Amy looked at her with the calm, womanly bravery, and yet with sympathy. Then she said, in a graver tone, as she cut her work with the scissors and seemed to be very entertaining all her power upon cutting a straight line,

"Ellen, I am, as you know, and as you said just now, cheerful by nature; but it does not follow, because some of us are cheerful by nature, that therefore all cheerful people have had no sad experience. I don't speak of myself, but of the rule."

"Oh! I know that," replied Ellen, and the two sat for some time in silence. Ellen's busy little brain was keeping and darting from fancy to fancy, and her brisk fingers in sewing were humorously contrasted with Amy Warring's quieter hand. Suddenly she dropped her work into her lap, wheeled round upon Amy, caught her face between her hands, kissed her, and looking her full in the eyes, exclaimed,

"You dear thing! you very, very never marries!"

Amy's calm face blushed and grew pale. She did not try to escape, and her serene eyes returned the eager, affectionate gaze of her cousin. The same mysterious feeling overspread her whole face, and she said, and somehow felt a strange pleasure in saying, for she trusted Ellen entirely,

"Let me show you!"

Ellen released her lively prize, and Amy, rising quietly, went to her bureau, opened the drawer, and took out a sheet of paper, returned with the pure white bridal ribbon. An hour before she would have supposed she could never touch any of the gifts that betoken a suspicion of her secret. Now it was with a sort of tranquillity, a kind of saintly resignation, a feeling of willing renunciation, as if the very guarding of such a secret were a luxury and indulgence she ought to enjoy—and it was with a consciousness that her victory was perfect because she was willing to tell another how she had struggled—that she held the paper in her hand, and answered Ellen's question by saying,

"Because the man who asked me to marry him paper loved some one else."

Ellen was bridesmaid for the tremendous secret she had unexpectedly extorted. She looked at the paper, and said, timidly,

"And you had letters?"

"Why not?"

"Then—then—you couldn't keep them because he loved you—"

"No, but because I loved him," replied Amy, in a low, melancholy voice.

She returned the little package to its place.

"Ellen," said she, solemnly as she came back to her seat beside her cousin, "I have answered your question. It is not necessary it should be mentioned to me, because no mention would ever do any good. Let us never speak of it again, for now you know how I love you."

"I will not," replied Ellen, "after I have said that I can not comprehend how any man whom you could love did not marry you. You and Hope Wayne are the only perfect women I know, and I should think a man could, if he could, rather marry you, because you have a sort of tenderness for him that I have for 'somebody' else said, suddenly, "I see how it is—it is because she has had no suffering, she has always been rich, beautiful, and worshiped."

Amy Waring smiled.

"Why, Ellen, you began by saying that I had never had any trouble. Darling, we know nothing about it."

Ellen listened laughed, and said that Amy was right, as she always was. Presently she began to look at the clock, as if she were tired of the impatient, and wished subtly to discover it.

"What time will he come?" asked Amy.

"He said he would stop on his way up about four," answered Ellen, innocently.

"Black hair and eyes always keep true," said Amy.

The cousins laid aside their work, and Ellen began slowly to put on her bonnet and shawl. But as she stood before the bureau looking at the mirror she saw in the mirror the reflection of a stood there, a small copy of the portrait in Mrs. Bonnet's parlor. The girl stopped for a few moments as she met in that glass the expression of it in her hand she turned it round. How Amy's face and asked,

"Who looks like that?"

Amy studied it for a moment. Her face suddenly lost its student expression. She took the sketch hastily and gazed at it intently, changed color, and said herself, in profound and perplexed amazement,

"Can it be possible?"

Ellen in turn was not less interested and apprehensive:

"Whom does it look like? asked she, eagerly.

"Edward Wynne," answered Amy, still holding the sketch and studying it.

"Is that so very remarkable?" inquired Ellen, doubtfully.

"Yes, it is remarkable, when it is so marked, and when you think who this is, and who it is that resembles her. Edward Wynne, my father's school-fellow, Little Malacca, did not know then, and does not know now, any thing about his parents, and our Aunt Martha—"

Ellen's eyes opened wide with eager attention. As Amy Waring saw her she reflected a moment, and said,

"It is curious that two secrets should come out to-day. But this one, at least, could not be forever concealed. Your brother never told you the story of Aunt Martha?"

"No, I never heard it. I only knew it was something sad, and we never heard her name at home."

"Well, Ellen, I think you ought to know it, for if I am not greatly mistaken our family is on the eve of having over that was lost and is found again."

The same open-eyed eagerness kept Ellen silent.

"Our Aunt Martha Darro was one of the most beautiful girls ever born, and willful and passionate. She was the gayest of belles, the most dangerous of coquettes. Many women play that character, Ellen, but she was real. There came somebody, I don't know his name. She began to flirt, and ended by the most passionate attachment. It was sudden and swift. One day a note was found in her room. I am beyond, I know described it. Of course a full-blown rose she has been to us all as dead."

The picture was obscure. Ellen looked doubtfully at her cousin.

"And isn't she dead?" she asked, breathlessly.

"Ellen, will you promise no silence, for the present?"

"Absolute."

"Aunt Martha is not dead."

Ellen flopped down in a long breath, felt faint, and sank into a chair. But she did not take her eyes off Amy's face for a moment.

"And you believe Edward Wynne—"

"Is her son—"

"And our cousin."

Amy Waring seated herself by Ellen and took her hand, and said, cheerfully,

"What then?"

Ellen could not but smile as she perceived the same good sense in Amy which she had in her that had asked the question.

"It is a fact, is it not?" asked Amy.

"It isn't that," said Ellen. "But when I saw his likeness to the portrait, and remembered what he knew of his parents, I felt as if he were somehow a central part of the mystery that has always hung over the portrait. Besides," she added, after a little pause, the old happy look beginning to break through the tears which filled her eyes, "I always felt disposed to marry a cousin."

"You shouldn't say," exclaimed Amy, "I know somebody who will teach you that it is perfectly proper. His name is—"

There was a knock at the door. It was a servant who said, when Amy opened it,

"Please, miss, Mr. Wynne is down stairs."

"There! it takes two people to tell you who," said Amy. "But, Ellen, remember. Don't speak till I give you leave. Let Martha's secret be dead to us after all. I have known about it for a long time. Now, Ellen, you must help me put her that she would disappear again. So I had nothing to do but to try to restore her, and I have done it, and you in the same hour have succeeded in doing so by myself."

"Who helped you, in the name of heaven?" asked Ellen.

"Lowrence Nowl," replied Amy, in a lower tone.

Ellen turned from the door at which she stood with a look light of expectation in her eyes, and, as if the name reminded her, although no name had been mentioned during the conference, she went up to the west up to her and kissed her, and said, gently,

"No, dear Amy, I will never speak of it again."

She glided out of the room. Amy Waring looked after her.

"Did she mean she would never think again of the story of Aunt Martha, or—or—?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATE STATE ELECTION.

WITH regard to the recent election in this State, it is very certain that Governor Wise, Mr. Seward, and many others, has been chosen Secretary of State, and it is not improbable that the MEXICAN OUTRAGE IN TEXAS.

Letters in New Orleans papers, from Corpus Christi, dated the 7th Instant, state that Brownsville was taken by Cortinas on the 1st Instant. The Mexican flag which had been hoisted over the Custom-house and the War Department has received a salute of twenty-one guns. The Commander of the Texas Military Department, dated San Antonio, 8th Instant, which says that Cortinas has retired to and fortified from His Grande City, with intelligence that Cortinas had fled into Matamoras, and that there was a Mexican civil American citizens. It was further stated that Cortinas on the 2nd Instant had issued a proclamation declaring the Rio Grande River. The War Department were ordered to the scene of action under General Twiggs and Twenty-two Companies.

NEW EXCITEMENT AT HARPER'S FERRY.

The excitement caused by the Harper's Ferry forays has been heightened by the discovery of a conspiracy so evident that at Chambersburg, Harper's Ferry, Richmond, and other towns the citizens have taken the most active apprehensions of an attempt to rescue Old Brown and his fellow-captives. The Governor of Virginia has issued a proclamation to the vicinity of Chief-town, which says, it is known that a conspiracy exists to release the prisoners here, has served to confirm the fears of the citizens. In this state of affairs Governor Wise has ordered troops to proceed to Charlestown forthwith to guard the prisoners and preserve the peace. Great excitement exists in Virginia, though at the latest dates no plot had been discovered.

JOHN BROWN IN PRISON.

A lady, who visited Charlestown to assist Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, writes from her interview with John Brown, the first of an hour, and the other for a shorter period.

He is in a cell, about seven feet square, with a cot, and Sheridan on a large bed. Captain Brown arose from his bed to receive his guests, and stood a few moments leaning against the bed-head, immediately lying down again from weakness. His visitors were struck with the cheerfulness of his expression, and the calmness of his manner. He seemed not only passively resigned to his fate, but cheerful under it, and more than willing to meet it.

He said to them:

"I expected Mr. Child would be here to introduce me; I am sorry neither he nor his partner would make their appearance for you."

The men stood helpless.

"You never looked for the reasons why she should not come; but she was very kind—very kind!"

Many questions were then asked as to the treatment and care he had received; to which he said,

"I wish it to be understood by every body that I have been very kindly attended: for if I had been under the care of father or brother I could not have been better treated than by Captain Avis and his family."

Captain Avis is the Sheriff of the county, and the reports speak in high terms for his humane and courteous conduct to the prisoners in his charge.

When another allusion was made to Mrs. Child, Captain Brown said, with a smile,

"The reason why she did not come to-day was, she had I did not wish my wife to come, was for fear lest they should be insulted or annoyed, and that on this account I would be troubled myself."

HIS STATE OF MIND.

Mrs. —— had conversed with her on the jail a large bunch of autumn leaves, gathered in the morning from the forest. Every one of them was full of life and beauty, and she arranged them between the grated bars of her window. "Captain Brown," said a fish-lawn rose which he had beside his cheek on his pillow. This old man seemed to have touched with these visions of thoughtfulness. He is said to have always been a great lover of the beauty of God's world, and especially of flowers.

Mrs. —— drew a chair near his bedside, and talking of her husband, and the ever-kind Avis family who had served his prosaic conversation, of which I can give only a small portion. She says:

"I never saw a person who seemed less troubled or excited, or who more entirely had his mind and heart clear. His remarks are pointed, pithy, and sensible. He is not in the least impatient, but cheerful, and seems to have excellent common sense about every thing."

HIS PRINCIPLES OF SLAVERY.

She asked him some direct questions—never you actuated, in any degree, in undertaking your late enterprise, by a feeling of hatred of the South, or prejudice against them to that effect had gone abroad.

He answered promptly and clear in this statement, and in the present case:

"I am not conscious of ever having had a feeling of revenge, or, in fact, of hatred, toward the slave or any family in Kansas. But I can see that a thing is wrong and wicked, and I have a right to think and feel that those who do the wrong must be punished, and still have no feeling of revenge. This is the way I was raised by my spirit of revenge."

He talked a great deal about his family, manifesting solicitude for their comfort after he was gone, but evincing how perfectly resigned he was to the will of Providence in their behalf.

Some allusion was then made to the sentence which he had received, and to the sympathy manifested for him, and, as my friend says, "almost sublimity."

"I do not think," he replied, "that I could have borne much than to die for it!"

She says that she never forget the impressive manner in which he uttered these solemn words. She repeated:

"It is not the hardest thing that can happen to a brave man to die; but it is a great thing sometimes for a brave man to lie on his back in prison, disabled by wounds. Do you not think so?" she asked him. "I am not satisfied that it may war you down, or cause you to relax your convictions, to regret your adventure, or to encourage but I will," he replied, "what weakness soever I may have had. I do not think I could have borne the Lord and Master Jesus Christ, as I certainly should if I should any apparent cowardice shown."

When the conversation had proceeded thus far, as it was known around the jail that Mrs. Child was there, she was asked to collect, and although no denomination of visitors was made, yet there were many indications of impatience; so that the Sheriff called to the door, and the ladies left the cell, to put an end to the interview.

SAUCY OF THE "NORTH STAR."

The following is a copy of the glad tidings which the telegraph brought on Thursday morning:

"NEW YORK, Thursday Morning, Thursday, November 17, 1859."

"A letter to the Charleston Courier, dated Nassau, New Providence, November 5, says that the steamer North Star, from New York for Aspinwall, got ashore about the 31st of October on French Key, about 100 miles on the Keys six or seven days, but finally got off without much assistance from the wreckers. She sustained no loss of sections, and proceeded on her voyage on the 1st Instant.

"The Fleur de Lis, Indian Keys, from which the North Star got on shore on her passage from this port to Aspinwall, was built in 1855, by Messrs. Jacobs, Pierce & Co., the route to Aspinwall, and nineteen miles west of the east end of Hillsboro Inlet, in the northeastern part of the Bahama Islands." This is the passage used by sailing vessels coming from the West Indies, and by their passengers to and from Aspinwall.

GERRIT SMITH'S INSANITY.

Gerrit Smith passes through The Journal, of the Interstate insanity of Gerrit Smith, says:

"We learn that Gerrit Smith's friends Smith himself and most intensely, his present melancholy and his mental aberration. He has been for years the victim of his own loving sympathies for the down-trodden and oppressed to a quarter of a century. His physical health was decayed, long ago, by his prodigal expenditure of nerve in regard to temperance and diet.

"Gerrit Smith's mind was most munificently endowed. We know him first in 1834, then seeing and winning Dorothy Barker, his first wife, and then in 1840, when since have seen a nobler specimen of manhood. To his high intellectual gifts he added the rare and fact of surpassing beauty.

"Whose red and white
Nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on.

"Then added, generous, social as ever, impulsive, he lived for others rather than for himself. Possessed of ample means, he gave away his property with the liberality of an accomplished wife, he was subsequently restored to his understanding, and he labored incessantly upon men and things. He became, as he believed, the instrument of God in the abolition movement. Recently time and labor, and from an opposite cause, that he became an ultra Abolitionist; and his persuasive zeal for Temperance changed to coercive measures in favor of Prohibition. Of his ample fortune, he dispensed in aid of Abolitionism and Temperance with more liberality than wisdom. Both his perverted talents and his misapplied money ignored the objects he sought to promote.

"Mr. Smith has lived for nearly thirty years in a state of political hallucination. The delusion culminated last year in the conviction that he was called of God to be a candidate for the Presidency. He was not content to be in the election on his own account, but every other person in this State that he could control. He was nominated by means. That disappointment left him too well prepared in body and mind, for the shock which has overthrown his too long unbalanced intellect.

"The Harper's Ferry insurrection was an attempt to carry the teachings of prominent Abolitionists into practical effect. It was foreshadowed in a letter from Mr. Smith to the Jerry Rescuers. That he ever really intended slaves should rise, rob, and murder, we do not believe; but in speeches and letters he indulged in language which bears no other construction. Unfortunately for Gerrit Smith, driven to madness by his own impassioned and intense, he was ready to carry into practice the principles which he had taught to others through years.

"In the mean time, with knowledge of the noble and generous character of Gerrit Smith, we do not wish to deplore the dispensation which deprives him of reason. Should he ever recover it, he will be blessed by God and men, his family, by various 'declensions,' fallen into by the managers of his business.

"Of what a noble mind is here's ruthrown!
The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's eye, tongue, sword;
The expectancy and rose of the fair state,
The glass of fashion and the mould of form.
The observed of all observers, quite quite down."

A TOUCHING STORY.

The Albany Journal furnishes the following, where in a citizen of New York performed a highly creditable part:

"Nearly every body knows 'Little Jimmy' the blind newsboy, a bright, intelligent, and honest lad of ten years. Mr. Britton, of the Stuyvesant, has given him exclusive privilege to sell his papers there, and he is said to be a favorite with and well patronized by those frequenting it. Mr. Britton, who is a kind-hearted man, as we understand, but learned to do both without any regard to instructive. Yesterday, a gentleman entered the Stuyvesant and interested in conversing with him, when he asked him if he was not afraid to be in the street, and whether went up with him. Sitting down to the information he learned the beautiful story of Jimmy's mother. It was a sweet, plaintive, touching song, rendered with much pathos by the child. His mother died when he was five, could he have seen, could have found tears in the eyes of the gentleman present—tears of sympathy for the afflicted, and such as do the strong man credit, for they were of the best kind—the tears of sympathy for the afflicted men, Mr. Y——, of New York, drew from his pocket-book twenty-five dollars and presented it to the lad. 'Jimmy' was overjoyed at the generous gift, and his gratitude, with the tears of his benefactor, moistened his face. He declined himself to receive but the ever-ready Britton, who, as he put the money in his pocket, told Jimmy he would keep it for him. Jimmy is just now a modern as those that make us think so well of the world."

A COLLISION ON A COW-CATCHER.

We take the following from the Times: "As one of the freight trains coming east rounded a sharp curve near Huntingdon, the engineer saw a small child sitting in the middle of the track, and immediately shut off steam. He instantly whistled down brakes and reversed his engine, but before the train could be stopped it was upon which it was running rendered it impossible to stop before reaching the child, and the engineer thought have been crushed to death. In this emergency, when he saw that the child was in the act of rising, he leaned over the side of his engine, and, with a presence of mind and nerve of nerve that has few parallels, ran to the front of the engine, crouched down on the cow-catcher, and, finding himself with one hand, leaned as far forward as possible, and with the other grasped the child by the collar of the other he threw it off the track. It was the work of an instant, and was performed coolly and successfully. It but he was equal to the emergency, and the child was found lying at the foot of a small embankment, where it had rolled after being thrown from the track of the road, alive and kicking, but somewhat stunned and frightened. The child is a former named Nolt, residing immediately along the road.

FRESHETS.

The Hon. A. H. Stephens, of Georgia, in a recent address at a meeting of the Alumni of the Georgia and Cephus Asylum and Free Schools of that city, related the following anecdote:

"A poor little boy, on a cold night in January, with his mother sick and dying, and his father absent in the second guardian or guide to protect or direct him on his way, commenced his journey. He was a little plaintive, who took him in, fed, helped, and sent him on his way with his blessing. The little boy's heart responded to that heart, and resigned him with fresh courage to battle with the storms of life. He was successful in his efforts to get a living, and in due time returned to the house that had clothed and fed him. He found the old man dead; the cornercats that gave on the substance of man had blown away, and nothing left but the bare old estates. She sent for the nearest counsel to consult her cause to his, and then found that the little boy whom she had given welcomed and entertained by her deceased husband. The grandson of a man whose unbounded gratitude was now added to the ordinary motives connected with the profession. He undertook the cause with a will not easy to be resisted; he gained it; the widow was restored to her home. The little boy grew up and Mr. Stephens added, with an emphasis of emotion that showed his sympathies were deeply touched, 'that orphan boy stood before you!'"

Christmas Day last month, Lord Brougham being in Cannes, had a Christmas-tree prepared for the poor children and the scenes of his early youth, proceeded alone to Mr. L. E. Landon's residence, in which he was not here. He went through every room in both flats of the house, and looked out of the window at which those two unwary years ago he was wont to sit and gaze on the scenery of Paris.

The Cincinnati Times, noticing the dangerous illness of Senator Douglas, says: "Mr. Douglas's constitution, through which he has passed in the last six years would seem to be enough to break down any man. Mrs. Douglas, however, has a constitution of iron. He has often lived many days and nights together in the cars, and has stood the fatigue of speaking to the people in the open air, without injury; but his acquaintance is so extensive in the Senate, he is so popular, he gives so much time to others, that we ever knew by "Nature's own sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

Though he has a strong constitution, however, he is just the man to be worn out by a succession of 'fusses.'"

A wedding in bona-stock-and-bond-mortgage-life took place in St. Louis on the 17th inst., between Miss Kate Knoxit, a the oldest son of Colonel Frederick Bennett, and the third daughter of Judge Lucien Eugene John O'Fallon. The families and relatives of the wedded pair are said to be among the wealthiest in the city.

The Rev. Dr. Cheever, of New York, has received a handsome testimonial in all the coins of benevolence, was last week handed to him by the hand of his beloved, by named John Brown, and in a few weeks will be published in the columns of the Tribune.

The Evening Journal says that a well-informed gentleman, who has recently visited the Island of Cuba, assures it that Señor Ovieda, of "Diamond Marriage" memory, is worth about $5,000,000. The Island, by the way, exports, from sudden stores, to $100,000,000.

The Rev. Dr. Cheever, of New York (Sunbury), well known as a reckoning and horticulturist, will probably, in the course of a few weeks, publish a book which will be a superior kind of interest to those of the beloved ground laid out by Washington.

The editor of the Lynn (Massachusetts) Reporter furnishes his readers an interesting account of a recent visit to Dungeon Rock, and his interview with Mr. Mitchell, who has been engaged for the last eight years in this singularly cold locality in the wilder attempt to obtain the treasure of Kidd, the freebooter. Guided in his labors at first by dreams and visionary by subsequently, he delved man has, with the assistance of his son, blasted passages out of the solid rock. He has labored with his own hands nearly a hundred feet in the solid rock. The last time he visited the cave he found that the water had risen to such a height that he was obliged to abandon it. He has still undaunted a firm belief that he will accomplish a final success.

lieves he has lost than ten feet to get to reach the longsought cave.

Sir Francis S. Goldsmid has prescribed £100 sterling to the fund for the purchase of medals for Garibaldi.

General Tom Thumb will be twenty-five years old in January next. He resides in Bridgeport, Connecticut, where he owns a fine house on the main street, valued at over $50,000. He drives a pony which he says will travel a mile in three minutes.

A lexicology girl, named Sarah Wilkinson, proved the other day in a Boston lawyer who had deserted her at the altar. During his examination he told her that he had once taken a solemn oath, to please a friend, that he would never marry that girl, and that he considered that oath at length sealed to. Before the magistrate the fellow offered to marry the girl, and thus put an end to the proceedings; but she hesitated, and then refused the offer outright. The Midnight Mail is now the only passenger train once could not be trusted, and that she had better have nothing to do with him.

The late George Brown, of Baltimore, left by his will $400,000 to his hands and a part of his estate to support his benevolent objects as she should judge fit, and she has given away about $300,000 of the amount in her lifetime.

The Prairie du Chien (Wisconsin) Leader states that two young ladies, Miss Haskell and Miss Pool, when walking in the vicinity of Jenny Coon, Richland County, were pursued by two bears, one of which struck Miss Pool with his paw, tearing her breast to the bone, and causing her death in a few hours. Miss Haskell escaped with a few scratches. The bears were killed soon after.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE WRECK OF THE "ROYAL CHARTER."

By the Ship Clyde at Boston we have full and detailed accounts of the wreck of the screw steamship Royal Charter, and of the fearful loss of life attending it. Nearly all the gold and the possession of graphic and copious details of the and calamity.

It appears that the Royal Charter, when within two or three hours sail of Liverpool (on the coast of Carnarvonshire, Motionary), experienced the full fury of a terrific northwest gale, which prevailed for about twelve hours during the night of the 25th and 26th ult. The steam power of the vessel was insufficient to enable her to make any way in the teeth of the strong breeze, and the sails, which at one time were reg rapidly steadily, it became necessary, at about two o'clock at night, to let go the anchor—a measure which been previously tried and rockets discharged in the hope of attracting a pilot, but without success.

The gale meantime increased to a perfect hurricane, and at day-light in the morning the cables parted, and the vessel parted, and shortly afterward the ship was beating on the rocks in a place called Moelfre Bay, about three miles to the east of Angelsea. The masts were cut away, but without any beneficial result.

THE VESSEL FOUNDERING.

About daylight nir's clock) a sailor, with a cord tied around his waist, passed over the vessel's side and got on to an unsubmerged rock, he succeeded in reaching and securing the end of a rope which was thrown to him, and in most cases his mates followed his example, and got safely ashore perpendicular to the height of forty feet. A hawser was first got ashore, and a line was then passed on to it, and the line was then passed on to it, with a view of hauling the passengers and crew on shore. About a dozen were thus saved. By this means soon landed, and it was hoped that all on board might be saved.

At about seven o'clock, however, the water beating against the ship's broadside with tremendous violence, she suddenly snapped asunder amidships and tumbled in pieces. At the passengers and crew were still on board, numbers were killed by the crushing debris, and only twenty-six managed to get ashore. Of these one or more number saved only thirty-one out of a total passengers and crew of 459.

The scene was terrible in the extreme. The sea was washed on and of the rocks several times, and in consequence instances were very frequent where persons on the jutting rocks were hurled back into the sea by the furious waves.

Not a superior officer was saved, neither a woman nor a child.

Captain Taylor exerted himself to the utmost, but was finally carried on the back of a sailor through the surf, but he, by a boat falling from the davits, and was seen no more.

HER PASSENGERS AND CARGO.

The departure of the Royal Charter was incomplete, so that by eight o'clock nothing was visible but masses of wreck, mingled with bodies of the dead and dying on the strand. The prostration of the telegraph wires, and the obstruction by the six of a portion of the line of the Holyhead Railroad (which passes the locality), caused considerable delay in the progress of the news to the public, and a consequent loss of time in sending telegrams to the spot. The vessel had on board 388 passengers, 112 ounces of gold, besides a large number of sovereigns, besides and a valuable cargo of merchandise. Many lives and hopes were entertained that this might be recovered.

The Royal Charter was an iron vessel of 1,400 tons burthen, and furnished with auxiliary screw engines. She was built by Messrs. Lawrie, of Glasgow, in 1855, and was insured for £80 000. Her general rags was not very valuable—say £7,000.

Of the persons on board the Royal Charter when she left Australia (eighty-seven days previously) 388 were passengers, and 124 crew—total, 512. Of these, seventeen passengers were saved, and twenty-seven of the crew. Some were saved from the wreck; so that the total loss of life was 467. Among the passengers were a number of invalids, who were transferred from a rig-boat to the Royal Charter in Melbourne harbor, and who died on the voyage.

Instructions were being effected at Lloyd's on the building at twenty-five per cent.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF THE CATASTROPHE.

Another writer says: "At about seven o'clock, the waves having regained their mastery over the unfortunate barque, she suddenly snapped asunder amidships, and tumbled in pieces like a wooden toy.

"The scenes on board during the last hour were painful beyond description. Wives, husbands, children, friends and parents, lovers and friends, were embracing each other with the consternation of despair, and many for the last time.

"Among the bridge, a clergyman from New Zealand, before the final consummation, was engaged in prayer, which was earnestly participated in by most until the end; and just as the vessel broke in two, and amidst a panic universal. About twenty-six persons managed to get ashore, but it was again through Providence and no design or ability, for they were all washed on the shrieking rocks, and on scattered fragments of the wreck. Indeed, many were washed on and off several times and many who thought they had reached safety were lost to sight by a jutting rock, were hurled back again to a watery grave.

"On the vessel breaking in two, the after part, with the poop, remained afloat for a few minutes, but what with the strength of the wind and the mountain seas which covered the sea and struck many a brave and struggling man's breast as he swam, she soon sank to form mid of land.

"At eight o'clock in the morning nothing but the wreck scattered about and corpses left on the strand, retained the terrible catastrophe that had befallen nearly 500 human beings, a few hours before glowing with joy at once again sighting the shores of their native land, which they had toiled and saved, and satisfied that how the voyage to which they had so long looked forward with the globe was nearly ended. Many of the passengers were accompanied, indeed, so much had they satisfied themselves that the voyage was nearly at an end, that before they presented the Captain with a piece of plate, for his uniform kindness and attention, and in the congratulatory speeches which followed the Captain pleasantly assured them that within twenty-four hours he expected to be on the lee side of Mrs. Taylor.

DEATH OF THE CAPTAIN.

"The Captain, however, succumbed to a sailor's fate. He was strong and powerful, and made every effort to save himself, but he might be preserved in vain. He again seen struggling in the water, laying hold of a yardarm, and in every one and then being washed from his grip. On recovering his spar, he acknowledged effort, and was seen to struggle manfully with the waves. After this he and Mr. Doyle, the second officer, were seen on the top of the ship, struggling together with the shore, when a boat fell from the davits and struck them both, and they were carried by the waves and no more.

"One incident if related, that when the Captain had been struck prostrate on deck, exhausted, he saw the Second Officer, Mr. Doyle, in the act of saving a female passenger, and he, with the assistance of the second officer, Mr. Stevens, to give a hand there, and to lash the child by a rope, and after expecting at that time that help would be soon available."

THE SCENE ON THE WRECK.

"We read in the Liverpool Journal of October 25th: "Many persons visited the scene of the wreck yesterday, and were making anxious inquiries as to the fate of relatives and friends. For this purpose every facility was afforded them. The number of bodies that have been recognized among those deprived of their nearest relatives and friends is very considerable. The Rev. Mr. Jones, one of the vicars, several of the leaders of the coastguard force, and others by the calamity floated upon the beach; numerously and deeply engaged in the sad and painful duty of identification at a late hour last evening, to twenty-six. Of these, five were found on the beach at Moelfre Bay, and the bodies were conveyed to Llanlago Church, and carefully laid out in coffins, and arranged in readiness for identification. Some had on their clothing, while others were found in their berths, and others on the deck, where they had been in their berths, and rushed suddenly to the deck, and were washed away in the attempt to reach with the perilous position of the blinded ship. Many of the bodies were recognized by the clothing. One showed a waistcoat which was recognized by a friend as having been hung up in front of the tent by one of the constables. Another, curiously enough, had a £5 note in his hat of her husband, a man named Barrett, who had been washed overboard. She said: 'Oh, my dear, if the poor widow was most heart-rending to witness. Some of the women, by, in an attempt to identify, suggested that she might be mistaken. 'Oh no,' said she, 'I know it is my husband.' By looking at the husband! God look down upon me!' Among those who were identified were Mr. Hughes, of the firm of Hughes & Wolverley-street, Grean. Two of his brothers were aboard the ship, and were drowned. Mr. Hughes was present at the identification of the bodies of his brothers. He was the second gentleman to meet them at Liverpool. He has left for Australia to place the affairs of Moelfre Bay to rights for the dead bodies."

HOW THE "GREAT EASTERN" STOOD THE GALE.

A reporter writes from Holyhead: "The gale is at this hour still, just before the Ants sailed, says:

"The Steamship Great Eastern passed aboard the Great Eastern reports the effect of the gale.

Captain Harrison and his officers and crew were at their posts ready to run the ship out if necessary.

The Great Eastern behaved well, and almost equalled the screw steamship Clyde, which arrived at Boston this morning.

"Captain Harrison's water-proof coat was blown to shreds of him, and myself found myself under the gangplank, and blown down and tumbled along with such violence that I thought my bones were broken.

"The saloon skylights were blown up, and wind and rain poured down. The saloon floor was covered with water, and looking at every sea, and the lower decks soft and splashy with the rain.

"Three anchors were down, and appeared taut to the strain.

"At six the breakwater was in a boiling way—portions of the sea breaking over it, and the foaming the sea beyond, and the lighthouse was hidden from view.

"At 10.30 A. M. it parted, and the ship was adrift, rolling and pitching terrifically.

"A second heavy anchor was let go, and the screw moved, and the ship was kept head to the sea. Three anchors driven round at speed, and were somewhat damaged by the concussion.

"The passengers, with the exception of a few, were cautious, too brigs, too decumbent, and one gallivanted living in the saloon. The ship behaved well. The bucket of the main were actually dragged out-and-tried longer.

THE GALE AT LIVERPOOL.

An anecdote is told in connection with the recent decision of the Queen's Bench in favor of Mr. Bennett against their way seats. At the Sheriff of Edinburgh stood a gentleman who had a ticket for one of the seats in question, a lady sought audience of him. It was granted, and she was introduced with her child. She told the Sheriff with her she was deeply in love with Prince Arthur, and that nothing would satisfy her child but seeing the representing Prince Arthur with a bouquet. The Sheriff consulted with the Lord Provost, and as the law jurisdiction sufficient for the presentation of the bouquet; however, he would undertake to present the flowers. The bouquet, the wand, and the child was brought in, and presented the flowers to the Prince, and the young lady, who stood a behind the Queen, and the Prince, and the Queen, and the platform. Her Majesty, with the utmost promptitude, immediately presented the bouquet to the young lady, and she would not for a moment "come between the child and her Queen," but immediately gave the flowers to the child, and felt Miss ——, stepping forward with the bouquet, presented it to the child, with the most delicate consciousness beaming from her child-face, which, no doubt, the gratitude Prince fully appreciated.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S LETTER TO VICTOR EMANUEL.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "The letter addressed by the Emperor to Victor Emanuel is addressed by the King of Sardinia, and he has no hesitation in communicating its contents to Europe.

"Monsieur mon Frere,—I write to-day to your Majesty to inform you of the steps which circumstances, in addition, to remind you of the past, and to settle with you the conditions of the peace which I have in view. The circumstances are grave; it is requisite to by acute prudence and sterile regret, and to examine carefully the real state of affairs. Then, the question is not now whether of Lodi done well or ill in making peace with Austria, but rather to obtain from the treaty results the most favorable for Italy, and the most useful for the repose of Europe.

Before entering on the discussion of this question, I must call your attention to the fact that the war has undergone a change which has rendered every delicate negotiation and every explicit treaty impossible.

"In point of fact, war has often fewer complications than peace. In the former, two interests only are in presence of each other—the attack and the defense; in the latter, on the contrary, the point is to reconcile a multitude of interests—often of an opposite character. This is what actually occurred at the moment of peace. It was necessary to conclude a treaty that should secure in the best manner possible the independence of Italy, which would satisfy Piedmont and the wishes of the population, and yet which would not wound the Catholic party, the susceptibilities of the Sovereign to whom I had given my word.

"I believed then that if the Emperor of Austria wished to come to a friendly understanding with me, with a view of bringing about this important result, the causes of hostility would cease, the animosities had spent their force, empires would dissipate, and that the regeneration of Italy would be the result of common accord, and without further bloodshed.

HIS ITALIAN POLICY.

"I now state what are, to my opinion, the essential conditions of that regeneration.

"Italy to be composed of several independent States, united by a federal bond.

"Each of these States to adopt a parliament representative system and salutary reforms.

"The Sovereign Pontiff to then retire the principle of Italian confederation, to help him out, to bring on some of customs, and one currency.

"The governing power to be at Rome, which should be composed of representatives named by the sovereigns or elected by municipal Chambers, or partly by the one this species of list, the influence of the religious feelings be compensated and a happy balance should be created balanced by the element resulting from election.

"The honorary Presidency of the Italian Confederacy Pontiff, the religious sentiment of the Italian people would be surrounded with the most honors of the Pope would be increased throughout Italy, and the Holy Father, delivered from the cares of temporal power, would be in possession of the noblest of the populations, the duties which I had formed at the moment of making the peace of Villafranca, and which I am happy to see to-day your influence in promoting it. Besides, a consideration would induce me to look favorably on Venetia.

"The cession of Lombardy, with a limited debt, is an accomplished fact.

"Austria has given up her right to keep gentlemen in the surrounding places—Parma, Ferrara, and Leghorn.

"The rights of the Sovereigns have, it is true, been violated, but the people have declared in favor of the new order of things, and the principle of non-intervention of countries has been formally set aside; and, lastly, Venetia cannot remain under the present state of things to the interest of your Majesty, as of the Peninsula, to accept me in the conditions which I have the honor to set forth from it the best results; for your Majesty can not forget that I have given you my word of honor, and that I am a Congress which is about to open, withdraw myself from my engagements, and I should be placed in a most embarrassed.

WHAT FRANCE DEMANDS.

"We demand that Parma and Placenza shall be united to Piedmont, and that Modena and the Legations shall constitute of state, independent to her.

"The federal union of the Duchies of Parma shall be called to Modena;

"Tuscany to be augmented, perhaps, by a portion of territory—shall be restored to the Grand Duke Ferdinand.

"That a system of moderate anger liberty shall be established in the Papal States.

"That Austria shall frankly disengage herself from all connection with the Transformations in Italy, and that she shall consent to complete the nationality of Italy, by ceding to Victor Emanuel the provinces called administrative, and which form the kingdom of Venetia.

"That Austria cede the fortresses of Mantua and Peschiera, which shall form the federal fortresses.

"And, lastly, that a Confederation based on the real forces of Italy be placed under the honorary Presidency, the exclusive of every foreign influence, shall consolidate the work of the regeneration of Italy.

I shall neglect nothing for the attainment of this great result. I hope that the Congress which is to assemble will not vary, and as far as the interests of Europe are concerned, I feel sure that it will not refuse to serve the cause for which we have combated together.

"Please or by Queen, etc. etc. etc."

SPAIN.

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

We read in the Gibraltar correspondence of the Herald: "Some hostile demonstrations have been made here from Tangier, and Gibraltar is ready to run a storm of shot and shell, without stocking to save their property. Yesterday, the Governor received a letter from the Spanish Consul at Tangier against the Spanish Consul at Tangier against the Spanish Consul at Tangier against

FALL GAMES.—THE ELEPHANT.

FALL GAMES—THE APPLE-BEE.

FALL GAMES.

The preceding illustrations will remind many a reader of happy evenings spent in pleasant homes in New England or the Middle States. One of our designs represents the Elephant games—a very popular pastime for the fall and winter holidays in New England. A couple of stout, good-natured young men, arm'd with a twisted piece of wood or still leather to represent a trunk, and provided with a large shawl, with enough room for a very fat elephant, who may, if he be so inclined, present the prettiest girls in the room with all manner of presents with his unreserved trunk; while a boy, the well-known docility of the animal, that the Queen of the evening may ride like a lady, the capacity of endauce, without the least danger.

Our other design represents an Apple-Bee, another popular pastime in many parts of the country. The old superstition that an apple-paring thrown over the shoulder by a pretty girl would assume, as the ground, the form of the initial of the name of her lover or future husband, is still firmly believed in many country places. So long as it leads to nothing worse than such merry, healthful sports as the one here so well and truly depicted, no one need be in a hurry to see it exploded. It serves, on the occasion represented in our picture, to relieve a natural necessary pause in every Northern farmer's home—the paring of apples for drying and market.

TWO PARTINGS.

We parted once before. You wept
When I rose up to go, you did;
You pray'd for me before you slept,
You little love, you know you did!

And no grief now is on that brow,
Which then, you said, throbb'd so, you did;
No hand now hotter than your vow—
You cruel thing, you know you did!

Do you remember what the sea,
I took you out to show you, did?
You made a pretty smile;
You false of tongue, you know you did!

You sighed, "That life were like its crests!
When sunshine kisses below," you did;
"To catch love's light before it rests!"
You cold, cold heart, you know you did.

What have I done? You smile no more
On me as months ago you did;
You deem my homage now a bore;
You liked it then, you know you did.

"How blest," you said, "were life with one Who'd love you truly!" Yes, you did—
But—you thought I was an elder son—
You utter flirt, you know you did!

THE MARKED MONEY.

But Erie Road, that great, puffing, driving, fire-breathing, destroying monster, winds through the huge now.

But, there was a time?

Certainly, there was a time when these yelling, screeching engines did not rush at one end of the place at all unseemly hours of the day and night, and thunder down about it, making all at the other, after a horrifying call, and roaring over the bridges like a great tempest, such as we read of in legend, seeming to say, "Well, I have spared you this time, only swallowed a few of your people. The next time I come I'll take the whole place and the village."

Yes, there was a time when the little place was still smaller than now. Not so very long ago either. We can all remember it—all who can remember the days of silver shoe-buckles and their hair. They can remember how, when they were young, that spot was a village, though it was only about a half-way house in the progress, where a fiddler (more famous as a violinist) was always to be had at a moment's notice, and where the art of kicking up the nicest little suppers while the hot pumps did, whisper at "four o'clock" was discussed, and where there was just room enough for a party to dance, and no more, no matter how large the party.

What! in the village?

Nonsense! I am speaking now of the little white house that stands about midway as you pass through it. That is "the Village Tavern," always has been the village tavern for more than half a century, until within ten years the last word was painted out and that of "Hotel" substituted.

There was a time when, as I said, this "Village Tavern" was the great place for riding, driving, and sleighing parties to stop and refresh and sup. It was a spot, too, for travelers, when they did not head over the hard road and to the places of their destination in less time than they could spur it home. Many a traveler who came only for the night's rest, for his horse and himself, fast, staid over a day or two, perhaps for a week. There were host and jockey in those days, that could be caught in the clear, bright waters of the Passaic, which ran stealthily by the foot of the garden, less than a stone's-throw from the back piazza, and was not banged and whirled and bealed by a thousand mill-wheels, and rumbled over by half a hundred trains of steam-cars daily. There was woodcock too, five minutes' walk away, and a partridge, or, if you liked a longer walk, something of larger growth worthy of your powder and shot.

John Gordon kept "The Village Tavern." Gordon was a hard-headed, stout-headed, red-faced, jolly, humorous Scotchman. He was liberal, with all the oils, in his dealings. He was proud of his ale eye to the main chance. He was proud of his position as landlord, proud that his house should be known and spoken of in the great city of New York, and particularly proud that so many connoisseurs thought it well worth their while to drive out to "The Village Tavern" that they might drink Gordon's inimitable punch, made from a peculiar whisky of which the landlord had once come into possession, and which, he was sure, was by the fest of Ben Nevis, to the hour it went gurgling down the drinkers' throats.

Of all these whisky John Gordon proud. This was the pride of his profession; but there was one other pride that he was proud, and to which all other things were but as accessories. This was his daughter Letty. Letty Gordon was the landlord's only child. She was a motherless girl—her wife, and ten years after his marriage there came to John Gordon's house a little girl, who, like little Letty could count eight years Mrs. Letty Gordon, senior, was called to another world, and the world, leaving little Letty heiress of all the goods, chattels, and real estate of which she died possessed, the last item being "The Village Tavern," with all furniture and belongings: a comfortable little suiting out which, with true Dutch carefulness, her good father had settled upon her the day she was married, and from which John Gordon had guaranteed some addition to be made at stated times in various forms in the country round.

Letty Gordon had great blue eyes, very blue, very large, very sparkling, with surpassed mischief. Letty Gordon had light-brown hair that danced about her head in curls, which in some sort were almost repudiated a ribbon. She had the whitest skin, and the whitest teeth, and the—— Oh! this sounds too much like an auctioneer's summons. I shall cut it by saying that she was just the morriest, sweetest, gayest, prettiest girl that I have ever seen, and I am not alone in so believing. There were a few of the fairest guests of "The Village Tavern" who could contend with Letty Gordon; but to the mass who came and went like transient birds, Letty was the loadstar. Many a heard of the landlord's beautiful daughter; once in a long while some one more fortunate than the rest would catch a glimpse of her, as she went to or from whence she came, or whither she went, the glimpser could never tell. They only knew that, quietly of the mysterious beauty of whom they heard so much, of whom they knew that she breathed the same atmosphere with them, had yet to them was a sealed book. This was the treasure that "The Village Tavern" was supposed to. She who, already an heiress in her own right, was to inherit all the acres that he had been adding year by year to the "Village Tavern." "The Village Tavern." Letty was not only the admiration of the gay people who came from the city, but she was the ambition of every rustic beau who looked with covetous eyes upon the fair face and the broad acres of the landlord's daughter. Mrs. Letty Gordon but they looked in vain, for John Gordon had long resolved that his daughter should marry a man who should be no common man, but should outdouble her in wealth.

Letty Gordon was not the only fair attraction that brought the gallants to "The Village Tavern." There was another sight that was extremely sharp, in the person of Martha Field. Martha and Letty were of an age—both eighteen. Martha was a year older than Letty, but was called a child by the late Mrs. Letty Gordon to "care for." Martha was the daughter of "The Village Tavern;" she was here, there, and every where, as John Gordon expressed it. If extra company were coming, it was Martha who helped Letty, who was able and willing. Whether Martha's hand was wanted in the kitchen, or in the parlor, to wait on the guests, to attend in the bar, it was always the same; she was there. Whatever she did was done well. Martha was a favorite with all the male as suitor to the mistress, made a desperate effort to secure the landlord's heart by the short road to his love with the maid, only to find out that his fate was the same in either quarter. Martha field had been apprenticed in the kitchen of the house by her beneath her trim, well-fitting bodice. She had been taught how to entertain confidants into the keeping of David Bigelow, a smart and promising carpenter, who, by some special art lurking under his tongue, had persuaded Martha to allow him for to himself in the face of the most startling opposition. Under these circumstances, there can be no wonder that Martha should be given to reading romances, and sympathizing generally with lovers particularly circumstanced. Martha, then, was now one who said that when Martha Field married a man, that man would be a man. Martha, it is a trifle for the couple to start with; but those who know the landlord better declared that as long as Martha was in the house, and that was not at any part with a dollar of all he had so carefully hoarded up, he would effectually resist. In proof of which they pointed to Letty and Martha, upon whom he never lavished a cent, putting off their desires for money alone, as inherent in the sex. To prove them that their fears would make their fortunes was a favorite joke with him.

This was John Gordon's household, save only Aunt Lois, who reigned supreme in the kitchen department. Aunt Lois was a fixture in the house. Leaves fluttered with more than ordinary gladness, and the birds sang about over the trees of the landlord, sending its light to the clear, gravelly bottom that it almost seemed to be in their very bones, the Paterson stage rattled through the village, and dropped one passenger at "The Village Tavern." He was a tall, dark-complexioned man, somewhere about thirty, with a quiet, assured manner, that told the crowd of idlers who stood always ready to stare at the stage passengers, if they were capable of receiving any impression, that the new-comer was an even easily-snared fowl, and would accommodate to all the attentions that could be thrust upon him.

He told John Gordon, who stood ready to receive him, that his name was Philip Conger, and his intention was to spend a week with him, and try his luck at the fish. John was pleased at the announcement, and told his guest so. More pleased as he noticed that the young man's baggage (spoke that many was plentiful), and still more pleased when he found that his liberal orders did full justice to his table, Philip Conger fished until the sunset while old trout and pickerel trembled in their watery beds. He shot with such success that he awakened the jealousy of the stereotyped sportsmen of the place. He walked, he rode, and drove, and he rode much passed away, and yet he remained a guest of "The Village Tavern." Another week, and Philip Conger was still there; but he no longer rode, no longer fished, his walks and rides were shorter, and the house had more attraction. In a few words, he had seen Letty Gordon, had spoken with her, and in that moment all things that carried him away from where he could feel that she was near to him had lost their charm. Another still than this, Letty, who had been so invisible to all other eyes, now went flitting uneasily about the house. Philip, who upon the piazza, there was large chances but he would see her within the hour. If he walked through about the garden, Letty had a bouquet to make up, some berries to pick, or something to do which he always could take a hand in. Letty and the village who already knew every thing told John Gordon occasionally that Letty was a sad coquette, and that she was flirting with a stranger, being published leisurely along the river bank in a skiff, or had been sent at some past time to bring, with the stranger in some near line, or sitting in some half-secluded place assertly talking. They could tell that the landlord's pride was dark whenever such intelligence was brought him, and those who were most about the house could almost tell the hour when anger treated his gust with the same attention as formerly, there was a lack of that welcome greeting with which John Gordon had always for well paying guests; and then the gossips foretold a storm. They said that when John Gordon's face darkened there would be lightning flashes, which would strike somewhere. There were other signs which these foretelling ills saw, a coming storm. Letty was seen once, twice, perhaps three times, in tears, and Martha Field had been heard openly to call her all fathers hyena.

One day John Gordon, with redder face than usual, and every sign of storm in his eye, came from parlor to cellar. Something there was in the wind more than common. The busy-bodies looked around and around for the cause, and were not long in finding it out. There, almost opposite the house, in a full view, was the little skiff that at one time, while Philip Conger, with Letty Gordon as his pupil, was back at his old employment of fishing; but they said the long gathering storm would burst; but they were to be woefully mistaken when they looked for the lightning flash to descend over the head of Philip Conger. In their own good time the couple came back; they were too happy to have any eyes for the world. Philip, after his visit of wrath all charged, sought Philip. For an hour they remained alone in the room of Philip; but those who listened for the thunder of the storm heard nothing. There was only the confused sound of a low tone proceeding from that of Gordon above to the other, then an instantly calming down. What the conversation was that had so changed the violent man was a mystery, but at the end of the hour John Gordon came forth pale and silent, and in another hour Philip Conger had turned his back on "The Village Tavern," never to be its guest again.

It was the first affair his hardiness was reserved, and poor Letty had now not only to bear with her father's dark looks and stern words, but, what was worse, the scrutinizer of her lover's face. How she would have borne this it would be hard to say, but Martha Field, who brought to her a letter from Philip, written within that hour before he left the house, filled with his promises of love, and his hopes of a speedy return, and who knew the vicinity and would find means to communicate with her, had confided every thing, and Martha was now the delivery that should, if she did not carry, the correspondence between Letty Gordon and Philip Conger; and David Bigelow the writer, who, at the bidding of Martha, performed the post-office. Without actually knowing this, John Gordon suspected, and his suspicion generated secretive measures. David Bigelow was at once forbidden the house, and Martha was told that her pleasure rained down upon the head of Martha.

For weeks things remained in this uncertain state. Whatever communication Letty contrived to take were locked within his own breast. There was a mystery about her thoughts which many could fathom, and to which Letty Gordon lent her sympathy and triumphantly when Martha Field brought her the news that she had heard strange things.

John Gordon had been known to have several private interviews with the landlord of the livery stable. The old man had been seen lurking around the village suspiciously, as if smelling out some trouble. He was often in the dead of time at the tavern, in talks with the landlord or sitting watching with body and mind, lying under his bowered brows. The gossips were busy again. They declared that between John Gordon and old Brown there was something that would bring trouble to Philip Conger or David Bigelow. They had heard the landlord declare his intention of driving them both out of the village, and of turning Martha Field into the road to seek a house where she would find better fortune. Letty, in her fear, lover eye who knew John Gordon knew that he would not stop half-way in his wishes to hurt.

and upon which he started. Of late he had talked much about ingratitude—about those he had fed turning from him—about conspiracy—about nursing vipers in his bosom that turned and stung him; and for a long time these pickers-up of inconsiderable domestic trifles were divided in opinion whether the old man made allusion to his daughter or to Martha Field. They were soon satisfied when they perceived that he ceased to speak to Martha unless forced by necessity to do so, and then only with an impatience that betrayed a strong uneasiness. Martha laughed at the threats of John Gordon to expel her from his house. She knew that she could be useful to the success of "The Village Tavern," and that if its landlord did not understand that fact, there were those about her who knew enough that would, and to these she would go. Martha Field set him at defiance, and still remained under the roof of David Bigelow to carry the letters of the lovers.

It was one morning in the early autumn, following a day that John Gordon and old Brown had been engaged in numberless consultations. The pair seemed to blanch, and those who had been peering about until they knew more of the matter than the actors themselves had, that it was near its catastrophe. The habitant redness had deserted John Gordon's face; it was pale, toasted—very pale—for John Gordon. He stepped more quickly that night than was his custom; from the bar to the parlor, and up and up stairs to where Letty and Martha sat. Those who spoke of it afterward said that many things passed that evening that were strange, but were not thought of at that day until the next day. They said that soon after dark a carriage, a kind of buggy like the one Philip Conger was sometimes seen in, came slowly up the river, and by for some minutes under the road within view of the house, and that it was not enough to give up to conquer men. It was strange then how many had seen and foretold all these things to be themselves long before; how many had known it so, and were not surprised in the least; and how many were ready with the intimation that it would be a lesson to John Gordon, and lead him to see that there was an instability in wealth, and that it was not true but that—

A week rolled by, and John Gordon left his room, but with no broken limb to splints hanging by a sling. He had arrived, people said, in the week to be at least ten years older. His face was drawn and haggard, and his healthy hue had gone quite out of his cheeks. His eyes were dim, and there was no bowl hearty laugh resounding in the house, as in the old days. The loungers and gossips watched the old man as he went vacantly about the house, speaking with something to say. They watched him as he was confronted in his own bar, that spot which only one short week before was his stronghold, by another face as pale and haggard as his own, who asked for justice on behalf of Martha Field, and was refused. Then this man, who was none other than David Bigelow, stood up before the landlord and the curious crowd, and told how Martha Field was guiltless, and that John Gordon knew it when, in his base anger and despair, he had made the means of communication between his daughter and Philip Conger, he sent an innocent girl, who should have been as dear to him as a child, to a criminal prison. John Gordon brooded with the rage he was obliged to suppress, and David Bigelow went on. Yes! he knew that the money which he had marked as a trap was taken by his daughter Letty, as she had a perfect right to do; for was not the house and all within it—yes, and all its riches—hers for the last cent, even the lands he had bought with those profits, hers? Yes! And he, John Gordon, knew this, and more. He knew that Letty Gordon had taken this money as she would take any other thing that was her own, and kept it from the Sheriff, that it purchase such articles as her father wrongfully denied her; paper, pens, and ink, that she might write to the man to whom she had betrothed herself; and such things as were necessary to have when she fled from the home where she was a prisoner.

This he said, and more. That Martha Field had refused to say one thing on the day of the arrest, knowing that Letty would step forward for her protection at the proper time; that it was Letty's intention to have left her home with Philip Conger within a few days of the one on which Martha was arrested: but why the flight should have occurred on that evening, so prosperously, was an unanswered question. One thing was certain, that when Letty Gordon left home she did not, nor did she now, know of the arrest of Martha Field, or that would come forward as an ally and show her entire innocence.

The old man opened all of David's story. There was law, he said, and justice for all. If the girl was innocent let her show it, and all would be right. She had chosen silence when she was examined before the Squire; now let her wait until her trial. There was law and justice for all, and protection for him too, and he would have it. John Gordon accompanied this last declaration by a blow upon the table with his clenched, sinewy hand, that brought back to the listeners some memory of the vast strength in it would require but a vigorous to have provoked his wrath. David Bigelow drew himself to his full height, and speaking in calmly low, measured tones that showed how his address were the consummate topic, he told him that from that moment all his actions should be subject to his again for mercy. That he would go forth, and, if Letty Gordon was alive, he would find her and bring her there to Martha Field's cell, that he to confound his villainy. From that time forward John Gordon could look upon him as a deadly enemy, and remember that, as he had denied mercy, so would it be denied to him. David Bigelow strode out of the room, while the old man looked fiercely at the group, who murmured their admiration of the carpenter, and one by one followed him out.

David Bigelow had left the village, none knew exactly when, but the sunrise was the hour he had gone to New York. Days and weeks slipped by, and nothing was heard of him. Martha Field was still a prisoner awaiting trial. All efforts at engaging strength in his arm; the bone was knitting finely, the doctor said, but he was not regaining strength in "The Village Tavern." The neighbors came less, and gossiped less. The story crept about. Some said he drove up Broadway to know something about it. There was one thing they could all agree upon, that was John Gordon's face was pale, and the strength of his welcome gone. The day for Martha Field's trial came. There was great sympathy for her throughout the county. Her story was believed, but there was no evidence, no conversation with her could make clearly and distinctly. The loss of the money was proved, the marking, the tracing of the marked money to the village stores, where it had been passed by Martha. There was no defense, the very aids counted who had contributed to it, and said. He could only make the statement on behalf of the prisoner; and then he gave Martha's story of how she became possessed of the money innocently. There was a dead silence in the court-room as he closed a beautiful appeal for mercy for the prisoner. In its midst came a loud groan, and in a moment after a shuffling of feet and several persons were running to the door, who had already caught sight of the lunches and lay prostrate upon the floor. It was John Gordon, the stout man, the strong man, now he was, as they strove to raise him to his feet. His eyes were wide open, and looking eagerly toward the judge. "I cannot see her," he said. "I am sorry. I know she tells the truth."

"Put that man back upon the stairs," the judge says, sternly.

The man was put back upon the stand; but he had nothing to say, only that he knew the girl innocent, and he could see truth in the face of the prisoner told now, when he would not see it before. And so they carried him away to his wagon, and drove him home.

As they bore the old broken-down man out by one door there were eyes—not Martha's from the other that made her heart leap. The eyes of Letty Gordon! and, when speaking of the case afterward, that they would have acquitted the prisoner through sympathy, they would have been sorry for the deed. But when the eyes of David Bigelow and Letty Gordon met Martha's she knew that she wanted no sympathy now to set her out upon the world with a stain upon her name forever. The truth had come; and when Letty Gordon, now Mrs. David Bigelow, threw her arms about the prisoner's neck, and kissed her, while she cried and laughed by turns, every body knew the story as well as though it had been told. As a form the evidence must be given, and before the town hall could open Letty's checks the verdict was rendered—" Not Guilty." How the people shouted, until the judge was obliged to adjourn the court for an hour, to allow the enthusiasm time to cool! How the news spread like wild-fire through the country town, and the ladies looked out of their windows and waved their handkerchiefs to Martha as she passed up the street from the courthouse! And how the little boys ran after her with stray barrels and boxes that night in her honor!

John Gordon retired from being Mayor of the Village Tavern," and David Bigelow and Mrs. Martha Bigelow took his place, and for twenty years dispensed its hospitalities; after which period returned in pairs and person, they gave way in turn. John Gordon lived many years after, undisturbed in the wealth that by legal right belonged to Letty. Philip Conger was not rich, but fortune prospered with him and he grew so.

On the night of Martha's arrest, with the instinct of love, he knew that something was being plotted by John Gordon, without knowing what, and believed it to be a scheme to remove Letty. Watching, he saw the light in her room, and knew it was Letty's intention to have left her home with Philip Conger within a few days of the one on which Martha was arrested: but why the flight should have occurred on that evening, so prosperously, was an unanswered question. One thing was certain, that when Letty Gordon left home she did not, nor did she now, know of the arrest of Martha Field, or that would come forward as an ally and show her entire innocence.

The old man opened all of David's story. There was law, he said, and justice for all. If the girl was innocent let her show it, and all would be right. She had chosen silence when she was examined before the Squire; now let her wait until her trial. There was law and justice for all, and protection for him too, and he would have it. John Gordon accompanied this last declaration by a blow upon the table with his clenched, sinewy hand, that brought back to the listeners some memory of the vast strength in it would require but a vigorous to have provoked his wrath. David Bigelow drew himself to his full height, and speaking in calmly low, measured tones that showed how his address were the consummate topic, he told him that from that moment all his actions should be subject to him again for mercy. That he would go forth, and, if Letty Gordon was alive, he would find her and bring her there to Martha Field's cell, that he to confound his villainy. From that time forward John Gordon could look upon him as a deadly enemy, and remember that, as he had denied mercy, so would it be denied to him. David Bigelow strode out of the room, while the old man looked fiercely at the group, who murmured their admiration of the carpenter, and one by one followed him out.

David Bigelow had left the village, none knew exactly when, but the sunrise was the hour he had gone to New York. Days and weeks slipped by, and nothing was heard of him. Martha Field was still a prisoner awaiting trial. All efforts at engaging strength in his arm; the bone was knitting finely, the doctor said, but he was not gaining strength in "The Village Tavern." The neighbors came less, and gossiped less. The story crept about. Some said he drove up Broadway to know something about it. There was one thing they could all agree upon, that was John Gordon's face was pale, and the strength of his welcome gone. The day for Martha Field's trial came. There was great sympathy for her throughout the county. Her story was believed, but there was no evidence, no conversation with her could make clearly and distinctly. The loss of the money was proved, the marking, the tracing of the marked money to the village stores, where it had been passed by Martha. There was no defense, the very aids counted who had contributed to it, and said. He could only make the statement on behalf of the prisoner; and then he gave Martha's story of how she became possessed of the money innocently. There was a dead silence in the court-room as he closed a beautiful appeal for mercy for the prisoner. In its midst came a loud groan, and in a moment after a shuffling of feet and several persons were running to the door, who had already caught sight of the lunches and lay prostrate upon the floor. It was John Gordon, the stout man, the strong man, now he was, as they strove to raise him to his feet. His eyes were wide open, and looking eagerly toward the judge. "I cannot see her," he said. "I am sorry. I know she tells the truth."

"Put that man back upon the stand," the judge says, sternly.

The man was put back upon the stand; but he had nothing to say, only that he knew the girl innocent, and he could see truth in the face of the prisoner told now, when he would not see it before. And so they carried him away to his wagon, and drove him home.

As they bore the old broken-down man out by one door there were eyes—not Martha's from the other that made her heart leap. The eyes of Letty Gordon! and, when speaking of the case afterward, that they would have acquitted the prisoner through sympathy, they would have been sorry for the deed. But when the eyes of David Bigelow and Letty Gordon met Martha's she knew that she wanted no sympathy now to set her out upon the world with a stain upon her name forever. The truth had come; and when Letty Gordon, now Mrs. David Bigelow, threw her arms about the prisoner's neck, and kissed her, while she cried and laughed by turns, every body knew the story as well as though it had been told. As a form the evidence must be given, and before the town hall could open Letty's checks the verdict was rendered—" Not Guilty." How the people shouted, until the judge was obliged to adjourn the court for an hour, to allow the enthusiasm time to cool! How the news spread like wild-fire through the country town, and the ladies looked out of their windows and waved their handkerchiefs to Martha as she passed up the street from the courthouse! And how the little boys ran after her with stray barrels and boxes that night in her honor!

John Gordon retired from being Mayor of the Village Tavern," and David Bigelow and Mrs.

PULLING THROUGH.

FIVE-AND-THIRTY years ago my best friend in this village, and one of the richest men in town, was a dog. The old pest-woman ought to have been held a better friend, punctually as she toddled by with her weekly bone. For a dog is the first love tale of Deborah Tims in her basket. But Tom, alas, she instilled to the sucklest child. He was seafood letters of demand from creditors and lawyers, with notes of contemptuous pity or expostulation from friends, relatives, and strangers, portentous missives of advice, anonymous letters, meant to strip me naked (which indeed was a trifle of so much waste paper) with every thing that could premise shipwreck of T. Pawley's life. In those days to spell the word "dun" seemed as much clock gave me a thrill of pain.

It was a white-haired and pink-faced young student of the sort commonly known as "nice young men who play upon the flute. I was the acquaintance of Miss Tims, the only and questionable daughter of John Tims, bookseller, Twickenham. I was a constant visitor. I borrowed two hundred pounds for parliament, but I had a wealthy Uncle James, a stocking-maker, nearly the kindest-natured gentleman outside a novel, and to whom I lived at Bradford, and in whom only, of things human, could myself, I had to trust. This Uncle James had many children of his own; and, while he took great pains to secure for me a perfect knowledge of the art and mystery of hosiery, it was his whim or conscience to charge against me in a book the sum of every penny that I had to receive. He would enable me, he said, to earn a good living, and would put me in the way of a sufficient livelihood, but he would not give me a penny of money.

I knew that I had white and pink flutes at Bradford, I knew also that I composed sentimental poetry to be read under trees to Miss Tims, and I knew of part of a novel that I had begun. Some of that verse I printed in a gold-edged book upon the credit of the three hundred pounds, out of which sum a certain part went to the publisher and the rest to a friendly publisher and printer. I had, therefore, a tremendous stake in the success or failure of pulling through in life, and I looked eagerly toward the future. Uncle James considered my ability to be nothing more than a contemptible way of showing them. He kindly bought ten copies of "Lays and Lamentations of Love," and presented Polly T. Pawley. But for the next few months I found the leaves of that work applied to so many unaccustomed purposes that I could not recognize him with a good grace for his fifty shillings. Uncle James took ten copies more, and ten pages on which was an acrostic upon the word Deborah, and used them successively as kettle-holders for a month. Then he sent them to one of the prefaces made for him into fly-traps by Cousin Polly's aid; and whether by reason of fatness or of approaching the natural term set to it by the destructibility of paper, my good uncle liberally subscribed for ten more copies that I could not for his manner. Whenever I went home to Bradford scraps of my poetry were discovered in the form of breakfast-time outside my Cousin Polly's head. When my books were dissected, she seized upon that part of them which was called "preliminary matter" upon curl-papers. What matter? They were also intended eventually for the fly-traps. Uncle James conquered me: I forswore all farther printing of verse, and only continued to write it for another sort of use.

One thing, however, I did not forswear, and that was Miss Tims's society, which was in a manner a matter of stockings, whose father had been a lieutenant in the army, and some of whose ancestors were knights before the civil wars!

"Why, what arms has Miss Tims?" asked the old gentleman.

"The widest and roundest, uncle, with the neatest little insteps—"

"Fangh, Sir, what arms are those for a young gentleman to marry into?"

Deborah's father was a chubby bookseller, the comiest of men, and her mother the most comfortable of good-humored dames. They liked me well enough, but without the consent of my uncle I must not marry their daughter. They had their pride also, and I was forbidden to appear at Twickenham. But we persecuted young folks, who are now the happiest of old folks, held by one another by the heart-strings. I looked forward for the next hundred, only the more eagerly into the future.

Desperately anxious, therefore, to begin the world, I qualified myself for practice at the age of twenty-one, and went into the country as assistant to a busy surgeon, by why that I might be as near as I could make myself, while looking out for a fair opening in life. I watched advertisements, and put myself upon the looks of medical agents, hoping for something that would satisfy my longing to gain money and be near Miss Tims. It must be something very tempting that would justify me, to him, in rushing at the unripe age of twenty-one to the wearying cares of matrimony and a dependent practice.

The much-wished promise I was deaf, until within a twelvemonth I had made a great discovery, and was put by a medical agent into communication with Mr. Bentlebrow, Esq., M.D., of Bentlebrough, who desired, on reasonable terms, to share evenly with me a practice of One Thousand Pounds a year.

Doctor Hawley had a frank way of correspondence, welcome to inexperience, and I could not sufficiently manner when we met inspired me with respect and confidence. It was the tenderness of a father—he was thirty years my senior—blended with the respect due from an equal. I had written to Uncle James to found some way of which there was so much harmony of taste between us, that he had been induced to invest five hundred in a friend with literary tastes and enlarged sympathies with whom he could exchange, at the end of his life with whom he could exchange, at the end of his life with whom he could exchange, at the end of his life and then ceased, on account of his sympathy with the unfortunate debtors, an immediate return to London upon business relating to poor Watts's affairs. He hoped that he might yet find means to secure for his family some little opportunity of livelihood. It was not a busy time for practice, and he had lost ground, doubtless, by so many absences, but in a few days he would be back for good, and then we would look out our shoulder to the wheel. And so he vanished, not for days, but weeks.

In the mean time all was going wrong once to me. I stuck close by the surgery, but leisure to wonder at the very small quantity of drugs dispensed, though an imposing array of pots and jars, and perused the curious monotony of the prescriptions in the day-book, which proved to me that a wonderful harmless compound as the universal medicine. My passers were reserved in manner: those whom I applied to seemed to be afraid of me; but all declared that Dr. Hawley was a wonderful clever man.

The Doctor occupied the handsomest house in the village. It was built by himself, and stood in large, well-laid grounds. The wood and pot-herbs in such a house as that, and the gray host that it held, would be a fortune to a poor man. Hawley's estimable was supplied more freely with water and potatoes than with other sorts of food. In later days, when every man's business and affairs were known to me, I knew from the butcher that the meat bill of that mansion had not exceeded a shilling a week. But there was a very gentle lady in it—Mrs. Hawley—for whom there was given me for my Doctor's sake, eighty guineas a year, out of Dr. Bentley's Golden Treasury. She was a pious, simple-hearted, trusting woman, who, like the faithful, penniless wife of a swindler. She had been married for her fortune, and the big house had been built out of it. The husband, whose degree was one of the pretenses upon which he lived, had spent every penny of the inheritance. He had debated her, as he deluded hundreds of people wiser in this world than she or I pretended to be, for her sake. For eighteen years he kept in her delusion. His bland manner was practiced on her, and not on me. That was the same—as he had when he picked me up—the terror of the neighborhood, and all houses men shunned him: when he came to see me he remembered, and dared to visit, none who dared visit her; and when, for months, in every year, her husband was away, following his own devices; she sat patiently at home, true to the last, faith and love to the man whom she had married. From her simple debate of him, when sometimes we were together in his absence, and before I knew how much she was to be needed, I caught almost the first shadow of my doubt. Every one, she said, was jealous of his talents. Many people his enemies; besides, unhappily (that was indeed some grief to her), he had been misunderstood sometimes of late, and so long time, till I ventured on a word of sympathy.

"You may just keep your pity for yourself, young man."

"Why? What do you mean?"

"Doctor Hawley's a deal cleverer than Master Pawley knows. But you'll not be the first to find it out."

I had already fallen into the first stage of heartache, and gave weight to the man's words. But I paid no more heed to them, and became more busy. After another ten minutes the tenth-hour suddenly abated, and the sense of relief from pain touched me all fallow's minds. I sat for he had lately broke out with.

"Hey! I'll tell you while tossing you sit there to that glum candle, looking so young and so pale without telling me right forward you're done for. There!"

"You may tell me what you please. Perhaps you mean what I feel."

"I mean that the sooner you be gone the better. I've known this house eighteen years, and never have seen aught in it but misery. Any man, woman, or child in Bentlebrough. Doctor Hawley's most amazing clever, but he's a wicked creature on the earth or under the earth—"

"How why do you come to him? Why do you wait for him? Why have you come to live here with him?"

"Because he's the best doctor in the country. None of the gentlefolks or tradesfolks come to him. I'm one of his patients. He'll die no good, not then I leave he'll separate us. But I mean to be done good to now—I'll take my chance about the separating. Party a poor man, he's owed me pounds for a week's illness, and had him to the Court of Requests, and at last clapped him into prison." His man's tongue was loosed, apparently for an hour, pouring incident on incident of fraud and cruelty.

"I do not believe all this scandal. Doctor Hawley is in London even now for a kind purpose."

"He's in London now about two hundred miles, that's where he is. And that's where all the money ten that ever he has got. He's never out of knowledge, and he'll soon be having one with you. Nobody put you on your guard, I suppose, when you first came here. Lots of us were sorry, but there wasn't one dared speak. It's actionable to speak truth of such a man."

"What if I tell him all you have been saying?"

"Keep it to yourself, young man, and turn it over. Look about, ask questions, and then go back home."

The Doctor did not return that night, nor for another fortnight. To my written complaint that there was no practice at all, he replied that practice would be developed until he returned. He was ashamed to be so much absorbed over Poor Watts, and so forth. When he did return, it was but for three days, during which his behavior strengthened every suspicion. Then he went back again to London.

In the mean time I was practicing among the poor, and, chiefly by housekeeper, one after the other, the twenty-five sovereigns which were all that I had to live upon. When they were all gone, the domestic assured me, with the kindest fun, that ready money did not matter, for I had the test of credit; and, indeed, there was a modest pattern of mine whom I had poisoned with an overdose of laudanum. Numerous letters were sent to me, or addressed to those who showed themselves to have some care about me. Vagrants were sent to my insolent bailiff, talking with the last libel—that might wound the fame, perhaps, of others with my ex-housekeeper's blessing. Scandal so foul as some of that which spread can hardly be conceived by those who have not lived where ignorance and immorality abound. I knew the fountain of it all. Nothing on earth except my dog saw Hawley ever defiled. Whatever scandal came direct to me I put aside with the invariable answer to the questioner about it, "You know whence the report comes; it is for you to believe it or not, as you please." I meant to pull through, and knew that my best links to success were those I had been obliged to sell my horse, and could not buy another, I did really perform a horse's duties on foot—I went to and fro, and not on horseback into the bargain. So I shut my eyes on Doctor Hawley's new mode of part in my talk about him, never abused him, nor complained of him. One day's rumor indeed set forth that Pawley and Hawley were quarreling with each other in the street, and it is most true that I never passed my partner and received what seemed to be a cut direct, because it me from a malicious face, without a vigorous desire to lay my stick upon his back. Oh, how I could have thrashed him! But I did manage, and said nothing, and looked nothing. I simply did my work; quarreled with nobody, but nobody's body; but sturdily and determinately facing the whole battery of persecution, looked neither to the right nor to the left, kept a firm grasp upon my plow, and went on with the furrow.

In one way, of course, taken to assure all my creditors that I was penniless, discarded by my family, already heavily in debt. Duns were thus raised about me, and I was pressed for more and more debts. I had to give up my watch, every luxury of furniture, my books, and even yonder clock. But I was not without a friend. During I sold Deborah's first bow-gift, a gold locket. To full many years' quarrels with nobody, but to my each other in their fervent protestations that she was the most admirable and marvelous of witnesses. The little citizen, not to be outdone, declared her to be a celestial witness.

"LIKE THE SOUL OF THE FURIOUS WOMAN WHOSE BODY LAY LIFELESS ON THE GROUND."

"He must take his chance," said Madame Defarge. "No; I can not spare him! You are engaged at three o'clock; you are going to see the basin of to-day executed—you!"

The question was addressed to the wood-sawyer, who hurriedly replied in the affirmative; seizing the occasion to add that he was the most ardent of Republicans, and that he would be in effect the most desolate of Republicans, if anything prevented him from enjoying the pleasure of smoking his afternoon pipe in the contemplation of the droll national barber. He was so very demonstrative herein, that he might have been suspected (perhaps was, by the dark eyes that looked contemptuously at him out of Madame Defarge's head) of having his small individual fears for his own personal safety, every hour in the day.

"I," said madame, "am equally engaged at the same place. After it is over—say at eight to-night—come you to me, in Saint Antoine, and we will give information against these people at my Section."

The wood-sawyer said he would be proud and flattered to attend the citizeness. The citizeness looking at him, he became extremely desirous to please as a small dog would have done, retreated across his wood, and hid his confusion over the handle of his saw.

Madame Defarge beckoned the Jurryman and The Vengeance a little closer to the door, and there expounded her further views to them thus:

"She will now be at home, awaiting the moment of his death. She will be mourning and grieving. She will be in a state of mind to approach the justice of the Republic. She will be full of sympathy with its enemies. I will go to her."

"What an admirable woman! what an admirable woman!" exclaimed Jacques Three, non-chalantly. "Ah, my cherished!" cried The Vengeance, and embraced her.

"Take you my knitting," said Madame Defarge, placing it in her lieutenant's hands, "and have it ready for me in my usual seat. Keep me my usual chair. Go you there, straight, for there will probably be a greater concourse than usual to-day."

"I will implicate the orders of my Chief," said The Vengeance, with alacrity, and kissing her cheek. "You will not be late?"

"I shall be there before the commencement."

"And before the tumbrils arrive. Be sure you are there, my soul," said The Vengeance, calling after her, for she had already started into the street, "before the tumbrils arrive!"

Madame Defarge slightly waved her hand to imply that she heard, and might be relied upon to arrive in good time, and so went through the mud, and round the corner of the prison wall. The Vengeance and the Jurryman, looking after her as she walked away, were highly appreciative of her fine figure and her general air of dowmess.

There were many women at that time upon whom the time had a dreadfully disfiguring hand; but there was not one among them more to be dreaded than this ruthless woman, who was taking her way along the streets. Of a strong and fearless character, of shrewd sense and quickness, of great determination, of that kind of beauty which not only seems to impart to its possessor firmness and animosity, but to strike into others an instinctive recognition of those qualities; the troubled time would have found her up under any circumstances. But imbued from her childhood with a brooding sense of wrong, and an inexorable hatred of its cause, supervening half developed her into a tigress. She was absolutely without pity. If she had ever had the virtue in her it had quite gone out of her.

It was nothing to her that an innocent man was to die for the sins of his forefathers; she saw, not him, but them. It was nothing to her that his wife was to be made a widow and his daughter an orphan; that was insufficient punishment, because they were but natural enemies and her prey, and as such had no right to live. To appeal to her was made hopeless by her having no sense of pity, even for herself. If she had been laid low in the streets, in any of the many encounters in which she had been engaged, she would not have pitied herself; nor, if she had been ordered to the axe to-morrow, would she have gone to it with any softer feeling than a fierce desire to charge physically with the man who sent her there.

Such a heart Madame Defarge carried under her rough robe. Carelessly worn, it was a becoming robe enough in a certain weird way, and her dark hair looked rich under many of its folds. Lying hidden in her bosom was a loaded pistol. Lying hidden at her waist was a sharp-edged dagger. Thus accoutred, and walking with the confident tread of such a character, and with the supple freedom of a woman who had habitually walked in her girlhood, barefoot and bardegged, on the brown vineyards, Madame Defarge took her way along the streets.

Now when the journey of the traveling coach, at that time of public unrest, was the completion of its load, had been planned out last night, the difficulty of taking Miss Pross in it had much engaged Mr. Lorry's attention. It was not merely desirable to avoid overlooking the coach, but it was of the highest importance that the time occupied in examining it and its passengers should be reduced to the utmost, since every escape might depend on the saving of only a few seconds here and there. Finally, he had proposed, after anxious consideration, that Miss Pross and Jerry, who were at liberty to leave the city, should leave it at two hours after the highest-wheeled conveyance known to that period. Unencumbered with luggage, they would soon overtake the coach, and, passing it and proceeding it on the road, would order its horses in advance, and have them ready at the stopping-places during the precious hours of the night, when delay was the most to be dreaded.

Seeing in this arrangement the hope of rendering real service in that pressing emergency, Miss Pross hailed it gratefully. Jerry was likewise glad to be of use; and though he thought it wise to hold himself in readiness to drive the coach himself, he was not sorry to be relieved of the trouble of walking his horses up and down unfrequented streets all night. Therefore, he had made the rounds of his stables, and had seen all his horses in their several stalls; and had paid his good friend the ostler for his attention in that regard; and had returned to the posting-house to get his dinner.

Dinner was scarcely begun, when a code of alarms was given. Somebody had better come and see what was wrong at the Royal George. Nothing particular was wrong there, but a mistake had been made in providing accommodation for the drivers of two hackney-coaches, who had arrived in the night and taken up their fares there. Jerry, who knew all the hackney-coachmen in a wide circle about him, was asked if he knew these two men. He did know them, and would go and see them. They were in a large double room, at the back of the house, on the second floor. Both were sitting on the bed, smoking and playing cards, when Jerry presented himself.

Standing in the doorway, he had a full view of both men before either observed him. Both were rough, shaggy, unkempt fellows. One was a taller man than the other, and he had a beard. They were both dressed in great coats, and appeared to have paid little regard to the arrangements of their clothing after their late active exercise. Upon the floor between them, were scattered dice, dominoes, cards, and dominoe-counters. Both men had been deep in play when Jerry stood looking at them, and were intent upon their game.

Mr. Cruncher looked over the shoulder of the man with the beard, and uttered an exclamation of surprise. The man with the beard looked over his own shoulder at Mr. Cruncher, and then coolly looked at his companion, who looked at him too.

"Sure enough!" said the man with the beard, speaking slowly and quietly; "I thought you was dead."

"Not I," said Mr. Cruncher.

"Well, then, I hope you're glad to see me," returned the man, "and not sorry."

"I'm glad to see you," said Mr. Cruncher, "under present circumstances."

"Oh, you're a cursed slow old dog!" said the man, rising, throwing down his cards, and coming forward. "Why, I'll tell you what, Jack," he added, looking at his companion, "this is the gentleman I've told you of."

"Oh, indeed!" said Jack, rising too.

"Yes, indeed," said the man with the beard. "Why, look at him! Forty-five years of age, six feet high, one hundred and eighty pounds weight, grizzled hair, eyebrows and all, nose a little on one side, a good deal of it on the other. Look at him! Why, he's the very model of the thief-portrait produced to us!"

"Well, he is like it," said Jack.

"Like it? I should think he was like it. I'll tell you what, Jack," he added, looking at his companion, "this is the gentleman that I've had the honor of telling you that I was going to pass myself off as, when I was stopped by the two genuine."

"Oh, indeed!" said Jack.

"Yes, indeed," said the man with the beard. "Why, look at him! Look at his hair, look at his eyebrows and all, look at his nose a little on one side, look at a good deal of it on the other. Look at his general build and make. Look at him altogether. Look at me. Look at us. Why, we're as like him as he is like himself."

Defarge that they were gone. Three of the doors she opened swiftly, and looked in.

"Those rooms are all in disorder, there has been harried packing, there are odds and ends upon the ground. There is no one in that room behind you! Let me look."

"Never!" said Miss Pross, who understood the request as perfectly as Madame Defarge understood the answer.

"If they are not in that room, they are gone, and can be pursued and brought back," said Madame Defarge to herself.

"As long as you don't know whether they are in that room or not you are uncertain what to do," said Miss Pross to herself; "and you shall not know that, if I can prevent your knowing it; and know that, or not know that, you shall not leave here while I can hold you."

"I have been in the streets from the first, nothing has escaped me, I will tear you to pieces but I will have you from that door," said Madame Defarge.

"As I am alone at the top of a high house in a solitary court-yard, we are not likely to be heard, and I pay for bodily strength to keep you here while every minute you are here is worth a hundred thousand guineas to my darling," said Miss Pross.

Madame Defarge made at the door. Miss Pross, on the instinct of the moment, seized her round the waist in both her arms, and held her tight. It was in vain for Madame Defarge to struggle and to strike; Miss Pross, with the vigorous tenacity of love, so much stronger than hate, clasped her tight, and even lifted her from the floor in the struggle that they had. The two hands of Madame Defarge buffeted and tore at her face; but Miss Pross, immovable, held down, held her round the waist, and clung to her with more than the hold of a drowning woman.

Soon Madame Defarge's hands ceased to strike, and her body encircled with a vice, bent under my arm," said Miss Pross, in smothered tones; "you shall not carry it. I am stronger than you; I bes Heaven for it. I'll hold you till one or other of us faints or dies!"

Madame Defarge's hands were at her bosom. Miss Pross looked up, saw what it was, struck at it, struck out a hand, a crash, and stood alone—blinded with smoke.

All this was in a second. As the smoke cleared, leaving an awful stillness, it was shot out on the air like the soul of the furious woman whose body lay before the prostrate figure.

In the first flight and horror of her situation Miss Pross paused the body so far from it as she could, and ran down the stairs to call the police to her help. Happily she bethought herself of the consequences of what she did, and how she could check herself and go back. It was dreadful to go in at the door again; but she did go in, and even took a look at it, to see how soon she could do things that she must want. These she put on, out on the staircase, and shutting the door, took the door, and taking away the key. She then sat down on the stairs a few moments, to breathe and to cry, and then went down into the yard.

By good fortune she had a veil on her bonnet, or she could hardly have gone along the streets without being stopped. By good fortune, too, she was mutually so respectable in appearance as not to show disfigurement like any other woman. She should both adjust her veil, for the marks of griping fingers were deep in her face, and her hair was torn, and her dress (basting composed with unsteady hands) was clutched and dragged a hundred ways.

In crossing the bridge she dropped the door-key in the river. Arriving at the cathedral door some few minutes before her escort, and waiting there, she thought, what if the door were already taken in a net, what if it were identified, what if the door escort were at the gate, examinis discovered, what if she were stopped at the gate, sent to prison, and charged with murder! In the midst of these fluttering thoughts the escort appeared, took her in, and took her away.

"Is there any noise in the streets?" she asked him.

"The usual noises," Mr. Cruncher replied; and looked surprised by the question and by her aspect.

"I don't hear you," said Miss Pross. "What do you say?"

It was in vain for Mr. Cruncher to repeat what he said; Miss Pross could not hear him. "So ill and so deaf," thought Mr. Cruncher, amazed; "at all events she'll see that." And she did.

"Is there any noise in the streets now?" asked Miss Pross again, presently.

Again Mr. Cruncher nodded his head.

"I don't hear it."

"Gone deaf in an hour?" said Mr. Cruncher, ruminating, with his mind much disturbed; "wot's come to her?"

"I feel," said Miss Pross, "as if there had been a flash and a crash, and that crash was the last thing I should ever hear in this life."

"Blest if she ain't in a queer condition!" said Mr. Cruncher, more and more disturbed. "Wot can she have been a doing of, to herself? I've a courage up! Hark! There's the roll of them dreadful carts! You can hear that, now."

"I can hear," said Miss Pross, seeing that he spoke to her, "nothing. Oh! my good man, there was first a great crash, and then a great stillness, and that stillness seems to be fixed and unchangeable, never to be broken any more as long as my life lasts!"

"If she don't hear the roll of those dreadful carts, now very nigh their journey's end," said Mr. Cruncher, glancing over his shoulder, "it's my opinion that indeed she never will hear any thing else in this world."

And indeed she never did.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

JONAS WHITCOMB'S REMEDY FOR
ASTHMA

Is worthy the attention of all who suffer from this distressing complaint. The late JONAS WHITCOMB, of Boston, visited Europe a few years since for the benefit of his health, which was much impaired by frequent attacks of Spasmodic Asthma.

While in Germany, an eminent physician became intimately acquainted in his case, and gave him relief. He followed the treatment ordered, and, to his surprise and joy, his asthma almost entirely disappeared. He procured the recipe which had accomplished so much for him, brought it with him to this country, and it became the property of the present proprietors. It contains no poisonous or injurious properties whatever; and an infant may take it with perfect safety.

[Extract from a distinguished lawyer in Newburyport, Mass.]

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

NEWBURYPORT, Feb. 25, 1856.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.—For nearly twelve months smothe since I received from the hand of your venerable predecessor a bottle of his Asthmatic Remedy.

I can now satisfied that my relief from one of the most distressing complaints incident to our life-subsisting disease that ever afflicted human being, is to be attributed wholly to this remedy. For thirteen years I suffered with the Asthma, and, if ever more severely than until, in 1851 and 1853, I was obliged, for months together, to sleep in my chair; and the best medical exercise could bring on a paroxysm, oftentimes so severe that I could not move or take food for hours.

From the time I took the first dose of your "Remedy," to the present writing, I have not had the slightest attack, now my system is so free from it that the most active exercise and exposure in the night air produces no effect, slightly restrict the lungs. Your medicine soon dispels the unwelcome guest, and I owe them a debt of gratitude from the innocent.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. H. BRADDON.

[Extract from a letter written by a distinguished Lawyer in Maine.]

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.—Gentlemen—I tried more than thirty different species for the Asthma, until I had become worn down by disease, and almost discouraged. When I commenced taking your medicine I had been afflicted with the disease twenty years. It is of the spasmodic kind; and in a bad attack I have frequently sat up all night, and sometimes several nights, taking your medicine I found an unaccustomed relief. My health and strength began to improve. I have gained almost twenty pounds in weight, and have, comparatively, no Asthma. When I feel the symptoms returning, a few teaspoonfuls of the medicine is sufficient to relieve me.

It affords me the highest pleasure to recommend what has been broken up, and that it will soon entirely leave me. At my age, no one has the confidence I have, therefore, and enjoyed the health that I have enjoyed for the last year. You are at liberty to make such use of useful power in Jonas Whitcomb's Remedy for the Asthma.

Respectfully yours, H. R. VOSE.

[Letter from a Clergyman.]

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

SOUTH WEYMOUTH, Mass., May 12, 1857.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.—I take pleasure in stating, by wonderful effects of your Asthmatic Remedy upon the Asthma on my wife. As often as ten or twelve times in a year she was brought to the very gates of death, requiring two or three watchers, sometimes for several days and nights in succession. Since she has used so far gone that her physician could not count her pulse. I consulted numerous physicians of the highest standing to little or no purpose. At length I heard of "Whitcomb's Remedy," and, as a last resort, I advised her to sleep quietly in a few minutes, and nearly broke up the disease. I am a Methodist Clergyman, and not given to puffing. I shall be happy to answer any inquiries respecting her case.

Yours truly, KIMBALL HADLEY.

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

SOUTH WEYMOUTH, Mass., Jan. 28, 1859.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.—I saw your notice of Jonas Whitcomb's Asthmatic Remedy in the Boston Pilot, and I wish to tell you of its effect upon me. I have been troubled very much about five years, and sometimes losing my sleep. Sometimes I could not move, and had to sit in one position for hours.

I began taking your medicine last September. I have not had a fit of coughing since, and I am sleeping well, nor an hour's work, since. I am a shoemaker by trade, and live in South Weymouth.

Your obedient servant, MICHAEL KEARNAY.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and sold by all Druggists everywhere.

One Dollar per Bottle.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving healing, and curing the most stubborn, painful, and dangerous diseases of Cough, Cold, Influenza, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Croup, Asthma, Inflammation of the Lungs, and other pulmonary complaints. Prescribed to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.

By years' assured Consistorfeits, of which there are several worthless ones, see that each bottle has the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

Full Length Steel Engravings of WASHINGTON AND EVERETT, Including a View of Mount Vernon.

In the Engraving of Washington. These splendid engravings are from original paintings by Hicks, and are engraved on steel in the highest style of Art. They are each 19x25 inches, each containing six square feet. So many cheap, miserable pictures have been palmed upon the public as works of art—and especially in cheap, black, and muddy engravings—that it is difficult to convince persons of taste that they are safe in ordering what they have not seen. We have paid the first sitting their own prices, amounting to many thousand dollars, to procure those which are really meritorious, as well as the best portraits, and that shall be standard. Size of Engravings, 19x25 inches. Each, Fourteen Dollars.

☞ The Editor of the New York Observer says:—"Mason engravings are genuine works of art. Their likenesses are admirable. The portrait of Mr. Everett will take precedence of all others."

☞ The New York Christian Advocate says:—"They are among the finest engravings we have ever seen upon the PUBLISHERS ARE FULLY RESPONSIBLE FOR ALL THEY PROMISE."

TERMS ALMOST GRATIS.

We will send Engravings to any person to color—

Either Engraving and a $3 00 Magazine, one year, for $5.

Both Engravings and a $3 00 Magazine, one year, for $6.

☞ Agents who remit $50 at one time will have an extra copy of each Engraving. The Magazines are

Harper's,
The Knickerbocker,
Godey's Lady's Book,
The Atlantic,
Blackwood.

☞ By special arrangement, the entire year's subscription to the Magazines can be made to begin with the subscriber, and the publishers receive their supply for the year direct from their respective publication offices. The rest of the engravings will be sent only by the discretion between the lowest wholesale and the regular price of the Magazines.

Engravings sent at once, and subscriptions to periodicals commence with current issue, unless otherwise ordered. Money at our risk if proof is retained of having been mailed. The Engravings can be had, therefore need early. Address

S. HULL BAILEY & CO.,
(At Wm. Hall & Son's Music Store,) 543 BROADWAY, N.Y.
NOW READY.

Special Announcement
FROM THE
Quaker City Publishing House!

100,000 Catalogues,
NEW, ENLARGED, AND REVISED—NOW READY FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Superior Inducements to the Public!

☞ A new and rare plan for obtaining GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, and valuable Jewelry. Full particulars given in Catalogues, which will be sent free to all applicants.

Valuable Gifts, worth from 50 cents to $100, GUARANTEED to each purchaser. $10,000 in Gifts have been distributed to my patrons within the past six months. Agents wanted during the present and the next six months.

The inducements offered Agents are more liberal than those of any other Book Publishing House.

Having born in the Publishing and Bookselling business for the past ten years, my experience enables me to conduct the Gift Enterprise with the greatest satisfaction to all.

☞ Agents WANTED in every Town and County, for full particulars address DANIEL ADEE, Quaker City Publishing House, 23 South Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

Singer's No. 2 Sewing Machine, $100.
Singer's No. 1 Sewing Machine, $90.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $1.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $80 and $75 are capable of executing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,
FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A
FAMILY PHYSIC,

are so compounded that disease within the range of their action can rarely withstand or evade them. Their penetrating properties search, and cleanse, and invigorate every portion of the human organism, correcting its diseased action, and restoring its healthy functions. In consequence of these properties, the invalid who is laid down with pain or physical debility is astonished to find his health or energy restored by a remedy so pleasant to take and so simple and inviting.

Last only to the cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also many formidable and dangerous diseases, such as Costiveness, Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Erysipelas, Headache, Piles, Rheumatism, Erruptions and Skin Diseases, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Fever, Tumors and Salt Rheum, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, as a Dinner Pill, and for Purifying the Blood.

They are sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best aperient in the world for all the purposes of a family physic.

Price 25 cents per Box: Five Boxes for $1 00.

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.

Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

361 BROADWAY. 539
BRIDAL SUITE.
Tucker's Furnishers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items.
Are all reliable.

A Book for Everybody.

THE RIGHT WORD IN THE RIGHT PLACE; A Pocket Dictionary of Synonyms, Technical Terms, Abbreviations, Foreign Phrases, etc., etc., with a Chapter on Punctuation and Proof-Reading. This will be an indispensable companion for every writer and speaker who would speak exactly what he means, and neither more nor less, and say it in the best way. No doubt, this work should be the

POCKET AND DESK COMPANION
OF
The Editor, The Orator;
The Clergyman, The Debater;
The Lawyer, The Student at Law;
The Physician, The Teacher;
The Legislator, The Student;
The Correspondent, The Conversationist.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

Sent by mail, to any address, on receipt of the price.

FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

Grover & Baker's
NOISELESS
Family Sewing Machines,
AT REDUCED PRICES.

New York, Oct 21, 1859.

The undersigned, Ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having purchased and used in our families GROVER AND BAKER'S CELEBRATED FAMILY SEWING MACHINE," take pleasure in recommending it as an instrument fully combining the essentials of a good machine. Its beautiful simplicity, ease of management, and strength and elasticity of its stitch, unite to render it, in our opinion, a Machine indispensable to any in the market, and one which we feel confident will give satisfaction to all who may purchase and use it.

W. P. STRICKLAND,	C. LAREW,
JOHN HALL,	JOHN PATTERSON,
S. ANNAN,	M. YOUNGS,
R. S. STORRS,	A. D. GILLETTE.

428 Broadway, New York; 18 Summer Street, Boston; 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; 93 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati; 113 Montgomery Street, San Francisco; 33 St. Francis Street, Mobile; 51 Camp Street, New Orleans.

ALL MACHINES WARRANTED.

☞ SEND FOR A CIRCULAR. ☜

To prevent Baldness, Use Jules Hauel's Lait Antiphelique, or Hair Restorer.—It will strengthen the roots of the hair, prevent it from falling out, and cause a new growth. It will cause a growth of hair upon those baldest exists, and will change gray hair to its former original life-color. It is perfectly harmless, and will not soil the skin. Sold by all Druggists, and by JULES HAUEL & CO., No. 704 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

SANFORD'S HOT-AIR FURNACES.
PORTABLE, DURABLE, AND ECONOMICAL.
THOUSANDS TESTIFY IN THEIR FAVOR.
Send for a pamphlet containing cuts and testimonials.
SANFORD'S MAMMOTH OIL GLOBE HEATER,
A favorite and well-tested source of good power.
SEND FOR A BOOK.
SANFORD, TOWSLOW & CO.,
No. 239 Water Street.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, no pay required until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 13 Broadway, New York.

1st. SIX LECTURES on the nausea, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin Diseases, Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to Old Age. Price 25 cents. By Engravings.—Price 50 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.

2nd. A book on Consumption and Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes disease. 121 pages, 6 engravings. Price 26 cents. Any book you wish, giving name, state, county town, and post office.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, CANNOT BE EXCELLED.

260 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
820 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
220 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
46 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our large importation of Garnet and Coral Jewelry, consisting of bracelets, brooches, ear-rings, necklaces, chains, lockets, pins, sleeve buttons, &c.

OSBORNE, BOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
Importers of Fine Jewelry and Watches,
No. 335 Broadway, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER,
Wholesale Agents,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER
PAINT of NEW and ELEGANT SHADES
For Roofs, Wood, Iron, Tin, Bricks, Canvas, Muslin, Paper, &c., durably, beautifully, and cheaply. Send for circular and cinder proof. Double and Locomotive. Depot 72 Maiden Lane, New York.

HICKS & BUTTS, Agents.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly,
The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.
Also
Quern's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The finest sweetness of the oil is retained, and you can not taste any complaint after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 139 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Beekman Street.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new invention. Agents have made over $10,000 in one;—other than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps, and get the secret. Address EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

ANOTHER DIAMOND WEDDING AFOOT.

BY NAPOLEON B. QUIGGS.

By every liberal right
In your brown and glossy hair;
By your cheeks of rose and lily,
And your pearly teeth, I swear;
By all your charms of person,
Of manners and of mind,
I swear, Matilda Jane, to be
A husband true and kind.

Your wishes shall be law to me—
Your whims a sealed decree;
You may waltz with all the world, and I Shall never jealous be;
I'll give bonnets in Fourteenth Street
To all your kin and kith;
And I'll drown myself,—so help me Heaven!
At the Clothing Store of SMITH.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.
} NEW YORK.

C. G. GUNTHER & SONS—FURS—

Have opened
THEIR ENTIRE STOCK FOR THE SEASON
OF MANUFACTURED
FURS,
Comprising all the leading and desirable styles, together with additional novelties in FURS
FOR LADIES' FURS,
GENTLEMEN'S FURS,
CHILDREN'S FURS,
FUR ROBES.
We solicit the inspection of the retail trade to the above, and offer our goods at the most advantageous prices. C. G. GUNTHER & SONS,
No. 40 Maiden Lane.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar,

513 Broadway,

Under the St. Nicholas Hotel.

HUDSON BAY SABLE, RUSSIAN SABLE,
MINK, MARTEN, ROYAL ERMINE,
OF THE LATEST STYLES FROM EUROPE.
CHILDREN'S FURS, IN ELEGANT VARIETY,
STOCK LARGE, ASSORTMENT COMPLETE,
PRICES MODERATE.
GENIN'S BAZAAR,
513 Broadway.

GREAT NATIONAL PICTURE.

"The Home of Washington during the War."

Fulgid by ROSSITER and MCGINN, now on Exhibition at the NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN,

Tenth Street, near Broadway.

From 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., and from 7 to 9 evening.
Admission, 25 cents.

DUSSELDORF GALLERY, 563 BROADWAY,

SONNTAG'S PICTURE,

"A DREAM OF ITALY."

Having met with the most unbridled praise of the Press and the numerous visitors to the above gallery, will remain on Exhibition a short time longer.
Open day and Evening. Admission, 25 cents.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

The great Alterative remedy for Purifying the Blood, will be found a certain cure for Scrofula, Rheumatism, Salt Rheum, Fever Sores, Erysipelas, Pimples, Pilos, Mercurial Diseases, Cutaneous Eruptions, Liver Complaints, Stubborn Ulcers, Loss of Appetite, General Debility, &c. As an alterative and renovating agent, it is unequaled. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, corner of William, N. Y.

LIBRETTOS OF ALL THE STANDARD OPERAS, with English Translation, for sale at the Music of the Principal Airs. Price 25 cents each. Published by BALMER BRIDGE & CO., Boston.

MUSICAL BOXES,

Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 36 tunes.
PAILLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 31 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

ALBERT WEBER, Piano-Forte Manufacturer, No. 185 West Broadway, near Canal St. The best assortment of PIANOS, warranted for three years, at the lowest prices. Call and examine before purchasing.

PIANOS AND MELODEONS equal to the best, and cheapest in the city.
E. P. JONES, 95 Ann Street, 2d floor.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

Publish this Week:

I.

THE QUEEN OF HEARTS.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Dead Secret," "The Lady in White" (just commenced in Harper's Weekly), &c., &c.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

The story of the "Queen of Hearts" is full of life and action.—John Bull.

The Queen of Hearts herself, too, is such a fascinating creature, so natural and so lovable, so wayward, impulsive, womanly, and touch-hearted, that we can not choose but follow her through the pages with something of a lover's tenderness.—London Literary Gazette.

II.

THE PRAIRIE TRAVELLER.

A HAND-BOOK FOR OVERLAND EMIGRANTS.

With Maps, Illustrations, and Itineraries of the Principal Routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific.

By RANDOLPH B. MARCY,

CAPTAIN U. S. ARMY.

Published by Authority of the War Department.

Small 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

"Whoever wishes to read an excellent book will find a genuine specimen in this volume. It is truly American to the back-bone, and makes us familiar with every knowledge that can be found only in the great prairies between the Mississippi and the Pacific. The design of the work is to supply the overland emigrant with a complete and satisfactory guide on his wide-new journey, describing the methods of prairie travel in the most minute detail, and founded on the personal experience of the author—a distinguished officer in the United States Army—rather than on the accounts of previous explorers. The information which it contains is, of course, not to be found in other publications. The subject is so novel as the recent paths which the feet of enterprise have opened in the Virgin prairie. Written from actual knowledge of the wants of the traveller and pencil, the statements of the author exhibit a remarkable freshness, and are not a little attractive from their vigorous style of expression, as well as for the practical and useful information which they impart. The work is published by authority of the War Department of the United States, and can not fail to prove useful and interesting to a large circle of readers besides those to whom it is especially addressed."

III.

ONE OF THEM.

By CHARLES LEVER.

Part I. 8vo, Paper, 5 cents.

☞ Either of the above sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

The New York Tribune.

THE TRIBUNE—now more than eighteen years old, and having over Two Hundred Thousand Subscribers, or constant purchasers, diffused through every State and Territory of the Union—aspires to be more than ever, in its best sense—the earnest champion of Liberty, Progress, and of whatever will tend to enhance our national growth in Intellect, Industry, Knowledge, and Prosperity. It will continue to urge the emancipation, not only of the Black Laborer from the chains and the lash, but of the White likewise from Land Monopoly, Intemperance, Ignorance, and that degeneration or remote Mankind which paralyzes every effort to rise, and which renders the morally certain reward. Believing that the chief evil of the day is the enormous multiplication of the unnecessary fetters of Non-Producers, it will continue to war against whatever tends to degrade Labor from its proper dignity in just and full recognition. It will tirelessly commend the duty of raising Labor from its present low level, and, wherever they may be tended, the Artisans as well, for whose protection and elevation to a higher standard of life debt, while our Slave-system exists in Southern States, will continue to be a burden and a curse. It will, therefore, oppose the Tariff—as often exposed—as it will ever assail the iniquitous Fugitive Slave Law, and every other manifestation of that evil spirit which seeks through the spoliation of other countries that aggrandizement which is to be only attained only through the due development and cultivation of our immense resources. It will especially advocate a more efficiently discriminating Tariff, the Freedom of the Public Lands, the construction of a Railroad from the navigable waters of the Mississippi to those of the Pacific, and every other measure which seems to us calculated to enhance the dignity of the occupations of Labor, and to increase the comforts of the Laborer.

Having the same confidence between Peaceful and Light, Inertia and Progress, Slavery and Freedom moves steadily onward. Isolated acts of folly and wickedness for the moment give a seeming advantage to Wrong; but God still reigns, and the Right will finally triumph and Right. The year 1860 must witness a memorable conflict between these antagonistic principles. The question—Shall Human Slavery be further strengthened and diffused over the power and influence of the Federal Union?—is now to receive a momentous, if not conclusive answer. Every Free State must be aroused to greater zeal for the Negroes' rights, and every Slave State must be made to feel that Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana are in earnest in their hostility to Slavery. The nearly every Free State, to demand a recognition of every man's right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness on the earth's sunless wherever he has not been subjugated by the State's constitution and laws. Meanwhile, the consecration of the virgin soil of the Territories to Free Labor must be maintained. The Right of Secession—a right above the attention of Congress through the ensuing four years—will be fully discussed in the columns of these canvass; and, whatever the immediate issue, we can not doubt that the ultimate triumph of the Right will be won with the strictest of impartial Philosophy and the most thorough Democracy.

The Tribune will continue to publish more graphic reports of the doings of Congress, and of whatever else happening at the Federal Metropolis will be of interest to the of public regard, and having extended both our Foreign and Domestic Correspondence, and secured the services of Political staff, we believe THE TRIBUNE may safely challenge comparison with any Journal, whether of current events or principles or as a reliable mirror of the passing time. Especially, we shall endeavor to make it, as it has been, while we shall constantly study to improve in every way, the best Family Newspaper in the world. The general verdict of the People, as to the success of our past labors, and those of the Staff shall be characterized by equal earnestness and assiduity.

The New York Daily Tribune

is printed on a large imperial sheet, and published every day in the year except Sundays—Sundays excepted. It contains full details on the topics of the time, employing a large corps of the best newspaper writers of the day: Domestic and Foreign Correspondence; Proceedings of Congress; Reports of Lectures; City News; Cattle, Horse, and Produce Markets; Reviews of Books; Literary Intelligence; Papers on Mechanics and the Arts, &c., &c. We strive to make THE TRIBUNE a newspaper in which the waste of the public—its Telegraphic Intelligence being over eight hours in advance.

TERMS.

THE DAILY TRIBUNE is mailed to Subscribers at $6 per annum, in advance; $3 for six months.

The New York Semi-Weekly Tribune is published every TUESDAY and FRIDAY, and contains all the leading features of the Daily, with the Cattle, Horse, and Country Markets, Reviews of Books, Literary Intelligence, and the Proceedings of Congress. Its correspondence and during the sessions of Congress it contains a complete Report of the Proceedings, with the most important speeches. We shall, as heretofore, make THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE a literary as well as a Political Newspaper, and we are determined that it shall rank in the front rank of Family Papers.

One Copy, one year	$3 00
Two Copies, one year	5 00
Five Copies, one year	11 25
Ten Copies, to one address	20 00
Ten Copies, or over, to address of each Subscriber,
$2 20 each.

Any person sending us a club of twenty, or over, will be entitled to a copy gratis. For a club of fifty, we will send the Daily Tribune one year.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE is sent to Clergymen at $2 per annum.

The New York Weekly Tribune,

A large eight-page paper for the country, is published every Saturday, and contains Editorials on the important topics of the time, the news of the week, interesting correspondence from all parts of the world, the New York Cattle, Horse, and Produce Markets, interesting and reliable Political, Mechanical and Agricultural articles, &c., &c.

We shall, during this year, as heretofore, constantly labor to improve the quality of the instructive entertainment afforded by the WEEKLY TRIBUNE, which we intend, shall continue to be the best Family Weekly newspaper published in the World. We consider the Cattle Market Reports alone richly worth to cattle raisers a year's subscription price.

TERMS.

One Copy, one year	$2 00
Three Copies, one year	5 00
Five Copies, one year	8 00
Ten Copies, one year	12 00
Twenty Copies, to one address	20 00
And any larger number (each)	1 00
Twenty Copies, to address of each Subscriber	24 00

Specimen Numbers sent free.

Any person sending us a club of Twenty, or more, will be entitled to a copy gratis. For a club of forty, we will send the Semi-Weekly Tribune; and for a club of one hundred the Daily Tribune will be sent gratis. We continue to send THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE to Clergymen for $1.

Subscription in coin, or currency at par, will be always cash in advance. All letters to be addressed to HORACE GREELEY & CO., Tribune Buildings, Nassau Street, New York.

READ! READ!! READ!!!—All who desire to understand the true philosophy of SLAVERY, and to be fortified with unanswerable facts over the Abolitionists, should read Dr. Van Evrie's Pamphlet, NEGROES AND NEGRO SLAVERY. Address DAY-BOOK OFFICE, No. 40 Ann Street, N.Y., inclosing two three-cent stamps.

A CURIOSITY FOR EVERYBODY.

THE ILLUSTRATED SCRAP-BOOK.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THIS is a most entertaining book, containing Five Hundred Pictures upon every conceivable subject of everyday life—with a large proportion of curiosity, scenery in all quarters of the globe, portraits of celebrated persons, battles, portrayals of historical events, natural curiosities, in one handsome octavo for study and amusement for old and young.

Price, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1.

For sale at all of the periodical depots by

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS PER COPY!

☞ Send, postage paid, to any part of the country, on the receipt of twenty-five cents in postage stamps or silver.

PUBLISHED BY
JOHN J. DYER & CO.,
25 School Street, Boston.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my eugenic medicated OIL, which will force them to grow with certainty from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1 00. Address, R. G. GRAHAM, 197 Nassau Street, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
R. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

H. B. Dodworth, Band Instruments, & Astor Place.—Publisher and Dealer in Music and Instruments.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square), New York,

Have just Published:

THE QUEEN OF HEARTS. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "Antonina; or, The Fall of Rome." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE VIRGINIANS. A Tale of the Last Century. By W. M. THACKERAY. Part I. of "The Newcomes," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "Henry Esmond," "The Great Hoggarty Diamond," "Lectures on English Humorists," &c., &c. With Illustrations by the Author. 8vo, Paper, 25 Cts. Muslin, $1 00.

THE PRAIRIE TRAVELLER. A Hand-Book for Overland Emigrants. With Maps, Illustrations, and Itineraries of the Principal Routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific. By RANDOLPH B. MARCY, Captain U. S. Army. Published by Authority of the War Department. Small 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

WOMAN AUTHORS OF ALL Ages and Countries. By MRS. ELLET, Author of "Women of the American Revolution," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

DR. STEPHEN SWEET, OF CONNECTICUT, is known all over the world.

$2000 A YEAR.—I am now making this sum in a business which may be followed by any lady or gentlemen,without nothing to start with, and a specimen of which, with full instructions, I will send on the receipt of $1, and return the money in every instance where satisfaction is not given. It is highly respectable, new, and very popular. Address

MRS. R. J. AVERY, Box 947, St. Louis, Mo.

A GREAT CURIOSITY.—Agents wanted. For particulars address with 3cent P. O. stamp inclosed. S. S. OSMENT, Box 13, Cleveland, Tenn.

1000 Agents Wanted.—Large Profits.—Send Stamp to Dr. Bee Ch. Keene, Mo.

ITCHING CHILBLAINS.

A sure relief, "Dupuy's Chilblain Balm." 25 cents per box; per mail, 30 cents. Sold at 809 Broadway.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 98 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other 25 cent Monthly.

Commencement of the Twentieth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR DECEMBER.

CONTENTS.

WASHINGTON IRVING.
With Nine Illustrations of the New Public Building.

HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA. By THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.
With Sixteen Illustrations.

INSECTS DESTRUCTIVE TO WHEAT.
With Twenty-three Illustrations.

THE ENGLISH IN INDIA.
AN ARMISTICE.

THE PUBLIC-TELLER. (Illustrated.)

THE GREAT LITERARY OF STONEBURGH.
OUR OLD HOME.
WISDOM AND GOODNESS.
REGULAR AUTHORS. By LEIGH HUNT. Ludlow.
NOTES OF CHARLES LAMB TO THOMAS ALLSOP. By GEORGE DARLEY.
"VENI, VIDI, VICI."
A HIT AT SELLING.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
SPRIGGINS'S VOYAGE OF LIFE.
Engraved Illustrations by MCLENAN.
FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.
With Two Illustrations.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year,	$4 00.

Postage on HARPER'S MAGAZINE must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a Year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE VERY BEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW STORY, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," splendidly Illustrated by MCLENAN, will commence in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of "HOWADJI IN SYRIA" will be continued in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for 1860.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

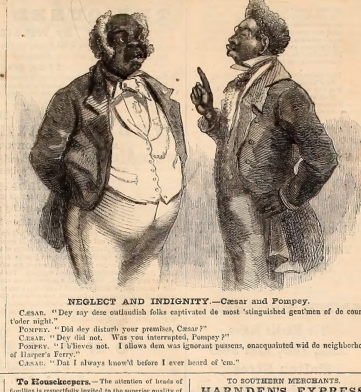
A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences to the Office of the Publication, or, by the Office of Delivery.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

A PREMATURE MOVEMENT.

JOHN BROWN. "Here! Take this, and follow me. My name's Brown."
COFFEE. "Please God! Mr. Brown, dat is impossible. We ain't done seedin' yit at our house."



NEGLECT AND INDIGNITY.—Cæsar and Pompey.

CÆSAR. "Dey say dese outlandish folks captivated de most 'stinguished gen'men of de county t'odder night."
POMPEY. "Did dey disturb your premises, Cæsar?"
CÆSAR. "Dey did not. Was you interrupted, Pompey?"
POMPEY. "I 'lieves not. I allows dem was ignorant passons, emancipated wid de neighborhood of Harper's Ferry."
CÆSAR. "Dat I always know'd before I ever heard of 'em."

Vest natural.

Vest natural.

DELANO Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Office and Salesroom No. 256 Broadway, opposite the City Hall Park.

The above Company are manufacturers of Life-preserving COATS, VESTS, SHIRTS, and JACKETS for Men and Boys, and WAISTS and SACKS for Ladies. These garments look like, and can be worn the same as ordinary clothing, and yet are the most perfect life-preservers ever invented.

We would draw attention to the annexed unsolicited letter.

NEW ORLEANS, October 9, 1859.

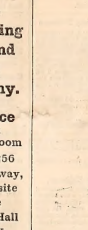
Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Gentlemen:

Having been saved by one of your "PATENT LIFE-PRESERVING VESTS," I deem it my duty to make it known to the public. I was on the Steamboat "Princess" when she was burned, and had it not been for one of your Vests (which I assure you are invaluable), should have been drowned. I therefore cordially recommend it to the public.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your well wisher,
Captain I. D. THOMSEN.

A Perfect Fitting Shirt



MADE TO MEASURE, SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS;
OR, SINGLE, $1 50 EACH.

MADE OF YORK MILLS MUSLIN AND FINE LINEN BOSOMS, AND WARRANTED AS GOOD A SHIRT AS SOLD IN RETAIL STORES AT $2 50 TO $3 EACH. FIFTY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $75 EACH.

P.S.—Those who think I can not make a good shirt for $1 50 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one dozen $15 fine shirts:

20 yds of York Mills muslin, at 16c. per yd..... $3 20
7 yards of fine linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50
Making and cutting..... 6 00
Laundry, $1 ; buttons and cotton, 50c..... 1 50
Profit..... 7 40

Total..... $30 00

SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid in the express company on receipt of goods.

WARD, from London,
257 Broadway, up stairs,
between White and Walker Streets.

A Fresh and Interesting Book from South Carolina.

NOW READY:

CAROLINA SPORTS, BY LAND AND WATER.

Including Incidents of DEVIL FISHING,
WILD CAT
DEER AND BEAR
HUNTING, ETC.
BY THE HON. WILLIAM ELLIOTT, of South Carolina.
WITH SIX SPIRITED ILLUSTRATIONS.
One Volume. Price $1.

Single copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

To Housekeepers.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Full and Winter Clothing, manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSLOW BEAVERS,
LIDUE DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
CASTOR AND LIGHT BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS
in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.
D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 255, 257, and 259 Broadway.

Hosiery and Men's Furnishing Goods.

A great assortment of best goods at prices generally paid for inferior qualities
Calls, remind, and compare. Our price, and money cheerfully refunded in case of dissatisfaction.

A. RANKIN & CO.,
No. 637 Broadway
and No. 96 Bowery.

Established in 1852.

Café de Costa Rica C&C

THIS SUPERIOR Strong-bodied & delicate flavored Mountain COFFEE, For sale by CORNELL & CO. No. 5 Beaver Street.

Thomas Andrews' "Excelsior" Yeast Powder

Is sure to supersede all other preparations where quick yeast is required. Nothing can excel the purity or efficacy of this compound. Every good housekeeper should try our Yeast Powder. It is ready for use in one minute. Half a million of cans sold this year! Get our "EXCELSIOR" YEAST POWDER from your grocer, and take no other, if you want the best!

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
136 and 138 Cedar Street, N. Y.
Established twelve years!

Willcox & Gibbs SEWING MACHINE

"Has points of superiority peculiarly its own"—demonstrated in practical use, and desirable to every one, all the requirements of a "FAMILY MACHINE."

Price $30.

Manufactured and sold, Wholesale and Retail, by
JAMES WILLCOX,
No. 658 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES
Are, without question, better and cheaper than any other machine in this market, or money refunded.
N.B.—Price Reduced to $20.
No. 502 Broadway.

TO SOUTHERN MERCHANTS.

HARNDEN'S EXPRESS

WILL LEAVE DAILY,
TUESDAY, THURSDAY AND SATURDAY,
BY STEAMSHIP
FOR SAVANNAH,
Thence, by Georgia Central Railroad, to
MACON, MEMPHIS, ATLANTA,
AUGUSTA, MOBILE, KNOXVILLE,
NASHVILLE, COLUMBUS, MONTGOMERY,
NEW ORLEANS,
And all Towns in the interior of
Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

Every description of merchandise forwarded at Low rates, and delivered with promptness and dispatch.
For further particulars apply at the office of
HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 74 Broadway.

Brown's Bronchial Troches

Are among the acknowledged institutions of the land. What could our ministers, our lecturers, our lawyers, do without them—everybody uses them—and what an amount of relief they afford! Singers and Speakers should not be long subjected, even for the shortest time, to cold and suddenly changes! We have tried them, and they did us good.—N. Y. Weekly.

Asthma.—It is useless to describe the tortures of Spasmodic Asthma. Those who have suffered from its distressing paroxysms know full well what it is. JOSIAH WESTON'S REMEDY, prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & Co., Boston, has seldom failed to afford immediate relief, even in the most severe cases, and frequently it has effected a permanent cure.

FROM THE

Springfield Republican.

W. E. HASKIN & Co., of Troy, N. Y., manufacture a hair restorative that takes precedence of all others. It renders the hair more soft and flexible, and stimulates its growth to luxuriance. In our sporting sedan editors may be found a strong testimonial to its merits—which is only one of the many its manufacturers have received.

Sold everywhere—Price 50 cents a bottle.

THE NEW BOOK
By Dr. Cumming.
THE GREAT TRIBULATION;
OR, THINGS COMING ON THE EARTH.
By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D.,
Minister of the Scottish National Church, Author of "Apocalyptic Sketches," "Voice of the Last Trumpet," "Sabbath Morning Readings," "Sabbath Evening Readings," &c. &c.
"Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by BUDD & CARLETON, 199 Grand Street, New York.

BUY your FURS of WILLIAMS, No. 293 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.
In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special Circular will be given. Here is the only chance. Applicants should state the County they desire to travel in. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR Family and Plantation use. Agency, 514 Broadway, up stairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.
H. C. LEE, Agt.

POWERFUL MICROSCOPES or Magnifying glasses, for 25 cents. Magnifying more than one hundred times. Sent by mail anywhere. Four of different powers for $1. "Perfect little wonders."—Boston Post.
C. B. UNDERWOOD, 114 Hanover Street, Boston.

BININGER'S OLD LONDON DOCK GIN

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the so-called "Holland Gin" Generally. "Cordial," "Medicated," &c., is now declared by all of the prominent physicians, chemists, and connoisseurs as possessing all of those nauseous medicinal qualities (acids and alcohol) which belong to an old and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and sold by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 52 Broadway, N. Y.

Overcoats—$2 50, $4 50, $8 50, $9 50, $10 and $25.
BUSINESS COATS—$7 50, $8 $9, $4 50, $6 50 & $10.
PANTS and VESTS—$1 to $10. Every Furnishing Goods, at GEO. A. HUNTER & CO.'S
Mammoth Clothing Store,
Nos. 289 and 291 Bowery.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 153.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

We commenced in the last number of Harper's Weekly WILKIE COLLINS'S new Story,

"A WOMAN IN WHITE,"

from advance proof-sheets purchased by us from the Author.

Mr. CURTIS'S delicious Story of American Life, was commenced in Harper's Weekly for April 9. We can supply back numbers from that date on receipt of the money.

"TRUMPS,"

Subscribers to Harper's Weekly may rely upon finding in its pages an illustrated history of the times in which we live, together with the best Stories and Serial Tales written in the United States and in England.

MAUDE CLARE.

THE fields were white with lily-buds,
White gleamed the lilied beck;
Each mated pigeon plumed the pomp
Of his metallic neck.

She follow'd his bride into the church,
With a lofty step and mien:
His bride was like a village maid,
Maude Clare was like a queen.

The minstrels made loud marriage din;
Each guest sat in his place,
To eat and drink, and wish good luck,
To do the wedding grace;

"ALL EYES WERE FIX'D ON GRAND MAUD CLARE."—[DRAWN BY MILLAIS.]

To eat and drink, and wish good luck,
To sing, and laugh, and jest:
One only neither ate nor drank,
Nor clasp'd her hands, nor blest'd.

"Son Thomas," his lady mother said,
With smiles, almost with tears,
"May Nell and you but live as true
As we have done for years;

"Your father, thirty years ago,
Had just your tale to tell;
But he was not so pale as you,
Nor I so pale as Nell."

My lord was pale with inward strife,
And Nell was pale with pride;
My lord gazed long on pale Maude Clare
Or ever he kiss'd the bride.

No eyes were fix'd upon the bride,
Or on the bridegroom more;
All eyes were fix'd on grand Maude Clare,
While she look'd straight before.

"Lo, I have brought my gift, my lord—
Have brought my gift," she said—
To bless the hearth, to bless the board,
To bless the marriage-bed.

"Here's my half of the golden chain
You wore about your neck,
That day we waded ankle-deep
For lilies in the beck:

"Here's my half of the faded leaves
We pluck'd from budding bough,
With feet among the lily-leaves—
The lilies are budding now."

He strove to match her scorn with scorn,
He falter'd in his place:
"Lady," he said—"Maude Clare," he said,
"Maude Clare"—and hid his face.

She turn'd to Nell: "My Lady Nell,
I have a gift for you,
Though, were it fruit, the bloom were gone,
Or, were it flowers, the dew.

"Take my share of a fickle heart,
Mine of a paltry love:
Take it, or leave it, as you will,
I wish my hands thereof."

ASSASSINATION OF ORMOND CHASE BY THE MEXICANS AT TEPIC.—FROM A SKETCH MADE ON THE SPOT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"And what you leave," said Nell, "I'll take,
And what you spurn I'll wear,
For he's my lord for better and worse,
And him I love, Maude Clare.

"Yes, though you're taller by the head,
More wise, and much more fair;
I'll love him till he loves me best—
Me best of all, Maude Clare!"

ASSASSINATION OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN IN MEXICO.

(From our own Correspondent.)

VERA CRUZ, November 7, 1859.

The murder of Ormond Chase at Tepic, in August last, by order of the Mexican clergy chief, Leonardo Marquez, is one of those atrocities of the Mexican clergy against American citizens which excite our people at home, from one end of the Union to the other, and impel our Government to prompt and effective action.

The circumstances of this brutal butchery are about these: Ormond Chase was a native of Maine. Two years ago or more he was employed by a man by the name of Hale, also an American, to take charge of his saw-mill, situated on the Santiago River, half-way between the town of Tepic and the port of San Blas, all in the State of Jalisco, Mexico. Mr. Chase attended faithfully to his business, and by his many acts of generosity won for himself the admiration and esteem of all who knew him, natives as well as foreigners. He became the great friend and favorite of Mr. Alsopp, the British Consul in Tepic.

The civil war now raging in this unhappy country, which has been running down every industrial interest in its onward devastating course, at length, in July last, made it impossible for Hale to continue operations at the saw-mill, and as danger threatened his employer, who lived in Tepic, where a ruthless and demoralized soldiery were scattering terror by their acts of licentiousness, he went there to give him the benefit of his services. It is notorious, and proved by the affidavits of respectable parties, that Chase actually did save, not only his employer's home from pillage, but also the houses of several other citizens, by his personal exertions. This was with the aid of American friends. The town shortly after fell into the hands of Marquez, with his contingent of the clergy soldiery. Mr. Alsopp, the British Consul, like many other residents of Tepic, had fled with his family to escape the danger that was impending the place with this change; and poor Chase was left in charge of the British Consulate, and, it is understood, was the only foreigner in the town. He saved the Consulate from harm without firing a shot.

Shortly after the entrance of Marquez Mr. Alsopp returned to Tepic from vice-regal duty, and resumed his functions as Consul. Chase was still in charge of the Consulate, when, on the 5th August last, the clergy force had been in the place about ten days, and was backed in a dangerous, without the chance of seeing or receiving any communications from his friends, he ventured to have made the flag for the Consulate, which he was ordered a prisoner to Guadalajara; but had gone but half the way when he was ordered back, and again thrown in prison. His friends renewed their efforts to obtain his liberty, or at least a fair trial. They were assured by officers of high rank in the clergy forces, as appears by positive testimony, that "the worst that could happen to Chase would be to send him out of the country." As this sentence was considered unjust they were to have it averted, and the full anxiety than when he was at first imprisoned. The reader may therefore imagine the horror and surprise of the friends of poor Chase when on the morning of the 5th August last, they learned that Chase had been shot, and that his body was then suspended to the limb of a tree within the limits of the town. Orders had arrived during the night from Marquez, who had returned to Guadalajara, to "shoot Chase, and hang him up for twenty-four hours, as a warning to foreigners." This cowardly, brutal, and incredible as may appear this order, it is nevertheless true that it was given by Leonardo Marquez, as will in due time appear by the official of a respectable person who has seen the order in question.

This case certainly presents the most horrible aspect of any of the many occurrences which have so disgraced Mexico in the last twenty years. It is nothing but the fiendish murder of a worthy man because he was an American, and was engaged in as more horrible still, if possible, than the assassination at Tacubaya. In the past year we have had to witness the murder of numbers of our fellow-countrymen, most of whom names are not now in my memories, and several others whom I never saw; but of those now in memory we have Dr. Howard, of Atlixco; James Glenn & Son, near Zacatecas, formerly of North Carolina; Mr. Albert Lemon, of New York; Dr. Duval, of Texas; two Smith boys, formerly of Philadelphia; and Ormond Chase, of Maine. Many others have been murdered in the most shocking manner; as, for instance, an American was shot by Degollados, while he was on his way back from Vera Cruz, in April last. Miramon came up in disguise, in the stage coach. He met an American on the road, and engaging in talk with him, discovered he was an American, and liberal in his views. This was enough. Miramon and his companions seized the poor fellow in an unguarded moment, and shot him like a dog. In reply to every representation made upon the dreadful state of affairs in this country our Government turns a deaf ear; and the bloodhounds of the clergy go on cutting off one after another of our fellow-countrymen, who are situated as in Mexico that to leave on the moment would be utter ruin, and why hope still that our people at home can not be so entirely lost to all sense of honor and humanity as to see us all butchered like so many rats. It is fair to say that very many Americans have fled Mexico in the last year, fearing the scenes that are now transpiring; but most of those did so without losing their fortunes—an example now not to be imitated, owing to the general anarchy prevailing in every direction throughout the land. It is not only impossible to move valuables, but exceedingly dangerous to make any disfance. The recent robbery of the conducta to Guadalajara by Marquez should be sufficient proof of what I say.

AN AMERICAN.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1859.

OUR REGULAR ANNUAL HOLIDAY PICTORIAL is now ready, containing a large number of magnificent Engravings by the most Eminent Artists. Price SIX CENTS per copy.

MEXICAN OUTRAGE ON OUR SOUTHERN FRONTIER.

WHATEVER be the truth respecting the recent Mexican outrages on the Rio Grande, there can be no question but grave injuries have been inflicted upon American citizens by Mexicans. In the absence of an adequate military force at Brownsville, it is certain that bands of plunderers, headed by one Cortinas, have plundered our fellow-citizens wherever they found them, and it is believed that many lives also have been superadded to robbery. Brownsville may or may not have been taken; the accounts published in the papers are so vague and so Metamoras authorities to assist our friends at Brownsville in repelling the outlaws, will likewise naturally have weight on the Mexican side.

But, on the other hand, the outrages which the illustrious rebels have inflicted upon the Church in the world can not gainsay. And it is but one more illustration of a state of feeling which has become notorious, that the unprincipled, and grasping clergy of Mexico know well that their worst enemies are the people of the United States. They do not pretend to say that every thing here is as good as it ought or might be, nor does it attempt to mortgage the future to what has been established. It merely reasons that the present vindicates the order of affairs as working among us, and hence that patriotism and philanthropy may afford to be satisfied. Looking at the practical side of government, it is keenly alive to the difficulties and dangers that beset its operations; and if it can keep society together on any thing like fair terms, it relies on the great agencies outside of organic enactments for the future. For forward. One generation never thinks as it should of its obligations to another, as the history of Europe, the sufferings of parents in their behalf. American conservatism has a reverential look toward the past. It upholds the footsteps of the Revolutionary army in the snow, the protracted agony of sorrow, and the crowded scenes of war; and the excitement that peace only changed the nature of the struggle, and how, for long years, Washington, Franklin, and their noble and heroic associates had to put the independence arms had gained into a constitution that arms would not be needed to defend. In that constitution it was comparatively easy to settle principles. But men's opinions are not so readily adjusted. Unforeseen and diurnal sympathy were demanded here; pride and prejudice had to be surrendered; and as private tastes are ordinarily more formidable barriers to harmony fellowship than opposite ideas, our forefathers had to agree to sacrifices them on the altar of the common good. American conservatism magnifies this office of our early patriotism. It reverts its spirit as heroic, and cherishes its work as hallowed by the seal of Heaven.

It is not our freedom, but the energy with which we are using this freedom, that constitutes our danger. Mr. Buchanan's peace we force Congress, a year ago, his views on the subject of Mexican affairs, and recommended the occupation by United States troops of the northern Mexican States. But the patriots who compose the two Houses of Congress were too busy with their party squabbles to give heed to his recommendation. Mr. Buchanan is therefore no better prepared to invade Mexico than he was twelve months ago, and he can not do so on his own responsibility without incurring a risk which he, of all men, would not care to assume.

Had any leading European Power — Great Britain, France, Russia, or Austria — been in our position, not only Mexico, but Central America would have been occupied by a military force from long ago, and peace, order, and commerce would have flourished from Texas to Panama. The greatest gainers by such an arrangement would have been the Mexicans and the Central Americans; but the whole world would have derived benefit. There are difficulties in the way of a military occupation of any part of Mexico or Central America by the United States. This nation's charter being written, and no provision being therein made for the military occupation of foreign lands, such an event might be viewed as a novelty of questionable constitutionality. At the same time, if ever we have a President like Jackson, who is not afraid of assuming responsibility, it is possible that the United States may render this service to their Southern neighbors and to the world. Until they do, the finest part of the continent will remain a prey to murdering priests, thieving generals, infamous robbers of fortune, and banditti of every kind.

AMERICAN CONSERVATISM.

CONSERVATISM, taken in its more tangible aspects, is simply the law of habit applied to the institutions and arrangements of society as now existing. It is the principle by which we value things in their political and social connections for what they have demonstrated themselves to be. It is the price that long usage has affixed to the inheritance of the past—the rate at which we hold the economies and customs of results. Viewed as conservatives, men are contented beings; or if not in sentiment absolutely so, they are at least disposed to make the best of circumstances as they are. Conservatism does not reject new ideas and opposes all reforms. It only refuses to accept them blindly by petrifying its own heart. But it resists change unless change is demanded by urgent and imperishable necessities. Present institutions may have their defects, but conservatism has found them out, measured their exact length and breadth, and sounded their depth, and learned the art to exercise liberty and power under them. It is very easy to idealize a better state of things, but conservatism ignores that ideas in the brain and ideas out of the brain are not precisely the same. It understands how real life can be made a shadow of fine sentiment, and what havoc an hour's genuine experience makes with abstract philosophy. It is with these brilliant conceptions of the future that it says it is with costly perfumes—delightful with your nose at the bottle; but let them escape into the air, and they expend all their delicate odor.

American conservatism is a common-sense estimate of political society as organized in our institutions. It does not pretend to say that every thing here is as good as it ought or might be, nor does it attempt to mortgage the future to what has been established. It merely reasons that the present vindicates the order of affairs as working among us, and hence that patriotism and philanthropy may afford to be satisfied. Looking at the practical side of government, it is keenly alive to the difficulties and dangers that beset its operations; and if it can keep society together on any thing like fair terms, it relies on the great agencies outside of organic enactments for the future. For forward. One generation never thinks as it should of its obligations to another, as the history of Europe, the sufferings of parents in their behalf. American conservatism has a reverential look toward the past. It upholds the footsteps of the Revolutionary army in the snow, the protracted agony of sorrow, and the crowded scenes of war; and the excitement that peace only changed the nature of the struggle, and how, for long years, Washington, Franklin, and their noble and heroic associates had to put the independence arms had gained into a constitution that arms would not be needed to defend. In that constitution it was comparatively easy to settle principles. But men's opinions are not so readily adjusted. Unforeseen and diurnal sympathy were demanded here; pride and prejudice had to be surrendered; and as private tastes are ordinarily more formidable barriers to harmony fellowship than opposite ideas, our forefathers had to agree to sacrifices them on the altar of the common good. American conservatism magnifies this office of our early patriotism. It reverts its spirit as heroic, and cherishes its work as hallowed by the seal of Heaven.

It is not our freedom, but the energy with which we are using this freedom, that constitutes our danger. Mr. Buchanan's peace we force Congress, a year ago, his views on the subject of Mexican affairs, and recommended the occupation by United States troops of the northern Mexican States. But the patriots who compose the two Houses of Congress were too busy with their party squabbles to give heed to his recommendation. Mr. Buchanan is therefore no better prepared to invade Mexico than he was twelve months ago, and he can not do so on his own responsibility without incurring a risk which he, of all men, would not care to assume.

Had any leading European Power — Great Britain, France, Russia, or Austria — been in our position, not only Mexico, but Central America would have been occupied by a military force from long ago, and peace, order, and commerce would have flourished from Texas to Panama. The greatest gainers by such an arrangement would have been the Mexicans and the Central Americans; but the whole world would have derived benefit. There are difficulties in the way of a military occupation of any part of Mexico or Central America by the United States. This nation's charter being written, and no provision being therein made

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE REMEDY FOR BALTIMORE.

A BALTIMORE correspondent, referring to a recent article of ours on the riots at the late election in that city, thus suggests a remedy:

"The Maryland Constitution has framed our criminal system very defectively. The ward magistrates examine and commit. The criminal power to punish parties charged with crime for trial by the criminal court, constituted also of magistrates. The terms of the court are entirely too brief; and were every moment industriously spent, to try all the minor and aggravated offenses of a city embracing a quarter of a million population would be an impossibility. Unfortunately, however, the judge is without energy, and has lacked the respect due to his position; consequently crime (particularly violence to persons) frequently escapes punishment. We have no Mayor's or Recorder's Court with any criminal jurisdiction. We have but one court for all purposes.

"Next year we have a Constitutional Convention, and I think then will be accurately remedied.

"The true sentiment of the city and State is that the elective judiciary is a failure; that one criminal court of law will be found sufficient; that a daily Recorder's Court in the city is a necessity, as punishment will quickly follow the offense; that a Registry Law is essential; that magistrates, constables, and all criminal officers must be appointed by the court, and that the police must be appointed during good behavior.

"With these alterations Baltimore will wheel, even on election-day, into line as one of the best governed cities of the Union."

BRUNEL'S THROAT AGAIN.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

YOUR correspondent, T. H. H., has himself fallen into a slight error in his description of the half-sovereign from the throat of the late Mr. Brunel.

He ascribes the success to Mr. Brunel's contrivance, "after many attempts by the most skilful London workmen to remove it by the aid of instruments had entirely failed."

Now Mr. Brunel's contrivance was first tried without success, such intense suffocation being produced by it as to endanger his life; and it was not until a single year that Sir Benjamin Brodie had opened the windpipe that, by sharp blows being given between the shoulders while the head was kept low, the coin rattled against his teeth, to the great delight of the patient and all present.

The part which Sir Benjamin Brodie took in Mr. Brunel's case gave rise to the following excellent conundrum, which was propounded to me some years ago by another very eminent man—the late Dr. Marshall Hall,

Q. Why is Sir Benjamin Brodie like a hired assassin?

A. Because he cut a man's throat for half a sovereign.

Yours respectfully, R. C.

MONTREAL, November, 1859.

THE LOUNGER.

CONSERVATISM.

Is your neighbor, who goes and comes every day upon a ferry-boat or upon a railroad train, and who is very anxious that nobody should ever inspect the engine, or ascertain whether the engineer is in the habit of getting drunk, who declares that every thing is working beautifully and smoothly, inviting your attention to the pretty view from the upper deck, and insisting that if you go below to spy into the machinery you run risk of smelling bad smells, and of soiling your fingers and clothes, besides making the passengers feel as if something must be wrong if any body goes to see that every thing is right—is this neighbor of yours a conservative? Is that complacent stupidity and bland bodylyshness conservatism?

Every traveler ought to know that friction to some extent is inseparable from the working of all machinery; and with friction comes wear and tear and need of repair. The conservative is the man who remembers this, and is always jealous of the public security is travel—who keeps the wheels always oiled, is willing to pay for the best of every thing, and who cherishes no blind confidence in the mere fact that every thing happens to be running swift and smoothly. The very ragged edges suggest the chances of safety, and as he knows this, does not guess at it; knows whether he is in a safe car and not a fool, and understands that anchorites have final laws; his constant care and suspicion by investigation and make sure are to keep the terrible enmity which makes a child break open his watch to see how it works; but not like him is the belligerent inspection of the watchmaker cleaning and regulating it.

Genuine conservatism, therefore, is neither stupidity, nor blindness, nor terror, nor self-indulgence, nor the spirit which is satisfied that the devil shall take the hindmost, or "after us the Deluge." It is not merely satisfied with a present state of things, for it knows that progress is superiority in every department of the world's life depend upon love of and attachment to that condition, and therefore it looks to see if the peace is peace or only an appearance—if the water be really water or only a mirage.

This, of course, is the only spirit by which the stability and progress of human institutions can be conserved, and therefore the party which is perpetually pouring under the surface of the established order of things to see if it really upon any thing, and whether it may not all come down in a chaotic wreck at any moment, is the conservative party of any country. And yet it has often happened that the very opposite feeling has borne the name.

For instance, in Dickens's ghastly and powerful "Tale of Two Cities," Monseigneur represents what is often called conservatism. Monseigneur honored absolutely and without question the established order of things. Monseigneur appealed to his father's estates and the general condition of France, and what was good enough for his father was good enough for Monseigneur. Monseigneur saw horrors and calamities, tragedies even, all around him. Desirous, but Monseigneur took snuff, and whisked it daintily off his perfumed ruffles, and asked you, in the politest manner in the world to guess whether it were possible that tragedies by trying to help those which were already happening.

You pleaded with him that there were laws of nature which could not be forever broken, instances of humanity which could not be always trampled with impunity. Monseigneur smiled, bowed blandly, waved his white hand deprecatingly, and said you, parbleu! that you were a dreamer, a visionary, an enthusiast, an encyclopedist, par consequ' even a republican. Upon your cold reception Monseigneur passed the wine and stroked his silk stockings. The French management of affairs in 1789 had lasted some time? Had lasted, for instance, Louis Fourteenth's time, Louis Fifteenth's, surely it would last his natural majesty Louis Sixteenth's and his femme adorable. Monseigneur kissed the tips of his fingers with affectionate fervor. Where were signs of danger it would be quite time enough to be afraid. Meanwhile to listen to essemille, to head street ballads, to sing at supper shops, the seething of scum—pah! Let us drink to the sacred repose, to the glory of France!

Then Monseigneur went to bed. You remember how it is told in the story. Also! the noires noirse could not save—but even they could not. Monseigneur was murdered in his bed—his castle was burned—his estates wasted—his family slaughtered and proscribed. Was it Saint Antonio that bred the revolution, or Saint Germain that ground its heel into the heart of its brother? Was it the fiend of the slums that sharpened the guillotine, or the Monseigneur that hung men on gibbets and despair into fury? The Revolutionary Tribunal was the black and hideous flower that bloomed inevitably and naturally out of the dark soil of Bourbon Louises. The fiery, maddened "liberty and equality" was only the rabid form of noires rejnse—the side kept for centuries from the sun and air, and shrieking, quivering with poisonous madness, when it was turned up. Monseigneur begot the sans culotte.

To preserve the established order as if, because it is established, it ought to be, may be simply to tie down the safety-valve, and secure an immense speed and tranquillity until the imminent moment when the steam, obeying its inevitable law, bursts, and shatters to destruction whatever opposes it. That may be conservatism upon a racing steamer; that was conservatism in old France.

But the conservatism of noble and generous and thoughtful men every where is a preservation of obedience to those instincts of human nature and the human conscience and the Divine law, from which alone individual and national prosperity and peace can flow; for conservatism is but another name for Christianity, aiming to establish, by following those laws, peace and good-will upon the earth.

ACCIDENTS BY RAIL.

This year, upon the whole, has been quite free from shocking railway disasters, but those that have lately occurred show the recklessness from which they usually arise. The tragedy of August upon the Northern road from Troy is fresh in the public memory. It was an near murder as any slaughter caused by utter carelessness could be. It was as much murder as the deadly shooting from a window into a crowd, by individual malice.

Recently a rail was removed from a bridge for repairs upon the Indiana Central Railroad. Presently a train of eighteen cars came thundering along, and went down into the chasm. Many were slain, injuring several others, and destroying the live freight.

Upon the Hudson River Railroad the dog-man had turned the switch for the passenger-train, and signaled a freight that it should pass it. The engineer of the freight train, hoping still to pass before the other should reach the switch, came forward on, and plunged off the track, driving it up, smashing cars, and burying the locomotive, but fortunately disengaging itself from the platform, and train was stopped before a collision.

These accidents are the consequences of the most criminal silliness. The engineer should know that several steps up his staircase, and send his servant to their room to ask the time, is the most precisely what was done in these two cases. Why was not a man sent each way upon the Indiana road to warn the freight? Why was the switch kept open, but bound straightly. In the case of the Hudson River accident, a friend, the engineer is solely culpable. Surely the newspapers do only half their duty in not publishing his name. But all other companies and persons employing an engineer may be upon their guard.

It is not clear, however, that a serious accident happens upon the Hudson River road. It is by nature one of the most dangerous in the country, and it is impossible with constant watchfulness and diligence. Its passengers have little reason to complain of its wretched bridges and Dover Street station. But a railway traveler can well spare splendor in the station if he can be sure of safety upon the road. Let the road be safe, the engineering company will have every thing in keeping.

SONNET.

The sackcloth,—that befalls her is so great
Material garment! Would it were heaven!
Then would the fabric made of weeps and hair
Be only fleshly tatters, clinging close,
And the sun's rays pierce through to bless her.

The ashes that she sprinkles in wild prayer
Are not of mourning, but of sorrow.
Receives them not, though evermore they lie
Strewn on her hair, and eyes, and cheeks of agony!
I tell thee there are those clothed with despair;
And though they wear the garb of sadness,
Of pride, may veil the inmost garb they wear,
Not less doth it contain hearts and eyes
With its coulonous sting of bereavement.

NEW MUSIC.

In old wine he better for drink, old books to read, and old friends to talk with, why not old music to hear? Managers perpetually labor under the delusion that the public is tired of old operas, when but the most certainly successful opera they can advertise is one of the old familiars. There are but two exceptions, the very oldest upon the stage—"Don Giovanni."

Of course good new musical works are produced as good new books are published—but they are not brother and I. It is a pleasure, in our day, to announce that he would read the last new novel every evening, instead of some good, hearty, well-flavored, and well-known old book, which he would surely dwindle. Certainly one of the best things in the musical world is the New York Philharmonic Society is, that they are generous of old music, and chary of the new.

This is not to say that the new may not be good, but because it takes a great many hearings really to hear a fine musical piece. In a new book or romance we pass through it very much as we dash through fine scenery in the cars. We get a general idea of every hill, hollow, and river, but only by often and often traveling that way do we come to know where to look for the details, so as to have the most profound enjoyment of the beauty. So it is only by often and often hearing that we come fully to the significance and the beauties of a work of music.

New music should therefore be rather rarely heard than often. It will only gradually win public attention—unless it is a mere collection of catchy melodies, like the average of Verdi's Italian opera; in which case it will be immediately popular, and whistled all over town the next morning.

Nor ought managers to complain if people do not like a new work of a popular composer, simply because it is new. They will naturally want to hear it. They would even endeavor to hear it, but the manager puts gratify them. But has he any more right to complain if it fall than a publisher has to complain if the whole edition of Martin the rare minkop? They each expect a great demand, and contract with confidence for it. If it do not come, they suffer. But why blame the public?

There is a habit of saying that the public ought to support the Opera, and ought to share the losses of the manager by going to see new works, get up at great expense. But why should the public go into partnership with the Opera more than with any other business? If the wares offered suit them, they will buy. If not, not. And if the business be not worth the chance, why does any body embark in it?

If certain persons, for the sake of hearing new works and deciding upon their merit, agree to reimburse the manager for producing them, all honor to them—they are public benefactors. But in the absence of any such offer, let no unwary manager assume that it is made, or he may find himself out of pocket with his "Sicilian Vespers."

DREAMLAND: AN INDIAN SUMMER LONGING.

There was a land my youth and childhood knew,
Ere yet its Heaven-taught wisdom I unlearn'd;
And where all things were beautiful and true,
And lilies pure dunes in peaceful grey horned;
Dreamy was law, unknown were sin and care,
Why didst thou fade? Sweet Dreamland, come again!

Flowers of incredible radiance, never more
Can words and deeds bring your fairy fragrance bring!
Oh, might-dreamed bliss! The song is o'er
That made a music into the soul's ear!
World pulses splendors of the sunset skies—
What hath human bidden bids your whiteness?

Deep summer bliss of heaven! I quaff not now
The intoxicating rapture of thy hue!
Not mid no more with cloud winter dazing pour
Points to far countries, wonderful and new!
Earth's fresh Eden's untouched by sense or sight,
Sweet Dreamland, will then never come again?

Where now are those who peopled that fair shore?
Simple as childhood, wise and true and good
As a dear mother's kind and holy love?
Faith fully we were in man but understood
Angelic friends, whose love we calmly crave—
Are they all lying Dreamland in the grave?

Ah! vain are such regrets! life onward flows,
And brings realities that, stirmly sweet,
Each round our hearts, and give their own repose:
Blessed duties, guiding on our wayward feet.
But the old world will spring—a yearning grief
All else are dreams! Sweet Dreamland, come again!

Oh! dear lost land of love and hope and light!
Art thou forever vanished from our eyes?
Not! sidelong glimpses thou our aching sight,
And breathe thy fragrance through our memories.
And when to weary eyes calm rest is given,
We shall awake, and find that thou art heaven!

O. L. B.

Nonsensuse Heroe.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

The Author says:

"Your correspondent, 'Justitia,' will see, if she will read the story with a little more care, that Ida Howard, Mr. Egerton Dowyer's Ward, 'has made an assignment' of her marital rights, in consideration of the hope she had by Mr. Dowyer's Will to get the benefit of Mr. Dowyer's Debts. The being turned out of doors by his heirs, before the Will was proved, was merely to justify that natural response of her marriage with Frank."

Reader. There is nothing wrong, and nothing plain as fast as he can.

Alphabetical. It is very hard to name any "book of etiquette" which would be useful to gentlemen, as man can not be made by external rules. Gentility is in the character. You miss details of social conduct—but to write notes—what clothes to wear and when—whether to speak to a lady first, or not, are to be learned by observation and inquiry. People who write books of etiquette have very little knowledge of it. The most elaborate work upon the general subject is "Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his Son."

Sr. Louis wants to know if "a woman can be a governess." I know of a celebrity that a woman may be a governess." I know of no difficulty. Governesses are the feminine of governors; for a boy's private teacher is called tutor. The knowledge requisite as well as whether a woman who is a private teacher is a governess. It is an unnecessary difficulty, except where the parent is to know the sex. When we speak of poets, we name Mrs. Hemans and Mrs. Sigourney in the same breathing as Byron. Because we say that a poet is a creator, shall we say that a woman, who is a poet, is a creatress? Mr. Ruskin is a Grad a sinegress? It not Mrs. Siwes as much an author as Mr. Simms? The writer of books or an author. Madame de Staël is reckoned among French authors. She is a writer—not a writeress. Now I have a vocabulary of all the words of governess, half of whom seem to be women, does St. Louis think that each one of them would be a governess? Not at all. Governess is a word with no other masculine correspondent—Governor.

C. Y. Z. In this country professional etiquette does not require that an attorney should be employed to draw up a brief—but it could be an ably performed, written, or verbally, by X. Y. Z.," or any body else. The common-sense rule is that it should be well done. The Honorable Edward Everett is one of our wise men upon professional etiquette.

C. S. Beatrice Cenci is pronounced as if a soft t were introduced after each c. In Italian this name is spelled make the pronunciation hard as if Beatrice. The Italian sound of ci can be represented in English only by chi.

A. Thorn asks where to find the lines—

"Swift from his dewy pinions flies from me,
And lights on this unsullied wife's bosom."

It is "Trip down 'Tis Ever" is respectfully declined.

Grace Fletcher. No.

Constant Reader. If the author of a story only conceives his characters naturally, they work out the plot of the story themselves. There is a Love element in Dickens's operas; in which case it will be immediately popular, and whistled all over town the next morning.

Not ought managers to complain if people do not like a new work of a popular composer, simply because it is new. They will naturally want to hear it. They would even endeavor to hear it, but the manager puts gratify them. But has he any more right to complain if it fall than a publisher has to complain if the whole edition of Martin the rare minkop? They each expect a great demand, and contract with confidence for it. If it do not come, they suffer. But why blame the public?

There is a habit of saying that the public ought to support the Opera, and ought to share the losses of the manager by going to see new works, get up at great expense. But why should the public go into partnership with the Opera more than with any other business? If the wares offered suit them, they will buy. If not, not. And if the business be not worth the chance, why does any body embark in it?

If certain persons, for the sake of hearing new

—W. C. H. The postage to England is twenty-four cents. A letter addressed to Rev. R. H. Spurgeon, London, will probably reach its destination.

—G. W. E. The letter was a ghost mentioned in the Odyssey, supposed to have been eaten by the companions of Ulysses, and to have produced a dreamy indolence and forgetfulness of home. To eat the lotus is, therefore, to idle away from home.

THE RAG-CUTTER,

AND WHAT SHE FOUND IN THE RAGS BEFORE SHE CUT THEM UP.

Write parted lip and dreaming eye,
And cheeks curss'd by crowds of coals,
She stood, with mien half-bold, half-shy,
The fairest of a hundred girls.
A sun-like veil, o'er breast and brow,
Softens the grace it would conceal;
And so she stands before me now—
The Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

Wild-high 'mid rags all day she stands;
A long, keen blade before her gleams,
Downed, Powerful, with determined hands,
To part what is from that which seems.
No blemish 'scapes her fatal shears—
From from impure—the good from ill;
In dust and tears she writes her years—
The Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

Rags—only rags!—this costly lace,
Wrought cunningly, in days long past,
These frail cocoons of human dress,
To this complexion come at last.
Each thrill beneath their fragrant folds;
Warm, loving, close—it haunts them still;
And still infolds what now beholds
The Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

What sees she in this tangled pile?
Fair fabrics of an Indian loom—
What marks of smirk, what works of guile?
And who shall tell what webs of doom?
One slender gash through jelick fair,
A few dull clots o'er lace and frill:
Who recks the tragic story there?
The Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

Rags—only rags! Poor castaway
Of pride, of pleasure, of display!
Of bitter doom—of "better days"—
How much they tell that men would hide!
Think of it, Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.
The dainty sheet these writings fill;
And marvel not such tales were told
By Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

This bridal dress—these orange flowers—
Crumpled and crush'd, but fragrant still:
Oh! visions of long, by-gone hours,
Why must ye make your blessing ill?
Light, maiden, beauty—youth call back—
As life and love were at their fill?
May thoughts like these have grace to rack
The Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

This surplice graced "a saint in lawn;"
These sheets deformed a beggar knave;
These tender trappings adorned the dawn
That drove "the shameless" from the grave.
Strange way-side waifs we mortals weave
For after-times to "read and rail!"
Thy Loom-of-life strange "Gobelins" weave,
Weird Rag-girl of the Paper-mill.

So pass her years, twixt toil and thought:
"Rags" changed to paper—paper to coin—
A "home," with woman's witcheries fraught,
Awaits her as the day goes down.
Books, music, pictures—all are hers:
As they're for all who work and will;
And hope and health and homely cares
Make glad the girl of the Paper-mill.

Stark down, alas! through heart and brain
The mad'ning miasm turns to flame:
The world's disjointed! She (its Queen?)
Shall right the tangle—avenge its shame!
No squalid hovel, dank and foul,
Where greed and pain their plagues distill!
No handloom! pimp and thief—the ghoul
O'er streets of graves their tenants fill.

Alas for the Maiden!—alas for the Mill!
Blacken'd and charr'd its timbers stand:
Fire and fate have worked their will;
Nor hard to guess whence came the brand.
Pauper and Peer (twin-birth of wrong),
Perpetuate the poison and fast ye kill;
And silence rests on the once glad throng
That filled the cells of the Paper-mill.

* * * * *

She lives! Some far-off, Western will Grows glad beneath her Matron-hand;
And well she wields her sceptre mild
To guide, to counsel, and command.
A seer still, she walks serene
Twixt certain Good and seeming Ill;
Piercing life's shams, with insight keen—
Brave Rag-girl of the Paper-mill!

J. Jude Deakin.

JOHN W. FORNEY, EDITOR OF THE "PRESS."

Among the editors and politicians of the United States, few have attracted more attention than John W. Forney. He is a native of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and is now about forty-two years of age. In 1837 he became the editor and joint-owner of the Lancaster Intelligencer, and in 1840 he united that paper with the Lancaster Journal, under the title of the Intelligencer & Journal, which he continued to publish until 1845. During the time he was here spent as a Democratic editor in Lancaster county (which was then the stronghold of the Whig party), Mr. Forney gained a wide-spread reputation for ability as a writer, and for the unwavering constancy with which he advocated the principles of his Democratic party.

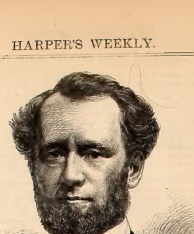
In 1845 he removed to Philadelphia, and in 1846 became the owner and editor of the Philadelphia Pennsylvanian. He remained there until he was elected Clerk of the House of Representatives, in 1851, but still continued for two years after he had assumed the duties of his office to write for the Pennsylvanian. He was a candidate in 1849 for the Clerkship, and received the caucus nomination of the Democratic members, who were then in a minority; but owing to the defection of some members of his party, who voted in the House for Mr. Campbell, the Whig candidate, he was defeated. This act of bad faith caused great indignation at the time; but Colonel Forney returned to his home, and did all in his power to allay the bitter feelings which it had created.

During his career as editor of the Pennsylvanian that paper gained a national reputation by the vigor of its political articles. While always courteous to political antagonists, and maintaining friendly personal relations with his editorial and other leading political antagonists, Mr. Forney became, in popular estimation, the oracle of his party in Pennsylvania, and in repeated contests infused into it the enthusiasm which led it on to victory. Every political question of the day was boldly met, and disarmed in a masterly manner.

Elected as Clerk of the National House of Representatives in 1851, he was re-elected in 1853, and performed the duties of the office in a very creditable and satisfactory manner. At the opening of the Congress of 1855, which was controlled by the Opposition, but in which, owing to the party divisions, no one united party possessed a clear majority, it was his duty, as Clerk of the old House, to act as the presiding officer until a new Speaker was elected; and during the protracted struggle which took place at the commencement of the session, and which was continued for several weeks before an organization was effected, Mr. Forney, by his dignified bearing, fearless and parliamentary ability, preserved admirable order, and prevented any of those violent political personal conflicts which have disgraced Congress, and out of which the bitter feeling then existing between the various parties rendered it almost inevitable. His decisions on all questions of order were always sustained, and such was the high estimation in which he was held by the House, and the appreciation of his fairness and impartiality, that the members were always ready to acquiesce in his decisions and eager to sustain him. Hon. Humphrey Marshall of Kentucky, Mr. Morrison Harrison of Maryland, Robert T. Paine of North Carolina, Mark Trafton of Massachusetts, Lewis D. Campbell of Ohio, who were prominent Opposition members, besides a large number of Democrats, all paid to Mr. Forney the tribute of praise for the satisfactory manner in which he discharged the duties of his office.

After Mr. Banks was sworn in as Speaker the House, before adjourning, unanimously passed a resolution of thanks to him "for the distinguished ability, fidelity, and impartiality with which he has presided over the deliberations of the House of Representatives during the arduous and protracted contest for Speaker which has just closed." The very day that he resigned his office to his successor his accounts, involving millions of dollars, were all settled at the Treasury Department, as exact and regular had he been in the discharge of his duties. The admirable system he observed in this office, which is one of great importance and responsibility, has never been surpassed.

Mr. Forney's connection with the Washington Union continued during the latter part of Mr. Fillmore's administration, and during three years of Mr. Pierce's. This important post he resigned but he might devote his time and attention to securing the nomination of Mr. Buchanan at the Cincinnati Convention. Retiring from Washington to his home in Pennsylvania, he was elected by the Democratic State Convention of March 4, 1856, chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee, and from that day was untiring until the close of the election in November.



JOHN W. FORNEY, ESQ., OF PHILADELPHIA.

In January, 1857, he became a candidate for the United States Senate, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of Hon. Richard Brodhead.

The Democratic members of the Legislature reflected the wishes of their constituents, and by a handsome majority gave Mr. Forney the caucus nomination on the first ballot; but he was defeated in the election by S. Cameron, who influenced enough opposition votes to secure his election. When the result was announced the feeling of indignation was intense in Pennsylvania. Meetings were called throughout the State, and the individuals who were charged with betraying their party were bitterly denounced.

Meantime all possible admiration and respect were expressed for the character and services of Mr. Forney, and deep regret at his defeat. After the senatorial contest he returned to his home in Philadelphia, and for a while remained quietly in the midst of his family, enjoying the comforts of private life, which the excitement and fatigue of an active campaign rendered necessary.

After the inauguration of Mr. Buchanan he tendered to Mr. Forney several lucrative political positions, which he declined.

In August, 1857, he commenced the publication of The Press, an independent Democratic newspaper, at Philadelphia. From the very outset it was one of the most successful newspapers of the country, and has now attained a very large circulation. It extended to Mr. Buchanan's administration a warm support up to the time of the adoption of the Lecompton Constitution, and the effort to secure the admission of Kansas into the Union under it. Mr. Forney resolutely opposed that measure, and as the Administration made a test question of it, and ostracized all who refused to indorse its policy, a disruption of the friendly relations which had previously existed between him and Mr. Buchanan was inevitable. The result of the struggle engendered new forms part of the political history of the country. At the Congressional election of 1857, in the Northern States, the Administration candidates were defeated in nearly every district. In Pennsylvania but two were elected. Notwithstanding Mr. Forney's long-continued and prominent identification with the Democratic party, he resolutely maintained his position as an Anti-Lecompton Democrat, sustaining only those candidates who were faithful adherents of the doctrine of Popular Sovereignty.

At the present time he is again advocated by many of the newspapers of the country as a candidate for Clerk of the House of Representatives. That body will be composed of Administration Democrats, Republicans, South Americans, and Anti-Lecompton Democrats, neither of which parties possess a clear majority, and it will therefore become necessary, as in 1855, that a coalition of some kind should be formed to control the organization of the House. The Republican members will probably possess sufficient strength, by uniting with either the South Americans or the Anti-Lecompton Democrats, to elect a Speaker and Clerk: and one of these unions will probably be formed. If they unite with the South Americans, a Republican Speaker will probably be elected, and a South American Clerk of the House of Representatives. If they unite with the Anti-Lecompton Democrats, it is supposed Mr. Forney would again be elected to the position he occupied from 1851 to 1855.

A CONFESSIONAL IN A CHURCH AT LIMA.

The accompanying sketch of a confessional at Lima will be recognized by all who have traveled in Catholic countries. The artist who drew it thus describes the scene:

"The interior of the churches differ but little from those in Europe, excepting that the roofs are divided into innumerable compartments of almost every shape. The confessionals seem to me most in, and the penitents are only separated from their spiritual adviser by a strip of black silk, which is suspended over the opening through which the confessions are made. My attention was greatly attracted by a young girl who entered one of the confessionals, and who seemed to be relating something of intense interest, for every now and then, when she appeared to pause, the face of the monk, who was listening to her as she knelt at a right slide, would take an expression of impatient anxiety, which was immensely amusing. I could not help taking out my book and pencil, and jotting down the accompanying sketch, which will give you an idea of the group they formed. In an adjoining pew was seated a charming girl waiting her turn to communicate. She was elegantly dressed, and, on resing me with my pencil in hand, evidently took some pains to place herself in an easy and graceful pose. A negro servant, half of whose face was hidden by an extravagant shirt collar, attended the young lady. He stood at some little distance from his mistress, and, perceiving how I was employed, endeavored to get himself into the most dignified attitude, expecting by this to attract my attention and get transferred, color and all, to paper."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXXX.

REMINISCENCE.

On the very evening that General Belch and Abel Newt were sitting together, smoking, taking snuff, sipping wine, and discussing the vast principles that should control the action of American legislators and statesmen, Hope Wayne and Mrs. Simcoe sat together in their pleasant drawing-room, talking of old times. The fire crackled upon the hearth, and the bright flames flickering through the room brought out every object with fitful distinctness. The lamp was turned almost out—for they found it more agreeable to sit in a twilight as they spoke of the days which seemed to both of them to be full of subdued and melancholy light. They sat side by side; Hope leaning her cheek upon her hand, and gazing thoughtfully into the fire; Mrs. Simcoe turned partly toward her, and occasionally studying her face, as if peculiarly anxious to observe its expression.

It might have happened in many ways that they were speaking of the old times. The older woman may have intentionally led the conversation in that direction for some ulterior purpose she had in view. Or that is more likely than that the young woman should constantly draw her friend and guardian to speak of days and people connected with her own life, but passed before her memory had retained them?

"And you thought, then," said Mrs. Simcoe, "that you wanted to see more society—do you remember?"

Hope smiled faintly.

SCENE IN A FASHIONABLE CHURCH AT LIMA.

"NO ONE KNOWS WHEN HE IS HAPPY, HOPE."

"Yes. I have often thought of it. I remember you told me that I should probably have what I wanted quite as soon as I was ready for it. So it proved," she said, smiling more decidedly: "and there was a time when I was really unhappy."

Mrs. Simcoe looked narrowly at the beaming face beside her, full of peaceful light, and hope, and life. Her sad eyes filled with tears, and she sighed. Hope, without looking up, but with an air of happy reverie, said, as if it were only kind to ask,

"Why do you sigh, aunty?"

"Because no one knows when he is happy, Hope."

"Why, aunty, you are a scholar: you know the old philosopher said, 'Count no man happy till he dies.'"

"I know nothing of the old philosophers, my darling. Philosophy is nothing in the dark hours. It is a broken reed to lean upon, not the unfailing staff, as Mr. Summerfield used to say."

"What did he call the unfailing staff, aunty?" asked Hope, still as if lost in her own thoughts, and only speaking because it was not kind to remain silent.

With a solemn, murmuring voice Mrs. Simcoe repeated the lines—

"I hold two with a trembling hand,
And will not let them go,
Till steadfastly by faith I stand,
And all thy goodness know."

The expression on Hope's face changed. As the older woman spoke, her companion seemed to herself to be again sitting on the lawn—it was sunset—the pines murmured—her aunt was sitting at the upper window—and the sound of the old hymn floated into the tranquil air like a benediction.

After a few moments Hope looked about with a half-bewildered air, as if awaking. Mrs. Simcoe, with her hands clasped before her bosom, as if in inward prayer, seemed to be wrestling with some strong emotion. There were hollow circles under her eyes, which Hope could see as the flames flashed and fell; and respecting her struggle, whatever it might be, Hope waited until the look of anguish passed and the old sad calmness returned.

"Aunty," she said, taking her hand, "you were speaking of Mr. Summerfield. Will—"

There was a faint start upon the part of the elder woman, but she almost instantly conquered the feeling, and showed that she was ready to listen.

"Do you remember that you used to mention his name very, very often when I was a child?—that you used to say, 'Hope dear, this was Mr. Summerfield's favorite hymn,' or, 'My child, you should have heard Mr. Summerfield read that verse,' or you used to speak of Mr. as 'the saint?'"

"It was because all the happiest and saddest associations of my life cluster around him, Hope," replied Mrs. Simcoe, calmly. "At one time I heard him constantly, and his face and his face and fiery sweetness are burned into my memory forever. He was very young—not so much older than you when he died; but think what a work he did! He was slight and short, with a sweet blue eye; and his whole face was full of earnest, loving expression of that eye. He was like an instrument of heavenly essence upon which only divine tones were played. He was not violent in his manner, but very impassioned; and when he stood in the pulpit to preach, with the vast congregation crowding every part of the church, sitting upon the pulpit-stairs, upon the gallery-railings, and wherever a foot could press itself to stand, or room be found to sit, the great responsibility of speaking to that warm of human beings of their most momentous interests so filled and possessed him, that in the prayer he seemed to yearn for strength and the gifts of grace so earnestly—he cried, as if his heart were bursting, 'Help, Lord, or I perish!' that the vast crowd, murmuring with sobs, with gasps, and sighs, echoed solemnly, as if they had but one voice, and in verse all mufflied in tears—'Help, Lord, or I perish!' But, Hope, as in summer you are often see a cloud full of light even while it shower rain, suddenly breaking away and dissipated in the full glory of sunlight, so when the prayer was ended, and that which had been as if obscured and weeping, was a broader and a weeping which God's grace lighted up and shone through — his soul, in the sermon, seemed to come forth self in the most touching eloquence, as simply and easily as a bird sings.

"I heard him preach one day upon the Graces of God, and, by God's blessing, I was awakened. Never shall I forget his words; never the winning melody of his voice, and the following, unbroken, all gen-tures. Oh, Hope! I recall the very words used," said the older woman, with a keen, piercing look, as if she knew the sermon by heart.

"'Ah! sinner, sinner, it is he, our God, who shoots us through and through with the keenness of his power. It is our God who scatters the arrows of his wrath; but they are winged with the plumes of his love. The quivers of softness, and the Gospel. Oh! the promises! the promises!—Come onto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Yes, patriarch of white hairs, of wasted cheeks, and tottering step! the humble sinner who has fallen almost to the ground to-day—into the ground to-morrow. Here stands the Judge to give you mercy. Yes, mother of many, and broken spirit! whose long life is a sorrowful vigil, waiting upon the coming of wicked children, of wicked husbands—weary, weary, and heavy laden with tribulation, here is the Comforter who shall give you rest. And you, young man, young maiden, sitting here to-day in the pleasitude of youth and hope and love, without express apprehension, as if something were about to fall upon the unwary, here is a solemn voice which startled ery of terror. There were cries of 'Lord! Lord! have mercy!' Smothered shrieks and sobs filled the air; pale faces were turned to other like spectres. I fell upon my knees, and felt the power of the Holy Ghost upon me. O deep waters, Selah; but they were the waters of grace and faith, and I was convicted of my sins. But passing a moment, while the vast crowd swayed and shook with the tumult of emotion, with his arms outspread, his voice on his forehead swollen, and the light flashing in his eyes, he raised his arms and eyes to heaven, and said, with inexpressible sweetness and power, which seemed to trickle with balm into the very soul, as it came down upon the dry ground, 'Yes, it is at hand, but so art thou! Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly; and when youth and hope and love have become dead weights and burdens in these young hearts, teach them how to feel the peace that passeth understanding. Give them to thee, for they wearily labor; they are heavily laden, gracious Father! Oh, give them rest!'"

As Mrs. Simcoe spoke she had straightened herself and sat upright in her chair. Every word she uttered was said with singular fervor, and Hope Wayne was amazed at the copious flow. But she had suddenly pressed an unknown stop in the organ on which she had played a few simple tunes for many years, which now broke out into imperial and stately harmonies.

"Then," continued Mrs. Simcoe, "then he portrayed the doom of those who resist and reject the offered grace. Come! he exclaimed, 'freely come! It is the eternal spring of living water. It is your fate, and it flows for you. Come! come! it is the good shepherd who calls his flock to wander by the still waters and in the green pastures. Will you shut your ears to Them, woe! woe! when the night cometh, and the shepherd folds his flock, and you are cast out? Will you seek Philosophy, and confide in that? It is a ravening wolf—and ere morning dawn are consumed. Will you lean on human pride—on your own sufficiency? It is a broken reed, and your fall will be forever fatal. Will you say there is no God?'—"

Mrs. Simcoe moved her chair back so suddenly that Hope, intently listening, uttered a half cry, and suddenly rose as if to help her; but she saw that it was an involuntary movement, occasioned by the energy of her feeling and the vividness of her remembrance of the scene. Mrs. Simcoe continued, as if entirely unconscious of Hope's presence, so entirely was she absorbed by the mental scene; her voice sank into a low, menacing whisper, as if reproducing the very tone of the preacher she was describing.

"Will you say there is no God? He raised his hands warningly, and shook them over the congregation while he lowered his voice. 'Hush! hush! lest he hear—lest he mark—lest the great Jehovah'—his voice swelling suddenly into loud, piercing tones—'Maker of heaven and earth, Judge of the earth and the dead, the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End, the eternal God, from everlasting to everlasting, should know that you, pitiable, crawling worm—that you, corrupt in nature and conceived in sin—child of wrath and of the devil! say that there is no God! Woe, woe! for the Judge cometh! Woe, woe! for the gnashing of teeth and the outer darkness! Woe, woe! for those who encircled him, and buffeted him, and pierced him with thorns! Woe, woe! for the Lord our God is a just God, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy, but will not turn the day of mercy is past! Oh! for the hour—sinner, sinner, beware!—when that anger rises like an ingulfing fiery sea, and sweeps them away forever!'

"Yes would have thought the sea had entered his building; for the congregation had risen, and a smothered cry swept over the people. Many rose upright with clasped hands and cried, 'Hallelujah!' 'Praise be to God!' Others lay cowering and struggling upon the seats; others sobbed most grievously with frantic earnestness at the face of the young apostle. Children with frightened eyes stood the cold hands of their mothers. The Lord was dealing with his people—convicting sinners, and calling the lost sheep home. He ceased, but could not be borne out, so solid was the throng. Their neighbors leaned their faces upon them, and turned them, repeating snatches of hymns, and waiting for the next word of the preacher.

"Hope was filled up by an inward power, beholding with joy the working of the Word, but with a total unconsciousness of himself. Ah! the young man was meek and lowly while he was about his Father's business. And after waiting for a few moments, the music of his voice poured out peace upon that awakened throng.

"'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Yes, fellow-sinners, rest. For all of us, rest. For the wanderer, rest. For you who, just awakened, tremble in doubt, rest. For you, young woman, who despairest of heaven, rest. For you, young man, who, lingering in the bondage of sin, rest. Oh! that I had the wings of a dove, for then would I fly away and be at rest. Brother, sister, it shall be so. To your weary soul those wings were given. Rise from the world of grief and sin, of death and disappointment, you shall fly away. Deep in the bosom of your God, you shall find your rest. Your love is his heart-pain. Those wings are his tender promises. That rest is the peace of heaven.

"Come, O thou rejected, and wretchless Lord,
Thy power to us make known:
Strike with the hammer of thy word,
And break those hearts of stone.

"Oh that we all might now begin
Our foolishness to mourn;
And turn unto our mercy sin,
And to the Saviour turn.

"Give us ourselves and thee to know,
In this our greatest day:
Repentance unto life bestow,
And take our sins away.

"Ourselves we know, and feel of unbelief,
And freely then release;
Fill every soul with sacred grief,
And then with sacred peace."

CHAPTER LXXXI.

A LOVER, A HUSBAND, AND A FATHER.

As Mrs. Simcoe's voice died away Hope Wayne sank down upon her with tears in her eyes. Never before had she known the depth and power of her aunt's beside her, and now they were only to the description of a sermon. Neither of the two spoke. Mrs. Simcoe covered her face with both hands, and sat perfectly still. Hope would not interrupt the silence with a word.

"Hope, dear," the older woman presently said, "that day I found peace, and, Heaven knows, I had long wanted it. My heart was broken."

She stopped.

"Aunty," said Hope, in a low, pleading voice, and taking her hand.

"Yes, Hope: it was the old story. Will you allow me never suspect it?"

Suspect it? Hope Wayne suspect this grandfather's silent housekeeper, her hymn - singing old nurse, had ever been in love? Yet, was this the more wonderful, or that the old nurse herself should feel that it was a perfectly natural and probable suspicion?

"No, aunty, never," answered Hope, with the utmost sincerity.

"It is true notwithstanding, dear. When I was twenty years old, living with my father, a poor farmer in the country, there came to pass the summer in the village, a gentleman, a good deal older than I. He was handsome, graceful, elegant, fascinating. I saw him at church, but he did not see me. Then I met him sometimes upon the road, idly sauntering along, swinging a little cane, and looking as if village life were the dullest. It seemed as though to observe me. One day he bowed. I said nothing, but hurried on. When I was a little beyond him I turned my head. He also was turning and looking at me.

"Hope, darling. I was old enough to know why I turned. Yes, and so was he. How was I to remember the many graceful speeches he had let along the fields and touched the trees so kindly. Every thing was still. The birds dropped harvesting homeward notes, and the cows were coming in from the pastures. I was going after one cow, but I knew at a long time of the hour and looked at the new moon timidly showing herself in the west. Then I looked at my clumsy gown and thick shoes and large hands, and thought of the graceful, elegant man, who had not bowed to me insolently. I imagined that a gentleman used to city life must find our country ways tiresome. I pitied him, but what could I do?

"Once in the meadows I was following up the brook to find cardinal flowers. The brook was turning a little westward and was passing, looking closely among the flags and pickerel-weed, I suddenly heard a voice close to me—

"The bobolink blossoms are further on, Miss Jane.' I knew instantly who it was, and I was conscious of being more ashamed than the flowers I was seeking.

"Well, dear," said Mr. Simcoe, after pausing for a few moments, "I can not repeat every detail. The time came when I was not afraid to speak to him—when I cared to speak to no one else—when I thought of him all day, and dreamed of him all night—when I wore the ribbons he praised, and the colors he loved, and the flowers he gave me; when he told me of his great life beyond the village, of lofty and beautiful women he had known, of wise men he had spoken with, of foreign countries he had visited—when he twined my hair around his finger and said, 'Jane, I love you!'"

Her eyes were excited, and her voice was hurried, but inexpressibly red. Hope sat by, and the tears flowed from her eyes.

"A long, long time. Yet it was only a few months—it was only a summer. He came in the early and was gone again in September. But between his coming and going the roses in our garden bloomed and withered. So you see there was time enough. Time enough! Time enough! I was heavenly happy.

"One day he said that he must go. There was some frightful trouble in his eye. 'Will you come back?' I trembled to remember how sternly I asked it, and how cold and bloodless I felt. 'So help me God!' he answered, and left me. Left me! 'So help me God!' he murmured, as his tears fell upon my cheek and he kissed me. 'So help me God!'—and he left me. Not a word, not a look, not a sign had he given me to suppose that he would not return. Not a thought, not a wish had he breathed to me that you might not hear. His miniature hung in a locket around my neck. My whole heart and soul hung upon his love. 'So help me God!' he whispered, and left me.

"He did not come back. I thought my heart was frozen. My mother sighed as she went on with her usual, incessant work. My father tried to be cheerful. 'Cry, girl, cry,' my mother said; 'only cry, and you'll be better.' I could not cry. I could not smile. I could do nothing but help her silently in the long, hard work, day after day, summer and winter. I read the books he had given me. I thought of the things he had said. I sat in my chamber when the floor was scrubbed, and the bread baked, and the dishes washed, and the flies buzzed in the hot, still kitchen. I can hear them now. And then I sat, looking out of my window, straining my eyes toward the horizon—sometimes sure that I heard him coming, clicking the gate, hurrying up the gravel, with his eager, handsome, melancholy face. I started up. My heart stood still. I was ready to fall upon his neck and say, 'I believe thou art right.' He did not come. "So long as God" he said, and did not come.

COLONEL WAYNE'S FIRST LOVE.

"My father brought me to New York to change the scene. But God had brought me here to change my heart. I heard one Sunday good old Bishop Asbury, and he began the work that Summerfield finished. At Summerfield's I died. They left nothing, and I was the only child. I did what I could, and at last I became your grandfather's housekeeper."

As her story proceeded Mr. Simcoe looked more and more anxiously at Hope, whose eyes were fixed upon her incessantly. The older woman paused at this point, and taking Hope's face between her hands, immediately kissed and kissed her.

"Remember, darling," said she, "That love is his holy grace; those wings are his tender promises; that rest is the peace of his heaven."

"Yes, mamma," I remember," answered Hope.

"Your grandfather had a daughter Mary."

"My mother," said Hope, eagerly.

"Your mother, darling. She was as beautiful but as delicate as a flower. Your grandfather sent her in the ship of one of his friends to India, for the doctors said the long salt voyage would strengthen her. She was gone for several weeks, and met a young man of her own age, clerk in a house there. Of course they were soon engaged. But he was poor, and new to his business, and she knew the severity of your grandfather and his ambition for her. So she left the ship returned, and your mother returned in it. Scarcely was she at home a month than your grandfather told me that she had had a connection in view for his daughter, and wanted me to prepare her to receive the addresses of a gentleman a good deal older than she, but of the best family, and in every way a desirable husband. He was himself getting old, he said, and it was necessary that his daughter should marry. I answered that I loved my child and her. Gentle soul, with her soft, dark, opened ing eyes, with her flower-like fragility and womanly dependence. All but I was convinced that your grandfather should have been her parent.

"She was married here I told you. I thought her grief was only natural, and yet I was surprised at the sudden change in her. She faded before our eyes. We could not detect it, but she made no effort to resist. She did not refuse to see her old friends. She did not seem to be less loved any one else. I think she had a mortal fear of her father, and I thought she could not do any thing that repeated resistance.

"One day your grandfather said at dinner, 'To-morrow, Mrs. Bayley, your son and child will be here.'

"To-morrow she rose like a spectre. The stranger arrived. Mary kept her room until dinner-time. Then we both went down to see the new comer. He was in the parlor with your grandfather, and he was engaged in telling him some very amusing story when we came in, for your grandfather was laughing immoderately. I rose upon seeing us.

"Colonel Wayne, my daughter,' said he, waving his hand toward her. He bowed—she sunk, upon like, into a chair.

"'Mrs. Simcoe, Colonel Wayne,' I said.

"Our eyes met. It was my lover. He was too much amazed to bow. But in a moment he smiled courteously and seated himself; for he saw at once what had befallen in the household. I said nothing; I remembered. I sunk into a chair and looked at him. He was older, but the same charm still hovered about his person. His voice had the same secret music, and his manner was the same graceful grace which seemed to spring from the consciousness of power. I was conscious of only two things—that I loved him, and that he was married to my child and woman.

"During dinner he made two or three observations to me. But I bowed and said nothing. After a few days he made a formal offer of his hand to Mary Burt. She was his child! She knew not what to say, for she knew her mother had forbidden him. She trembled, hesitated, fluttered, delayed. 'You must, you shall!' were the terrible words she heard from her husband. She decided to tell me. I was her friend, he should force a summary interview. In fact, Hope, you could recite, by rote, what I could not. 'Only, dear father,' she said, 'I am too young. Let me not be married for a year.' Her father laughed and assented. And I think she instantly wrote to her lover in India.

"The world came driving out to congratulate. 'Such a reasonable connection!' every body said; 'a military man of fine old family. It is really delightful to have such matches sometimes take place, in which all the condi tions are satisfactory.'

"All the time his miniature lung round my neck. Why? Because I did, in the bottom of my soul, still believe him. I believed that he'd say, 'So help me God!'

"He went away, and sometimes returned for a week. I was comforted by seeing that he did not love your mother, and by the confidence I had that she would not marry him. I was sure that something would happen to prevent.

"The year was coming round. One night your mother came into my room in her night-dress; her face was radiant, and she held a note in her hand. It was from her lover. He had thrown himself upon a ship when her letter reached him, and here he was. Full of generous ardor, he proposed to marry her privately at once; there was no other way he was sure.

"'Will you help us?' she said, after she had told me every thing.

"'But you are two such children,' I said.

"'Then you will not help. You will make me marry Colonel Wayne.'

"Hope, I tried to see the matter calmly. I sought the source of God. I do not say that I did just what I should have done, but I helped them. The time was arranged when she was to go away. I, of course, thought that her lover was to be married.

"He came. It was a June night; the moon was full. We were quietly along the avenue. The gate was opened. We were just passing through, and your mother and Colonel Wayne stepped from the shadow of the wall and the trees.

"Your mother and her lover stood perfectly still. She gave a little cry. Your grandfather was furious.

"'Go, Sir!' he shrieked at the young man. "'If your daughter commands it,' he replied. "'Your grandfather turned to him incredulously.

"'Sir, my daughter is the betrothed wife of Colonel Wayne.'

"The young man looked with an incredulous smile at your mother, who had sunk senseless into my arms, and said, 'Is this true, Mary?'

"She was mine before she ever saw him,' said your grandfather with a hissed at him with contempt.

"'Go—before I strike you!'

"The young man hesitated for a few moments, saw that it was useless to remain longer at that time, and went.

"The next day Mr. Burt sent for Dr. Peewee.

"The moment I knew what he intended to do I ran to your grandfather and told him that Colonel Wayne was not the husband of his daughter. But when I told him that he had deserted me, Mr. Burt laughed scornfully.

"'Colonel Simcoe! Why, you have lost your wits. Remember, Colonel Wayne is a gentleman of family. Do you know who you were—'

"'I was a poor country girl,' said I, 'and Colonel Wayne loved me, and I loved him, and here is the pledge and proof of it.'

"I drew out the miniature as I spoke, and held it before your grandfather's eyes. He flashy staggered, and rang the bell violently.

"'Send Colonel Wayne to me,' said, hastily, to the servant.

"A moment the Colonel came in. I saw his color change as his eye fell upon me, holding the locket in my hand, and upon your grandfather's disordered face.

"'Colonel Wayne, have you ever seen Mrs. Simcoe before?'

"He was very pale, and there were sullen circles under his eyes as he spoke; but he said calmly,

"'Not to my knowledge.'

"Hope's head fell on his shoulder.

"'Who gave me that, Sir?' said I, thrusting the miniature almost into his face.

"He took it, and his color looked at it. I saw his lip work and his throat quiver with an involuntary spasm.

"'I am sure I do not know.'

"I was speechless. Your grandfather was confounded. Colonel Wayne looked white, but resolute.

"'God only is my witness,' said I, slowly, as if the words came gasping from my heart. 'So help me God, I loved him, and he loved me.'

"A cynical smile curled his friend's lip, but he preserved the same placidity of face.

"'Your testimony is false, Mrs. Simcoe,' said your grandfather, not unkindly, to me. 'Go to your room.'

"I obeyed, for my duty was done."

Mrs. Simcoe paused and rocked silently to and fro. Hope looked at her, and kissed her fervently. Presently the narration was quietly resumed:

I told your mother my story. But she was stunned by her own grief, and I do not think she comprehended it. She only answered that they were married. Your mother did not say yes—for she could not utter a word—but the ecstasy proceeded from her face. Colonel Wayne, God hath joined together,' and I laughed aloud. I felt like a maniac.

"It was a few days after the marriage, when Colonel Wayne and his wife were absent, that your grandfather said to me at the dinner-table, in the presence of Dr. Peewee,

"'Mrs. Simcoe, your story seems to be true. But think a moment. A man like Colonel Wayne must have had many experiences. We don't do. But he has been in India, and thoughtless, I have no doubt. He may even have visited your native place. I am very sorry. If he has done so, I think he ought to have acknowledged it, the other day. But I hope sincerely that you will all be as happy as he gosses, and live happily together.' Dr. Peewee will you ask a blessing?'

It was already midnight, and the two women were by the fire. It was the moment when Abel Newt ran through his comrades, and, opening doors and windows. Hope Wayne was in bed and fast asleep. Mrs. Simcoe ended the story that Mrs. Simcoe was telling her voice had a swelling tone painful to hear. After a long silence she began again:

"What ought I to have done? Should I have gone away? That was the easiest course. But, Hope, the way of duty is not often the easiest way. I wrote a long letter to the good old Bishop Asbury, who seemed to me like a father, and after a while his answer came. He said that I should seek the Lord's leading, and if that bade me stay—if that told me that it would be for my soul's blessing that my heart should break daily—then I had better remain, seeing that the end is not here—that there we have no continuing city, and that our proud hearts must be bruised by grief, even as our Saviour's lowly forehead was pierced with thorns.

"So I said. It was partly pity for your mother, who began to droop at once. It was partly that I might keep my wound bleeding for my friend's sake—and pain's sake, I believe. But it could not then—because I believed, as before I do, in your mother, that in his secret heart I was the woman your father loved, and I could not give him up.

"Your mother's lover wrote to me at once, I discovered afterward, but his letters were intercepted, for years sometimes to Colonel Wayne's absolute man. Then he came to Pinewood, but he was not allowed to see your mother. The poor boy was literally driven before he could effect any thing your mother was the wife of Colonel Wayne. Then, in the same ship in which he had come from India, he returned; and after he was gone all his letters were given to me.

"Hope, you are a woman. I told him every about your mother, but there was not much to tell. She never remembered his name after her marriage. There were gay parties given in honor of the wedding, and her delicate, drooping, feminine nature hung upon the arm of her handsome, elegant husband. People said that her melancholy shyness was beautiful to behold, and that she clung to her husband like the waving ivy to the oak.

"Then came the baby. She was just nineteen when she was married—she was not twenty-one when you were born. Oh! I did not think of myself, only, but of her, when I heard the sunshine of your infant voice. Your mother's life was bound up in you. She was a mere child herself, but she was a mother. She trented me always with unsurpassed politeness, but darling, it was a dreary time for a young girl. Hope," said Mrs. Simcoe, after a short pause, "that is all—the end you yourself remember."

"Yes," replied Hope, in the same low, solemn tone. "My father went out upon the pond, one evening, with a friend to bathe, and was drowned. Mr. Gray's boys found him. My grandfather was let me wear mourning for him. I wore a blue ribbon the day Dr. Peewee preached his funeral sermon; and I did not care to wear black. Aunty, I had seen him too little to love him like a father, you know."

She said it almost as if apologizing to Mrs. Simcoe, whose story bowed her head.

It was past midnight. It was the very moment when Abel Newt was starting with horror at the sight of the apparition in the glass.

She turned wistfully toward Hope, who was looking at her with a beautiful, vague apprehension of some peculiar fitness to the condition in the words Mrs. Simcoe uttered. Hope knew that she was with an inward strayed, and then said, calmly, but in the low voice,

"And, aunty, you found me."

Mrs. Simcoe took her darling's face between her caressing hands. She smoothed the glistening golden hair. Her eyes rested upon the forehead.

"Dear, you are the daughter of the man I loved me, I truly believe, more than my other woman. You have known no other mother but me. You have learned that joy is not appointed for us below, but trial, and grace through suffering."

"Convince us first of unbelief,
And freely then release;
Fill every heart with sacred grief,
And then with sacred peace."

"Aunty, the young man?" said Hope, in the same tone.

"Was Lawrence Newt," answered Mrs. Simcoe.

"It was the moment when Abel sat at his desk, writing the name that Mrs. Simcoe had pronounced.

At first Hope Wayne felt every nerve in her frame relaxed—a mist clouded her eyes—she had a weary sense of happiness, for she thought she was dying. She had disbelieved what she had dreaded. She was perfectly sure it was coming, and yet the word shot out upon her like a tongue of lightning. The mist passed. She felt her cheeks glowing, and was preternaturally clear. Mrs. Simcoe sat beside her, weeping silently.

"Good-night, dearest aunty!" said Hope, as she rose and bent down to kiss her.

"My child!" said the older woman, in tones that trembled out of an aching heart.

Hope took her candle, and moved toward the door. As she went she heard Mrs. Simcoe repeating, in the old murmuring sunset strain,

"These wings are his tender promises. That rest is the peace of heaven!"

LITERARY.

THE STATESMAN'S MANUAL; containing the Addresses and Messages of the Presidents of the United States, Inaugural, Annual, and Special, from 1789 to 1858; with a memoir of each of the Presidents, and a history of their administrations; also LEGALITIES between the United States and foreign powers, Constitution of the United States, Presidential proclamations, and other important documents and statistical information. Compiled by Edwin Williams. Illustrated by Benson J. Lossing. With steel portraits of the Presidents. Four volumes, 8vo. Harper Brothers, New York.

The title of this very valuable work gives an accurate idea of its contents. It is, in fact, a succinct, detailed, and unbiased documentary history of our country; and, as such, is invaluable not only to statesmen and politicians, but to all who desire to understand thoroughly the theory and policy of our Government, from its formation to the present time. The full and reference for this purpose it has not its equal, because all the materials have been drawn from official sources, and every document is given in extenso also may be is perfectly resigned to his fate, and is unconscious of having committed any crime."

MEXICAN INTRIGUES IN TEXAS.

From Texas we learn that the Legislature has authorized the Governor to call out all the troops necessary for the protection of the frontier. Captain Ford had been appointed commander of the troops, and had started out after Cortinas. The Brownsville affair had caused great excitement, and volunteers were rapidly organizing. Deputy-Sheriff Campbell had been released by Cortinas. Brownsville is full, and was still closed against him.

WRECK OF THE "INDIA."

The screw steamship India, belonging to the Liverpool and Canadian Steamship Company, which sailed from Liverpool on the 5th ultimo, for Portland, Maine, got on the rocks of Mary Joseph, off Gaydoret, Nova Scotia, at five o'clock on the morning of Saturday, the 21st ultimo, and is a total wreck. She parted amidships. She had but 21 passengers aboard, and her crew numbered 100 men. A boat was capsized, and several persons drowned. Twenty-four passengers were picked up by the schooner Alexander, and taken to Halifax. The number lost is not known.

The Indian was a first-class iron propeller, and was but one year old. She was thirty-four tons burden. She was built in Dumbarton, Scotland, and had been but a short time in the service. She was considered a fast vessel, and fitted with five water-tight bulkhead compartments. Her engine was a vertical direct one, with two cylinders of sixty-two inches in diameter and a three and a half feet stroke.

THANKSGIVING IN THE CITY.

The Thanksgiving Day observance which I might be malicious to say is willing enough to suspend business operations when each individual is sure that his neighbor will not anticipate him in achieving a bargain, past all observance to Thanksgiving Day, was a Thanksgiving those which are chronically open, closed their doors and put up their shutters. Some did this, perhaps, with no other opportunity of enjoying themselves, brushed the cool, freezing air in the streets, and congregated to hear their favorite preachers descant on various topics of the day, and to see their friends. Others, more provident, churches were open for public service. Many of the churches were filled to repletion with our present impression those meeting were participating in Presbyterian Church street, while a large number of others are presented more scanty, though not by any means unmindful of the interesting points.

The festival was not, of course, without its charitable aspects. The children at the Five Points House of Industry, and at the Ladies' Home for Destitute Children, were treated to their customary Thanksgiving dinner yesterday. Donations of cash and provisions were supplied from tables, at which over one thousand children, and the parents of those who were left for the day at home, hundred dollars in cash were received, and a large number of articles of clothing, bedding, &c., were given to the children. At the House of Industry, also, there were over one hundred visitors during the day, and about four hundred dinners were left for the children of the Industrial institution. The exercises at both places were of an interesting character."

SHOOTING AFFRAY AT NASHVILLE.

Particulars of the affray in Nashville, in which Mr. Polesdexter, editor of the Union and Americans, was killed by Mr. Allen A. Hall of the News, are given by the Nashville Patriot. The deadly originated in a political controversy, there stated, in a political controversy, during which Mr. Polesdexter sought to fasten the charge of bribery on Hall, being ready to unite with the Republican party. There subsequently was a "mutual explanation," each party characterizing their author as "a liar."

Mr. Polesdexter was shot down as Mr. Polesdexter replied to the accusation, and was instantly killed by a ball through the heart. A son of Mr. Hall and Mr. Polesdexter, which resulted in nothing more serious than a challenge. The correspondence was pending between the principals in the affair, a card was issued by Mr. Hall, in which he stated Mr. Polesdexter had been killed as the effect of the paper, with the evident intent of exculpating Mr. Hall. That gentleman did not happen to be in attend, but, being warned of Mr. Polesdexter's approach, left the office. As call the third time, he advanced into the street, and, as he approached, struck him on the head with a cane. Mr. Polesdexter was about to draw a weapon, but, as he did so, Hall struck him with a cane on the head and fired. Mr. Polesdexter fell to the ground. A coroner's jury rendered a verdict which exonerated Hall from blame in killing Mr. Hall for trial in $5000 bonds, which were immediately furnished.

ANOTHER DIAMOND WEDDING.

The New Haven Journal of the 26th says: "The 'Bonus Bette' and the young millionaire" is the title by which the marriage has been the subject of considerable favor in the fashionable circles of this city, and to which took place on Wednesday at St. Paul's Church, Boston, with the usual accompaniments of a fashionable, pastor Dr. Huntington officiating. It is said that the bride was dressed in a white satin dress, with a veil of rich Venetian chain of rare and costly workmanship, and the bridesmaids were also provide of diverse quality, but, fine, as is fitting. Through the kindness of a friend, we have been favored with a description of the dress worn by the bride, and the wife was presented from the manor digital determinational, and made a pretty display. The bridegroom was to provide a new way of carrying the trousseau which would have been unique and novel, and worthy of the beauty of the lace or embroidery. It was a pity that the carriage was not provided, and the rest of the ceremonies. What it might appear when made up, we do not know, per person, we do not pretend to guess. We record what we have."

PERSONAL.

Judge H. F. Bain, of Marysville, has been appointed by Governor Weller United States Senator, vice Gwin. The vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Broderick. The Marysville Democrat says that he will start for the city of Washington in the course of the fifth or sixth of December.

We read in the Detroit Free Press that Gen. Cass intends to announce the return of the Hon. Charles Lanman, of Washington, to the Secretary at Boston by the Canada. Mr. Lanman took ready to his seat in the Senate, and will assume the duties and responsibilities of that office. His health, as we learn from his own lips, is considered as completely re-established. He feels in full possession of his natural physical vigor, and that the exercise of his brain is no longer forbidden or limited by the heavy remnants of a diseased and suffering body. Several of Mr. Lanman's personal and political friends met him, on the arrival at the Canada at her wharf, with a hearty welcome.

Governor Seward was presented in Alexandria with three superb Arabian horses, which were landed at the three superb Arabian horses, which were landed at the New York State Agricultural Society.

The last-mentioned had been the intelligence of the death of the celebrated pioneer and explorer, Christopher Carson, at Taos, New Mexico, on the 23d ult. He was a noted Indian Agent. Carson was a native of Kentucky, leaving been born in Madison County in 1809. His father shortly after that period removed to Missouri, where Kit, when a lad of fifteen, was apprenticed to a saddler—occupying himself at that business two years, at the end of which he joined a trapping expedition to the Rocky Mountains, and continued in that business with the great Fur Company for the next ten years, during which he explored the Plains. For eighteen years he was a colonel of Brad's Cavalry, and subsequently engaged in his expedition Carson married him, and was also with Gen. Fremont's last expedition. In 1847 he received the rank of Lieutenant Colonel by brevet, and for the last few years he has been most remarkable exploit on the Plains was executed in 1854, when he conducted Gen. Beale's party from Texas to California.

A New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says that Lola Montez is living very quietly up town, and does not appear to be in want of money. She has a house of her own friends, the husband of Lola Montez, and though the talks basely of her former husband, she is not at all ashamed of her former life. She is very fond of horses, takes out her little toiseau-wagon every afternoon, and is often seen in the Park, and then falls back upon old times with decided gusto when she meets any of her old friends. She is very fond of going to do.

Several contemporary talks about some forthcoming "Lilliputian nuptials," and thus reveals itself: "Gen. Tom Thumb, the celebrated dwarf, who has been through to a grasshopper, made a very tall fortune for P. T. Barnum, and has retired from the show business, is about to settle in the bonds of holy matrimony with a young lady of his own size. The dimensions differ about her height, and in the vicinity of Bridgeport, Conn., where she resides, she is considered a beauty.

A Jerusalem Flag contains an account of the death, on last Thursday week, of a little girl of eight years, named Sarah Ann Cohen, who, though not quite so old as Tom Thumb, her clothing took fire. She first tried to put out the flames herself, but, finding that the intensity of her years to throw water on her; but the little girl, in her agony, ran into the street, where the flames were then burning her lying out in the yard, and, in terror, ran into the house, where the flames were then burning her lying out in the yard, and, in terror, ran into the house, where the flames were then burning her lying out in the yard, and, in terror, ran into the house

LOSS OF THE "ROYAL CHARTER" ON THE COAST OF ENGLAND, OCTOBER 25, 1859.

THE LOSS OF THE "ROYAL CHARTER."

We gave in last number a full account of this terrible shipwreck—the most appalling that has occurred since the burning of the Austria. We now present, on the preceding page, an engraving of the scene from sketches made in England. We may add to the full narrative we published last week, the following extracts from the statements of the passengers.

James Dean says:

"He was in bed in a berth with four other passengers when the ship struck, and he was aroused by one of his fellows exclaiming, 'I think we're lost!' He dressed himself, and after a few minutes' prayer ascended on deck, where he had not been more than a very brief period when the vessel parted in the centre 'like the mapping of a tobacco stump.' The people on board stood petrified, as it were, seemingly unable to make the slightest struggle for their lives, while their terror was increased by the awful scenes presented as unfortunate creatures fell and were crushed to atoms in the chasm separating the two parts of the ship. He never for a moment lost his presence of mind. He saw that most of those in the water struggled toward the large pieces of the wreck, and he saw also that most of those who retained the hindmost portions of the vessel were resolved to death, and their bodies dreadfully mutilated against the rocks. Throughout totally unable to swim, he jumped overboard, and just seized a boy he saw floating near him. Almost at the very moment he seized him a hand was thrust under his arm, and a second claimant appeared. Dean said it would not support both of them, so as soon as possible he left the box for another piece of wood, and with that he was thrown upon the shore. He left his support and tried to gain a position of security, but ere he could do so a wave overpowered him and carried him back to sea, where he became entangled in the floating remnants of the vessel, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he extricated himself. When he had succeeded in this he was again thrown on shore. While momentarily expecting the arrival of another wave a rope was thrown to him, and by it he was finally drawn out of danger, without experiencing any injuries or bruises other than of a very trifling description. He soon recovered strength, and was able to leave for Wigan on Friday morning."

Mr. Carew Taylor says:

"I was in bed when I heard Captain Withers addressing somebody. 'Come directly: I shall take your child.' There was some answer to that, but I don't know what. He said she had struck, or something of that kind, and that was about half past two o'clock in the morning. I jumped out of bed, and looked out on saloon, where, seeing somebody there, I put my coat, trowsers, and greatcoat on, and went before I heard that person's cry. Mr. Woodruff. I then heard the ship giving tremendous jerks or concussions, when I felt that she was aground. Gentlemen and ladies were in the greatest consternation, praying, etc. The Rev. Mr. Hodges stood praying contemporaneously. I then went to the end of the saloon to look for my child and mate. I found the lobby of the saloon crammed with people, so that no chance remained to get out, and it was impossible to find the nurse and my child. I eventually found them, and the thumping of the vessel was on a grander succession and violence than before. Water began to come in, so that I was perfectly wet through hours before I got saved. I saw the ship divided in half, and saw Captain Taylor on deck, lying there with a leg of wood tied to him. I said to him, 'Oh, Captain Taylor, have a fearful scene this is!' He did not reply to me. Another wave came over, and I, with the rest of my party, jumped overboard. I got on a piece of wood, to which I saw another man clinging. After that I got a piece of boarding, from which I was washed twice, and at last somebody took hold of my fingers from near the shore. Three men assisted me down on shore, and the people paid me every possible attention. I think it was Saturday I saw pilot me in his own bed and treated me with the greatest kindness. His daughter and wife were saved, lost. The ship was thumping on the rocks for hours before she went to pieces."

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC. ETC.

[From Advance Sheets, purchased direct from the Author.]

HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE—Continued.

IV.

"Sare has escaped from my asylum.

I can not say with truth that the terrible inference which those words suggested flashed upon me like a new revelation. Some of the strange questions put to me by the woman in white, after my ill-considered promise to leave her free to act as she pleased, had suggested the conclusion, either that she was naturally flighty and unsettled, or that some recent shock of terror had disturbed the balance of her faculties. But the idea of absolute insanity which we all associate with the very name of an Asylum, had, I can honestly declare, never occurred to me, in connection with her. I had seen nothing, in her language or her actions, to justify it at the time; and, even with the new light thrown on her by the words which the stranger had addressed to the policeman, I could see nothing to justify it now.

What had I done? Assisted the victim of the most horrible of all false imprisonments to escape; or cast loose on the wide world of London an unfortunate creature whose actions it was my duty, and every man's duty, carefully to control? I turned sick at heart when the question occurred to me, and when I felt it impossible truly that it was asked in vain.

In the disturbed state of my mind, it was useless to think of going to bed, when I at last got back to my chambers in Clement's Inn. Before many hours elapsed it would be necessary to resume my customary journey to Cumberland. I sat down and tried, first to sketch, then to read what the woman in white put between me and my pencil, between me and my book. Had the forlorn creature come to any harm? That was my first thought, though I shrank selfishly from confronting it. Other thoughts followed, on which it was less harrowing to dwell. Where had she stopped the cab? What had become of her now? Had she been traced and captured by the men in the closed cab? Or was she still capable of controlling her own actions; and were we two following exactly the same roads toward one point in the mysterious future, at which we were to meet once more?

I was still in this state of mind when I came to look my door, to bid farewell to London pursuits, London people, and London fashions, and to lie in movement again toward new interests and a new life. Even the bustle and confusion at the railway terminus were welcome as distracting me, at other times, roused me and did me good.

My traveling instructions directed me to go to Carlisle, and then to diverge to a branch railway which would take me nearer to my destination. As a misfortune to begin with, our engine broke down between Carlisle and Kirkstone. The delay occasioned by this accident caused me to be too late for the branch train, by which I was to have gone to my destination. I had to wait some hours; and when a later train finally departed and set me down at the station at Dumfoot House, it was past ten, and the night was so dark that I could hardly see my way to the fancy-chaise which had been sent to the station to be in waiting for me.

The driver evidently discomposed by the lateness of my arrival. He was in that state of highly-respectful sullenness which is peculiar to English coachmen. I got no answers to me through the darkness in perfect silence. The roads were bad, and the journey consequently one which might increased the difficulty of getting over the ground quickly. It was, by my watch, nearly an hour and a half before the lights of the nearest village appeared, and I heard the sound of the sea on the distant shore. I was set down at the door on a smooth gravel drive. We had passed one gate before entering the drive, and we passed another before we drew up at the house. I was received by a solemn man-servant out of livery, who informed me that the family retired for the night, and was then led into a large and lofty room where my supper was awaiting me. I forbore to mention to this gentleman of a lonesome mahogany widderers of dining table.

I was too tired and out of spirits to eat or drink much, especially with the solemn servant waiting on me as elaborately as if a small Dinner-party had arrived at the house instead of a solitary man. I said that the cold fowl was ready to be taken up to my bedchamber. The solemn servant conducted me into a prettily-furnished bedroom, and said, "Breakfast at nine o'clock, Sir"—looked all round him to see that every thing was in its proper place—and noiselessly withdrew.

"What shall I see in my dreams to-night?" I thought to myself, as I put out the candle; "the woman in white, or the unknown inhabitants of this Cumberland mansion?" It was a strange sensation to be sleeping in the house, like a friend of the family, and yet not to know one of the inmates, even by sight.

V.

When I rose the next morning and drew up my blind, the sea opened before me joyously under the bright August sunlight. A little distant coast of Scotland fringed the horizon with its lines of undulating hills.

The view was such a surprise, and such a change to me, after my weary London experience of brick and mortar landscape, that I seemed to burst into a new life and a new set of thoughts the moment I looked at it. The confused sensation of having suddenly lost my familiarity with the past, without acquiring any additional clearness of idea in reference to the present or the future, took possession of my mind. Circumstances that were but a few hours old, faded back in my memory, as if they had happened months and months since. Persia's quaint announcement of the means by which he had procured me my present employment; the farewell evening I had passed with my mother and sister; even my mysterious adventure on the way home from Hampstead, seemed to belong like events which might have occurred at some former epoch of my existence. Although the woman in white was still in my mind, the image of her seemed to have grown dull and faint already.

"MY TASTE WAS SUFFICIENTLY EDUCATED TO ENABLE ME TO APPRECIATE THE VALUE OF THE DRAWINGS, WHILE I TURNED THEM OVER."

A little before nine o'clock, I descended to the ground-floor of the house. The solemn man-servant was waiting before me to show me the way to the sitting-room. I was conducted to it, and left alone.

My first glance round me, as the man opened the door, disclosed a well-furnished breakfast-table, standing in the middle of a large room, with many windows in it. I looked from the table to the window farthest from me, and saw a lady standing at it, with her back turned toward me. The instant my eyes rested on her, I was struck by the rare beauty of her form, and by the unaffected grace of her attitude. Her figure was tall, yet not too tall; rounded and well-developed, yet not fat; her head set on her shoulders with an easy, pliant firmness; her hair, perfection of its eyes of a rare, fine, fair complexion, and her features, if I could not pronounce them to be regular, were at least strikingly expressive and intelligent.

Never can met one more flatly contradicted—never was the fair promise of a lovely figure more strangely and startlingly belied by the face and head that crowned it. The lady's complexion was almost swarthy, and the dark down on her upper lip was almost a mustache. She had a large, firm, masculine mouth and jaw; prominent, piercing, coarse brown eyes; and thick, coal-black hair, growing unusually low down on her forehead. Her expression—bright, frank, and intelligent—appeared, while she was silent, to be altogether wanting in those feminine attractions of gentleness and pliability, without which the beauty of the handsomest woman alive is always incomplete. No one such face as this set on shoulders that a sculptor would have longed to model—to be charmed by the modest graces of action through which the symmetrical limbs betrayed their beauty when they moved, and even to be almost repelled by the masculine form and masculine look of the features in which the perfectly shaped figure ended—but to find a sensation oddly akin to the helpless discomfort familiar to us all in sleep, when we recognize yet can not reconcile the anomalies and contradictions of a dream.

"Mr. Hartright?" said the lady, interrogatively; her manner lighting up with a smile, and softening and growing womanly the moment she began to speak. "We require the services of you last night, and went to bed as usual. Accept my apologies for our apparent want of attention, and allow me to introduce myself as one of your pupils. Shall we shake hands? I suppose we must come to it sooner or later—and why not sooner?"

These odd words of welcome were spoken in a clear, ringing, pleasant voice. The offered hand—rather large, but beautifully formed—was given to me with the easy, unaffected assurance of a highly-bred woman. We sat down together at the breakfast-table in as cordial and customary a manner as if we had known each other for years, and had met at Limmeridge House to talk over old times by previous appointment.

"I hope you come here good-humoredly determined to make the best of your position," continued the lady. "If you will have to begin with meeting by putting up with my society one company at breakfast-time mine. My sister is in her own room, nursing that essentially feminine malady, a bilious headache; and her old governess, Mrs. Vesey, is charitably attending on her with restorative tea. My uncle, Mr. Fairlie, never joins us at any of our meals: he is an invalid, and keeps bachelor state in his own apartments. There is nobody else in the house but me. Two young ladies have been staying here, but they went away yesterday, to my great and no wonder. All through their visit (in consequence of Mr. Fairlie's invalid condition) we produced no such convenience in the house as a flirtable, danceable, small-talkable creature of the male sex; and the consequence was, we did nothing but quarrel, especially at dinner-time. How can you expect four women to dine together three days running, and not quarrel? We are such fools, we can't entertain each other at table. You see I don't think much of my own sex, Mr. Hartright—which will you have, tea or coffee?—no woman does think much of her own sex, although, few of them, confess it as freely as I do. Dear me, you look puzzled. Why? Are you wondering what you will have for breakfast? or are you surprised at my crueless way of talking? In the first case I advise you, as a friend, to have nothing at all with that cold ham at your elbow, and to wait till the omelette comes in. In the second case, I will give you some tea to compose your spirits, and do all a woman can (which is very little, by-the-by) to hold my tongue."

She handed me my cup of tea, laughing gayly. Her light flow of talk, and her lively familiarity of manner with a total stranger, were accompanied by an unaffected naturalness and an easy inborn confidence in herself and her position, which would have secured her the respect of the most audacious man breathing. While it was impossible to be formal and reserved in her company, it was more than impossible to take the faintest vestige of a liberty with her, even in thought. I felt this instinctively, even while I caught the infection of her own bright gayety of spirits—even while I did my best to answer her in her own frank, lively way.

"Yes, yes," she said, when I had suggested the only explanation I could offer, to account for my perplexity at her looks, "I suppose. You are such a perfect stranger in the house, that you are puzzled by my familiar reference to the worthy inhabitants. Natural enough: I ought to have thought of it before. At any rate, I can set it right now. Suppose I begin with myself, so as to get done with that part of the subject as soon as possible? My name is Marian Halcombe; and I am as inaccurate as women usually are in calling Mr. Fairlie my uncle, and Miss Fairlie my sister. My mother was twice married: the first time to Mr. Halcombe, by whom I was born; the second time to Mr. Fairlie, my half-sister's father. Except that we are both orphans, we are in every respect as unlike each other as possible. My father was a poor man, and Miss Fairlie's father was a rich man. I have got nothing, and she is an heiress. I am dark and ugly, and she is fair and pretty. Every body thinks me crabbed and odd (with perfect justice); and every body thinks her sweet-tempered and charming (with more justice still). In short, she is an angel; and I—Try some of that marmalade, Mr. Hartright, and finish the sentence, in the name of female propriety, for yourself. What can I to tell you about

Mr. Fairlie? Upon my honor, I hardly know. He is sure to send for you after breakfast, and you can study him for yourself. In the mean time, I may inform you, first, that he is the late Mr. Fairlie's younger brother; secondly, that he is a single man; and, thirdly, that he is Miss Fairlie's guardian. I won't live without her, and she can't live without me; and that is how I come to be at Limmeridge House. You know, and I have honestly fond of each other; which, you will say, is perfectly unaccountable, under the circumstances, and I quite agree with you—but so it is. You must please both of us, Mr. Hartright, or you please neither of us; and, if you please, you will be thrown entirely upon our society. Mrs. Vesey is an excellent person, who reports all the carriages that come, and counts the nothing; and Mr. Fairlie is too great an invalid to be responsible for the right use of anything that is the matter with him, and the doctors don't know what is the matter with him, and he doesn't know himself what is the matter with him. We all say it's on the nerves, and we none of us know what nerves mean when we say it. However, I advise you to humor his little peculiarities, when you see him to-day. Admire his collection of coins, prints, and wax-color drawings, and you will win his heart. Upon the whole, if you can be contented with a quiet country life, I don't see why you should not get on very well here. Everybody in the house, Mr. Fairlie's drawings will be among you. After lunch, Miss Fairlie and I shoulder our sketch-books, and get on to watercolor nature, under your directions. Drawing is for favorite white, mind, not mine. Woven over my draw—their marks are too flighty, and their eyes are too inattentive. No matter—my sister likes it; it is worthy and well spoil paper, for she sees as composedly as any woman in England. As for evening, I think we can help you through the time. Mr. Fairlie is very delightful. For my own pour part, I don't know one note of music from the other; but I can make play at chess, backgammon, écarté, and (join the inevitable female drawbacks), even at knitting as well. What do you think of the programme? Can you reconcile yourself to our quiet, regular life? or do you mean to be restless, and vaguely urgent for change and adventure, in the handsome atmosphere of Limmeridge House?"

She had a pretty face, in her gracefully bantering way, with no other interruptions on my part than the unimportant occasions which politeness required of me. The turn of the expression, however, in her last question, or rather in the one chosen word, "adventure," lightly as it fell from her lips, recalled my thoughts to my meeting with the woman in white, and urged me to discover the connection which the stranger's own reference to Mrs. Fairlie's retirement as the most likely to be well known between the names less figurative from the Asylum, and the former mistress of Limmeridge House.

"Even if I were the most restless of mankind," I said, "I should be in no danger of hurrying after adventures for some time to come. The very night before I arrived at this house, I met with an adventure; and the excitement and excitement of it, I can assure you, Miss Halcombe, will last me for the whole of the time I stay in Cumberland, if not for a much longer period."

"You don't say so, Mr. Hartright! May I hear it?"

"You have a claim to hear it. The chief person in the adventure was a total stranger to me, and may perhaps be a total stranger to you; but she certainly mentioned the name of one of the late Mrs. Fairlie in terms of the sincerest gratitude and regard."

"Mentioned my mother's name! You interest me indescribably. Pray go on."

I at once related the circumstances under which I had met the woman in white, exactly as they had occurred; and I repeated as closely as I had mind to me about Mrs. Fairlie and Limmeridge House, word for word.

Miss Halcombe's bright resolute eyes looked eagerly into mine, from the beginning of the narrative to the end. Her face expressed the liveliest sense of astonishment, but nothing more. She was evidently as far from knowing of any slow to the mystery as I was myself.

"Are you quite sure of those words referring to my mother's kindness?"

"Quite sure," I replied. "Whoever she may be, the woman was once at school in the village of Limmeridge, was treated with especial kindness by Mrs. Fairlie, and, in grateful remembrance of that kindness, feels an affectionate interest in all surviving members of the family. She knew that Mrs. Fairlie and her husband were both dead; and she spoke of you and Miss Fairlie as if they had known each other when they were children."

"You said, I think, that she denied belonging to this place?"

"Yes, she told me she came from Hampshire."

"And you entirely failed to find out her name?"

"Entirely."

"Very strange. I think you were quite justified, Mr. Hartright, in giving the poor creature her liberty, for the sums to have recourse to your pressence to show herself unfit to enjoy it. But I wish you had been a little more reserve about finding out her name. You would really clear up this mystery, in some way. You had better not speak of it yet to Mr. Fairlie, or to my sister. They are both of them, I am certain, quite as ignorant of who the woman is, and of what her past history in connection with us can be, as I am myself. But they are also, in widely different ways, rather nervous and sensitive; and you would only fidget one and alarm the other to no purpose. As for myself, I am all ashame with curiosity, and I devoise my whole energies to the business of discovery from this moment. When my mother came here, after her second marriage, she certainly established a most intimate and yet as it exists at the present time. But the old teachers are all dead, or gone elsewhere; and no enlightenment is to be hoped for from that quarter. The only other alternative I can think of—"

At this point we were interrupted by the entrance of the servant, with a message from Mr. Fairlie, requesting to see me immediately after breakfast, and to see me, as soon as I had done breakfast.

"Wait in the hall," said Miss Halcombe, answering for me, in her quick, decisive manner, as she rose to ring the bell. "Mr. Hartright will come out directly. Hartright, I say!" she went on, addressing me again, "that my sister and I have a large collection of my mother's letters, addressed to her father and to hers. In the absence of any other means of getting information, I will send you the key of the cover my mother's correspondence with Mr. Fairlie. He was fond of London, and was constantly writing to her from town; and she was accustomed, at such times, to write and report to him how things were going at Limmeridge. My letters are full of references to the school in which she took so strong an interest, and I think it more than likely that I may have discovered something when we meet again. The luncheon hour is two, Mr. Hartright, and I shall have pleasure of introducing you to my sister by that time, and we will occupy the intervening hour in looking over the correspondence and showing you at our pet points of view. Till two o'clock, then, farewell."

She nodded to me with the lively grace, the delightful refinement of manner which characterized her whole way, and did and all that she said and disappeared by a door at the lower end of the room, leading to the hall. I turned my steps toward the hall, and followed the servant on my way, for the first time, to the presence of Mr. Fairlie.

VI.

My conductor led me up stairs into a passage which took us back to the front entrance of the house, and then ushered me into a room, and of very thing about it. The bow-window looked out on the same lovely view which I had admired, the day before, from the house; and the furniture was the perfection of luxury and beauty. The tables and chairs were all of the most graceful, well-bound books, elegant conveniences for writing, and beautiful flowers; the second glance at the whole room was enough to fill the necessary materials for mounting water-color drawing, and had a light, delicate, artistic look to it which I could expand or fold up at will; the walls were hung with gayly tinted chintz; and the floor was covered with a carpet of the most delicious softness. It was the prettiest and most luxurious room I had ever entered in my life, and I was admired it with the warmest enthusiasm.

The solemn servant was not too highly trained to betray the slightest satisfaction. He bowed with icy deference when my terms of eulogy were at an end, and uttered not the words of favor for me to go out into the passage again.

We turned a corner, and entered a long second passage, terminating in a glass door. Right of entrs at the end, crossed a small circular upper hall, and then opened, by the servant's direction, into a bazar. The servant opened this door, and led me on a few yards to a second; opened that also, and announced me at last in the room. The green silk hanging before us; raised one of the window-curtains, and uttered the words, "Mr. Hartright," and left me.

I found myself in a large, lofty room, with a magnificent painted ceiling, and with a carpet over the floor, so thick and soft that it felt like a bed of velvet moss. The upper end of the room was occupied by a long book-case of some rare inlaid wood that was quite new to me. It was filled with books in rich bindings. On the top was adorned with statuettes in marble, ranged in regular alternation with antique vases. At the opposite side stood two antique cabinets; and between them, and above them, hung a picture of Venice by Turner, and Cuyp, covered by glass, and bearing Raphael's name on the gilt tablet at the bottom of the frame. The light was small and on my left, as I stood inside the door, were chiffoniers and little stands in buhl and marqueterie, loaded with trifles in Dresden china, with rare vases, ivory ornaments, and toys and curiosities that seemed to be made of gold, silver, and precious stones. At the lower end of the room, opposite to me, the windows were concealed by sunlight, and by screens of large blinds of the same pale sea-green color as the curtains over the door. The light thus introduced was deliciously soft, mysterious, and subdued; it fell equally upon all the objects in the room; it helped to intensify the still silence, and the air of profound seclusion that possessed the place; and, combined with the warm, aromatic ate halo of repose, the solitary figure of the master of the house, leaning back, listlessly composed, in a large easy-chair, with a reading-easel fastened on one of its arms, and a little table on the other.

If a man's personal appearance, when he is out of his dressing-room, and when he has passed forty, can be accepted as a safe guide to his time of life—which is more than doubtful—Mr. Fairlie was age, when I saw him, might have been reasonably computed at over fifty and under sixty years. His beardless face was thin, and worn, and unapparently pale, but not wrinkled; his nose was high and hooked; his eyes were of a dim grayish blue, large, prominent, and rather red round the rims of the eyelids; his hair was scanty, soft to look at, and of that light sandy color which is the last to disclose its own change toward gray. He was dressed in a dark frock-coat, of some substance much thinner than cloth, and in waistcoat and trousers of spotless white. His feet were effeminately small, and were clad in buff-colored Turkish slippers. The rings adorned his white delicate hands, the white cuffs were the most unexpected observation detected to be all but precious. Upon the whole, he had a frail, languidly fretful, overfinished look—something singularly and supplexantly delicate in its association with a man, and with a man who, something which could by no possibility have looked natural and appropriate if it had been transferred to the person of any other woman. My morning's experience of Miss Halcombe had predisposed me to be pleased with every body in the house; but my sympathies shut themselves up resolutely at the first sight of Mr. Fairlie.

On approaching nearer to him, I discovered that he was not occupied without occupation as I had at first supposed. Placed amidst the other rare and beautiful objects on a large round table, near him, was a dwarf cabinet in ebony and silver, containing coins of all shapes and sizes, and a little drawers lined with dark purple velvet. One of these drawers lay on the small table attached to his chair; and near, it were a pair of delicate tweezers, a wash-leather "stump," and a little bottle of liquid, all evidently ready for immediate use for the removal of any accidental impurities which might be discovered on the coins. His eyes, when I first drew near to him, were busily scanning which looked to me like a new specimen of the kind, and stopped to make my bow.

"So glad to see you at Limmeridge, Mr. Hartright," he said, in a querulous, croaking voice, which matched well with his personal in its agreeable manner, a discordantly high tone with a drowsily languid utterance. "Pray sit down. I am sorry to be unable myself to move my chair, please. In the wretched state of my nerves, movement of any kind is exquisitely painful to me. Have you seen your studio? Will it do?"

"I have just come from seeing the room, Mr. Fairlie; and I assure you—"

He lifted up his hand in the middle of the sentence, by closing his eyes, and holding up one of his white hands imploringly. I paused in astonishment, and the querulous voice honored me with this explanation:

"Pray excuse me. But could you contrive to speak in a lower key? In the wretched state of my nerves loud sound of any kind is indescribably painful to me. You will pardon an invalid ? I only say to you what the lamented master of your house said to me on his visit to every body. Yes. And you really like the room?"

"I could wish for nothing prettier and nothing more comfortable," I answered, dropping my voice to a whisper, beginning to discover already that Mr. Fairlie's selfish affectation and Mr. Fairlie's wretched nerves meant one and the same thing.

"So glad. You will find your position here, Mr. Hartright, extremely recognized. There is none of the horrid English barbarity of feeling about the social position of an artist in this house. Leonardo da Vinci, my life has been passed abroad that I have quite cost my income sketch in that country. I wish I could say the same of the gentry—detestable word, but I suppose I must use it—of the gentry in the neighborhood. Goths in Art, Mr. Hartright, Goths right. People, I do assure you, who would have opened their doors to Correggio, and who would turn Charles the Fifth pick up Titian's brush for him. Do you mind putting this tray of coins back in the cabinet during me for the next one to it? In the wretched state of my nerves exercise of any kind is unspeakably disagreeable to me. Yes. Thank you."

As a practical commentary on the liberal social theory which he had just favored me by illustrating, Mr. Fairlie's cool request rather amused me—not by its selfishness, but quite the reverse, with all possible politeness. He began trifling with the new set of coins and the English breakfast-table, and I proceeded to put them and admiring them all the time he was speaking to me.

"A thousand thanks and a thousand excuses. Do you like coins? Yes. So glad we have another taste in common besides our love for Art. Now, about the pecuniary arrangements between us. You will be very satisfactory?"

"Most satisfactory, Mr. Fairlie."

"So glad. And—what next? Ah! I remember. In reference to the considerations which you are good enough to accept for giving me the benefit of your accomplishments in my way, an steward will wait on you at the end of the first week, to ascertain your wishes. And—what next? Ah! Locks, if not? I am great deal more to say; and I appear to have quite forgotten it. Do you mind touching the bell? In that corner. Yes. Thank you."

I rang; and a new servant noiselessly made his appearance—a foreigner, with a set smile and perfectly brushed hair—a valet every inch of him.

"Louis," said Mr. Fairlie, dreamily dusting the tips of his fingers with one of the tiny brushes for the coins, "I made some entries in my tablettes this morning. Find my tablettes. Ah, thousand pardons, Mr. Hartwright. I'm afraid I bore you."

As he wearily closed his eyes again, before I could answer, and as he did most assuredly bore me, I sat silent, and looked up at the Madonna and Child by Raphael. In the mean time, the valet left the room, and returned shortly with a little ivory book. Mr. Fairlie, after first reckoning himself by a gentle sigh, let the book drop upon with one hand, and held up the tiny brush with the other, as a sign to the servant to wait for further orders.

"Yes, at last!" said Mr. Fairlie, consulting the tablettes. "Louis, take down that portfolio." He pointed, as he spoke, to a handsome port-folios placed near the window, on mahogany stands. "No. Not the one with the green backs—that contains my Zoological drawings, Mr. Hartright. Do you like etchings? Yes? I am glad we have another taste in common. The port-folio with the red back, Louis. Don't drop it! You have no idea of the torture I should suffer, Mr. Hartright, if Louis dropped that port-folio. Is it safe on the chair? Do you think it safe, Mr. Hartright? Are you glad. You will oblige me by looking at the drawings, if you really think they're quite safe. Thank you. Thank you. What an easy chair. Don't you see me holding the tablettes? Do you suppose I want to hold them? Then why do you see me of the tablettes without being told? A thousand pardons, Mr. Hartright; servants are such beings, and they not! Do tell me—what do you think of the drawings? They have come from the best artist we have. I thought they they smelled of horrid dealers' and brokers' fingers when I looked at them last. Can you undertake to do like?"

Although my nerves were not delicate enough to protect the odor of plebeian fingers from the old offended Mr. Fairlie's nostrils, my taste was sufficiently educated to enable me to appreciate the merits of the drawings, while I looked them over. They were, for the most part, really fine specimens of their kind, though not of a kind that had deserved much better treatment at the hands of their former possessor than they appeared to have received.

"The drawings," I answered, "require careful washing and mounting, and, in some places, they are well worth—"

"I beg your pardon," interposed Mr. Fairlie. "Do you mind closing my eyes while you speak? Even this light is too much for them. Yes?"

"I was about to say that the drawings are well worth all the time and trouble—"

Mr. Fairlie suddenly opened his eyes again, and rolled them with an expression of helpless pain in the direction of the ceiling.

"I entreat you to excuse me, Mr. Hartright," he said, in a feeble flutter. "But surely I hear some horrid children in the garden, or my private garden—below?"

"I don't say, Mr. Fairlie. I heard nothing myself."

"Oblige me—you have such very good intonation—by ringing the bell once—oblige me by lifting up a corner of the blind. Don't let the sun in on me, Mr. Hartright. Have you done that job? Yes? Then will you be so very kind as to look into the garden and make quite sure?"

I complied with this new request. The garden was actually walled in, all round. Not a human creature, large or small, appeared in any part of the sacred seclusion. I reported that gratifying fact to Mr. Fairlie.

"A thousand thanks. My fancy, I suppose. There are no children, thank Heaven, in the house; but the servants (persons with the coarsest nerves) will encourage the children from the village. Such brats—oh, dear me, such brats! Shall I ever forget the time when Louis's study boast a reform in the construction of children. Nurses are not to be thought of. I have them machines for the production of incessant noise. Surely our delightful Raffaello's conception is sufficiently desirable?

He pointed to the picture of the Madonna, the upper part of which represented the conventional cherubs of Italian Art, celestially provided with sitting accommodation for their chins, and perfectly well-behaved children.

"Quite a model family!" said Mr. Fairlie, leaning on his elbow. "Such calm, round faces, and such nice soft wings, and—nothing else. No dirty little legs to run about on, and no nose little dirty fingers to poke. Bliss! How immeasurably superior to the existing construction! Let me close my eyes again, if you will allow me. And you really can manage the drawings? So glad. Is there any thing else to settle? If there is, I shall be sorry to forgotten it. Shall we ring for Louis again?"

Being, by this time, quite as anxious, on my side, as Mr. Fairlie evidently was on his, to bring the interview to a speedy conclusion, I thought it would try the effect of suggesting some of the servant unnecessary, by offering the requisite suggestion on my own responsibility.

"The only point, Mr. Fairlie, that remains to be discussed," I said, "refers, I think, to the instructions to which I am expected to communicate to the two young ladies."

"Ah! just so. Very good. Mr. Hartright, I will I felt strong enough to go into that part of the arrangement—but I don't. The ladies, who study by your kind services, Mr. Hartright, must settle, and decide, and so on, for themselves. They dance in the room of your drawing art. She knows just enough about it to be conscious of her own sad defects. Please take pains with her. Yes. Is there any thing else? No. We quite understand each other—don't we? I have no right to detain you any longer from your delightful pursuit—have I? So pleasant to have settled every thing—such a sensible relief to have done business. Do you mind ringing for Louis to carry the port-folios to your own room?"

"I will carry them there, myself, Mr. Fairlie, if you will allow me."

"Will you really? Are you strong enough? How nice to be so strong! Are you sure you won't drop it? So glad to possess you at Lansmeridge, Mr. Hartright. I am such a sufferer that I hardly dare hope to enjoy much of your society. Would you mind taking great pains not to let the doors bang, and not to drop the port-folio? Thanks ... Gently with the curtains, please—the slightest noise from them goes through me like a knife. Yes. Good-morning!"

When the sea-green curtains were closed, and when the two baize doors were shut behind me, I stopped for a moment in the little circular hall beyond, and drew a long, luxurious breath of relief. It was like coming to the surface of the water, after deep diving, to find myself once more on the outside of Mr. Radcliffe's house.

As soon as I was comfortably established for the morning in my new library, I began, by way of consolation at which I arrived was to turn my steps no more in the direction of this apartments occupied by the master of the house, except on the very improbable event of his honoring me with a second invitation to pay him a professional visit. Having settled this satisfactory plan of future conduct, in reference to Mr. Fairlie, I soon recovered the serenity of mind with which my employer's haughty familiarity and impudent politeness had, for the moment, deprived me. The remaining hours of the morning passed away pleasantly enough, in looking over the drawings, arranging them in order, examining their ragged edges, and accomplishing the other necessary preparations in anticipation of the business of mounting them. Shortly after noon, to have made more progress than this; but, in the bustle-room was ever near, I grew restless and unsettled, and felt unable to fix my attention on work, even though that work was only of the humble manual kind.

At two o'clock, I proceeded according to the breakfast-room, a little anxiously. Expectations of some interest were connected with my approaching acquaintance in that quarter of the house. My introduction to Miss Fairlie was now close at hand; and, if Miss Halcombe's search through her mother's letters had produced the result which she anticipated, the time had come for clearing up the mystery of the woman in white.

HELEN LAWRENCE.

WHEN I was eighteen Helen Lawrence and her mother came to live in Hackney. I was the only boy in the house—there could not be two persons more dissimilar—but Helen and I became friends at once; and I found in a charming little girl the companion of my own age and sex. She was very pretty, in a soft, blushing, girlish way; rather short—which I admired in her the more as I was myself beyond the ordinary stature of woman, and so awfully conscious of it. Her mother's reminiscences of person and capacity were enhanced by contrast with my own shortcomings. I had grown rapidly, and was unusually thin; suppose something but an anatomical preparation could well have had less flesh on than myself. I was also high-shouldered, and had a sidling way of standing. Then my health was not robust; my face was long, narrow, and, (I used to be unmercifully) just the color of an underdone bowl-sheet pan-cake. Helen was different as possible from all this. She was plump and full, had falling shoulders, and the sweetest color. How I used to envy her cheeks! Such a fresher glow than any cochi-al-bone, and of the pearl-colored drum-sticks which, in my case, did not exist.

Well, as I said, we were constantly together, and very happy so. She helped me about my collars and under-sleeves, and showed me how to take in my dresses and do my hair in French twist; so much so, indeed, under her care, as more presentable than heretofore. She was not particularly fond of books, but she had oceans of sense: I was rather clever, but possessed no available knowledge of any kind; so we balanced each other. We used to like sitting in the window beneath the sky; once in a while we would sit in moonlight evenings on the piazza, and hold each other's hands, without saying much. I think it was the most I know about how lovers feel. I suppose their sensations are similar—"only," as I say, "more so."

My two brothers did not at all enter into our calculations. Frederic was studying law, and quite engrossed by it; and Rudcliffe, my particular favorite and especial friend, was absorbed to the end of his famous flirtation with Nelly Coan. Of course, according to his fashion, he had neither eyes nor ears for any one else but Nelly; and Helen might have been her own grandmother for all Rudcliffe cared to remember her. But the Nelly Coan affair came to an end by the middle of July, and Rudcliffe was at liberty to rest "fresh fields and pastures new." Before a month was over he was devotedly in love with Helen. After watching for a little I felt very sure how it would end, and you may guess I was delighted. She was so good, so sweet, so thoroughly reliable; she would make Rudcliffe happy, I knew. And any woman that he loved must be happy herself, of course. I sounded my mother, and cosmopolitly the announcement that was sure to come. Rudcliffe had never kept any thing of the kind from me, from his first declaration to Miss Kit Mills over the apple-barrel, when he was ten years old, all along through the host of Laura, Matildas, and Marias who had successively occupied and vacated the chambers of his heart.

About the last of September the time arrived. Rudcliffe came home one evening radiant, overflowing with joy: Helen and he were engaged! All the details of the affair were soon settled. Helen's friends, on being consulted, were very well pleased. They might have married at once; but the elders thought it better they should wait a year or two, as they were both very young—Helen eighteen, and Rudcliffe scarcely twenty-one.

Then began a very happy time for the "three of us." Helen did not come as often, but when she did arrive I kept her longer; and in the evenings, when Rudcliffe returned from the store, we had such pleasant hours together! we read generally to have them a while to themselves—for which, I dare say, they thanked me in their hearts. What with visits to the neighborhood and to the city, I fancy they had not time for many private interviews. Still, I believe they had such long times before Rudcliffe—his early days, his quickness in study, good and generous things he had done. I was not in the least jealous, dearly as I loved Rudcliffe, and only laughed a little when the clippers, which were the only fancy-work I ever did, got into a tangle, or when a world of trouble, were superseded by a pair of Helen's embroidery. Nay, I even listened complacently to Rudcliffe's excited fits of anger when decried the old, though I had been previously wont to regard such remonstrances against the Bible as the I was a charming fall and winter for us all.

Early in the spring there was a change. An old friend of our family, living some thirty miles distant, was about to retire from his business of a country merchant, and wished his own nephew and my brother to succeed him. It was an advantageous offer, and my father and mother gratefully accepted it, and left us for his new home. His estate to me very dear, and always in excellent spirits; the village was beautiful, the society agreeable, the scenery in the neighborhood very charming and romantic. I only felt sorry to leave Helen, but, I said, "I could not think of any thing to do with her."

He made us a little visit after a couple of months. I thought he had improved astonishingly. He was good about the house, and very lively when in search of pearl buttons, which had hitherto contented him, and two or three pairs of pantaloons and vests, and a dress-coat from a Broadway tailor.

The lovers were continually together; there were walks and rides and dinners and teas in company, and I was in some way aware that my girl was not a stranger seeing us might have been puzzled to know whether Rudcliffe were "paying attention" to Helen or to me. But I was sure to an end, however, as all days will, and the young people had to go.

Every thing went on well for a time. Helen had frequent letters, and so had I. We had plenty to talk about, and especially had much to do, for she had already begun that interminable work, "getting ready." I wished my girl was not really "getting" even if her courtship should be as long as Rachel's! There were the more days of delay to their coming between us.

It was, I should say, about the beginning of August that I received a letter from Rudcliffe, in which he announced, among other items, that he had met a very beautiful girl, Miss Coldbrook, at a party a few days previous, and that he thought she used to know me—did I remember any thing about her? I can not tell you how it was—or, I had not her frequently when I spent the winter in Philadelphia—but I did remember "the most beautiful girl"! Well, some might call her so. She had a strong resemblance to Helen, and, for much the same reason, plenty of paint, evenly laid on; rather insignificant features, and a port, self-confident as a well-appointed frigate. I remembered: hair black as jet, and brushed and oiled till it shone like the wet coats imported from Java—the Venus—the Parisian divinity, not the Medicean. Intended by nature to be rather dumpy, but laced by art till there was some sort of merit in the result, above which rose a billowy breadth of bust. She seemed inordinately fond of me, remembered with small fortune on it every year, and danced and flirted to perfection. A very "stylish" girl, no doubt, and which said of her by Rudcliffe was, of course there could be no danger about Rudcliffe. He was engaged, yet very much given to like the her. I wished it yet more when other letters came, in all of which her name figured conspicuously. Then I had been a guest at Miss Coldbrook's—or there; a sail on the lake, and Miss Coldbrook sang to Make me an excursion to Niagara Falls, and Rudcliffe escorted Miss Coldbrook. When, in addition to this, Helen had no letter for ten days, I grew rather uneasy.

One Saturday evening, in the beginning of September, Rudcliffe came unexpectedly. In the confusion and gladness of meeting him I quite forgot my fears. After ten he went over to see Helen, but remained only a couple of hours. The next day was Sunday; we went to church, as usual, and had a long walk in the afternoon, and, on our of tea, at five o'clock. That meal over, Rudcliffe and I took our chairs out on the piazza and smoked a while, as it was a very warm summer afternoon.

"You will go over to see Helen by-and-by, I suppose?" was my opening remark.

"Why no, I think not, as it is Sunday; I never go on Sunday, you know."

"Then it was very different; you were here all the time, and could see her every day. Now you are going early to-morrow, and may not come home again for months."

"I don't think I had better; her people are rather strict about Sunday."

I was silent; I felt very uncomfortable; I wished to ask some questions, yet thought it was not best.

"How sweetly Helen looked to-day!" I said presently. "That simple straw bonnet, with just a round-knot in the rosebe, is so becoming to her. She is like a rose-bud herself, I think."

My brother laughed. "You are romantic, Sappy," he said. "Not that you Helen is a pretty little thing. But you should see Miss Coldbrook! There is beauty for you, with all the advantages of dress and style to set it off!"

The mention of that lady's name "in this connection," as ministers have it, did not altogether suit me.

"It is not often," I said, "that a person is fortunate enough to possess a name so thoroughly descriptive."

"How do you mean? I do not understand."

"Why, the 'cold' in plain enough, I'm sure; that doesn't need elucidation. And as for the 'brook,' isn't it like the little stream below the village—both shallow and broad. Bread, I mean, to her shoulders, and shallow as to her sense."

"Sappy, how can you be so rude!" exclaimed Rudcliffe, angrily. "I But this comes of your petted infatuation for Helen Lawrence."

"I should say," I returned, coolly, "that you had as good a call to be 'infatuated' in that direction as any one else."

"Marian Coldbrook," I added, dogmatically, "is no more to be compared to Helen than a pebble is to a well of clear water."

"Sophia!" uttered Rudcliffe, in a warning voice, "remember you are talking of the woman I love."

"Oh yes," I said, out of all patience, "of the woman you think you love, and for whom, two months from now, you wouldn't give a brass straw!"

"You are mistaken," he replied, with great vehemence. "Say what you will, Sophy, and hate her for it as you may, I do love her as I never loved any one before."

"Oh, Rudcliffe, is that so?" I cried, beginning to see the drift of it all. "Can you like her better than Helen?"

He was silent a while, then answered, firmly—

"Yes, Sophy, a thousand times better."

"Oh dear! oh dear!" I said, in distress; "what will she do? Poor, poor Helen!"

He seemed moved. "Do you think," he asked, "that she will be very sorry to lose me?"

"How can you doubt it? Oh, Rudcliffe, it is too cruel! She was my friend; she didn't belong to you at all, when our thing story began; she was your cousin. You sought her, and paid her every attention, and then you said you could not live without her love; and now she has done it, this is the way you treat her—"

"I know it is hard, I know it is dreadful," he said, "but how can I help it? Can we alter our feelings as will? I don't care for Helen, and I do love Marian."

"And this, I suppose, is the reason you have written to her so often?"

"Yes. How could I write as I had done with my heart wholly full of Marian? I could not be such a hypocrite."

"I should think," I replied, bitterly, "that there was much the same between hypocrite in each caprice—such falsehood—as you have been guilty of."

"There is no good to be attained," Rudcliffe answered me, "by this perpetual accusation and dispute. We shall never color each other's opinions. The question remains—what is to be done?"

Spoiken unadvisedly, I had talked long and seriously. Rudcliffe was very sorry for Helen: very loth to pain her. He said she was the best and dearest little girl that ever lived, and the only wished she did not care so much more for him than he deserved—a wish I echoed most heartily. At last I proposed that he should say nothing to her at present; there would be only one more interview, and that was not as kindly as possible to her. After he got back to Meriden he must try to overcome his love for Marian Coldbrook as much as before, if he could without too much hypocrisy; and perhaps it would all come right in the end. But if he felt certain impossible—why, then, I supposed he must tell the truth, and we must bear the consequences.

Then weeks and weeks went by. Every day, when the mail came in, I said to Helen, "Is there a letter?" Every day she answered, "No, not yet." She was at our house one morning when the stage went by.

"There is no use in going down," she said; "there will be nothing there."

I was curious at the expression rather provoked me, though I ought to have been glad if she were growing indifferent.

"Oh! very well," I said; "I can write to Rudcliffe that you don't think his letters worth a walk to the post-office, and he will not, probably, trouble himself to send any."

"Oh, Sophy, Sophy," she answered, sadly; "but I never can help hoping I shall find one, and then when I go in and see the empty box it makes me feel worse than ever."

It was not long after that before the letter came, and poor little Helen's long suspense was over. She had hoped against hope, for I always evaded the questions she put so timidly, and she did not dare to press me more. She thought there must be some misunderstanding—that she had offended him in some way—and that he would write again and plainly set before her. She was no longer dear to him, and they must part; he hoped she would forget him, and be happier with some one more worthy of her love.

Poor Helen! She had been used to sorrow: every one had been gentle and good to her always; she was entirely unacquainted with pain, and it was hard to bear. I never saw any thing so touching as her grief, so pitiful as her attempts to bear it quietly and appear cheerful once more. She would not write to Rudcliffe herself; she asked me to tell him that he was free, and request him to return her letters. And so it was all over; all lost Helen's suffering, and the sad blight that had fallen on her life. She never would say any thing against Rudcliffe, she would not have him blamed by any one. She clothed me when I broke out sometimes with bitter reproaches toward him.

"Don't, Sophy," she would say; "you can't tell how it grieves me."

She left Hackwick that fall, and lived thenceforward in Boston.

To Radcliffe I grew reconciled by slow degrees; he had been too dear and intimate for my heart to renounce him altogether, faulty as he was.

A year or two after Helen left us I visited some friends in Boston, and in the course of my stay saw her frequently. She was altered a good deal; she was tall, and no longer girlish but womanly, and a very sweet and gracious womanhood she was. She had much and thought more; and she seemed lovelier to me than even in the first flush of her youth.

"How much you have improved, Helen!" I said to her one day.

"Do you think so?" she asked, with pleasure.

"Well, I hope I have. It would be a pity," she said, after a slight pause, "if any one should not be so much as I have done, and suffer so little."

We spent many a happy hour together, and I wished more sincerely than ever that the past could be undone, and Rudcliffe and Helen once more they stood. I ventured to hint as much to her.

"That could not be, Sophy," she answered, "even if your brother wished it, which he has never thought of doing."

"Why Helen, are you so very unforgiving?"

"Not at all; but I have had too much trouble to earn myself of loving those who have done me wrong."

The next time Rudcliffe came home I had a long talk with him, such as we had never before indulged in, about the miserable time of his separation from Helen. I did not spare him any thing: I told him all her love and suffering, and he was deeply moved. "Poor little thing!" he said. "What a brute I was! But, Sophy, you must do me the justice to believe that I never dreamed she would feel it as much. I was very much thoughtless, but not so deliberately cruel. I fancied—and, in truth, I think I was sincere—I forgive me! not more than I despise myself, though."

"No, Radcliffe, she never despised you; she forgave you at once, without your ever uttered most. What a prize you lost when you threw away such love as hers for the sake of a girl like Marian Coldbrook!"

"Yes," he said, coloring; "what a silly infatuation that was! In a few weeks I found out how been her fervent lover for months. By-the-by, I didn't tell you that I met her in Boston. I met her a few days since. She has secured 'the establishment' at last, but I pity the poor husband."

A short time afterward I went to spend the day with her. Helen took me up to her own room. I had had a letter myself that day, which I want to show you. You know you have always been my confidante." And truly it was a letter from Rudcliffe, eloquent, manly, and of it, with the best feelings of his heart. He took shame to himself for the way he forgot his true love, and for the future. If ever a man declared his love in language fitted to touch a woman's feelings he did in. He implored me would listen again at I read. From her perfect calmness I augured the best. But she shook and fell, and I, perfectly trembling with excitement, turned to her.

"I am afraid, Sophy," she said, "that you will be disappointed when you hear what I have to say."

It was a hard blow. I scarcely knew how to meet it.

"I can not complain, Helen, at any rate," I replied. "I did hope that all might be forgotten and forgiven; but I have impressed on you, you blame you. You were shamefully treated, and it is due to you that Rudcliffe should suffer what his wrongs he could, even though you have refused him."

Helen smiled. I thought it was very cruel for her to do so when she must know how I was feeling.

"Sophy," she said, "I am going to tell him —you!" I don't know which of us was happier the rest of the day.

Six months later my cousins and I were dressing for the wedding. Alicia was "doing" my hair in the latest fashion.

"And now, Miss Sophy," said she, "you'll have to stand aside. Three spoils company," we used to say when we were children, "and find it true."

"That is so," chimed in Gertrude; "you and Radcliffe have always been every thing to each other, but that is done with now. A man's family must always give place to him who from the day he married."

"I don't think so," I said.

"But you'll learn so," said Alicia.

I laughed, and defied them.

But alas! they were right. It was foolish and wild in me to dream that a man's love for a sister, though fraternal, could be as deep and strong as one to that for his wife. The one too surely crowds out the other. It was bitter for me at first, I said to myself, "I shall never be so happy for years before he ever saw her; it is too hard that I should be neglected and forgotten, and the memories of all." I went through with such feelings as I suppose all loving parents undergo when they learn that their children have ceased to love them. Rudcliffe and Helen became a great part of his time and thought; he has only stray moments, occasional remembrances, to spare for me. It is natural, it is inevitable, I suppose. It might have been so with me if I had a husband and interests of my own. Women are no more ungrateful than men are heroes; and I often think our much-praised devotion is deeply tinctured with selfishness. Our lives are monotonous and circumscribed, and we throw ourselves solemnly into any feeling that lifts us out of the tedium of our everyday round. Yes, if I had other ties, Rudcliffe might have become a mere necessary of life to me, as it is, I should feel the change and the loss most painfully at times.

And thus it was, you see, I lost my only friend; for when Radcliffe went Helen went with him. She is my good, true-hearted sister; she thinks much of me in a quiet way; she writes to me occasionally, and sends me recipes and patterns. But the tender little friend, the girl who sat with me in the moonlight years ago, is gone forever. No one loves me as she used to do, or ever will again for I am growing old in earnest, and if you know how long a time has passed since all these things I write of happened, you would start to find a face of so much sentimentalism dwelling in a heart that ought to have grown reasonable long ago.

DRESS AND ITS VICTIMS.

BY HARRIET MARTINEAU.

How can people be so blind by fashion, nowadays? many ask. We must be thinking of the old times when the ladies laced so tight that "sighs and strong waists" were a favorite subject for the sons fainting fair one as often as numbers were collected together, whether at church, in the ball-room, or the theatres. Or perhaps we are thinking of the accidents that have happened during particular jubilees of dress, as the lowering of the Marchioness of Salisbury, from her high cap nodding over the coach-roof; or the death of the Duchess Bridgeman last year, from the skirts of one of them catching fire at the grate; or the number of long coats that, during the fashion of crinoline, when a lady could scarcely dine in company, or play the piano at home, without peril of death by fire.

Perhaps it may be the heavy, toweling, Turkish dresses of the last summer we may be thinking of, bringing in a crowd of bad symptoms, headaches, congestions, fits, agues, with the fearful consequences of bleeding and reducing, which we read of in medical books, and in grappling literature, like Horace Walpole's correspondence. Or we may have even in thinking of the barbaric fashion of going long the face, and neck, and arms, of our sex into the excess of enamoling the skin. That was not at so very remote a time; for I have heard from the lips of witnesses what it was like; and a friend of mine, yet living, can tell what she saw at a concert-room in Paris before the days of the fall of broad shoulders which looked like tawny mackin—as smooth, as shining, and as little like anything human. The shoulders were more enamoled, and may have looked white in their day; but the life-long pains to preserve such appearance would serve after a certain lapse of time; and there they were, hopeless, tawny, and the quality of the skin destroyed. This passage by no means overreaches we read of in the history of the past centuries may have been unconscious or intentional. There are many plenty of unconscious passing besides.

We do not, however, mean any of these things when we speak of dress, in connection with pernicious mortality.

Perhaps I may be supposed to be referring to the notoriously afflicted and short-lived classes of milliners and sho-sewers who are worn-out and killed off in the course of dress. But I am not now going to bring forward their case, because it comes under a different head. It is a case which is not thinking of either the political economy or the general mortality of the dress question, but it should bring up the group of victims who, already enfeebled, some from hopeless poverty, some from intolerable degradation, and some from the embarrassment of gambling debts incurred for the sake of dress.

If the secrets of the city were known, we might hear of more tragedies than the theatres show, from the spread of gambling among women, and especially among servant-girls and shop-women, who have been carried beyond bounds by the extravagant fashions of the day. But I am not speaking of suicides, nor of the victims of the needle, whose case is to be given in a different article, and whose day of deliverance, too, is at hand. If the sewing-machine is the reality it appears—and not a phantasm—it will be the death of those hands. We may possibly look into that another time. But what we desire to have in view at present is how and sometimes murderous effect of dress which we see every day.

It will not seem so wonderful that the familiar clothing of our neighbors and ourselves may be of such importance when we remember the many conditions of physician—that dress may, and usually does, affect the circulation and action of every secretory department of the human frame—the brain and nervous system, the lungs, the stomach, and other organs of the trunk; the eyes, the skin, the muscles, the glandular system, the nutritive system, and even the bones. Take the clothes on which all hangs. If dress can meddle mischievously with the action, or affect the condition of all these, it can be no marvel that it is sometimes fatal in a good many of the hundred thousand needless deaths which are happening around us every day.

Putting aside the ordinary associations, as far as we can, and trying for the moment to consider what is to be desired in the clothing of the human body—what is requisite to make dress good and beautiful—let us see what is essential.

Dress should be a covering to all the parts of the body which need warmth or coolness, as the case may be. It should be a shelter from the rain, or the atmosphere, whether there be cold, or heat, or wet, or damp, or glare. This is the first requisite, for such shelter is the main purpose of clothing. In our own country the dress should easily admit of the necessary changes in degree of warmth demanded by our changeable climate.

Dress should bear a close relation to the human form. No other principle can be permanent; no other can be durably sanctioned by sense and taste, because no other has reality in it. We may fancy that we admire the old Greek and Roman robes which look dignified in Julius Cæsar on the stage and in statues, and in our own imaginations of classical times; but we could not get through our daily business in such a costume; nor should we admire the appearance of our acquaintances in it. In fact, the wearers themselves were always tucking up or putting away their troublesome wrappers when they had any thing to do, and the lazy people of society appeared in their work-shops and fields in garments which left their limbs free to use their whole body for action. On the whole, in a general way, with particular variations according to taste, the dress should follow the outline of the body. Any great deviation from this principle involves inconvenience on the one hand and deformity on the other.

Where it follows the outline of the frame it should fit accurately to fulfill its office, and should not so easily as not to embarrass action. It should neither compress the internal and external parts of the external organs. An easy fit, in short, is the requisite. It is a part of this easy fit that the weight of the clothes should be properly and equally distributed.

After the peace of 1815 it was said that gained more by the changes from the French—gloves that would fit, and the shoemakers. It would make a good fit, and would be long, and be a great comfort to the wearers, if we made due use of the shoulder-piece now. It should be considered that the weight of the garment is spread on the part best fitted to bear it, instead of being hung from the neck, as it was before we knew how to use the upper part of the waist (in the case of women's dress) as now, when we ought to know better.

